(2) I also believe Tom Reynolds, a striker, who testified that in February 1981, at the same restaurant referred to above, Zemba stated that he was disappointed that Randall and Corona were still in positions of authority with the Union. Zemba denied the statements in issue and was supported in part by Harrison, who was also present. However, I cannot credit these denials. The pattern of attacks on union leadership expressed to union rank and file is striking.[87] Also, I find that Reynolds was a credible witness on this point.[88]

I find that the statements referred to above in (1) and (2) made to strikers in the course of a long and bitter strike were designed and intended to coerce employees in the selection of their collective-bargaining representatives and therefore violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

(3) Reynolds also testified to a conversation in December with Zemba at Respondent's place of business. At this time, Zemba showed Reynolds a copy of an article in the Labor Law Journal (G.C. Exh. 68) dealing with reinstatement rights of strikers. Then giving Reynolds

[81] Thus, Ingersoll attended the contract negotiations as a member of Respondent's team; during the strike, he had several conversations with strikers that could be construed as emanating from a management figure; on April 23, 1981, at an arbitration hearing, Ingersoll described his position with the Company as transit supervisor and, along with Zemba, purported to represent Respondent at the hearing.

[85] In fact, Respondent did this and the Union agreed to an informal settlement of these charges. (See G.C. Br. 37 fn. 23.)

[86] The only case that suggests an employer may suspend negotiations with a striking union where the strike is characterized by extreme violence and vandalism is Kohler Co., 128 NLRB 1062 (1960), modified sub nom. Auto Workers Local 833 v. NLRB, 300 F.2d 699 (D.C. Cir. 1962), cert. denied 370 U.S. 911 (1962). Assuming without finding that the strike here was characterized by extreme violence and vandalism, the Kohler case is of dubious vitality. In the opinion of one authority, R. Gorman, Basic Text on Labor Law, Unionization & Collective Bargaining, 438 (1976), Kohler has been superceded by two Supreme Court decisions, Drake Bakeries v. Bakery Workers Local 50, 370 U.S. 254 (1962), and NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736 (1962). Accordingly, Kohler does not help Respondent in this case.

[87] In addition to detesting Corona because of her union office, Zemba also apparently objected strongly to Corona's sexual preference, a subject he also addressed in this conversation with Reynolds.

the impression that he was basing his statement on the article, Zemba stated that anyone on the picket line when misconduct occurred or when he and Harrison were called names would not be returned to work when the strike was over.

I find that this statement was made and violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. It was an erroneous statement of the law relative to reinstatement of strikers and it was also designed to coerce employees in the course of their protected activities.[89] Attempting to make all pickets responsible for the misconduct of one or few would effectively tend to break the strike, where any misconduct had or might occur.

(4) The final allegation relates to a statement allegedly made to employees by Flo Ybarra, director of safety and training at the relevant time. According to Robert DeEstrada, employed by Respondent in January 1981 as a school busdriver, Ybarra held a meeting for nonstriking employees in early February. At this meeting ostensibly called to discuss employee parking and a coming employee party, Ybarra stated that the Union was finished and that the strikers would be given only part-time work when they returned from the strike. This was in response to a question from an employee concerned about his job tenure if the strike were to be settled.

Ybarra denied making the statement in question, but I find that she did make the statement. DeEstrada worked for Respondent only a short time after this meeting. Although he was not involved in the passions of the protracted strike, he was fired by Ybarra because of an accident that DeEstrada had with an Aztec schoolbus. Despite this possible motive to fabricate, I believed him. Moreover, Ybarra did not here or elsewhere in her testimony impress me as a credible witness. In discussing the return of the strikers referred to in paragraph 22(a) of the fourth consolidated amended complaint below, I will return to the question of Ybarra's credibility. It suffices to say for now that I cannot credit her denial.[90] I discredit Ybarra even though she was generally corroborated by two nonstriking drivers, Michael Comfort and Ellen Huffman. The former testified he could not recall Ybarra's making the comments in question. The latter testified that Ybarra did not make the statement at issue. In light of all evidence in this case, and specifically that relating to Ybarra's credibility, I credit DeEstrada here.

Having found that Ybarra made the statement in question, I also find that the statement violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.[91] The remark was clearly coercive. By suggesting that the Union was no longer capable of representing members of the unit, Ybarra interfered with the free exercise of employee rights. In addition, to suggest that strikers would come back only as part-time employees also tended to undermine the status of the Union.

In conclusion of this section, I note that Respondent raises two general defenses to the charges discussed. First, at 605-606 of its brief, Respondent contends that the statements in issue are only isolated on minor events. Even if this claim were accurate, which it is not because the statements were significant violations of the Act, the defense of de minimis has fallen into disrepute and it no longer appears to have vitality under Board law.[92]

Similarly without merit is Respondent's claim (Br. 606-608) that the statements in question were protected under Section 8(c) of the Act. I have found the statements to be threats of reprisals for protected activity or otherwise calculated to undermine the status of the Union. Accordingly, they are not protected under Board law.[93]

[90] Toward the end of the case, a witness named Karen Boyd testified. She was a busdriver instructor for an Aztec competitor, and sometime after July 1981, contacted Ybarra relative to references for five Aztec strikers who had applied for employment at the competitor. Ybarra told her that the employees were troublemakers and to leave them and forget them. The witness hired the employees anyway and at a luncheon in December 1981, Ybarra expressed surprise to the witness that she had hired the Aztec employees. Ybarra denied these remarks. However, the witness knew her for 3 years, was a friend and neighbor, and had absolutely no reason to fabricate. I credit Boyd's account and find, based on this example and other evidence, that Ybarra's credibility is not high.

On April 27, 1981, a group of several returning strikers accompanied by Union President Moore and Chief Shop Steward Corona reported for work at Aztec. One of those in this group was Mary Mason, a witness at the hearing. She was given an employment application by Harrison and told to fill it out in part (R. Tr. 62). Later, Ybarra told her to fill it out totally. Mason, an Aztec employee since 1972, was then told to get a physical examination from Dr. Carey, the Company's physician, to get a DMV printout of her driving record, and to take an open-book test. Mason did as she was told. Two weeks later she was called back to Aztec and told by Harrison that Dr. Carey found a medical problem with Mason's back that disqualified her from returning to work as a busdriver. (G.C. Exh. 51.) Shortly thereafter, Mason was examined by her own physician who found her qualified to return to work. (G.C. Exh. 52.) Prior to her examination by Dr. Carey, Mason had a current medical examiner's certificate dated May 15 and valid for 2 years. (G.C. Exh. 50.) Ybarra told her she still needed to be examined by Dr. Carey because she had been off work for longer than 6 weeks. Ultimately, Mason returned to work in September 1982.

Another returning striker in this initial group was Jose Tovar. While undergoing all the rigors as described by Mason, he was also required to take a driving test, which he did. Subsequently, Tovar was told by Ybarra that he had failed the driving test. The next day, he retook the test with a different driver and he was told that he had failed again. In two subsequent days, each time with a different driver, Tovar took another driving test and each time was told that he failed. All the drivers assigned to grade Tovar were nonstriking employees. When Tovar complained of this to Harrison, he was subsequently taken back and worked as a schoolbus driver until school recessed for the summer. Tovar asked Ingersoll whether Tovar could work as a replacement driver on Aztec's transit routes during the summer. Ingersoll denied the request, saying that he did not have time to requalify him. In September 1981, Tovar was called back to work at Aztec.[95]

Another returning striker who testified was Philip Gress. Prior to the strike he had been a schoolbus driver and driver-trainer. After returning to work in April 1981, he was laid off for the entire summer. Normally he would have worked at least part of the summer as a trainer. When recalled in September 1981, Gress did not return as he felt he was under too much stress. As examples of this, he related how on two occasions he found live rounds of ammunition in his mailbox at work. Another example was a remark made by Hokstad to him shortly after Gress returned to work. "You got a lot of balls wearing a union pin in here." Then Hokstad remarked that this is a nonunion shop and further stated to some of the other nonstriking drivers, "Let's go find where he parked his car." Other similar incidents were also described.[96]

[94] I have omitted one sentence of the Union's letter as it deals with the typographical error referred to above.

[95] Although Tovar returned to work in September 1981, he did not participate in a "shake-up," i.e., a bidding procedure on bus routes based on strict driver seniority held on July 22, 1981. Ybarra testified that she had left messages on two occasions with Tovar's sister, the phone contact listed in Tovar's records. The record is unclear why Tovar did not receive the message nor does the record show exactly how Tovar was prejudiced; however, I will recommend to the Board that the latter issue at least be resolved at compliance.

[96] At the hearing, I noted and remarked for the record that the witness seemed to be a mild-mannered individual. (Tr. 10,364.) Some of the

Continued

Another returning striker who testified was Marian Young. Apparently, she was not part of the April 27 group referred to above, but returned to work later. Like Gress, she found live rounds of ammunition in her work mailbox.[97] She also had an argument with a nonstriking male driver over a route assignment. In December 1981, she and two other returning strikers, Shirley Rudy and Diane Macklin, were in a training class to qualify as transit drivers. Suddenly Kitty O'Brien, who had replaced Ybarra as the training supervisor, said the training class would be discontinued and she did not know when it would resume. As a result, Young was not permitted to bid at a December 1981 shakeup. According to the witness, certain transit drivers with less seniority were permitted to bid on and receive transit routes while she continued as a schoolbus driver.

O'Brien testified that Young's training was interrupted due to an increase in O'Brien's responsibilities when some strikers returned in December 1981. After this problem was taken care of, Aztec no longer needed any additional transit drivers at that time and the class was not resumed.

The final witness from the nonmisconduct strikers was Wendell Pyatt, who had been a part-time employee before the strike. He apparently returned to work for the first time in September, just before school began. Like those who had returned from the strike earlier, he was required to undergo a physical examination and obtain a DMV report. Harrison showed him two letters that had earlier been sent to him at a wrong address, apparently a prior address. His W-2 statement for 1980 had been sent to the correct address.

On cross-examination, the witness testified that he had been notified by Corona to report for work at Aztec. He could not report at this time, because he was going to school. He then called Schultz, who promised to send him a letter which he never received. He called Schultz back two additional times, but he was not there.[98]

2. Analysis and conclusion

I begin by finding that the Union's letter of April 3, 1981 (G.C. Exh. 23), recited above, was an unconditional offer to return to work.[99] On receipt of this letter, the burden was on the Employer to offer reinstatement to employees for whom positions were available.[100] In this case, Respondent has never claimed that employees were not taken back because permanent replacements were hired. Thus, it is important to understand that the status of the strikers was that of employees during the strike. The strikers were entitled to immediate reinstatement once their unconditional offer was received by Respondent[101] and this status continued until the employee obtained other regular and substantially equivalent employment.[102]

The question next becomes whether Aztec's response was consistent with the immediate reinstatement requirements of the law. Clearly, Respondent has fallen short by "two and a half country miles."[103] I will find below that the 5-day delay period does not apply here; therefore, the strikers were entitled to reinstatement not later than April 4, 1981. Yet, Respondent did not even reply to the Union's offer until April 21, 1981. (G.C. Exh. 34.)[104] The content of the reply like the inordinate time to receive it also fell far short.

In its letter of April 21, 1981, Respondent referred to a list of strikers "who may be entitled to reinstatement if they choose to comply with existing requirements as to notice, providing print-outs, meeting physical examination requirements, and meeting requalification requirements." (Emphasis added.) Thus, even those strikers who comply with all existing requirements as listed, including one not explicitly stated, i.e., the completion of a job application form, received only a limited promise from the Employer. That is, the strikers may be entitled to reinstatement. To me, this conveys the notion that the employer reserves the right to add other conditions later or to reject returning strikers for unstated reasons. Accordingly, I find that Respondent's entire procedure for reinstating the returning strikers listed in paragraph 22(a) of the complaint, Appendix A to this decision, did not comport with Board law and that Respondent's backpay obligation continues to run.[105]

Starting with the employment application, I note the case of NLRB v. Robinson Freight Lines, 251 F.2d 639 (6th Cir. 1958). There, an employer required returning strikers to fill out new employment applications allegedly pursuant to instructions from the Interstate Commerce Commission. The strikers refused to sign the applications and the court enforced the Board's Order finding that they had never been offered unconditional reinstatement. The court also held that in light of all surrounding circumstances, the strikers had reason to believe that their status as old employees, together with their seniority harassment from the nonstriking drivers was not reported to management, and Gress may have been the only returning driver who did not continue working for Respondent. Because there is no evidence to suggest that Gress was singled out for special harassment, I leave to compliance the question whether he willfully failed to mitigate damages by not returning to Respondent in September 1981.

[97] When these events were reported to Zemba, he prepared and distributed to employees, a memo threatening to fire any persons responsible for harassment against returning strikers. During the hearing, the name of a person surfaced as possibly the responsible culprit. The individual named was questioned by management and denied the charge. No disciplinary action was taken.

[98] The record does not show how long the witness was prevented from returning to work because he was attending school. Nor does the record show what arrangements were to be reflected in the letter Schultz promised to send, but which the witness never received. These are all matters for compliance.

In this case all returning strikers apparently completed the new applications.[106] This fact makes it no less onerous as the strikers had no choice under the circumstances. I reject Respondent's claim that it was merely attempting to update their personnel files. All surrounding circumstances indicate to me that Respondent intended to affect the status of the strikers as current employees. The use of physical examinations was also used by Respondent in an unlawful and discriminatory manner. The Board has held that the imposition of such requirements treats the discriminatee as an applicant for employment and, thus, renders an offer of employment suspect.[107] The taking of driving or open-book tests, and obtaining of DMV records are similarly improper prior conditions to the immediate reinstatement of strikers.

In this case, it is claimed that the Union agreed to these requirements. (G.C. Exh. 35.) There is no credible evidence that the Union waived the rights of its members—assuming that it had the power to do so. On the other hand, the Union admitted that it had agreed to the conditions for inclusion in the new collective-bargaining agreement. (G.C. Exh. 36.) On March 26, 1981, Neeper first presented the Company's proposal containing sections 9.7, 9.8, 9.9, and 17.8. Although Neeper stated that the Company intended these provisions to apply to returning strikers, the Union never agreed to this. The Union always took the position that strikers should return in accord with Board law.

Respondent further contends that the conditions imposed by Respondent on the returning strikers were required by DOT regulations and were simply matters of administrative convenience inconsequential at worst. As to the latter argument, the cases cited above, if not common sense, show that the conditions imposed by Respondent were substantial burdens on returning strikers. Moreover, strikers such as Young, Rudy, and Macklin have not had their seniority treated with proper deference under the facts of the case.

Respondent's claim that it was merely following DOT rules and regulations is similarly without merit. In this respect, I quote from Respondent's brief at 496:

> These [medical examinations, etc.] were standards applied to all employees working at Aztec at that time. As such, they were not conditions of the reinstatement offer. These requirements applied to all employees and were based upon valid business reasons and requirements of law. They were put into effect substantially, before any offers of reinstatement to the strikers were made.

The General Counsel argues (at Br. 49 fn. 41) that the circumstances of Respondent's change in policy to require physical examinations and testing is a unilateral change in violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. The General Counsel concedes that the alleged violation was not in the complaint, but asks either to permit amendment of the complaint or to make a finding on the evidence adduced. I choose the latter procedure. I find that the matter was fully litigated and that the subject matter of the alleged violation is closely related to the allegations of the complaint.[108] I further find that the section of Respondent's brief quoted above puts the matter in sharp focus.

Both Ybarra and Harrison testified that the conditions in issue were implemented by the Company in October or November. There is no evidence of notice to or bargaining with the Union with respect to these matters. Ybarra in particular testified that she was advised by a representative of a bus transportation trade association to implement the changes based on what the representative said were recent DOT rules and regulations.

Assuming without finding that these regulations apply to Respondent, a primarily intrastate carrier, they are of no help to Respondent's case. First, the regulations specifically address only the medical examination issue leaving the employment application and open-book and driving tests without any basis at all. (G.C. Exhs. 64, a, b, c, and d.) As to the medical tests, both Mason and Tovar had valid medical certificates when they were ordered to take another physical as a condition of reinstatement. Thus, as to them, section 391.45 is specifically not applicable.[109] However, Ybarra testified that as to them and others who may be similarly situated, Respondent relies on section 391.1 (G.C. Exh. 64b)[110] by which Respondent sought to make more stringent regulations than those specifically authorized. Of course, no administrative regulation is valid authority to make unilateral changes where there was a duty to give notice to the Union and an opportunity to bargain.[111] Because this did not occur there, I find that in October or November, when the policies in question were implemented, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.[112] Because of this violation, Respondent's claim that conditions imposed on returning strikers were imposed on all employees where applicable, without discrimination, has a hollow ring to it.

[106] Any returning strikers who failed to comply with Respondent's unlawful conditions could be faced at compliance with an allegation from Respondent that they failed to mitigate damages.

But Respondent's attempted defense must fail, not only because it was implemented in an unlawful manner, but also because it is otherwise without merit. It has been shown above that the regulations of an administrative agency cannot be interpreted to defeat the rights of returning strikers to immediate reinstatement. To hold otherwise would effectively undercut the protected status of a lawful strike and the protected status of strikers as continuing employees.[113]

In sum, I find that the employees listed in "Appendix A" never received an unconditional offer to return to work. The conditions imposed on them were unlawful and without a legal basis. Because the offer of reinstatement tendered by the Employer was conditional, backpay was not tolled. Moreover, the failure of Respondent to reinstate the strikers listed in "Appendix A" properly violates Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.[114] Finally, I find that the usual 5-day delay before backpay is to begin would not apply in this case, because the Employer attached unlawful conditions to the return of the strikers. Accordingly, backpay will commence as of the unconditional offer to return to work. Because the letter of April 3, 1981, was delivered by messenger on that day, backpay will commence as of April 4, 1981.[115]

G. The Alleged Unlawful Refusal to Reinstate the Strikers Unconditionally (Alleged Resignations and Misconduct)

1. Preliminary observations and facts

After receiving the Union's unconditional offer to return to work, Respondent refused to reinstate approximately 10 strikers who allegedly resigned or otherwise abandoned employment during the term of the strike. Respondent also refused to reinstate approximately 62 strikers because the strikers participated in various unprotected acts of strike misconduct either on the picket line, or in some cases, away from the picket line. In either case, it is claimed by Respondent that because the misconduct was committed within the context of the strike, the various strikers are not entitled under the law to reinstatement. Because the facts vary as to each striker, it will be necessary, with a few exceptions, to consider each striker separately. The only exception will be in those few cases in which two individuals are alleged to have been together constantly on the picket line so that the evidence of one will almost always apply to the other.

As reflected above, the strike here began at 12:01 a.m. on August 23. It was perhaps not the longest, nor the most violent and bitter, labor dispute in American history, but the evidence in this case reflecting on the conduct of the strike can only be characterized as appalling. Without in any way attempting to minimize nor condone the unlawful labor practices committed by the Employer, the behavior of some pickets was outrageous. I will find below various acts of misconduct including physical assaults, spitting on cars or persons, the throwing of eggs or other objects at vehicles or persons, threats of great physical harm, a continuous barrage of the most vile obscenities and sexual innuendoes imaginable directed primarily at Harrison and Zemba, and other acts of petty harassment such as the opening of bus emergency doors and the repeated blocking of buses and other vehicles.

To be sure, the misconduct that occurred was not limited to the strikers. Nonstriking employees also committed various acts of misconduct against strikers including physical assaults, spraying of ammonia or other liquid, use of obscenities and racial epithets, occasional egg throwing, use of weapons such as tire irons, crowbars, or knives to threaten strikers and most commonly, speeding into or out of the Aztec yard in such a manner as to threaten or, in a few cases, to actually hit a striker or a member of a striker's family. The Union has raised the issue of condonation, because virtually none of the nonstriker misconduct was punished by company management. In some cases, this misconduct was unknown to management, but the lack of knowledge raises the additional issue of whether management deliberately intended to remain ignorant. In one case, Schultz, then Aztec's second highest ranking official, used his own funds to bail out of jail a nonstriker who had been arrested and charged with a serious offense against a striker. As the issue of misconduct itself, the issue of condonation will have to be carefully considered and weighed for its effect on the case of individual strikers. Also relevant for the same purpose is the effect of the Employer's unfair labor practices found in other sections of this opinion.[116]

I find now and will support below with detailed analysis that the nonstriker misconduct was substantially less than that committed by strikers. In addition, in all or most cases of nonstriker misconduct, there was some element of direct and immediate provocation by strikers that caused the nonstrikers to believe that self-defense was required. In many cases, the purported self-defense was an overreaction to the perceived threat. Nowhere was this more true than in the cases of nonstriker vehicles speeding into or out of the yard. For those persons, either management or nonstrikers, blocked from entering or leaving the yard by a mass of pickets, some unpleasant episodes were likely to occur.

Considering the length of the strike and its violent character, it is truly amazing that no serious injuries resulted. Serious property damage, particularly to cars and buses did occur, however. Police were frequently called to the picket line for one reason or another and occasional arrests were made. These arrests in turn led in some cases to convictions that I will consider where applicable. Various persons have civil lawsuits in progress and I will also detail these as factors to be weighed in judging credibility.

[112] The fact that a strike was in progress does not affect Respondent's duty to give notice and an opportunity to bargain on the proposed changes. In this case, there is reason to believe that the changes in policy were designed to disparage and undermine the Union. Flowers Baking Co., 169 NLRB 738 (1968), enfd. 418 F.2d 244 (5th Cir. 1969).

Most of the picket line activities in issue here occurred at Respondent's bus yard on Twain Avenue in San Diego. To better understand the geography, I note a sketch of the area prepared by the parties to the case. (See diagram A below.) Some additional picket line activity occurred in a downtown area of Chula Vista, a suburb of San Diego served by Respondent's transit division and at the Chula Vista bus yard.

(Diagram A)

When the strike started, it was early on a Saturday morning. Yelkey was on the picket line as were a number of pickets, well in excess of 100. Thereafter, the number of pickets varied until mid-December when in observance of Union Solidarity Day, another episode of mass picketing occurred. After this, the number of pickets declined gradually.

During the course of the strike, Harrison repeatedly encouraged nonstrikers to submit written reports to management of strike-related incidents. Harrison's pleas met with mixed success: she submitted no written incident reports because she was too busy with other matters. Harrison described several incidents of serious misconduct that she either observed or was the victim of. As to other incidents of misconduct, some witnesses at hearing prepared and submitted the reports and some did not. In many cases, oral reports of the incident were conveyed to Harrison, Zemba, or Schultz.

From time to time during the strike, meetings of company management were held. At these meetings, various incidents of misconduct together with the alleged perpetrators were discussed. After the Union submitted its unconditional offer to return to work, Zemba, Harrison, and legal counsel met to discuss individual strikers. The final decision as to which strikers should be offered reinstatement was a collective decision. Reviewed at that time were the personal knowledge of Zemba and Harrison based on their own observations and experiences, their knowledge of events based on the oral reports of nonstrikers or other members of management, and their knowledge based on various written reports. In addition to the incident reports referred to above, Zemba and Harrison reviewed logs prepared by the private security guards (R. Br. 57, 58) and logs kept by Aztec dispatchers (R. Br. 71) who were normally the first persons to whom an incident of misconduct would be reported. In addition to all the above, Harrison had devised during the strike a card index file (G.C. Exhs. 65a–ooo) as a means of collecting and summarizing reports of misconduct on individual strikers. The information collected and the meetings held were inexact and subject to some discrepancies. However, on balance, I am satisfied that when coupled with the testimony of the witnesses at hearing, the process was adequate to prove not only those who were guilty of serious misconduct during the strike but also those who were not. Before turning to consider the case of those charged with misconduct, I begin with the smaller group of those who are alleged to have resigned or otherwise abandoned their employment during the strike.

2. Analysis and conclusions (resignations)

In determining whether strikers resigned from their jobs during a strike such as to preclude them from reinstatement at its conclusion, the Board requires the party challenging the employee status of a striker to "affirmatively show by objective evidence" that the striker has abandoned an interest in his struck job. See Harowe Servo Controls, 250 NLRB 958, 964 (1980). Neither an employee's acceptance of other employment nor his resignation in order to accept other employment will automatically establish an intent to abandon a striker's original job. "The nature of the evidence which may rebut the presumption will be determined on a case-by-case basis." Ibid, quoting from Pacific Tile & Porcelain Co., 137 NLRB 1358, 1359–1360 (1962). And see Coca-Cola Bottling Co., 232 NLRB 794 (1977).

Although resignations in order to accept other jobs during a strike do not automatically eliminate a striker from being considered for reinstatement, where the resignations are voluntary and neither coerced nor caused by an employer's misconduct, the employer may rely on such resignations and conduct his business affairs accordingly. See Beverage-Air Co., 185 NLRB 168, 170 (1970); P. B. R. Co., 216 NLRB 602 (1975); and Mississippi Steel Corp., 169 NLRB 647, 663 (1968).

Although not all strikers who allegedly resigned in this case did so to accept other employment, the above cases are nevertheless helpful to the instant analysis. I turn now to the individual strikers.

a. Dana Banning

Zemba did not know Banning, but believed he was denied reinstatement due to his resignation. Banning picketed regularly for about the first 2 weeks of the strike. Following this period, Banning picketed weekends only until November, when he secured other employment. Between November and January 1981, Banning picketed only once a month. After February, Banning resumed picketing about once a week. At no time did Banning ever tell anyone that he was resigning his employment at Aztec.

In its brief at 437, Respondent argues that Banning was denied reinstatement because he had resigned. Then, apparently because there is no evidence to support this claim, Respondent discusses only the alleged strike misconduct of Banning. Because this evidence, such as it is, was never relied on by Respondent as a basis for refusing reinstatement, it is irrelevant to this proceeding and I decline to discuss it. I will, however, note that it is trivial and inadequate to preclude reinstatement. I find that Banning is entitled to reinstatement and backpay.

b. Leslie Carr

This person did not testify at the hearing.[117] However, Schultz, his supervisor, testified that prior to September 15, he received a call from Carr who stated that he would not be returning to Aztec. Schultz inquired as to whether Carr was going to take a job as a police officer, a job Carr had previously expressed some interest in. Carr said no, but that he had something else that he was trying to get into. Either before or after this call, Schultz received a telephone request from a school district asking for an employment reference on Carr. Carr's phone call was reported to Harrison and subsequently conveyed to Zemba. During the course of the strike, there is no evidence that Carr picketed or even appeared near any picket line.

[117] Because there was no explanation for his absence, I draw an adverse inference from Carr's failure to testify. However, I would decide his case in favor of Respondent even without the adverse inference.

I find that during the course of the strike, Carr resigned and is not entitled to reinstatement or backpay.

c. Darryl Conyer

According to Zemba, several weeks after the strike began, Conyer called him and said that he was going to New Jersey to look for painting work and would not be coming back. Conyer allegedly apologized for his misconduct on the picket line. Conyer admitted the call, but denied saying that he would not be back or apologizing for strike misconduct. Conyer testified that he specifically told Zemba the trip was temporary and that he would be back. Conyer also testified that Zemba stated, "plan to be gone for at least 7 months. That's how long the strike is going to last." Zemba denied saying this and also denied Conyer's testimony that in March 1981, after the latter's return, he talked to Zemba who stated that Conyer would be permitted to return to work.

Conyer was 22 years of age and prior to the strike had been the coach of Respondent's baseball team. I cannot believe that he told Zemba he was leaving San Diego for good nor that he apologized for strike misconduct. Conyer had relatives in New Jersey, but he had no way of knowing whether he would be able to find work there. When he was unable to find work there, he left the State about Thanksgiving time and went to Texas where he remained until January 1981. Then he returned to San Diego where he resumed picketing and collecting strike benefits from the Union. I believe Conyer's testimony that Zemba told him he would be able to return to work.

In its brief at 438–446, Respondent seems to rest its case on Conyer's alleged misconduct. Yet, Respondent also states flatly (Br. 438), "Conyer was denied reinstatement because he abandoned interest in employment at Aztec.[118] I find that the record does not reflect that Conyer abandoned his position[119] and that he is entitled to reinstatement and backpay.

d. Thomas Doty

This individual had originally gone on strike, then decided to cross the picket line and return to work. According to Harrison, on September 12, Doty hand-delivered the following letter to her at the Aztec accounting office:

> 9-12-80
> Aztec Bus Lines
> 4437 Twain Ave.
> San Diego Cal.
> To Management
> The strike at Aztec Buslines is having, has put mental and physical affect on my body. I can not preform my work as a driver at the best of my ability while this strike is going on.
> This letter is to inform you why I didn't show for work on 9-11-80.
> Until there is a decision or ruling on this strike whether the Union is in or out I can not mentally and physically work for Aztec Bus Lines.
> [G.C. Exh. 76.]

Although he denied so stating, I find that when Doty gave the letter to Harrison, he said he was quitting due to the strain of the strike. I also find that there was a brief discussion between Harrison and Doty as to the procedures for converting from a group health plan to an individual plan. A few hours later Doty returned with a woman who said she was his wife. She told Harrison that Doty had been under great strain but was not quitting. She demanded the letter back from Harrison, but the latter refused to return it. Doty later that day consulted with counsel for the Union and was advised to write Respondent a letter to clarify his intention. He then wrote a letter to Respondent that was received by them a few days later and reads as follows:

> Aztec Bus Lines
> 4437 Twain Ave.
> San Diego, Cal.
> To Management
> The letter that you received from Thomas G. Doty on 9-12-80 was not a letter of resignation.
> /s/ Thomas G. Doty
> [G.C. Exh. 77.]

After September 12, Doty never rejoined the picket line but made occasional visits there for social purposes. He also obtained a part-time job. When he returned to work, he resigned from the Union to avoid discipline for crossing the picket line. After September 12, Doty withdrew his resignation and paid his union dues out of the strike benefit of $50 per week. The balance was returned to the Union as a contribution to a general welfare fund.

"Where a striker has directly communicated to the [struck] employer his intention to quit . . . there must be some showing of reservation or qualification or continued interest before the Board will ignore that stated intention."[120] Here, I find sufficient showing of reservation in the letter handed to Harrison on September 12. Doty was leaving only until there was a decision or ruling on whether the Union is in or out. Of course, it could be reasonably argued that the letter on the whole was an ambiguous expression of Doty's intent. It is clear, however, the letter on its face did not manifest a clear intention to quit permanently. Subsequent events, although not determinative, are at least a factor to be considered. Doty's return within a few hours with his wife to disavow any intention to resign is consistent with my finding that he did not resign. Sending the second letter after consultation with counsel is entitled to less weight, but like Doty's withdrawal of his resignation from the Union, these are factors supporting my conclusion.

[118] Because there is no valid issue over Conyer's alleged misconduct, I decline to summarize or evaluate it.

[120] Foote & Davies, Inc., 262 NLRB 238 fn. 4 (1982).

In the alternative, I find that even if the first letter, when construed with Doty's statements to Harrison at the time of delivery, is deemed to be sufficient to manifest an intent to resign, I nevertheless conclude that the attempted resignation was ineffective. I must conclude that Doty was so affected by the stress and pressure of the strike, particularly after deciding to cross the picket line and return to work, that his decision to resign was not the product of an unfettered will, and that the decision cannot be found to have been voluntary.[121] Accordingly, I find that Doty is entitled to reinstatement and backpay.

e. Bert Dredden

When the strike started, Dredden was on a layoff status. On the first day of school, September 10, Dredden routinely reported for work and was assigned a schoolbus route. He worked that day and the following day failed to appear, leaving the schoolchildren on his route at least temporarily unattended. He never reported for work thereafter and never communicated with anyone in management about his intentions. Dredden never picketed either before or after his single day of work and never received strike benefits from the Union. Neither did he formally resign from the Union, but he stopped paying union dues in June. According to Dredden's testimony, he did visit the picket line from time to time. No other witness supports this claim. He also testified that a striker, John Kipple, convinced him not to report to work after the first day.

Under normal conditions, an employee who returns to work for 1 day after a layoff and never returns without any explanation would clearly have quit his job. In this case, a strike was in progress. Yet, there is no credible evidence that Dredden supported the strike: no picketing, no union dues, no strike benefits, and no statements to union officials nor to company officials expressing Dredden's intention to support the strike. In light of this evidence, or lack thereof, Dredden's self-serving testimony that he visited the picket line about once a week—even if I were to credit it—is not enough. I find that he abandoned his employment and he is not entitled to reinstatement or backpay.[122]

f. Gerald Marks

Zemba testified that about 1 week after the strike started, Marks called him on the telephone and stated that he was resigning in order to work at Sundance, a competitor of Aztec. About 1 month later, Zemba was talking to an official of Sundance when Marks got on the line and stated he was happy working for Sundance.

Marks never testified in the proceeding so I rely in part on an adverse inference to find for Respondent. Even without the adverse inference, I credit Zemba's testimony and find that Marks resigned and is not entitled to reinstatement and backpay.

g. Suhley Ozgundez

Prior to the strike, Ozgundez was serving a disciplinary suspension as a result of an accident with a bus. Although on suspension in the summer, he agreed with Schultz to return in September. The witness produced a note from Schultz dated July 10, saying that the witness could bid, in an August 25 shakeup, in order based on his existing seniority. (G.C. Exh. 79.) On or about August 20 Ozgundez did bid on a route and even took a dry run with another driver to familiarize himself with his assigned route. Due to the strike beginning on August 23, he did not actually start his run. Once the strike started, Ozgundez picketed sporadically because he was attending school and because he obtained another job at the San Diego Unified School District. He did not return to a job at a bank, as he had quit there in anticipation of returning to Aztec. Each month of the strike, the witness paid his union dues; on the single occasion, he received strike benefits from the Union, he returned the check to the Union as an offset against his union dues.

There is little doubt here that Ozgundez did not resign or otherwise abandon his employment. In reliance on the note of Schultz, Ozgundez quit his job at a bank, and attempted to bid on a new bus route. But for the intervening strike, he would have begun his new job. There is no direct evidence that Ozgundez resigned. The mere fact that he took another job during the strike is not sufficient to rebut his continued status as an employee.[123] I recommend that Ozgundez be reinstated with backpay.

h. Abraham Planje

Respondent contends that Planje resigned. In its brief at 446–447, Respondent discusses some alleged misconduct that is trivial and irrelevant to the issue of resignation. According to Zemba, he and Harrison were having lunch at a nearby Jack-in-the-Box Restaurant. Planje came up to them and stated he resigned because he was then working for a cement truck delivery company. Planje also allegedly apologized for his picket line misconduct.

Planje denied this testimony of Zemba. I credit Planje and find that he is entitled to reinstatement and backpay. I note that Zemba could not specify the date of the alleged conversation and Harrison never testified on the matter after Planje's denial. In conclusion, I note that during the course of the hearing, Planje was reinstated by Respondent. I find that Planje is entitled to reinstatement and backpay.

i. Cheryl Reid

According to Zemba, although he could not recall Reid, he believed that she had resigned. Reid went on strike and picketed for about the first 3 weeks. Reid then stopped picketing and did nothing until April 1981, when she took a job with a tour company. Reid continued to work there until January 1982. At this time she was offered and accepted reinstatement with Respondent.

[121] Not only does the wording of the letter, G.C. Exh. 76, support this conclusion, but also Doty's continuing change of position and virtual inability to articulate clearly just what he wanted.

[122] See Smith Alarm Systems, 209 NLRB 835 (1974).

[123] In fact, even where a striker formally resigns to take another job, this does not preclude reinstatement unless there is also unequivocal evidence of intent to sever permanently the striker's employment relationship. See Harowe Servo Controls, 250 NRLB 958, 964 (1980).

I find that Reid is entitled to reinstatement and backpay. Though she stopped picketing after 3 weeks, she continued to pay union dues and, in a sense, received strike benefits as well. On receipt of the $50 per week check from the Union, she endorsed it and handed it back to the Union for use in the general welfare fund. In addition, she occasionally attended union meetings as well. I find insufficient evidence to show any resignation.

j. Jean Umphreys

Umphreys resigned from Aztec in the third week of September 1980. In a position paper submitted to the General Counsel on or about September 4, 1981, Respondent through its attorneys, said this about Umphreys:

> On October 3, 1980, Ms. Umphreys contacted the Employer and voluntarily resigned. Prior to that time, Ms. Umphreys was not observed to have engaged in strike activity. Thus she was not a striker and did not have a right to unconditionally offer to return to work on April 3, 1981. Therefore, the Employer was under no obligation to offer Ms. Umphreys reinstatement. [G.C. Exh. 78, p. 13, par. 33.]

All the above is fairly curious and puzzling because at the hearing, Zemba spent much time detailing Umphreys' alleged misconduct. Then, just to be sure what Respondent's position was, I asked Zemba the following question:

> Q. Did her resignation, alleged resignation, play any role in the failure to reinstate her?
> A. No.

In light of the ambiguity raised above, I cannot fairly determine the reason Umphreys was denied reinstatement. Accordingly, I must resolve the ambiguity against Respondent as the one responsible for creating it and order Umphreys reinstated with backpay.

Alternatively, I consider her case on the merits. If she was denied reinstatement because she resigned as Respondent contends in part in its brief, but Zemba denied at hearing, then the evidence is as follows. According to Zemba, in September, he received a phone call from Umphreys, who stated she and another person were leaving the State to secure employment. Umphreys also apologized for misconduct on the picket line. Sometime later, Zemba was contacted by the Steak & Ale Company, in Texas. According to Harrison, she received information in early October that Umphreys was leaving for Indiana. (R. Exh. 49A.) According to Umphreys, she denied any calls to Zemba. She did stop picketing in mid-September, because she was upset over an injury to a dog owned by a picket. Umphreys did admit leaving for Texas in early October, but could not find a job and returned to San Diego in mid-December. While in Texas, she denied applying for work at the Steak & Ale restaurant.

When Umphreys left for Texas, she moved out of her rental premises. She got to Texas by hitchhiking; then returned by air, using money sent to her by her family. She is 24 years of age. Before leaving for Texas, Umphreys never applied for, nor received $50 per week in union strike benefits. She did pay her union dues until taking a withdrawal card just before leaving California. Her only income was $52 per week unemployment compensation, received from the State of California. When she returned from Texas, Umphreys never rejoined the picket line.

I find sufficient evidence to show that Umphreys resigned from Aztec before leaving for Texas. In her affidavit to an agent of the NLRB, she stated, "I am not denying but I do not recall calling Aztec and telling someone that I had resigned." Although there is a discrepancy between the note indicating departure for Indiana and Zemba's testimony, I find Umphreys did call and state she was resigning. Taking Umphreys' testimony alone, all inferences indicate a permanent move to Texas, even though it lasted only 2 months.[124] Assuming a person can rescind a resignation by reestablishing support for the Union and the strike, there is no evidence that Umphreys did this.

If Umphreys was denied reinstatement due to her misconduct on the picket line, as Zemba testified, and as Respondent argues, in part in its brief, but denied in its position paper, then the evidence is as follows.[125] Nonstriker employees Hoffman and Swick testified that Umphreys engaged in some minor blocking of vehicles. In addition, Hoffman testified that Umphreys called her a "bitch" and once followed her schoolbus while Umphreys was in a car with two other strikers. It was Zemba, however, who provided the most damaging testimony against Umphreys. According to him, she used a picket stick to make short poking motions toward him on several occasions without actually touching him. Zemba described threats to get him and his girlfriend. Harrison, Umphreys, and others also threatened to kill Zemba and members of his family on occasion. She shouted to Harrison and other female nonstrikers, "Is Zemba fucking all of you?" She also hit buses with a picket sign on 15–20 occasions.

Umphreys essentially denied all the accusations against her, but I credit the Respondent's witnesses. In evaluating this evidence, I will consider in mitigation, Respondent's unfair labor practices that I have found above and Respondent's condonation of certain acts by nonstrikers that I will recite below in the next section of this opinion. As a general rule, the use of epithets, vulgar words, profanity, or vulgar gestures does not deprive a striker of the protection of the Act.[126] Of greater moment is the following of the schoolbus and the threatening gestures toward Zemba with the picket sign. In both these incidents, the acts in question do not rise to the level to preclude reinstatement.[127] Similarly, the threats against [124] See Belt Supermarket, 260 NLRB 118 (1982).

[125] I find that Zemba had an honest belief that Umphreys engaged in serious strike misconduct. See Rubin Bros. Footwear, 99 NLRB 610, 611 (1951). However, I cannot tell for sure on this record why Umphreys was denied reinstatement.

Zemba, while serious, appear to be classic mere "animal exuberance." Thus, under Board law and considering mitigation of the unfair labor practices and condonation, I would recommend that Umphreys be reinstated with backpay.

This concludes the discussion of those strikers who are alleged to have resigned. In its brief (Br. 458–460), Respondent also discusses the cases of Francis Lackey, Shirley Porter, and Margaret Jonas. However, these individuals, either at hearing or in the General Counsel's brief (Br. 57 fn. 49), have all been dismissed from the case and no findings about them will be made. Finally, striker Karen Sloan has been inadvertently listed by Respondent in the section of the brief with alleged resignations. I will consider her case with the alleged strike misconduct to which I now turn.

3. Analysis and conclusions[128]

a. Strike misconduct

Before analyzing the cases of the individual strikers, I note several preliminary matters. First, when evaluating strike misconduct, there is extensive conflict between the Board and the courts of appeals.[129] Where the conflict exists, I am bound to follow the Board decisions.[130]

Another conflict occurs from time to time between Respondent's statement of position (G.C. Exh. 78), dated September 4, 1981, and submitted to the General Counsel, and Respondent's evidence adduced at hearing. The General Counsel makes much of these conflicts (see, e.g., Br. 85 fn. 63) as indicating changes of position of impeachment. In general, I have assigned little weight to the letter. It was never intended to be evidence for either side. Particularly in a massive case like this, each side can be expected to change its position often. The General Counsel did it as late as the filing of its brief. See, e.g., brief 49 footnote 41 in order to add still another allegation. This does not impeach the General Counsel's case any more than Respondent's position letter damages its case. Of course, where the conflict makes a difference, as it does for Umphreys, above, it will be noted. Because Board law commands that the letter is admissible, I have obeyed despite my own feeling that the letter's slight probative value is outweighed by its prejudice to Respondent. It also seems to me in the nature of settlement negotiations and inadmissible for that reason. (See Fed.R.Evid. 408.)

I also note again that Respondent does not claim that any of the strikers have been permanently replaced. Accordingly, it is unnecessary to make a finding about the type of strike, either economic or unfair labor practice. However, because I have found that prior to the commencement of the strike, the Employer had not bargained in bad faith, the strike was economic at its inception. Following the commencement of the strike, Respondent did bargain in bad faith and committed other unfair labor practices.[131] Accordingly, when the Union made an unconditional offer to return to work on April 3, 1981, the strikers had become unfair labor practice strikers.[132]

Another preliminary matter concerns the burden of proof that each party has. This burden was succinctly stated by the administrative law judge in Laredo Coca-Cola Bottling Co., 258 NLRB 491, 496 (1981):

> The Supreme Court has long recognized that actions taken against strikers are inherently destructive of Section 7 rights. N.L.R.B. v. Great Dane Trailers, Inc., 388 U.S. 26 (1967). In all cases involving either the discharge of or the refusal to reinstate strikers for having engaged in alleged acts of misconduct, "the burden of proving discrimination is that of the General Counsel." Rubin Bros. Footwear, Inc., 99 NLRB 610, 611 (1952). Accordingly, the General Counsel must first establish that an individual was in fact a striker and that an employer took some action against him for conduct while said individual engaged in the strike. At that point, the burden shifts to the Respondent which must prove that it entertained an honest belief that the striking employees have engaged in misconduct. Such constitutes an adequate defense to a charge of discrimination in refusing to reinstate strikers except where the General Counsel affirmatively establishes that the employees did not, in fact, engage in such misconduct or where the conduct in question was not "so flagrant or egregious as to require subordination of the employees' protected rights in order to vindicate the broader interest of society as a whole." Dallas General Drivers, Warehousemen and Helpers, Local Union No. 745, International Brotherhood of [128] In judging the credibility of the strikers, I have in most instances accepted the Respondent's version of events. Generally, the strikers denied committing the most serious acts of misconduct attributed to them and generally denied seeing or hearing other serious misconduct committed by other strikers. In the context of the evidence in this case, such denials were not usually convincing. On the other hand, regarding striker misconduct, in most instances Respondent's evidence was more persuasive for several reasons: (1) most of the misconduct ascribed to various strikers fell far short under Board law from precluding reinstatement. This fact leads to the inference that Respondent merely presented the evidence it had, without fabrication or mistake; (2) those strikers who were found to have committed serious acts of misconduct had live witnesses testify against them and submit themselves to cross-examination. In no case did I rely on dispatch or security officer logs or police reports alone to find against a striker; (3) the strikers were either known to management and nonstrikers or were identified from photographs. Thus, I was usually satisfied that misidentification was not a significant factor, particularly where multiple witnesses testified against a given striker. In sum, I have considered all evidence for each striker, including denials where applicable. However, because of the enormity of this case, it was not possible to detail conflicting testimony for each striker.

[131] In evaluating striker misconduct, I will give due consideration to the Respondent's conduct involving unfair labor practices. Harowe Servo Controls, supra, 250 NLRB at 1111. That is, the Board requires that I balance the nature of the employees' conduct against the Employer's unfair labor practices. E. I. du Pont & Co., 263 NLRB 159 cases cited at fn. 3 (1982).

[132] Gulf Envelope Co., 256 NLRB 320 (1981). See also Tarlas Meat Co., 239 NLRB 1400 (1979). Because the strikers are unfair labor practice strikers, an employer's erroneous belief, however sincere, that a striker has engaged in misconduct does not constitute a defense to refusing to reinstate him if such misconduct did not, in fact, occur. J. H. Rutter-Rex Mfg. Co., 158 NLRB 1414, 1418, 1448–1449 (1966).

> Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America . . . v. N.L.R.B., 389 F.2d 553 (D.C. Cir. 1968); Gold Kist, Inc., 245 NLRB 1095 (1979); Birch Tree Number One, Incorporated, d/b/a Birch View Manor, 243 NLRB 495 (1979); Co-Con, Inc., 238 NLRB 283 (1978); Rubin Bros., supra. Once the General Counsel has established that the misconduct did not occur, the burden shifts to the respondent to rebut the denials. Gold Kist, Inc., supra.

In this case, I find that as to all the affected individuals that they were strikers and were refused reinstatement by the Employer for conduct while on strike. I also find, with a few exceptions as indicated below, that Respondent held an honest belief that the strikers engaged in misconduct. Then I will find as to a substantial number of strikers that either the employees did not engage in such misconduct or the conduct was not so flagrant as to warrant discharge.[133]

In conclusion of preliminary matters, I turn to the issue of condonation raised by the Union and examine it from two perspectives: (1) disparate treatment—as found above no nonstriker was ever disciplined for misconduct and there was no mechanism in place to collect and evaluate nonstriker misconduct. This posture is in stark contrast to that employed for striking employees;[134] and (2) condonation—this concept is explained in the case of Union Trust Drill Co., 124 NLRB 1143 at 1155–1156 (1959):

> The Supreme Court has ruled that where a strike is characterized by unprotected activity, or even by illegal employee action, the employees take "the risk of termination of their employment." (N.L.R.B. v. Fansteel Metallurgical Corporation, 306 U.S. 240, 255), and the employer is "at liberty to treat them as having severed their relations with the Company." N.L.R.B. v. Sands Manufacturing Company, 306 U.S. 332, 344. By the same token, the employer is equally at liberty to disregard or waive the wrong, and to retain the offenders in his employ. It has never been suggested that the Act requires an employer to discharge an employee guilty of wrongful conduct, or that the Act itself terminates the relationship. The wrongful conduct merely permits the employer to take affirmative action to that end. Accordingly the courts and the Board have uniformly ruled that the only right accruing to an employer from unprotected strike conduct is the privilege or liberty to terminate the employment of the strikers because of their misconduct. Stewart Die Casting Corporation v. N.L.R.B., 114 F.2d 849, 856 (C.A. 7), cert. denied 312 U.S. 680; N.L.R.B. v. Aladdin Industries, Inc., 125 F.2d 377, 382 (C.A. 7) cert. denied 316 U.S. 706; Hazel Atlas Glass Company v. N.L.R.B., 127 F.2d 109, 118 (C.A. 4); N.L.R.B. v. Reed & Prince Manufacturing Company, 118 F.2d 874, 886 (C.A. 1), cert. denied 313 U.S. 595; N.L.R.B. v. Alabama Marble Co., 185 F.2d 1022 (C.A. 5).
> Though "condonation may not lightly be presumed from mere silence or equivocal statements, . . . [if it] clearly appears from some positive act by an employer indicating forgiveness and an intention of treating the guilty employees as if their misconduct had not occurred," then condonation has been established. N.L.R.B. v. Marshall Car Wheel and Foundry Co., 218 F.2d 409 (C.A. 5).

To illustrate better the behavior of some of Respondent's nonstriking employees, I note the following major incidents of misconduct:

(1) On October 24, Dave Smart drove his car toward the yard exit at a rapid rate of speed, almost hitting a striking picket. Linda McQueen kicked Smart's car. He exited the car, grabbed her by the neck and shoulders, and threw her down to the ground. McQueen hit her head, became dizzy, and was later taken to the hospital. At the hospital, McQueen was released after it was determined she was unhurt.

(2) On or about October 5, James Lombardi was arrested for deliberately attempting to run down pickets on the picket line. This occurred after someone threw eggs at Lombardi's car. Schultz later bailed him out of jail.

(3) Neil Sunard and other nonstrikers sprayed ammonia into the face of pickets Valerie Mendoza and others.

Other similar incidents involved the brandishing of tire irons, crowbars, or knives by nonstrikers. At brief 63, the Union describes incidents involving employees who originally were on strike, but returned to work before the strike was over. The acts of these persons are trivial, but it is true they were unpunished. In this case, the primary issue is whether discharge of strikers is justified. Under Board law, very few, if any, of the acts committed by nonstrikers would be grounds for discharge and, then, only if there was no direct provocation or if the acts were not impulsive and isolated.

The Union further contends (Br. 65) that under the facts and circumstances of this case, only strikers guilty of a physical assault should even warrant attention. Of course, I cannot agree. I am required to consider each striker individually in light of surrounding circumstances including the severity and frequency of the misconduct at issue, and the acts of Respondent as reflected above.[135] I begin with an incident that occurred in the early evening of August 23, when the strike was less than 24 hours old.

b. The Hokstad incident

Prior to the strike, Hokstad had taken a strident antiunion, antistrike position and clearly stated his intention not to strike. On occasion, his conversations seemed to be unduly provacative. Examples will be stated in discussions of individual strikers. On August 23, he was returning to the Aztec yard from an assignment about 7 p.m. A large number of pickets were on the line. Prior to making his turn from Twain into the yard, Hokstad had notified the dispatcher by radio that he was coming in. One of the pickets there was Brenda Leonard, wife of striker Walt Leonard. She had been on the line the entire day with her two children, one an infant, the other a young boy. The day was unusually warm and the baby had been crying due to the discomfort of the moment.

[133] Frequently at hearing the General Counsel used the expression, "industrial capital punishment," to dramatize the severity of job loss for strike misconduct. In reviewing the facts of each striker and the applicable Board and court precedents, I will be mindful of this expression.

As Hokstad turned into the yard, there is some conflict about his speed. Because the strikers were engaging in mass picketing and had every intention of blocking the bus as long as possible even if Hokstad were moving too fast for conditions, the strikers had to assume part blame for what happened. In any event, several pickets, including Walt Leonard and Shelton, hit the bus with their picket signs and the bus struck Brenda Leonard in the bedlam. At the time of hearing, Brenda Leonard was separated from her husband and she never testified. However, all evidence indicates that she was only slightly injured, if at all. Later she was taken to a nearby hospital, treated, and released.

Meanwhile, after Brenda Leonard was struck, several of the strikers literally went berserk. Harlene George, Walt Leonard, and Alan Shelton charged into the Aztec yard. The other pickets screamed that Zemba was a murderer and made continuous threats and epithets directed to him, Schultz, and Hokstad, who were all nearby, standing well inside the Aztec yard. Both Leonard and Shelton had picket sticks in their hands having stripped off the signs after the accident happened. They threatened Zemba with them and screamed that he was responsible for the death of Brenda Leonard. Both men swung their sticks at Zemba, missing him by inches.

While this was going on, Harlene George also rushed up to Zemba, making the same accusations indicated above and threatening to kill Zemba. Unlike the two men, George had nothing in her hands. However, she did strike Zemba with her fists, beating him several times around the neck and chest. Like Brenda Leonard, Zemba was only slightly injured, if at all, from this attack. George had to be pulled away from Zemba by a union official named Arellano, who never testified. Shelton also never testified.[136]

The above incident has led to a spate of lawsuits and countersuits involving the principals referred to above and the Union as well. I will provide additional details surrounding this incident in discussion of the individual strikers. As to Leonard and Shelton, there is sufficient evidence in the record regarding other incidents as well as the present matter to make an informed judgment. However, as to George, her fate will rise and fall on this incident because essentially she left the picket line shortly after the incident. I will begin the discussion of the individual strikers with George below, but first one additional incident that merits special attention.

c. Union Solidarity Day, December 23

On this day, the strikers appeared on the line en masse. They were joined by representatives of other unions, who appeared to show support for the strikers. Also represented was the local media, including a well-known San Diego television reporter. This reporter, Jim Gordon, was a witness at the hearing and unlike most other witnesses was a neutral.[137] Gordon presented an edited videotape (C.P. Exh. 26) that showed the pickets and certain union officials in attendance. I have also examined some photographs (C.P. Exhs. 23a, b, and c) that as the videotape reflects scenes taken at the Twain Avenue yard on the day in question.

The essential misconduct complained of on this day concerned mass picketing causing a blockage of Zemba's car for about 30–45 minutes in the morning until the police arrived and escorted Zemba out of the yard. Zemba testified that as he drove up to the line, he asked the pickets to let him go through as he had an appointment. They refused.

After reviewing this incident, I have decided to disregard it entirely and not consider any striker's alleged participation in it as a factor in the refusal to reinstate. In reaching this conclusion, I note the testimony of Gordon, who testified that Zemba had at least two opportunities to leave before the police arrived, but failed to drive out. During the time that Zemba's car was blocked, two or three Aztec buses were allowed to go through with no problem. Of course, it might not be surpising that strikers would single out Zemba for more harsh treatment. Yet in addition to Gordon's testimony, I rely on my analysis of human nature. Give the presence of the media, including television cameramen and photographers, would the pickets have wanted to embarrass high-ranking union officials by performing an unlawful act. I think not. I believe the pickets would have been on their best behavior at this point. On the other hand, Zemba did have an interest in putting the Union in a bad light and when I consider the totality of the circumstances, I cannot credit his testimony about what happened on this day. I turn next to the individual strikers.

4. The individual strikers

a. Harlene "Sam" George

According to Zemba, George was denied reinstatement because of her attack on him.[138] On the evening this happened, George was a picket captain whose responsibility in part was to prevent disorderly picket lines. Standing about 5 feet 3-1/2 inches, and weighing 110 pounds, George was 38 years old when she testified. Before going to work for Aztec, George had earned a registered nurse's degree and worked in pediatrics and in a hospital emergency room for several years. On August 22, George worked a shift as a busdriver from noon to about 9 p.m. Then, when the strike started, she joined about 100 other strikers. By the time Hokstad was driving his bus into the yard, George had not slept for almost 36 hours. When the incident occurred, George was in a nearby phone booth making a telephone call when another striker ran up and shouted that someone had been hit by a bus. George ran to the line and saw Brenda Leonard with a blanket thrown over her. When she did not see either the child or the infant, she "freaked out . . . went crazy" (witness' terms), because she assumed that "Zemba had let someone hurt the baby." George testified that she could not remember what happened after this but, after the incident, union officials told her to take some time off and, on October 1, she became inactive on the picket line.

[136] During the hearing, Shelton wrote a letter to counsel for the Union saying that he was living in Colorado and was unable to get to San Diego for the hearing due to financial reasons.

[137] Gordon was a member of a union himself. However, this fact did not affect his testimony. Moreover, because he had covered the Aztec labor dispute from the beginning, he related incidents how both management and the Union had attempted to exploit the media for their own gain. He understood this as a necessary ingredient of any labor dispute and as part of his job. Essentially, he remained unaffected by this.

[138] It is unclear whether Zemba also considered George's status as a picket captain and shop steward as factors in denying her reinstatement. However, the Board has held that union officials may not be singled out for greater discipline due to their status. Cf. South Central Bell Telephone, 254 NLRB 315, 316–317 (1981). Generally the courts of appeals have not agreed with the Board on this issue. As to other strikers who were picket captains or shop stewards, I have not relied on their status in reaching my decisions as to do so is contrary to Board law and because the evidence did not clearly show that Zemba relied on this fact in reaching his decision.

In analyzing this case, I reject any suggestion that this incident was staged by pickets as a pretext to make an attack on Zemba. The incident involving Brenda Leonard was an accident for which the Union and Hokstad must each share the blame.[139] This does not end the inquiry on George, however. In part, her actions were the result of hysteria caused by lack of sleep and the warm temperatures, and the animal exuberance of the strike. I find further that George, Leonard, and Shelton were not acting in concert pursuant to some prearranged plan; rather, each was acting spontaneously and individually in confronting Zemba.[140]

In evaluating this evidence, I note first that this incident occurred at the inception of the strike when the emotions of the participants were at a high pitch.[141] This isolated incident of misconduct is in stark contrast to other strikers such as Leonard and Shelton, who were guilty of repeated misconduct. In addition, the striking of Zemba was impulsive and of minor consequence.[142] The impulsive nature of the act is shown by George's training and experience as a nurse that under normal circumstances would have instinctively caused her to attend to Brenda Leonard, the ostensibly injured person. Instead, she attacked Zemba, not even the driver of the bus involved in the accident.

This is a close case. George is responsible for her lack of control caused in part by her lack of sleep. Zemba could well have been injured, but he was not. Accordingly, based on the totality of the evidence, I find that George is entitled to reinstatement and backpay.

b. Walt Leonard

In contrast to George, the misconduct of Leonard was serious, continuous, and deliberate. I begin with his actions during the Hokstad incident that need not be restated here. Hoffman, a female nonstriker, testified that when she drove through the line on one occasion, Leonard unzipped his trousers, pointed to his private parts, and stated, "This is for you, Sweetie. We're going to give this to you one of these nights when you're not watching." Leonard also made threats against Zemba and Hokstad and their families. The circumstances of these threats made on August 23 indicated they were to be taken seriously.[143] Also on August 23, Schultz observed Leonard deliberately break a taillight of a bus parked on the lot, using his picket stick. On two occasions, Leonard spit on Reese, a nonstriking employee, as he drove into the yard in his bus. Reese and another nonstriker named Swick were repeatedly threatened by Leonard, who frequently brandished a picket sign in a threatening manner.

Leonard's use of verbal taunts directed toward Zemba and Harrison was extensive and indefensible. Leonard called Zemba "a fucking Jew"[144] and a "cock-sucker." To Harrison, Leonard asked, "is Zemba eating you, how do you enjoy Zemba's cock"; "another night for a good fuck, Ellen." "Is Gus that good."[145] Finally, Leonard admitted at hearing that he threw eggs at buses (he told a Board agent he threw none) at cars on two occasions and at persons on two occasions.

By any standard, the totality of Leonard's conduct renders him unfit for reinstatement and backpay and I will so recommend to the Board.

c. Alan Shelton

This person did not testify and I will evaluate the evidence against him accordingly. I begin by reviewing Shelton's actions on August 23 as reflected above. In addition, on October 7, Shelton spit on Mitch Cohee, a nonstriker, as he walked across the picket line.[146] Ingersoll observed Shelton, along with another striker named Kipple, jump on a gate at the Aztec yard and knock it down.[147] On another occasion, Shelton followed [140] Thus, as a general rule, each striker was responsible for his own misconduct and not for the misconduct of others. NLRB v. Sea-Land Service, 356 F.2d 955, 966 (1st Cir. 1966), cert. denied 385 U.S. 900 (1966); Coronet Casuals, 207 NLRB 304, 305 (1973).

[144] The use of racial and religious epithets are factors in evaluating a striker's fitness to return to work. Old Town Shoe Co., 91 NLRB 240, 273–274 (1950).

[145] Picket line language of this type is offensive, defamatory, and opprobrious. Ben Pekin Corp., 181 NLRB 1025, 1028 (1970). However, the speech does not automatically lose the protection of the Act. Here it is at least a factor in the totality of the striker's conduct. Although the case of NLRB v. Longview Furniture Co., 206 F.2d 274, 276 (4th Cir. 1953), is in point, the court refused to enforce the Board's Order and therefore I am bound to disregard it.

[147] Although no estimate of damage was given, I consider this serious property damage. Giddings & Lewis, 240 NLRB 441 (1979); NLRB v. Trumbull Asphalt Co., 327 F.2d 841 (8th Cir. 1964).

Schultz, who was driving a nonstriker home after work. When Schultz first saw Shelton, it was after the nonstriker had been dropped off at an intersection, and Schultz saw Shelton in his car, carefully following (perhaps stalking) the nonstriker to see where he lived. Schultz went back and picked up the nonstriker again; then drove around until Shelton was lost.[148] On another occasion, Schultz drove Hokstad's car through the picket line while Hokstad left the yard by a different route. Shelton stated, "Why didn't you have him come through here, then we could beat his ass." Schultz heard Shelton ask Whitey Swadner, a nonstriker, to come across the street so he could kick his "ass" and settle the strike right there. I find that based on the totality of Shelton's misconduct, he is not entitled to reinstatement and backpay.

This striker engaged in occasional blocking of vehicles for short periods of time. On several occasions, he opened emergency doors of buses as a tactic to harass nonstrikers. On the first night of the strike, Adams called Zemba an "asshole." Schultz observed the witness directing bus traffic into Twain where it was unsafe.

The above incidents are all trivial in nature. No damage occurred to any property. Given the violent nature of the strike, it was unlikely that any nonstriking driver would rely on traffic signals from a picket. Finally, there was a report that Adams threw coffee on someone, but Adams denied it and I cannot credit the report. Accordingly, I find that Adams is entitled to reinstatement and backpay.

e. Nancy Alferos

Alferos called nonstriker Claybough a "fat fucking bitch." Alferos also kicked and hit buses but there is no evidence that damage resulted. On several occasions, nonstrikers Bevers and Swick were temporarily blocked for brief periods of time.[149] Some of the testimony at hearing relates to the alleged activities of Alferos' husband. Because there is no basis to conclude that Alferos is responsible for the acts of her husband, I decline to consider this evidence.

Finally, Zemba testified that on several occasions, Alferos followed him on foot to the Jack-in-the-Box Restaurant and called him names such as "son of a bitch." Like the other incidents, this, too is a minor incident. Based on the totality of her conduct, I find that Alferos is entitled to reinstatement and backpay.[150]

f. Norman Amador

The record on this striker indicates that he is one of the most active strikers on the line committing acts of misconduct. To begin, he threw an egg at and hit the car of Kitty O'Brien, a nonstriker. She made a citzen's arrest and pressed charges. About 2-3 days later, Amador told her if she continued to press charges, her husband would be collecting widow's benefits.[151] I regard both the throwing of the egg and subsequent threat as serious misconduct. The threat was given currency by Amador's propensity for violent behavior. In a similar vein, Amador told Hokstad that if he did not stop working, he would get his lights punched out as Stoker had done. A few days prior to this remark, Hokstad had been physically assaulted by Stoker. When a friend of Hokstad's came to Aztec to apply for work, Amador jumped on his bumper and began to rock the car. Hokstad's friend decided not to apply for work at Aztec.

Nonstriker Swick related how Amador challenged him to a fight and threatened to "kick his ass." Nonstriker Reese testified to a barrage of eggs thrown at his moving automobile and causing some minor dents and paint damage. A female striker named Hewin was followed by Amador and another striker in a truck after work. Hewin pulled over after a short drive and Amador pulled in front of her, got out of the truck, and began to approach her vehicle. She then sped away.

Zemba was referred to repeatedly by Amador as "fuckbrain" and was asked whether he was "laying Ellen [Harrison] in the office." Amador asked Schultz whether "he liked sucking Zemba's cock"; he referred to Schultz as a "stupid mother-fucker."

Finally, in Chula Vista, during an altercation between nonstrikers Orville Swadner and Maureen Fortner on one side (the latter did not testify) and Amador and Roy Stoker, on the other side, I find that Amador grabbed Fortner around the neck and attempted to choke her while she was attempting to call over her bus radio for assistance.

Based on the totality of Amador's conduct, I find that he is not entitled to reinstatement or to backpay.

g. Bob Baker and Don Lilly[152]

Known to the other strikers as "Frick and Frack," these two were virtually inseparable during the strike and before. With a few exceptions, the evidence as to one will apply to the other. On several occasions, Lilly walked across the hood of vehicles attempting to enter the yard. These were owned by nonstrikers and a customer of Aztec. Lilly also threw hot liquid, either coffee or soup through a bus window opened by another striker, hitting nonstriker Swick. Baker threw a football at Swick's car on one occasion. Baker and Lilly both owned motorcycles. While new employee Michael Comfort was taking a driving test on a bus, they followed him and interfered with the operation of his vehicle.[153] Baker threatened to rape the wife of nonstriker Jacobson because the latter was crossing the picket line. This was after Baker and Lilly had followed Comfort and Jacobson for about 8 miles. After this episode, Baker and Lilly were arrested by police and charged with "terrorism." Following dismissal of the charges in court, Baker said to Comfort, "Your time is coming mother-fucker."

[148] Under Board law, the mere following of Schultz and the nonstriker is not considered serious. Gibralter Sprocket Co., 241 NLRB 501 (1979). In this case, however, there were other factors that made the following more serious. For example, during this period of time, the homes of some nonstrikers were being vandalized.

[149] This temporary blocking is not serious conduct under Board law. Owen Joist Corp., 248 NLRB 589 (1980).

[150] On cross-examination, Alferos admitted throwing eggs at buses about six times as the buses were entering or leaving the yard. Although not appearing to be serious under Board law anyway, I decline to consider this evidence, because it does not appear she was denied reinstatement in whole or in part for this misconduct.

[151] The case was ultimately dismissed in court because, according to O'Brien, the judge felt a lot of people were throwing eggs and Amador should not be singled out.

[152] Unlike Baker, Lilly did not appear at the hearing to testify. I will consider his absence from the case as raising an adverse inference against him.

Zemba and Schultz were also chased by Baker and Lilly on motorcycles. This occurred on the second or third day of the strike, continuing for several miles, with Baker and Lilly following closely behind. Zemba finally had to go through a red light to lose them. In addition, several times, Baker and Lilly rocked Zemba's car as he was attempting to leave the yard. Both strikers made countless serious threats to harm Zemba and members of his family.

According to nonstriker Mitch Cohee, Baker and Lilly both spit on him as he walked through the line on October 7.[154]

Based on the totality of the evidence above, I find that neither Baker nor Lilly is entitled to reinstatement and backpay.

h. Karen Balding

During the course of the strike, Balding called Zemba names such as "Baldy," "Asshole," and "idiot." She referred to Harrison on several occasions, while on the picket line, as "Zemba's mistress." In addition to this misconduct, Balding participated in some hitting of vehicles, but there is no evidence that damage was caused. Finally, Balding participated with others in the picket line in blocking of buses and vehicles for short periods of time. Based on the totality of the evidence above, which I can only characterize as patently trivial, Balding is entitled to reinstatement and backpay.

i. Janel Bock

Some of Bock's actions on the picket line were petty and trivial. She opened emergency doors on buses, and stood in front of nonstriker Clayough's bus while shouting, "hit me, you bitch and see what happens." As buses came through the line, she would frequently whack them with her picket sign, but causing no damage. To Zemba, she threatened, "your life is short, you are not going to be around any more." She told Kitty O'Brien that she had better know where her kids are.[155] These threats were unaccompanied by any gestures or movement that would provide additional emphasis.

Other acts of Bock were more serious. For example, on one occasion, she threatened to get Zemba's camera and smash it into his face. On another occasion, she caused some minor damage by throwing rocks at the car of nonstriker Swick while he was stopped for a light. This caused slight nicks in his car.[156] Bock also broke the handle of a truck owned by nonstriker Reese, although this damage seemed to be inadvertent.

Bock was 28 years old and described herself as a clown on the picket line. After she testified, Hokstad met her in the hallway of the Federal building and advised her as a friend that if she returned to work at Aztec, she might be in danger. This warning was based on Hokstad's perception of the mood of the nonstrikers who were angry at the strikers for their violent strike activities.

To the extent that Bock's activities present a close case, I am persuaded by Respondent's unfair labor practices and condonation of nonstriker activities that she is entitled to reinstatement and backpay and I so recommend.

j. Ella "Jeannie" Boothe

Prior to the strike, Boothe was involved in a bitter arbitration over discipline imposed as a result of an accident. At one point during this procedure, Zemba referred to Boothe as a "killer behind the wheel." Despite the opportunity provided by the strike to settle old scores, this did not occur. Some of the evidence relating to Booth concerns the alleged acts of her "husband." However, I find no reason to consider this evidence as there is no basis for attributing his acts to Boothe.[157]

After the August 23 Hokstad incident, Boothe threatened to kill Zemba or have her husband beat him up. These comments were made in the excitement of that moment and were not serious. To Harrison, Boothe made several comments of a suggestive nature, such as whether she was Zemba's mistress or asking was Zemba good. Finally, Boothe participated in blocking vehicles on 8 to 10 occasions for brief periods of time.

Based on the totality of the evidence above, Boothe is entitled to reinstatement and backpay.

k. Donna Bozick

Like the last witness, Bozick's spouse appeared on the picket line from time to time and allegedly committed certain acts of misconduct. I do not consider them, as there is no basis for attributing them to Bozick.

Bozick was on the picket line only until December 6, when she left due to medical problems, and did not return. Harrison was not aware of any misconduct and was uncertain why she had not been reinstated. Similarly, Zemba could not recall any reports of misconduct about her.

In disregarding the evidence attributed to her husband, I find virtually no misconduct attributable to her. I find that Zemba could not have held an honest belief that she had committed serious misconduct. She is clearly entitled to reinstatement and backpay.

[153] When pulled over by a California Highway Patrol officer, riding on the bus to monitor Comfort's test, Lilly disobeyed the officer's order and sped away. Baker stayed and told the officer that he wanted to discuss the strike with a female passenger also riding on the bus.

[154] Later at the Jack-in-the-Box Restaurant, Cohee had a fist fight with Baker and Lilly. I disregard this incident entirely as it appears that Cohee was at least partly responsible for it.

[156] See MP Industries, 227 NLRB 1709, 1716 (1977). Although this conduct is not condoned, it is not serious enough to warrant discharge.

[157] Whenever a spouse of a striker is referred to, these spouses are either nonemployees or past employees unless otherwise stated. In this case, Boothe stated she had lived with a man for a long period of time but was not formally married to him.

This striker was 22 years old at the hearing. He engaged in serious acts of misconduct during the course of the strike. In September, Harrison and a secretary named Cheryl Foti were walking through the line and Burkhart swung his picket sign at them, missing them by inches.[158] Then Burkhart said, "Oops, I almost didn't miss." Burkhart followed nonstriker Swick home on one occasion at night and threatened "to beat his ass." Another nonstriker named Whitehead was leaving the yard on one occasion on his motorcycle. Someone hit him in the back with two eggs. Then as he stopped for a light about one-half block away, Burkhart came running toward him.[159]

Burkhart made extensive, repeated, and serious threats to Zemba. He told Zemba that he was Corona's son and intended to kill him for her. On 50 to 60 occasions, Burkhart threatened to go to Zemba's home and kill everyone there.[160] In addition, Burkhart frequently blocked Zemba by walking in tight circles and delaying him for several minutes. Burkhart also made several remarks to Zemba about Harrison such as, "are you getting into Ellen." Finally, Burkhart threw eggs at buses and other vehicles about 10 to 15 times.

On the basis of all the evidence, I conclude that Burkhart is not entitled to reinstatement and backpay.

m. Inez Camacho

Much of the evidence involving this striker concerned his dog, which because of its notoriety was brought into the hearing room. The dog stood 2-1/2 to 3 feet tall and weighed between 60–70 pounds. Comacho frequently took the unleashed dog to the picket line and would threaten to have the dog attack Zemba. Once in Zemba's presence, he told the dog to go "piss" on Zemba. There is no credible evidence the dog actually attacked anyone or obeyed any other ill-advised command. In the hearing, the dog was friendly and playful even though the room was warm and filled with strange people. Besides using the dog in the manner indicated, Comacho engaged in blocking of vehicles for brief periods and hitting of buses without causing damage as they entered the yard.

Nonstriker Hoffman testified that Comacho was out jogging once while she sat in a parked bus. He ran onto the bus and told her that he would not hurt her or throw rocks at the bus, because it was she. It is hard to believe that assurances against misconduct itself constitutes misconduct. Another nonstriker, Hokstad, also testified. Once Comacho said to him as he was about to begin a bus run for the day, "You're at work and your wife is at home alone and you'd better think about that." On another occasion, Hokstad was coming to work climbing the back fence thereby avoiding the pickets. He was confronted by Comacho and his dog. Comacho stated if you come back over the back fence, he would "kick his ass."

None of this misconduct including the threat to Hokstad is serious enough to bar reinstatement. I recommend that he be reinstated with backpay.

n. John Chasteen

As the last striker was accused of misconduct involving his dog around the picket line, this striker occasionally used one or more hand puppets on the line. Using the puppets, Chasteen frequently threatened Zemba by saying, "You will be dead, I'll kill you." Chasteen also used a puppet to call Zemba names such as "asshole" and "motherfucker," and to ask, "What was Ellen like." Like Zemba, Schultz was also threatened when Chasteen, through the puppet said, "Sooner or later, we'll get you." The use of the puppet in the manner described above detracted from the seriousness of the conduct and seemed to me more for the amusement of the other pickets than any other purpose.

Another incident involved nonstriker Whitehead who was followed in his bus by two cars containing strikers. When the cars passed him, they slowed down, impeding his progress. Chasteen was in one of these cars and a man named Barker was in another. This former striker, Barker, decided at some point to cross the picket line and return to work, when Zemba either knew or should have known of his misconduct involving Whitehead's bus. It is unnecessary to evaluate Chasteen's misconduct with regard to the bus; because Zemba took Barker back, he condoned the misconduct.[161]

Based on my review of all the evidence regarding Chasteen, including some minor blocking of vehicles, I conclude he is entitled to reinstatement and backpay.

o. Jan Corona

As has been noted earlier, this striker was chief shop steward, and was the highest ranking union official employed at Aztec. In accord with my understanding of Board law, I am not to weigh in aggravation of her misconduct, the fact of her union status.[162] Accordingly, I do not consider this fact.[163]

I also must disregard for different reasons, the testimony of nonstriker Dugent, who testified that Corona, wearing a blond wig, struck and broke his headlight, by swinging a picket sign as he drove through the picket line. Because there is no evidence that Corona ever wore a blond wig to the picket line, I do not find the testimony of Dugent to be reliable.

Also, to place Corona's misconduct in proper context, I do consider evidence involving Corona prior to the strike, such as a bitter personal attack by Zemba against her during a bargaining session. In addition, Zemba attempted to restrict Corona's access to Aztec personnel files and administrative offices, thereby obstructing the Union's right to gather information for the processing and filing of grievances.[164] From other remarks Zemba made to Reynolds and Patton about her, it appears that Zemba's hostility in large part was directed at Corona's life style and sexual preferences.[165] Keeping all this in mind, I turn to review Corona's activities.

[158] The picket signs were attached to fairly good-sized pieces of wood. (See G.C. Exhs. 62 and 63.) Although there is conflict about the exact size, it suffices to say that a person swinging a picket stick at another which just misses would cause great fear in the putative target.

[159] Whitehead then pulled around the corner and offered to fight Burkhardt. I do not condone this, but still find some misconduct by Burkhart in the incident that I must consider.

[162] Hammermill Paper Co., 252 NLRB 1236 (1980), enfd. 658 F.2d 155 (3d Cir. 1981). Cf. Szewczuga v. NLRB, 686 F.2d 962 (D.C. Cir. 1982).

[163] In this case, Corona was the only Aztec striker to be on salary from the Union during the strike as opposed to merely receiving strike benefits. She received $6.25 per hour for 40 hours or more per week. In my opinion, this fact would not change the rule that her status as a union official should not be considered by me.

To begin, there is little question that Corona made no serious effort to control the misconduct on the line. The Union kept a running log of day-to-day activities. Despite numerous incidents of picket misconduct, there is no evidence that any incident was recorded or of union discipline of any picket. Corona frequently gave oral instructions regarding forbidden conduct. For example, she told strikers not to throw eggs. However, the strikers ignored her orders with impunity, particularly since the picket captains appointed by her were not recording or otherwise not reporting incidents of misconduct and, in some cases, were committing multiple acts of misconduct themselves. On occasion, she ordered an intoxicated striker to leave the line and the person left. However, this type of control occurred infrequently. I make these findings above, in case higher authority finds that I erred in disregarding Corona's union status.

At the very beginning of the strike, Corona and Yelkey prevented a mechanic from coming to work. However, the mechanic never testified and the credible evidence does not show that unlawful means were used to deter the mechanic from entering the yard. On another occasion, Corona told Zemba that she was coming over to his house to picket. This never occurred, even though she publicized Zemba's address on the line. Because the address was public and no misconduct was threatened, I fail to see how this was misconduct at all.[166]

Another nonstriker named O'Brien testified that a small child threw eggs at her car and then got into Corona's vehicle. I cannot credit this testimony because I do not believe the child was Corona's—her children were much older. Even if the child got into Corona's vehicle, this is an inadequate basis to impute this misconduct to Corona.

Based on the totality of all the evidence regarding this striker summarized above, including Respondent's provocation, I must conclude that Corona is entitled to reinstatement and backpay.

p. Michael Doering

On the first night of the strike, Doering called to Zemba to come out so Doering could beat his "ass." This was followed later by several threats regarding Zemba's family such as, "You won't have your family to return to" and "Your family has been taken care of." After George's attack on Zemba, Doering stated, "We'll get you for sure next time."

This striker was one of the most active egg throwers on the picket line. He threw an egg at a moving schoolbus in October and Schultz subsequently testified against him in local court for committing this act. There Doering was convicted of malicious mischief.[167] Similarly, Doering stood in front of Hokstad's bus as it was exiting from the yard and threw several eggs at the windshield. Doering told the Board agent in an affidavit that he had not thrown any eggs. For this reason, and because Doering was exceptionally evasive in his testimony, I found his credibility to be very low. Although the throwing of eggs at moving vehicles seems to me an inherently dangerous activity, the Board takes a more tolerant attitude toward this activity.[168] I am, of course, bound by Board law. However, I will at least consider these episodes as factors in reaching my ultimate decision on the totality of the evidence.[169]

Doering made a number of comments to people that were calculated to lead to violence. He told the husband of a nonstriking female employee as the two rode out of the yard that the husband had a sexual disease. Doering referred to Zemba as a "fucking Jew." He asked Zemba, "How was Ellen to lay" and referred to Zemba and Harrison as they crossed the line as "cock-suckers." On one occasion, Doering refused to stop blocking the Aztec yard entrance until he was physically pushed back by police. As buses entered or exited the yard, Doering frequently struck the bus and in some cases the windshield with his picket stick. However, there is no evidence that any damage was done.

Finally, on at least two occasions, Doering called O'Brien, a nonstriker at work, and the first time stated, "We know where you live and we're going to get you." The second time, Doering muttered obscenities. Based on the totality of the evidence regarding Doering's misconduct, I conclude he is not entitled to reinstatement and backpay.[170]

q. James Fenderson

On the second day of the strike, Fenderson asked Zemba to come out so Fenderson could "whip his ass."

---

[164] According to Zemba, Corona made several remarks shortly after the strike began, such as that it was her turn to get him for his statements about her at the bargaining table. Although I find she made these remarks, she never used a gesture or other action to give credence to her threat. Under the circumstances, I do not regard her remarks as serious misconduct.

[165] As an example of Zemba's hostility to Corona, he testified that she had some connection to the Mexican underworld in Tijuana. There was no credible evidence whatsoever to support this conclusion.

[166] I make no finding about whether such picketing would have violated state law, because it never occurred.

[169] It was represented at the hearing that throwing objects at a schoolbus is a violation of California state law, whether the bus is occupied or not occupied with children. Even if true, it does not appear that state law woud supercede the Board's rulings regarding the throwing of eggs at vehicles, including schoolbuses.

[170] Some of the evidence regarding this striker concerned articles written by him that were critical of Aztec and that were published in a small newspaper during the strike. At the hearing, Doering invoked the fifth amendment in response to certain questions about his activities on the picket line. None of the incidents referred to in this footnote was a factor in my decision regarding his reinstatement.

The same remark was made to a nonstriker named Swick. Once when Zemba was leaving the yard, he said to Zemba, "Stop your car and get out, I'm going to take care of you." On a few occasions, Fenderson also opened emergency doors of buses and slapped at buses with his sign as they went through the line. No damage resulted.

At the hearing, Fenderson was most notable for his testimony regarding an altercation between strikers Stoker and Amador and nonstrikers Swadner and Fortner in Chula Vista. His evidence on that subject will be summarized in a discussion of Stoker's case, below. Despite the fact that Stoker was his friend, Fenderson did not involve himself in the incident.

At the time of the strike, Fenderson had a grievance pending against Aztec. Although I cannot find that the grievance was the cause of his failure to be reinstated, I do find based on the totality of the evidence that his misconduct was trivial. Accordingly, I find that he should be reinstated with backpay.

r. Patricia Fowler

In December, Fowler had an operation on her leg and was forced to use crutches in order to move about. All or most of the evidence against her is for a period of time prior to December. When the strike started, she was a picket captain on the 4 p.m. to midnight shift, and again, I do not consider that fact in aggravation.

In her role as picket captain, Fowler played a central role in not only committing acts of misconduct herself, but also encouraging others to do the same. Once Gordon Hall, a union officer, dropped off eggs to the picket line and Fowler shouted, with delight, "Our ammunition has arrived." In fact, she threw an egg at Cohee's van, but apparently she missed. In Chula Vista, Fowler asked nonstriker Claybough to fight her, "one on one." As nonstriker Hewin was attempting to drive her vehicle out of the yard after work, Fowler stood in front of the vehicle to block it, while striker Linda Peckron spit through the open window into the face of Hewin. Under the circumstances, I impute Peckron's conduct to Fowler.

In a similar incident, where Fowler acted as part of a team of errant strikers, she tried to open the door of nonstriker Swick's vehicle, thereby distracting him. Then strikers Peckron and Lilly threw hot liquid on him through an open window. On another occasion, Fowler opened the door of a bus being driven by nonstriker Law, and Peckron threw an egg into it. Due to this pattern, I find in all these incidents that she has responsibility for them as she was acting in concert with the other strikers. As a driver walked through the picket line, Fowler swung her sign at him, but missed.

Zemba and Harrison were the targets of repeated threats and sexual comments as they went into and left the yard. Zemba was told 20 to 30 times, "You will be dead by September"; "you are going to be killed," "your family is going to be killed," and similar such statements. Fowler said to Harrison on many occasions, "You are dead meat." As to sexual comments, Fowler asked Zemba, "Does Ellen [Harrison] give good head?" "Are you eating Ellen?" Then to Harrison, Folwer asked repeatedly, "Did you get hired because of what you have between your legs?"

Fowler was a member of a group of female pickets who frequently changed sexual slogans on the line—directed to Harrison who was either attempting to cross the line or somewhere nearby. These slogans, some with Lesbian content were repeated over and over and over. An example, "Come out, Ellen, we've got something for you," or "She's Connie's meat."[171]

Unlike other strikers who blocked vehicles for brief periods, Fowler blocked vehicles for extended periods, such as 15 to 20 and sometimes 30 minutes. On two occasions, she had to be moved by police force before a vehicle could move. She admitted blocking nonstriker Swadner for 25 minutes one night.

Fowler worked double picket shifts on most days for no extra money. In light of her extensive misconduct, it is not surprising that she became involved in direct confrontations with nonstrikers. Dugent, for example, threatened her with a crowbar after someone hit his car with an egg. I have considered all such evidence as well as evidence of Fowler's misconduct and conclude on the basis of the totality of the evidence, that she is not entitled to reinstatement nor backpay.

This striker was perhaps the most credible striker at the hearing. While on strike, he received his final paycheck and determined that he had been overpaid in vacation pay. He returned the $200 overpayment and, at hearing, produced a $200 canceled check to prove it. Married, with four children, the witness is a candidate for the ministry and youth director at a local Baptist church.

His alleged "misconduct" consisted of a few calls to the Aztec office during the strike to engage management in a conversation about the issues in the strike. Another time, Zemba walked through the line and the witness shouted, "I know where you're going, Zemba's going to pee . . ." In another telephone call to Zemba, after the incident with Brenda Leonard, Fox called Zemba a "murderer" and said Zemba would die for that.

On the basis of the totality of the evidence, Fox is clearly entitled to reinstatement and backpay. If what Fox did was misconduct, it is so trivial as to deserve little time and effort.

t. Fred Franz

Within the first 3 weeks of the strike Franz spit on a car driven by nonstriker O'Brien. This act is considerably different than spitting on an individual and much less severe.[172] In late September, Franz apparently mistook a female customer of Aztec for a new job applicant. As she crossed the picket line, Franz shouted, "You cocksuckers are taking our jobs away from us and we'll get you."[173] Franz frequently called Zemba a "prick" as he walked or drove through the line. Once he used this term and asked Zemba why he did not answer his phone at night. At this time Zemba was receiving a number of harassing phone calls at his home. Franz' comment does not show that he was making the calls and there is no other evidence on the matter.

[171] I have reviewed the cases of A. Duie Pyle, Inc., 263 NLRB 744 (1982), and Georgia Kraft Co., 258 NLRB 908 (1981). In those cases, the Board has stated its policy regarding threats and verbal taunts of a sexual and obscene nature, finding them generally to be insufficiently serious to deny reinstatement. These cases do not apply to Fowler and other strikers such as Jellison and Lindemann. (1) In most or all the affected strikers, there was additional misconduct committed; (2) where the threats and sexual statements were made, the statements were repeated, blatant, and flagrant and not to be confused with mere name-calling; and (3) the comments seem to me calculated to provoke violence on the part of the targets. See Carither's Stores, 262 NLRB 1381 (1982).

Franz also made comments to Zemba of a sexual nature, but these were primarily suggestive rather than patent obscenities. He asked Zemba, for example, "Are you making all the women happy?" Franz was arrested by the San Diego Police Department and later convicted of the "crime" of blocking the sidewalk. He was sentenced to time served (about 15 hours in jail). Franz also engaged in some limited blocking of vehicles and other petty harassment.

In mid-October, Franz, age 57 years old, suffered a heart attack and essentially left the picket line permanently. I consider his ill-advised name calling a relic of his former career in the Navy from which he is now retired. None of his activities are serious enough to preclude his reinstatement and I recommend that he be put back to work with backpay.[174]

u. Donna Friege

Some of the evidence presented here related to the activities of Friege's husband, an active duty Navy man. I do not consider any of his activities relevant to the question of whether Friege should return to work.

Like her husband, Freige, herself, was connected to the Navy Reserve in an active duty capacity during at least part of the strike. Among other acts she committed was "giving the finger" to nonstriker Hoffman as she drove her bus past Friege. Friege also told two nonstrikers, Hoffman and Whitton, that they would get them. To Zemba, she stated that her husband would get him. She asked Zemba whether he was keeping "Ellen [Harrison] and Flo [Ybarra]" happy.

In the first 2 weeks of the strike, Friege hit O'Brien's bus with a large picket sign, but there is no indication of damage occurring. Freige also engaged in petty acts such as opening emergency doors, and giving unsafe signals to buses as they exited from the yard.

Perhaps the highlight of Friege's testimony was her account of a picket line brawl involving herself, her husband, and a nonstriker named Jacobson, who never testified. Friege's colorful testimony involved pinching, slapping, stepping on glasses and breaking them, and stealing keys from the car of one of the participants. As the police who arrived on the scene, heard each side's account, and left without arresting anyone while shaking their heads, I decline to detail Friege's account and apportion blame. It appears each side was partly responsible. I can find nothing in the incident to affect Friege's reinstatement. Indeed, in considering the totality of Friege's conduct, I must conclude that she is entitled to reinstatement and backpay.

v. Stuart Grossman

When the strike started, Grossman was on vacation and he did not return to work during the strike. Zemba was vague as to him, thinking he may have possibly resigned.

Grossman engaged in some limited blocking of vehicles and hit buses occasionally as they went by the picket line. I question Zemba's good-faith belief that Grossman was guilty of serious misconduct. He is clearly entitled to reinstatement and backpay on this record.

w. Angel Huezo

This striker did not testify at the hearing. A single witness, Zemba, provided the basis for failing to reinstate Huezo. Although Huezo engaged in some blocking of vehicles, there were two primary acts described by Zemba. During the second week of the strike, Zemba observed Huezo with an object in his hand running alongside a highway coach bus as it pulled into the yard. After the bus parked, Zemba noticed a long scratch mark on the side of the bus, about 2-feet long, which had not been there before. The other major incident was a threat that Huezo stated to Zemba, to get Zemba's son. Huenzo knew Zemba's son, as both had attended the same suburban San Diego high school together.

Although the cost of repairing the damage to the bus was not stated, the deliberate and malicious act that Huezo committed is serious misconduct.[175] In addition, the threat against Zemba's son, who was known to Huezo, is serious. I find, based on the totality of the evidence, that Huezo is not entitled to reinstatement and backpay.[176]

x. Colleen Jellison

This witness was another member of a group of female strikers who repeatedly chanted sexual slurs directed to Harrison: "Come out . . . we have something for you . . . it won't hurt . . . it's better than Zemba's cock." In addition, Jellison directed comments toward Harrison such as, she wants to get into Ellen, Ellen is her "meat," and referring to Ellen as a "cocksucker." Jellison also told Ellen, "Zemba is screwing other women, aren't you jealous." These remarks were usually directed to Zemba and Harrison as they crossed the picket line and were frequent. About six times, Jellison turned her posterior to Zemba, and stated, "Kiss my ass."

[172] See Associated Grocers of New England, 227 NLRB 1200, 1207 (1977), enf. granted in part, denied in part, and remanded in part 563 F.2d 1333 (1st Cir. 1977).

[173] Franz and another striker named Lindemann were accused of frequently referring to Zemba, nonstrikers, or others, as "cocksuckers." In what I consider to be patently frivolous testimony, they both testified they were really using the term "copsucker" or some other nonsense variation of the word in question.

[174] I offer no opinion as to Franz' current physical condition or capacity to return to work. I leave these matters for compliance.

[176] In further support of my conclusion, I draw an adverse inference from Huezo's failure to testify without explanation.

Jellison called Schultz a "fucking liar" and threatened to get him. In addition, Jellison engaged in blocking of vehicles for up to 15 minutes, hit buses as they went through the line, and tried to open doors to buses.

This 29-year-old striker was the former roommate of striker George whose case was considered above. Although mere foul and vile language is not generally disqualifying, in this case, I hold that the repeated and repulsive nature of the remarks directed to Harrison, together with the blocking and other petty acts of harassment, make Jellison unfit for reinstatement and backpay. I will so recommend to the Board.

y. John Kipple

In early September, Schultz was attempting to enter the Aztec yard when he was blocked by Kipple and others for 20–25 minutes. Several other persons were blocked by Kipple as well, Swick for example. In addition, Kipple either threatened to kick Swick's "ass" or invited him out of his car to fight with Kipple. As Ingersoll was attempting to drive through the line, Kipple and another striker pounded on the fender of Ingersoll's car and dented it. In concert with Shelton, Kipple broke a gate in the Aztec fence. In mid-December, Kipple committed still another act of vandalism by breaking a bus windshield wiper off. On another occasion, Ingersoll was attempting to go through the line to work with his car window open. Kipple threw a cup of beer in Ingersoll's face.

In addition to vandalism, Kipple made vile and repulsive remarks on the line. To Harrison, he asked, four or five times, "Do you like sucking Zemba's cock"; "How do you like sleeping with the boss."[177]

Kipple was 35 years old at the time of the hearing. A college graduate, he was then a graduate student of the University of California at San Diego. During the strike he threw eggs at buses 20 to 30 times, explaining that, in his opinion, this activity was harmless and an appropriate release of tension and energy. In his statements to a Board agent prior to the hearing, Kipple refused to answer certain questions about the throwing of eggs while denying he hit vehicles with his picket sign. At hearing, he admitted hitting vehicles with his sign on two occasions.

Zemba also had several encounters with Kipple. Once Zemba was jogging about 2-3/4 miles from his home in La Jolla. Kipple pulled up in a car and yelled, "you son of a bitch, we'll get you." Other threats were directed to Zemba on three or four occasions. Another striker named Ondrechen confronted Zemba with the pointed end of his picket sign and Kipple told Ondrechen to shove it into Zemba's face. Finally, Kipple enjoyed walking close behind Zemba as the latter walked to the Jack-in-the-Box Restaurant. On one occasion, Kipple pushed ahead of Zemba in line, but never ordered food.

Based on a totality of the above evidence, I find without any doubt whatsoever, that Kipple is not entitled to reinstatement or to backpay.

z. Michael Kirkpatrick

During the strike this striker engaged in a number of unusual activities; for example, he took a hand-held spotlight and shined it into the Aztec yard at night. When the police ordered him to disconnect it, he complied. In addition, Kirkpatrick climbed the roof of an adjoining building and used a slingshot to shoot marbles[178] into the Aztec yard. One almost hit Schultz. Other marbles were thrown at Zemba by Kirkpatrick. He also threw rocks into the yard that hit an Aztec building. (R. Exh. 70.) These are serious acts of misconduct, because even though no injury or damage resulted, the activity was inherently dangerous.[179] Other times, Kirkpatrick was seen on the roof with fieldglasses observing the yard.

Kirkpatrick engaged in other provocative behavior. For example, at the Jack-in-the-Box Restaurant, he would, on occasion, sit in an adjacent booth to where Zemba and other Aztec managers were seated. Then Kirkpatrick placed a hot cup of coffee on the ledge separating the two booths and slowly began to push the coffee cup toward Zemba.[180]

On two separate occasions, Kirkpatrick followed nonstrikers home. Driving in his personal car, Kirkpatrick followed Swick to his home during the first week of the strike. Another time, Kirkpatrick was in a van driven by striker Connie Murphy. They followed Zemba, Harrison, and another person for about 7 miles. At times, the van followed closely behind Zemba's car.

I find this striker to have engaged in repeated acts of serious misconduct. Based on the totality of the evidence, he is not entitled to reinstatement and backpay.

aa. Glen Klock

Neither Zemba nor Harrison knew very much about this striker. Nonstriker Claybough testified he hit her bus with a sign. Picketing in Chula Vista, Klock was once hit by a bus mirror when he could not get out of the way of a speeding bus. He was not seriously injured.

Not only is there virtually no misconduct at all, not to mention serious misconduct, I find also no basis for even a good-faith belief that Klock engaged in strike misconduct.[181] He is clearly entitled to reinstatement and backpay.

[177] When Harrison was asked to testify to the remarks of Kipple, she became distraught and was unable to continue for a time. I took a brief recess for her to compose herself. When she returned, she finally gave the relevant testimony. I watched her closely. She trembled with fear and embarrassment and wept on the witness stand as she recounted the remarks of Kipple and another striker, Lindemann. Harrison had a prior background as an administrator for a fine arts museum and before that she worked as a comptroller for 6 years for a manufacturing plant. I cannot conclude that she was an unusually fragile person. I do conclude that she was deeply affected by the language directed at her and Zemba, in her presence. She was verbally assaulted by the remarks and there was emotional injury.

[180] Kirkpatrick admitted doing this and when I asked him why, he stated so that he would have more room to read his newspaper. When asked why he climbed up on the roof, Kirkpatrick answered that he wished to ask a workman some questions. I found this striker's credibility to be fairly low.

[181] Respondent contends that "reports" show that Klock intentionally laid down in front of a bus. This claim cannot be credited as no reliable evidence was presented to support it.

bb. Ray Lindemann

This striker repeatedly made comments to Harrison of a sexual nature such as, referring to her sucking Zemba's cock and "be sure and enjoy Zemba's cock."[182] Zemba reiterated Harrison's testimony and told of his own experiences with Lindemann's remarks. When Zemba returned on foot from the restaurant, Lindemann blocked the sidewalk, forcing Zemba to walk out in the street to get around him. At this time, Lindemann yelled, "Zemba you idiot, why didn't you try and go through me." In addition to this, Lindemann blocked buses for brief periods of time and struck buses, causing no damage. To nonstriker Hoffman, Lindemann leaned out of his car at a nearby restaurant and stated, "I'm going to get you, you'll get yours." Then he gave her the finger.

Essentially, this case presents the issue whether Lindemann's repeated sexual remarks to Harrison and Zemba will preclude his reinstatement.[183] This is not to discount the other matters described but they are trivial in nature. There is evidence to suggest that Lindemann harbored a personal grudge against Harrison and was attempting to settle old scores.[184] In any event, based on a totality of the credited evidence involving this striker, I find he should not be reinstated or receive backpay.

cc. Barbara McPheron

This striker was 31 years old and sister of another striker named Valerie Mendoza, whose case will be considered below. I find that she committed one of the most serious and dangerous acts of misconduct in the entire strike. About 1 or 2 weeks into the strike, Ingersoll was driving a van to work, with a number of nonstrikers in it, including his wife and daughter, then also working at Aztec. Proceeding along Mission Gorge Road in San Diego, Ingersoll was driving about 25–30 miles per hour with the side window on the driver's side open. Coming up on his left-hand side was a car owned by McPheron, who was riding as a passenger and driven by a former Aztec employee named Ruth Drake, who never testified at the hearing.[185] As Drake pulled alongside of Ingersoll's van, McPheron threw two eggs at him, hitting him on the side of the face with one and hitting inside of the van with the other. As Ingersoll's car was hit, he almost collided with the car in front of him. He heard laughter from McPheron as Drake turned left a few moments later.[186] I find that this act was extremely serious, and frought with potential for injury or even worse.[187] Moreover, I find that this act was not impulsive, but a planned attack by McPheron.

McPheron was also a member of a group of female pickets who repeatedly chanted sexual slogans at Harrison as previously indicated. She also told Harrison that "you would like a licking better than a fuck," or that you would like me better than Gus, or "Why don't you try me." These kind of remarks were also directed to other female nonstrikers. To Zemba, she engaged in name calling and bending over toward Zemba, telling him to kiss her "ass." Finally, McPheron also engaged in other conduct such as brief blocking, striking of buses with the picket signs, and opening emergency doors of buses. Based on the totality of the evidence regarding her conduct, I find that she is not entitled to reinstatement and backpay.

dd. Linda McQueen

This striker was still another member of the female chanters. She distinguished herself, in Zemba's mind, by exceeding even the low standards of sexual language set by some of the other strikers. I give credence to Zemba's testimony regarding her activities, because prior to the strike, McQueen had suffered an injury that precluded her employment as a busdriver. Rather than have McQueen receive workmen's compensation, Zemba assigned her a job in the office where she stayed for several weeks, doing dispatching and other office work. Zemba and Harrison knew her well.

To Zemba and Harrison, McQueen referred to eating Ellen's "pussy, finger fucking, Ellen is licking Zemba, and was Zemba fucking all the women." Nonstriking female employees Bevers, White, and Foti were asked by McQueen whether Zemba was "fucking" them. McQueen also bent over on occasion, telling Zemba to kiss her "ass."

Nonstriker Swick testified that McQueen threw rocks at his car, but no damage was indicated. Similarly, there was no apparent damage as she kicked the car of nonstriker Simard. On three or four occasions, she threw eggs at buses, but missed. On several occasions, McQueen threatened Zemba: on the first night of the strike, she stated that she would see that Zemba got killed. In addition, Zemba's family would be killed and so would he.

On several occasions, as Zemba walked to the Jack-in-the-Box Restaurant, she followed behind him on foot, calling him a "motherfucker" or yelling threats at him.

In evaluating the conduct of this witness, I consider her altercation with nonstriker Dave Smart, who threw her to the ground during an incident on the picket line.[188] McQueen provided some additional details on this incident. As Smart was driving through the line, McQueen "kind of kicked" the side of Smart's car. Then, after the incident, she was taken to Kaiser Hospital where she was found to be unhurt and received no treatment. As a result of this incident, McQueen claims that she developed paranoia, so that she could not go any place where men were. McQueen canceled her counseling sessions, however, and worked out the problem with a friend and through self-analysis. I do not believe any of this, about the alleged aftereffects of the Smart incident, not only because McQueen's testimony is contrary to common sense, but also because of her misconduct and provocation that I have summarized above. In looking to the totality of the evidence concerning her misconduct, I find that she is not entitled to reinstatement and backpay.

[182] As Harrison was testifying to these matters, Lindemann entered the hearing room. I cannot adequately describe the witness' reaction: she recoiled with loathing and revulsion; she wept and asked that he be barred from the hearing room. The General Counsel objected to this and I denied the witness' request. After a recess, the witness returned and, while not completely composed, was able to continue.

[183] I have decided to discredit the testimony of nonstriker Langley, who testified that Lindemann threw coffee on him. In an admission against interest, Franz testified that he did this. I have not considered this misconduct against Franz because he also testified that this incident was an accident and I believed him. I am also discounting the testimony of nonstriker Reese who described a man on the line who looked like Lindemann with a rifle in his possession. This evidence was not reliable.

[184] He testified that before Harrison arrived, the Company operated informally as a close working group. Then she established complicated procedures which, after her arrival, caused communication problems.

[185] Similarly, Respondent never called any other witnesses who were passengers in Ingersoll's van.

[186] McPheron admitted throwing two eggs at Ingersoll's van, but denied hitting him in the face and denied that his vehicle was moving when she threw the eggs. I do not believe her version of events for a moment. She alluded in her testimony to an argument between Ingersoll and Drake that occurred a short time before the incident in question: in this argument, Ingersoll allegedly said to Drake, "Shut up, you fucking cunt; I take that back, you don't even have a cunt." With this as a background, McPheron denied stalking Ingersoll and claimed to have seen his van simply by accident. I reject this aspect of her testimony as well.

ee. Valerie Mendoza

In addition to being related to striker McPheron above, this striker was living during the strike with striker Roy Stoker, whose case will be considered below. While her case will rise or fall on her own actions, some of her misconduct was in concert with Stoker. For example, in late August, O'Brien was leaving the yard in her car to go home. In the car was O'Brien's husband and Hokstad and his wife. While driving on Mission Gorge Road, about 9:30 p.m., Stoker and Mendoza jumped from behind a parked car and threw eggs at O'Brien's car. Two eggs hit the windshield. Another incident concerned Claybough who was driving a bus in Chula Vista while being followed by a car containing Mendoza and Stoker.

At other times, Mendoza acted on her own. For example, in early January, Mendoza was seen by nonstrikers Comfort and King throwing rocks at employee cars parked inside the lot. She did this for 5-6 minutes and hit three cars, including a new Toyota pickup truck. As a result, she caused several paint chips and dents in the vehicles. Hokstad was involved in a major altercation with Stoker that did not include Mendoza. However, on two separate occasions, she threw lighted cigarettes through the window of Hokstad's vehicle as he attempted to drive through the line. One of these times, Hokstad momentarily lost control of his bus. While Hokstad was distracted with the cigarette, Mendoza also reached through the window and smashed a flash cube attachment on his camera. To Hancock, Mendoza asked who in the Company she was "fucking." Mendoza also threatened to kick the "ass" of Hancock and two other female office employees. As Hoffman's husband drove through the line in a new truck, Mendoza spit on the truck.

In December or January, Zemba complained to police that Mendoza was trespassing on Aztec property, and she was arrested. The next day, Mendoza bumped Zemba on the street with her shoulder and said, "Oh, I'm sorry, are you going to have me arrested?" When Harrison was nearby, Mendoza asked Zemba how he liked to "fuck Ellen." Another time in late August, Mendoza told Zemba, "You are fucking all the women and that's why you are able to keep them instead of having them leave the company." In addition to this, Mendoza participated in the blocking of buses for brief periods, opening schoolbus emergency doors and other such petty acts.

In evaluating the evidence against Mendoza, I also consider an incident where she was sprayed in the face with ammonia by nonstriker Neil Simmard. However, this incident does not redeem Mendoza from the consequence of her serious repeated acts of misconduct. I find that she is not entitled to reinstatement and backpay.

ff. Roy Stoker

This striker was guilty of perhaps more major violent incidents than any other striker. First, he committed two physical assaults on nonstrikers. A day or so after the incident with Brenda Leonard, Hokstad drove up to the picket line with a friend who testified at the hearing and corroborated Hokstad's testimony. Stoker walked over to the car in which Hokstad was sitting and hit him in the face with a half fist or straight arm. This caused a cut and abrasions on Hokstad's face and caused his glasses to fly into the back seat.[189] In another incident, this time in Chula Vista, Swadner and Fortner were sitting in a bus listening to the tape-recording of a speech made by a company official. Stoker came up to the side of the bus and put his hand through, saying, "I'm going to take that fucking tape recorder and jam it up your fucking ass." At this time, Swadner slammed the window on Stoker's hand. Stoker then ran to the front of the bus, entered it, and while Fortner and two passengers watched, he struck Swadner in the jaw and knocked him down. Then Stoker beat on Swadner's head and kicked him in his back and ribs. Stoker then left the area quickly while Swadner called the police.[190] When the matter reached court, Stoker was convicted by a jury of another charge and Swadner's charge was dropped. These two incidents are extremely serious misconduct that would justify failure to reinstate,[191] but there is much more.

The other charge of which Stoker was convicted was malicious mischief committed on September 18, when Stoker broke the back window on Claybough's bus with his picket sign. He was sentenced to 1-year probation, $175 fine, and restitution. After his arrest, Stoker said to Claybough, "Why don't you have me arrested again and I'll pay you a personal visit at your home." This threat was taken seriously. During the strike, Claybough's adult daughter and sometimes the daughter's husband rode with Claybough on her bus route for 8 hours a day every day. Prior to this, Stoker had boarded a transit bus in Chula Vista that Claybough was driving and told passengers they did not have good sense to ride with a "fat-assed" lady that could not get behind the steering wheel.

[188] I also consider the fact that McQueen is a defendant in a civil suit brought against her by nonstriker named Churning, who did not testify in the instant case. The cause of action is based on the alleged blocking of Churning's bus in the middle of the street.

[189] This misconduct is by itself sufficient for discharge. Kane-Miller Corp., 259 NLRB 1075 (1982).

[191] Giddings & Lewis, Inc., 240 NLRB 441 (1979); W. C. McQuaide, 220 NLRB 593, 594 (1975), enfd. as to this point 552 F.2d 519 (3d Cir. 1977).

It is unnecessary to restate Stoker's misconduct described with Mendoza above. However, Stoker, by himself, threw a football at O'Brien's windshield of her bus, but this did no damage. A few minutes after the strike began, Stoker and another person were seen kicking in the right side of a nonstriker's car by a witness named Golding. The car belonged to Golding's father-in-law and the fender was badly damaged.

Zemba too had personal experiences with Stoker. Once, he observed Stoker throw a bag of grease against a windshield of a bus. When Zemba walked to the Jack-in-the-Box Restaurant, Stoker followed saying, "You're not going to return; we'll get you."

The evidence against Stoker is so overwhelming and so clear and convincing that I hardly need to say that he is not entitled to reinstatement or backpay.

gg. Kiernon (Gene) Moore

The primary accusation against this striker concerns the alleged placing of black plaster of Paris containers containing copper tubing tire puncture devices in the path of buses in Chula Vista.[192] Both Zemba and Claybough testified on this subject: in late August, Zemba testified that he observed Moore, Ondrechen, and Pangilinan in Chula Vista at Broadway and H Streets. He observed the three persons placing the tubing under the tire of a bus. Before he could retrieve it, the three strikers took it away. Claybough testified that in the first month or so of the strike, she saw Moore leaning over a gutter with something in his hand. In the gutter was a piece of copper tubing. Claybough also once asked Moore to stop taking pictures of her and he answered, "I want to see what you look like after you're dead."

I cannot credit the testimony of Zemba and Claybough on this matter. The latter's testimony seems highly suspect. She never attempted to retrieve the device, merely leaving it in the gutter. Moore's mere proximity to the device does not show he placed it there. Similarly, I am unable to understand how three strikers could be placing the device in the curb as described by Zemba. Unlike Ondrechen and Pangilinan who have substantial other misconduct, Moore has no other serious misconduct against him that I am able to credit.

Moore did make occasional threats to Zemba at the Twain Avenue location such as "I'll get you for this," and, "You won't live too much longer." Later, Moore made a remark to Zemba that a lynch mob would get him. Moore also engaged in occasional brief blocking of vehicles and hitting of buses with fists and picket signs. Based on the totality of the credited testimony involving Moore, I conclude that he is entitled to reinstatement and backpay.

hh. Joe Mountain

Hoffman testified that during the strike she was blocked in by Mountain driving for another company. The incident happened at a local school where both drivers were picking up schoolchildren. Mountain was in front of Hoffman who could not back up because this is prohibited by law in a school zone. I credit Mountain's explanation that Hoffman's estimate of the time of 15 minutes was exaggerated and, in any event, Mountain could not pull up because of the presence of children crossing in front of his bus.

Zemba testified that on one occasion he asked Mountain to stop challenging nonstrikers to fight and that Mountain responded, "Go to hell." Then he challenged Zemba to a fight. Mountain also referred to Zemba as a "bastard," and said, "We're going to wreck you." No drivers testified who had supposedly been challenged to fight.[193] Mountain also engaged in the brief blocking of buses and, on one occasion, hit a bus as it entered the yard, but caused no damage. This and all other conduct attributed to Mountain was minor in nature. Based on the totality of the conduct attributed to him, I conclude that he is entitled to reinstatement and backpay.

ii. Phillip Mulligan

Prior to the strike, Mulligan was involved in a bitter arbitration dispute with Zemba that ultimately went into litigation. Perhaps because Mulligan was a college student during all or part of the strike, there is little evidence of any misconduct.

Zemba described two threats made to him by Mulligan. On the second or third day of the strike, Mulligan told Zemba that he would push Zemba underneath a bus at the picket line. In October or November, Mulligan threatened to run Zemba down if he saw Zemba on the street. O'Brien, too, was told by Mulligan many times, "You'll be sorry, we'll get you." In addition to this, Mulligan was seen opening schoolbus doors on several occasions and briefly blocking vehicles, including using the picket sign to block Zemba's view. Once he followed Zemba to a nearby restaurant on foot.

Based on the totality of the evidence against Mulligan, I conclude he is entitled to reinstatement and backpay.

jj. Connie Murphy

Beginning shortly after the strike began and continuing thereafter, this striker engaged in extensive and significant misconduct. Moreover, as will be demonstrated below, she was one of the least credible witnesses to be presented by either side.

When the strike began, some of the buses were still out. One of these late-arriving buses was driven by

[192] Two other serious matters were implicated at hearing, one relied on by Respondent as part of the basis for discharge and one apparently not relied on. The first concerns an alleged assault against Mrs. Barba, wife of a nonstriker. Neither Mr. nor Mrs. Barba testified, and based on the only first-hand evidence presented at hearing, i.e., from Moore, I find that the evidence of the alleged assault is too tenuous and unreliable to consider. The second matter concerns alleged child molestation charges against Moore. Because this matter was not apparently relied on by Respondent, I do not evaluate the evidence, although I note that the evidence appears slim and lacking in merit to say the least. In both instances, I will disregard the evidence as it is unconvincing. I will base my decision on the other evidence of record.

[193] Mountain did describe an incident with Hokstad whom he challenged to a fight. This was after Hokstad blew a loud airhorn at Mountain and other pickets who had not had a full opportunity to clear a path for Hokstad's bus.

Cheryl Anderson, who never testified at the hearing. She left her bus on Twain Street in such a way as to obstruct traffic, especially due to the darkness. Then someone disabled the bus by pressing a certain switch that precluded the bus from starting in the normal way. When a nonstriker went out to the street to retrieve the bus, she could not start it and a mechanic was summoned. However, the mechanic would not start the bus because he was required to go to the rear of the bus, lift the cover to the engine compartment, and reset the switch. He could not do this because Murphy had driven her van flush up against the rear of the bus so the compartment door could not be opened. When Murphy could not be found to move her van, the police were called. Only when the police threatened to tow the van, did she emerge from the crowd of strikers and drive her van away. As she backed away, she almost struck Zemba, who was standing nearby. The incident lasted in excess of 30 minutes in the first hours of the strike.[194]

On August 26, Murphy threw eggs at a bus driven by O'Brien as it left the yard. The eggs struck the windshield and side of the bus and caused O'Brien's vision to be obstructed.[195]

Along with striker Kirkpatrick, Murphy, driving her van, followed Zemba, Harrison, and another person in a long chase. The next day Murphy said to Zemba, "We didn't get you that time, we'll get you next time."[196]

Harrison was a continual victim of Murphy's misconduct. Murphy made harassing calls to Harrison at home, saying that Harrison was "dead meat," and that "we are going to get you." The next day, Murphy asked her how she liked the phone calls. Murphy was also the leader of the female strikers who repeatedly chanted sexual slogans toward Harrison. These women referred to Harrison as "Connie's meat." Murphy shouted, "I'll show you how to make love, you're mine." References were made to Harrison's "cunt" and her "big ass." Murphy asked, "Are you enjoying Zemba's cock."

Finally, Murphy also blocked vehicles, gave Zemba the finger, and hit buses as they came through the line.[197]

Based on a totality of the evidence regarding Murphy, I find she is not entitled to reinstatement or backpay.

kk. Brenda Myers

This striker was seen by Schultz and Swick with a can opener-type instrument scratching it along the side of a bus, causing serious damage. As Hokstad was driving a bus into the yard, Myers threw eggs at and hit his front window, thereby obstructing his vision.[198] On another occasion, Swick was a passenger in a car leaving the yard, when Myers threw a rock at his head. He blocked the rock with his arm and the rock hit him there. This incident happened a few weeks after Swick had caused the arrest of Myers for scratching the side of a bus with a can opener. On that night, Swick was afraid to drive his car through the picket line due to the threats of the remaining pickets so he was forced to lay down in the back seat of a police car in order to get through the line.

As Ybarra was going through the line in a vehicle with her three daughters, ages 16 and 12-year-old twins, Myers shouted, "You're dead, you're through."

Myers was another member of a female group of pickets who constantly chanted sexual slogans directed to Harrison.[199] To Schultz, Myers said, "You ought to try women sometime, you wouldn't take it out on us then." A combination of threats and sexual comments were directed to the female office staff. To Cheryl Foti, Myers asked, "Is Zemba getting into you." Myers also said she would not make it through the line. To Bevers, Myers threatened to whip her "ass." Myers told Zemba that he and his family would be killed. As Zemba walked to the restaurant, Myers followed him by foot saying, "Look who's behind you, why are you walking so fast." Myers told Harrison that she would get her "ass."

In evaluating the totality of Myers' conduct, I am mindful of the threats made to her by nonstriker Reese, to beat the "shit" out of her. I am also mindful that Swadner sprayed her with ammonia although in a later trial for this conduct, Swadner was found not guilty. Finally, I note that Reese brandished a crowbar in her presence. Despite these incidents, which I find Myers provoked in whole or in part, I must conclude that her conduct is such that she is not entitled to reinstatement or to backpay.

ll. Ron Norman

This witness did not testify at hearing; however, an adverse inference is not drawn because the Union introduced evidence that his absence was due to a medical condition.[200] I similarly do not consider as evidence the fact that Norman is a defendant in a court suit brought by nonstriker Churning for alleged extended blocking of Churning's bus. The latter never testified and there is no other credible evidence on the point.

Schultz testified that once at a bus checkpoint, Norman said he ought to leave when buses did because there would not be anyone there to protect him. Norman threatened Zemba's life and promised to get him. Norman also engaged in brief blocking, opening of emergency doors, and striking of buses as they entered or exited the yard. No damage resulted.

[194] In her affidavit to the Board agent, Murphy stated she had parked her van at all times to allow access to the rear compartment. In her testimony at hearing, she admitted having to back up before the mechanic could reset the switch.

[195] I disregard O'Brien's additional testimony about the alleged children of Murphy also throwing eggs. There is inadequate proof that the children were Murphy's or that they were acting under her direction and control.

[196] At hearing, Murphy admitted the incident following Zemba and the others for about 2 miles and stated she did it out of curiosity. In her statement to the Board agent, Murphy refused to answer any questions about this incident.

[197] In her affidavit to the Board agent, Murphy denied throwing eggs, but at the hearing, she admitted throwing a single egg at O'Brien's bus. Murphy also denied in her statement opening bus emergency doors, but at hearing admitted this activity on one occasion. Her rationale stated at hearing for pulling her van up flush behind the bus was to prevent accidents and not to obstruct movement of the bus. This testimony is totally incredible.

[198] While denying this incident, Myers did admit to throwing eggs at vehicles four times and on two occasions, bringing her own eggs to the picket line, a dozen each time. In her affidavit to the Board agent, she denied throwing eggs at all.

[200] C.P. Exh. 28.

Based on the totality of the evidence against Norman, I conclude he is entitled to reinstatement and to backpay as none of his acts were serious misconduct.[201]

mm. Steve Ondrechen

This striker used abusive language toward Zemba, calling him a "cocksucker" and saying "fuck you" or "mother-fucker." On one occasion, these epithets were accompanied by action. Zemba was in his car attempting to leave the yard. Ondrechen took the sharpened end of his picket stick and poked it through the open car window, about 3-12 inches from Zemba's face. This continued for 15-20 seconds while Ondrechen yelled, "You Jew-bastard, I'm going to kill you."[202] Although Zemba was not Jewish, Ondrechen frequently referred to him as "mother-fucking Jew," a "Jew bastard," or "dirty Jew."

To Harrison, Ondrechen asked, "How do you like Zemba's cock." He also called her a "fucking whore." Claybough was told by Ondrechen that her life was not worth a plugged nickel and that she better watch her step.

Based on the totality of the evidence against this striker, I must conclude that he is not entitled to reinstatement and backpay.[203]

nn. Marian "Susie" Osborne

This striker committed various acts of misconduct that are not sufficient to preclude reinstatement. Nonstriker Huffman was told by Osborne that she would get her. Claybough was told by Osborne that she knew someone who would get her. Osborne also directed threats to Zemba such as, "Be careful where you go, you don't have too long to live." These and similar types of remarks were made to Zemba as Osborne and another striker followed him to the Jack-in-the-Box Restaurant.

In addition to these threats, Osborne engaged in name calling and sexual innuendoes. However, it is significant that Harrison, the usual target of these comments, was not sure who Osborne was or why she was not reinstated. Zemba, however, did recall Osborne. He was asked, "How do you like that whore," "How was Ellen to screw." Other female office employees were called "whore," and asked who in the office they were sleeping with. Osborne called Ellen Hoffman, a nonstriker, a "bitch" and asked her if she was still walking the street at night to make more money.

In addition to the usual brief blocking, Osborne blocked a bus for up to 20 minutes, according to Swick. However, this extended blocking was an isolated act. The threats were not accompanied by any overt act. After the single incident with Claybough referred to above, she was arrested, but never formally charged. The name-calling and sexual insults seem to me of a far lesser provocation than referred to with others such as Jellison and McQueen. Based on the totality of the evidence against Osborne, I find that she is entitled to reinstatement and backpay.

oo. Agnes Pangilinan

This striker was seen by Zemba, Schultz, Swick, and Harrison throwing nails on the driveway leading to the Aztec yard. (R. Exh. 60.)[204] Schultz described the nails as 1-1/2 inches long. No tires were damaged because company officials were able to pick up the nails shortly after Pangilinan threw them.[205] In addition to this rather convincing evidence of serious misconduct, there is still more evidence of other serious transgressions. About 2 months into the strike, Ellen Hoffman saw Pangilinan place a round plaster of Paris device with a spike sticking out of it in the Aztec driveway just before a bus entered. The bus ran over the object but the tire was not punctured. As described above, Zemba also observed this striker and two others in Chula Vista placing a similar object in a curb next to the tire of an Aztec bus.

Pangilinan also threatened Hoffman by forcing her picket stick into the window of a bus 3 inches from Hoffman's face, almost hitting the witness, and saying she hoped that Hoffman killed herself. Comfort described this striker as opening emergency doors on two occasions and Hewin described a threat to her as she was driving her bus from the Aztec yard. Pangilinan said, "You're going to die."

Pangilinan's denial of this misconduct was unconvincing. Unlike many of the other female strikers, she was small, only 5 feet 1 inch tall, and her speech was distinctive as she was born in Guam. There was no mistaking Pangilinan and the evidence against her was overwhelming. Based on the totality of the evidence against her, I find that she is not entitled to reinstatement and backpay.

pp. Frank Patton

A picket captain until October 13,[206] when he went into the hospital, Patton was accused of sundry acts of misconduct. In September, Zemba had Patton arrested for trespass. Patton told Schultz well into the strike that the trouble on the line would change from the night to the mornings. This statement seemed more like the conveying of information and not like a threat, particularly because Patton was not predicting anything in particular either from the pickets or from him, personally.

[201] I leave to compliance the question of whether Norman is physically capable of performing his work and, if not, the determining of when he became disabled.

[202] Although either Harrison or Schultz was with Zemba at the time, neither testified to this incident, even though Zemba said at the time to those in the car to be sure and remember this. On Br. 136 fn. 80 the General Counsel notes this fact. I credit Zemba's testimony over Ondrechen's denial because even though I cannot account for the lack of corroborating testimony, it is not likely that anyone would fabricate an incident like this. Moreover, Zemba testified on this point with a credibility that made me believe him.

[203] In reaching this conclusion, I do not rely on Zemba's testimony that Ondrechen was one of three placing sharpened copper tubing near a bus tire in Chula Vista.

[204] Indeed, Zemba observed her committing these acts a total of three times.

[205] The Board has consistently held that the scattering of nails by a striking employee at the gates of a struck facility constitutes misconduct sufficient to warrant discharge. See Giddings & Lewis, Inc., 240 NLRB 441 (1979); Moore Business Forms, 224 NLRB 393, 398 (1976), enfd. in part 574 F.2d 835 (5th Cir. 1978).

[206] Again, I do not consider Patton's status as an aggravating factor.

Dugent testified that Patton said he would get him. When Dugent attempted to report this remark to the police, the police would not accept the complaint. According to Hokstad, Patton said to him early in the strike, "We're going to put you in the hospital—your teeth will be wired shut for months." Hokstad testified to another alleged conversation with Patton, this at Disneyland, prior to the strike. Patton allegedly said that Hokstad might make it across the picket line once, but he would never make it through twice.

Patton denied the substance of these two conversations with Hokstad and I credit these denials and find the remarks were never made. At the hearing, Patton impressed me as a particularly calm and mature witness, not given to picket line rhetoric. He stands accused of relatively little misconduct which corroborates my impression at the hearing. Hokstad, on the other hand, was on occasion, a needlessly provocative antiunion employee, himself not free from misconduct. I simply do not believe this aspect of his testimony. Clearly, without Hokstad's testimony, there is no basis at all not to reinstate Patton. Even were I to credit Hokstad, I would still recommend that Patton be reinstated under Board law as the threats were not accompanied by any overt action and I would rely on Respondent's unfair labor practices and condonation, if this were a close case. It is not, and Patton should be reinstated with backpay.

qq. Linda Peckron

Peckron was one of the most vicious and violent strikers and was guilty of extensive serious misconduct. A major problem is where to begin. Kathy Hewin provided a telling episode as she drove up to the line in her car after work. It was a warm day and her window was down. Peckron approached her car and spit in her face.[207] This act was not an isolated act of impulsive misconduct. Witness what occurred next. As Hewin wiped the spit from her face, a cup holder from her car flew out of the window. She opened the door to retrieve it, putting her leg to the ground. Then Peckron, who stood 5 feet 8 inches tall and weighed between 250 and 300 pounds, began pushing against the door with Hewin's leg caught between the door and the frame of the car. Finally after several moments, Peckron released the pressure and allowed Hewin to get her leg back in the car and leave. Hewin's leg was bruised but she was not seriously injured.[208]

Peckron was also guilty of extensive egg throwing. Schultz saw her throw an egg inside a bus as it pulled through the line. A bus driven by Comfort was hit two times with eggs thrown by Peckron. Peckron also hit the windsheild of a bus driven by Cohee with an egg. A nonstriker named Estrada testified that Peckron threw an egg at his car after he had finished work. About 9 p.m. one night, Peckron and Fowler threw eggs at Harrison's car, hitting in on its trunk. Hewin, too, described how Peckron threw an egg and hit the windshield of her car as she went through the line. Peckron testified that she brought eggs to the line 5–10 times, about one dozen each time. Sometimes she also would pitch in to buy the eggs. Then the eggs would be kept in the car closest to the line. In addition to throwing eggs, Peckron threw a rock at the back of Hokstad's car as he drove through the line. No damage was done to the window, however.

Peckron also made the usual threats to get Zemba and his family and to do Ellen in. There was some sexual innuendo, but not explicit. For example, on several occasions, she asked Harrison if Zemba was good in bed. She engaged in extensive blocking of vehicles and opening of emergency doors.

Perhaps the most astounding circumstance of Peckeron's case, apart from the misconduct committed by her, is the fact that in early December, Peckron was named a picket captain. She replaced Fowler at this time and continued in this position for about 2 months. When named a picket captain, her proclivity for violent behavior must have been known to the Union. In any event, in evaluating her conduct, I have not considered her status as a picket captain in making my recommendation.

Based on the totality of the evidence against her, I find that Peckron is not entitled to reinstatement or to backpay.[209]

rr. Tom Reynolds

About Labor Day, Reynolds became a relief picket captain replacing Patton on one of the shifts. Again, I do not consider this fact. During the time on the picket line, Reynolds engaged in a variety of misconduct. He followed a bus driven by Hoffman to a golf course where she picked up pasengers. Then he left. Along with Kipple, Reynolds beat on Ingersoll's car as he drove through the line. This caused some minor dents in the fender. Once, as Cohee was driving through the line, Reynolds spit on a window of his van.

[207] I have indicated my view earlier that spitting directly in a person's face is a serious provocative act that frequently generates a violent response. Cf. Sea View Industries, 127 NLRB 1402, 1430–1431, 1437 (1960).

[208] Two of Peckron's fellow strikers, Balding and Tom, and other witnesses for the Company, e.g., Ybarra and Swick, all testified to this incident. Not surprisingly, I do not believe Peckron's denials of this incident at all.

[209] Peckron testified to some instances of misconduct by nonstrikers, one of whom was a person named Dugent, who threatened pickets with a crowbar once. Witness this amazing testimony from Peckron, herself, which I credit:

> Q. [Mr. Geerdes] Had there been any contact between Mr. Dugent and the pickets prior to him arriving on the picket line with his crowbar?
> A. I'm sure when he came in that night that people were hollering and yelling at him. He was one that couldn't take that a whole lot. He got real fired up real quick.
> Q. Do you remember specifically what occurred when he came in that night.
> A. I don't remember specifically that night exactly what had been said, but Dugent was one that we liked to catch, because he did react. He reacted real violently, really funny. You know these were pretty hilarious to watch. [R. Tr. 7895.]

The witness went on to say that it was basically the same type of thing with nonstriker Reese. (R. Tr. 7896.) Thus, Peckron here is relating the scheme of the strikers to find nonstrikers with the least self-control and provoke them into violence. Because of this strategy of the strikers, I have not given great weight to the conduct of the nonstrikers.

Zemba's experience with Reynolds regarding misconduct consisted of an isolated incident in December or January 1981, where Reynolds deliberately bumped Zemba as the latter walked near the line. Zemba was not injured at all. Reynolds also used a hand-held spotlight to shine into the Aztec yard.[210]

According to Smeltzer, a nonstriker, he saw Reynolds throw eggs on two occasions. Reynolds denied this, but admitted delivering eggs to the picket line on two occasions, two dozen each time. The eggs were brought for people to throw. When he saw people with eggs, he made sure that he looked elsewhere. I credit Reynolds' denial that he never threw eggs himself. In Smeltzer's testimony he was less than certain on one of the two occasions cited. However, Reynolds' candid testimony regarding the bringing of the eggs to the line and aiding and abetting this activity makes it unlikely that he would fabricate denials of the throwing itself. I believe his testimony on this point.

Of course this leaves the bumping incident that I find was a minor and isolated incident. I have considered Reynolds' activities with the eggs and the other matters referred to above. I have not yet mentioned several instances of blocking for brief periods. Zemba seems to consider Reynolds a different breed from the repeated violence demonstrated by some other strikers. Zemba occasionally engaged Reynolds in conversation at the Jack-in-the-Box Restaurant. Moreover, the minor damage to Ingersoll's car and the spitting incident do not justify discharge. Based on a totality of the circumstances regarding Reynolds, I conclude that he is entitled to reinstatement and backpay.

ss. Julia Richard and Susan Silvestri

Like Baker and Lilly, these two strikers were so often together, it makes good sense to consider them together. Nonstriker Hoffman testified that both women called her "cocksucker" and blocked her from entering the Aztec yard. On one occasion, Richard swung her sign like a baseball bat and hit Hoffman's headlight, but did not damage it. Silverstri threw a rock at a bus driven by Hoffman but caused no damage.

A female nonstriker named Bevers testified that both strikers said they knew where they could find her. Both also threatened to kick Hancock's "ass." In September, Silvestri hit the door of a truck driven by Reese and, for this act, she was cited by the police. The driver's door was dented. Harrison described Richard and Silvestri following her to the restaurant, one on each side, and one said, "Oh, we don't want her anyway. She's Connie's [Murphy's] meat." On another occasion, the two women followed her, wondering out loud, "I wonder what she would do. Do you think we should try her." Once Silvestri said to Harrison, "You would like a licking better than a fuck."

Although Zemba could not place Richard, he did recall Silvestri following him on foot about 12 times. She said, "Ellen is dead meat." Silvestri also threatened to kill Zemba and his family on several occasions. Once Silvestri said to Zemba, "Hey, mother-fucker, where's your lover at. You won't be seeing her, because we've gotten rid of her." Silvestri also bent over and told Zemba to kiss her "ass" about 12 separate occasions.

Richard and Silvestri were roommates during the time of the strike. They usually were on the line at the same time, because only Richard had a car. Both women engaged in repeated blocking and striking of vehicles as they came through the line.

Despite the similarity in many respects of their conduct, it is clear that Silvestri was engaged in the more egregious conduct. As to Richard, I find without question she is entitled to reinstatement and backpay. It is a much closer question regarding Silvestri. However, on balance, I find that her threats were not accompanied by overt actions and the repeated sexual statements were on a more innocuous scale, as compared to statements made by other strikers. For this reason, I recommend that Silvestri be reinstated and awarded backpay as well.

tt. Hubert Robinson

In September, this striker threatened to kick Zemba's "ass" as the latter drove through the picket line. Robinson called Comfort a "fucker," or "mixed-breed mother-fucker" on several occasions.

In October, Robinson was sued with other strikers by nonstriker Churning, who at the time of hearing was no longer working for Respondent. Apparently outraged by what he considered a baseless lawsuit, Robinson made several remarks to Zemba suggesting Zemba was responsible for the lawsuit. For example, shortly after he received service of process, Robinson said to Zemba, as he drove through the line, "I thought you were my friend, now I'm being accused of this. What goes around comes around." Robinson went on to accuse Zemba of having been kicked out of Philadelphia, a reference Zemba could not explain. A few days later Zemba was walking past the picket line and Robinson again alluded to the Churning suit by saying that he was not going to forget about it and that Zemba should remember what Zemba said before. On another occasion, Robinson invited Zemba to exit his car so Robinson could "whip his ass."

A nonstriker named Estrada testified that Robinson threw eggs at his car. I cannot credit this testimony, however. Robinson denied the allegation and I believe his testimony. Moreover, the level of Robinson's activities on the line does not corroborate Estrada's testimony. That is, Robinson engaged in few incidents, all which were minor. His statement, to Zemba, "what goes around," etc., is too ambiguous to be characterized as a threat. The threat to fight Zemba is nothing more than a trivial rough incident.

Robinson was 50 years old and before coming to San Diego had retired from the fire department in an eastern city. I found him to be mature and mostly truthful in his testimony, but with a slight tendency to get excited about events on the picket line. In reviewing the totality of the evidence regarding his case, I find that he is entitled to reinstatement and backpay.

[210] I do not credit the testimony of Zemba that Reynolds was using a radio device to jam communications between the buses and Aztec dispatcher. I find no credible factual basis for Zemba's conclusion.

uu. Karen Sloane

Neither Zemba nor Harrison knew Sloan nor why she was not reinstated.[211] After reviewing the evidence pertaining to Sloane, I am as much in the dark as anyone. Other than Sloane herself, the only witness to give substantive testimony regarding Sloane was Swick. His testimony on this striker was not impressive. He testified that Sloane blocked buses, engaged in verbal harassment of drivers (no details were given), and hit a bus with her picket sign on two occasions. I cannot credit this testimony. Sloan testified and denied even this extremely slight misconduct. She also testified that she was on the picket line only the first 3 weeks. Thereafter, she stopped picketing because, as a single parent of two children, she was unable to afford a babysitter.

I find here that Zemba could not have held an honest belief that this striker engaged in serious misconduct. Accordingly, she is clearly entitled to reinstatement and backpay.

vv. Michael Smith

There is at least a scintilla of evidence regarding this striker to support the decision not to reinstate. When Smith returned from an assignment, the strike had already started. Smith told Zemba "to shove the bus up his ass" and then he gave Zemba the finger. Smith also told Zemba to go to hell. In addition to these remarks, Smith hit a bus with a sign on two occasions, and blocked buses and Zemba's car for brief periods on several more occasions.

Based on the totality of the evidence regarding this witness, I find that he is entitled to reinstatement and backpay.[212]

ww. George Sprague

When the strike started, Sprague was on disability status where he remained until November. Notwithstanding his status, he also joined the strike from the beginning.

Sprague called nonstriker Golding names such as "scab" and "jerk" and stated that he would get Golding. Both Swick and Zemba observed Sprague blocking buses and other vehicles on several occasions for brief periods of time. Both witnesses also saw Sprague hitting buses with picket signs. No damage was indicated.

Respondent describes two incidents (Br. 323–324) that it characterizes as provoked by Sprague. The first involving an altercation with a nonstriker named Jacobson was not provoked by Sprague, but rather is an example of unpunished misconduct by a nonstriker. The second incident involves Sprague, on a motorcycle, following a van of nonstrikers. There is no evidence that Zemba even knew of this incident much less relied on it as a basis for not reinstating Sprague. In any event, it is not serious enough by itself nor when coupled with all other misconduct to deny Sprague reinstatement. I find that he is entitled to reinstatement and to backpay.

xx. Brad Steckmesser

Zemba stated that Steckmesser was blocking vehicles generally. Harrison described an incident that occurred in September where Steckmesser swung a picket sign at her, missed, and stated, "We might not always miss." Steckmesser spit on a car driven through the line by Swadner and twisted the side mirror of his car.

Swinging the sign at Harrison, even for a deliberate miss, and spitting on Swadner's car are serious matters, but not serious enough to deny Steckmesser reinstatement. He is distinguished because his unusual sounding name is mentioned so few times in this long case, especially when compared to some other strikers. I have considered the totality of the evidence relating to Steckmesser and recommend that he be reinstated and awarded backpay.

yy. Hernando Suanico

This striker did not testify at the hearing. Neither Zemba nor Harrison had firsthand knowledge nor even secondhand knowledge of this striker's activities. Nonstriker Claybough testified that Suanico threatened her life in an incident in Chula Vista also involving Stoker and Ondrechen. Unlike the latter two strikers about whom there is substantial evidence of misconduct, this is the only matter affecting Suanico. Accordingly, I do not credit Claybough on this point. Moreover, even if I were to credit her, this single, impulsive incident would not be sufficient to deny reinstatement and backpay to Suanico. I find he is entitled to reinstatement and backpay.

zz. Judy Tolwitzke

In mid-September Zemba met Tolwitzke at the office of San Diego City Schools where the following exchange occurred: Tolwitzke said, "Hi, Gus, we're going to do you in." Zemba responded, "Are you threatening me," and she replied, "We'll take care of you." On two occasions, Zemba heard her tell nonstriking drivers, "We'll get you. You won't be here tomorrow." This striker also engaged in brief blocking of buses on about six occasions.

The threats, if they can be so construed, referred to above, were not accompanied by any overt act and impress me as no more than pure verbiage. The first exchange between Zemba and Tolwitzke is not made more serious because it occurred away from the picket line. Based on the totality of the evidence concerning this strike, I find that Tolwitzke is entitled to reinstatement and backpay.

aaa. Steve Tom

On October 6, Tom told Hokstad that he was a "dead man" and that Tom was going to get him and his car. This was after an altercation with other strikers that did not directly involve Tom. According to Zemba, Swick, and Comfort, Tom engaged in the blocking of buses and other vehicles for brief periods of time. Zemba also saw Tom striking buses with his picket sign a few times. Harrison saw Tom present only in a group of pickets who were committing acts of misconduct such as throwing eggs. She also testified that on October 2, the police were attempting to clear pickets away from the Aztec yard, and Tom argued with the police and resisted them. There was no evidence he was arrested or charged with a crime.

[212] According to representations made by the lawyers at hearing, Smith was reinstated in early January 1982, worked for only a few days, then quit, stating he wanted another job. I leave to compliance the verification of these statements and of course the computation of backpay due and owing to Smith. The backpay may have been tolled in mid-January 1982, if Smith's departure was uncoerced.

Contrary to his affidavit to a Board agent in which he had denied throwing eggs, Tom testified at hearing that he threw two eggs at buses. One of these missed its target and the other hit the back of the bus as it was entering the yard.

I have earlier indicated my view that throwing eggs at moving buses is serious misconduct, especially where the windshield is hit. I have also stated the Board does not share that view particularly where, as here, there is no other serious misconduct. Because I am bound by Board decisions, I recommend that Tom be reinstated with backpay.

bbb. Lester Wallace[213]

Shortly after the strike began, Wallace was attempting to let the air out of the tires on the bus left on the street by Anderson (this is the bus immobilized by Murphy's van). He was stopped by Schultz. Later that evening, after the incident with Brenda Leonard, Wallace called Hokstad on the telephone at the Aztec yard and stated, "You're a dead man. I'm over at your house right now and I'm going to rape and kill your wife." On receiving this call, Hokstad immediately called the police and asked them to check his home. Given conditions on the picket line at that time, I regard this telephone call as extremely serious misconduct.[214] When Hokstad left the yard about 9 p.m., he called his brother and asked him to pick him up at the back fence, which Hokstad climbed over. He was afraid to cross the picket line in his car.

Swick testified that Wallace came to his home on one occasion within the first 3 weeks of the strike. When Swick opened the front door and saw who it was, he immediately slammed the door. Wallace drove by the home on one other occasion and called Bill Jones, Swick's roommate, a "mother-fucker" and "worthless son-of-a-bitch." Swick also described several incidents of blocking buses and hitting buses with picket signs as they drove through the line. On several occasions, Wallace threatened to kick his "ass."

Wallace directed several threats to Zemba. One night, Zemba was leaving work for the day in his car. Wallace said, "If you are going home, forget it, they're dead." The substance of this threat was repeated three times. Other times Wallace said to Zemba, "You're a dead man; we know where you live and we are going to get your family." Wallace also called Zemba a "mother-fucker" on several occasions.

Ingersoll described Wallace's habit of blocking buses by standing directly in front of them.

Based on the totality of the evidence concerning this striker, I find that he is not entitled to reinstatement and backpay.

ccc. Vasco W. "Bill" Walter Jr.

As Zemba drove through the line, Walter usually handed him a passage from the Bible, as he noted that Zemba would be killed and was going to hell. In fact, Walter was a Sunday school teacher and was affiliated with a religious organization. Although Walter described himself as completely nonviolent, I believe Zemba when he testified to Walter blocking his car, and about four or five times rocking it as Zemba attempted to drive through the line. Walter was the only striker, male or female, who wore a brief bathing suit on the picket line. Given his size, there was no mistaking him.[215]

Walter called Dugent a "son-of-a-bitch" and threw four or five eggs at a bus entering the yard. On two other occasions, Walter threw eggs at buses entering the yard as well.

O'Brien described several incidents of blocking buses and Ybarra observed Walter opening schoolbus emergency doors.[216]

In evaluating the conduct of this witness, I note some conflict between his asserted beliefs and his behavior at the picket line. In addition, Walter was less than completely candid in his testimony.[217] And yet, Walter not only refused at hearing to repeat the obscenities he heard on the picket line for the hearing, he also complained to Corona about this activity and threatened to quit the strike if the obscentities did not stop.[218] Based on the totality of evidence regarding this striker, I conclude that he is entitled to reinstatement and backpay.

ddd. Stanley Wright

At the time of the hearing this witness was 65 years of age.[219] The evidence of misconduct is slight to say the

[213] I have disregarded and will not credit the testimony of nonstriker Whitehead regarding the alleged actions of Wallace. Not only did Wallace deny the act in question, but Whitehead's testimony as to the identity of the culprit was not convincing. (R. Tr. 1280.)

[214] Thus, George had physically assaulted Zemba; Leonard and Shelton had approached Zemba in a threatening manner. The other pickets were virtually berserk with hatred and anger toward Hokstad and Zemba. In sum, these surrounding circumstances were tantamount to an overt act that gave the threat currency. Although I find that it would warrant discharge by itself, the only issue here is whether the totality of the misconduct warrants discharge.

[215] The witness stood 5 feet 10 inches and weighed 242 pounds. He wore the bathing suit because of the heat.

[216] I do not credit Harrison's testimony that Walter was telling Aztec customers that the yard was closed and then dircting them to competitors. He denied doing this and there is no credible evidence to support Harrison, who was merely repeating reports heard from others.

[217] For example, after denying that he threw eggs, Walter admitted having eggs in his possession on the picket line. But he said that his wife used them for cooking. Given the context of this strike, his testimony is incredible.

[218] Moreover, as Walter was asked at the hearing about various obscene expressions used during the strike, he winced as he heard the words.

[219] Wright supposedly suffers from impaired hearing. Although he does have a hearing aid, he does not usually wear it. During his testimony, he was questioned by the lawyers in their normal tone of voice. Wright had no trouble hearing and responding. All this came up as the least. First, he was present when Reynolds bumped into Zemba. His presence at the time is of no consequence whatsoever and I decline to even afford it minimal weight.[220] Moreover, Reynolds himself was ordered reinstated. Wright also suggested to Zemba that the paint shed would burn easily. Wright also stated, "You better be careful, that could blow up or catch fire and destroy all the buses." Assuming without finding that these statements are threats, they clearly are not serious threats under Board law. Moreover, Zemba had relocated all combustible materials sometime after the strike started. Accordingly, Wright's experience in the paint shop was of no great moment in putting his statements in context.

Finally, Zemba testified there was one other matter relating to Wright, but he could not recall it. Naturally, I disregard entirely this other incident.

Based on the totality of the evidence regarding this striker, I conclude he is entitled to reinstatement and backpay.[221]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act and was at all material times, and continues to be, the exclusive representative of Respondent's employees in the appropriate unit set forth below for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

3. All employees in the following classifications—coach operators, maintenance, and student drivers—constitute an appropriate unit for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

4. By unilaterally changing employees' health and accident insurance plan, without timely notice to the Union and without affording the Union an opportunity to bargain, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

5. By failing and refusing to execute the contract on the Union's request, after agreement had been reached on all substantive proposals, Respondent violate Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

6. By failing and refusing since March 26, 1981, to bargain in good faith with the Union, more specifically, by engaging in surface bargaining during the period indicated, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

7. Respondent, through Zemba in paragraphs (a) through (c) below, and through Ybarra in paragraph (d), violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act:

(a) By coercing employees in the selection of their collective-bargaining representative.

(b) By making verbal comments to employees disparaging to certain of the union leaders.

(c) By making to employees erroneous statements of labor law designed to coerce employees in the course of their protected activities.

(d) By making statements that effectively disparaged the Union and coerced employees in the selection of their collective-bargaining representative.

8. By failing and refusing since April 4, 1981, to reinstate all strikers listed on "Appendix A" to this opinion unconditionally, and by requiring these same returning strikers as a condition of reinstatement to complete employment applications, to undergo and pass medical examinations as determined solely by Respondent or its physician agents; to undergo and pass open book tests and driving tests as determined solely by Respondent or its agents; and by requiring employees to provide Respondent with copies of the employees' State Department of Motor Vehicle (DMV) driving records, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. In addition, by unilaterally implementing the conditions listed above as terms and conditions of employment, Respondent has, since October or November, violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

9. By failing and refusing, since April 4, 1981, to reinstate the strikers listed below who contrary to Respondent's claim never resigned or otherwise abandoned their employment, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act: Dana Banning, Darryl Conyer, Thomas Doty, Suhley Ozgundez, Abraham Planje, Cheryl Reid, and Jean Umphreys.

10. By failing and refusing since April 4, 1981, to reinstate the strikers listed in "Appendix B" to this opinion, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

11. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

12. Respondent did not violate the Act by refusing to reinstate the following:

Norman Amador
Robert Baker
Phil Burkhart
Leslie Carr
Michael Doering
Bertram Dredden
Patricia Fowler
Angel Huezo
Colleen Jellison
John Kipple
Michael Kirkpatrick
Wallace Leonard
Raymond Lindemann
Gerald Marks
Barbara McPheron
Linda McQueen
Valerie Mendoza
Connie Murphy
Brenda Myers
Stephen Ondrechen
Agnes Pangilinan
Linda Peckron
Alan Shelton
Roy Stoker

Respondent considered taking Wright back during the hearing. First, the Company took the position that he could come back only if he wore a hearing aid at work doing his usual job as a body paint man. Wright's job calls for little or no driving of buses. When the Company's initial position proved to be a problem, they further modified their position and agreed to take Wright back even without his hearing aid. Because I will recommend that Wright be reinstated with backpay, I will leave to compliance the task of sorting out Wright's backpay and just when it was tolled, if at all.

[220] Respondent seems to concede that this incident was part of the reason for not reinstating Wright. (Br. 422-423.)

[221] Much of Wright's testimony was taken up not with explaining or denying the misconduct charges against him—that part of his testimony was short, given to evidence presented by Respondent. Rather, Wright described his experience with the Company's doctors attempting to get medical approval to return to work. As part of the recommended Remedy in this case, Wright and other strikers who were reinstated will have to be made whole for their out-of-pocket expenses incurred in complying with Respondent's unlawful conditions before returning to work. Further details of this "Make Whole" remedy will follow below.

Donald Lilly
Lester Wallace

3. Other than as reflected above, Respondent has committed no other unfair labor practices.

THE REMEDY

It having been found that the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act, it will be recommended that the Respondent cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

It having been found that Respondent unlawfully refused to bargain collectively with the Union as to the selection of an insurance carrier for an employee health and accident insurance plan and, further, as to the selection and implementation of certain conditions precedent to the hiring of new employees, I will recommend that Respondent be ordered to bargain collectively, on request, with the Union as to these matters and, if an agreement is reached, embody the agreement in a signed agreement.

It having been further found that Respondent unlawfully refused to execute and to sign a contract reached with the Union, it will be recommended that, on request from the Union, Respondent be ordered to execute and to sign the contract.

It having been further found that Respondent has bargained in bad faith with the Union by engaging in surface bargaining, it is recommended that Respondent be ordered to bargain in good faith with the Union with the specific intent of reaching agreement, if possible.

It having further been found that Respondent through its agents and supervisors made certain statements to employees that coerced the employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed to the employees by Section 7 of the Act, it is recommended that Respondent be ordered to cease and desist from the actions.

It having been further found that Respondent has, since April 4, 1981, unlawfully refused to reinstate unconditionally the strikers listed on "Appendices A and B" to this opinion, plus other strikers, Dana Banning, Darryl Conyer, Thomas Doty, Suhley Ozgundez, Abraham Planje, Cheryl Reid, and Jean Umphreys, it is recommended that Respondent be ordered to reinstate all the employees immediately to their former jobs, or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges[222] and make them whole for any and all losses of earnings caused by Respondent's unlawful discharges. All the employees who are entitled to reinstatement shall be made whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered by reason of the discriminatory failure to reinstate them. Further, in order to fully remedy Respondent's refusal to execute the collective-bargaining agreement, Respondent shall make whole all employees covered by the aforesaid collective-bargaining agreement for the loss of any benefits that would have accrued to them under the contract had Respondent executed the same within a reasonable time after the Union's request for Respondent's signature, computed in the manner set forth in Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 682 (1970).[223] In addition, all employees listed in "Appendix A" and those affected employees listed in "Appendix B" and paragraph 9 of the conclusions of law, who were offered reinstatement only if they complied with Respondent's unlawful conditions are entitled to be made whole for any out-of-pocket expenses incurred by the employees as a direct result of attempting to comply with the unlawful conditions. These potential expenses include, but are not limited to, costs of additional medical examinations or medical tests which would not otherwise have been taken, transportation expenses, child-care expenses, and similar expenses.[224] All backpay in this case shall be computed in accordance with F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest as provided in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[225]

With respect to the proper remedy, the Union contends (Br. 69–74) that it is entitled to litigation expenses including attorney's fees. Much of the Union's argument is based on authority of J. P. Stevens & Co. v. NLRB, 668 F.2d 767 (4th Cir. 1981).[226] This judgment of the court of appeals in J. P. Stevens was recently vacated by order of the U.S. Supreme Court, 458 U.S. 1118 (1982), and remanded for further consideration in light of Summit Valley Industries v. Carpenters Local 112, 110 LRRM 2441 (1982). In Summit Valley, the U.S. Supreme Court affirmed the decision of the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals that attorney's fees incurred in prior proceedings before the Board may not be recovered pursuant to Section 303 of the Labor Management Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 187. Thus, the decision to vacate the remedy in J. P. Stevens seems to suggest that the Supreme Court did not favor the remedy proposed by the Board in that case. It is unnecessary to speculate further on the applicability of J. P. Stevens to the instant case. There are other Board precedents to review which are helpful to resolving the issue at bar. In Kane-Miller Corp., 259 NLRB 1075 fn. 3 (1982), a case involving discharge of strikers for alleged picket line misconduct, the Board denied the charging party's request for attorney's fees, bargaining expenses, and other costs incurred. As authority, the Board cited Wellington Hall Nursing Home, 257 NLRB 791 fn. 2 (1981), and cases cited therein. In Wellington, the Board stated that such remedies (as those requested by the Union here) are appropriate only when a respondent raises defenses so insubstantial as to be patently frivolous or in other exceptional circumstances not present here.[227] In the instant case, Respondent has prevailed with respect to bad-faith bargaining prior to the strike and with respect to a substantial number of strikers. On all other charges, I have found against Respondent. However, even on those issues where Respondent's evidence has lacked merit, I cannot find that Respondent's position was patently frivolous. Put differently, Respondent's defense was debatable on all issues.[228]

[222] It is specifically recommended that Respondent be ordered to hold within a reasonable time after this decision becomes final, a "shake-up" for the purpose of having the returning strikers bid on desired routes in accordance with their seniority.

[223] Any contributions owing to the Union's employee benefit funds shall be computed in the manner set forth in Merryweather Optical Co., 240 NLRB 1213 (1979). See also World's Best Janitorial Services, 263 NLRB No. 65 (Aug. 16, 1982) (not reported in Board volume).

[224] Nothing in this remedy shall be construed as prohibiting Respondent from requesting returning strikers to update personal data such as addresses, or from requiring a medical examination at Respondent's expense where a bona fide reason exists for said examination. Where a dispute exists as to whether a returning striker should be required to undergo a physical examination, it is recommended that the parties be ordered to resolve their difference through good-faith collective bargaining.

The Union has presented substantial evidence reflecting Respondent's proclivity to refuse to follow proper grievance-and-arbitration procedures, to refuse to accept the arbitrator's award, and even to refuse to obey the order of a Federal district court. Yet, the Union cannot rest its case on this evidence, as persuasive as it may be to establish Respondent's animus. Whether Respondent had animus toward the Union is not the issue. Under Board law, I must look primarily to Respondent's defenses in this case, and only secondarily to what has occurred in other proceedings. Perhaps in these other proceedings, Respondent is entitled to litigation expenses. If so, surely a double recovery would not be warranted. If not, perhaps the conduct was not serious enough to deserve that remedy. I can say, however, in this case, based on all relevant facts and circumstances, I recommend that the Union not be awarded attorney's fees and other litigation expenses.

On the other hand, based also on the evidence of record here, I will recommend to the Board that a broad remedial order is warranted.[229]

[228] Two other points should be made. First, even for those few strikers where there was virtually no evidence to support a charge of picket line misconduct and I found that Respondent could not have entertained an honest belief that these persons engaged in picket line misconduct, even here I do not find Respondent's defense to be frivolous. I find instead that these strikers were caught up by an honest mistake with the others due to the large number of persons involved. The reinstatement and backpay remedy about them as well as for the others, where closer issues were presented, will suffice. Second, It would be inequitable in this case to award litigation expenses to the Union, even if warranted, because of the Union's studied indifference to the repeated almost daily misconduct occurring on the picket line. SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN JOHANSEN AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On June 30, 1987, Administrative Law Judge James F. Morton issued the attached supplemental decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, the General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed a brief in response to the General Counsel's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the supplemental decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Supplemental Decision and Order.

The Respondent's employees, represented by Local 455, went on strike July 1, 1975. In January 1976, when the Respondent unlawfully refused to bargain, the strike was converted into an unfair labor practice strike.[3] In August 1978, the Union made an unconditional offer to return to work. In 1980, the Board found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) by failing to reinstate fully unfair labor practice strikers.[4] Subsequently, the Regional Director issued the instant backpay specification.

The judge found, inter alia, that no discriminatee for whom the General Counsel sought backpay pursuant to the make-whole order in Kuno, supra, was entitled to reimbursement for fringe benefits lost as a result of participation in the strike. The judge also found that Moshe Waldman, a striker who was never offered reinstatement, was not entitled to reimbursement for out-of-pocket medical expenses. Additionally, the judge found that Robert Scott, a striker who returned individually to the Respondent's employ before August 9, 1978, was not entitled to receive any back wages pursuant to the make-whole order in Kuno, supra. For the reasons set forth below, we disagree with the judge.

1. It is well settled that the "finding of an unfair labor practice . . . is presumptive proof that some back pay is owed by the [Respondent]."[5] The burden is on the General Counsel to prove the gross amount of backpay due.[6] The burden then shifts to the Respondent to establish facts that negate or mitigate its liability.[7]

In analyzing the General Counsel's backpay claims for discriminatees Anthony Ariano, Vincent Cangemi, Guido Pagan, Robert Scott, Ben Braver, and Moshe Waldman, the judge acknowledged that the collective-bargaining agreement effective just prior to the 1975 strike provided unit employees various fringe benefits. He also found that the Respondent had not provided these contractual benefits at least since 1976. The judge mistakenly stated that the Regional Director's amended backpay specification sought to make the discriminatees whole by requiring the Respondent to contribute to Local 455's Welfare, Pension, and Annuity Funds at rates that Local 455 established in subsequent contracts with other employers during the backpay period. The judge then reasoned that requiring the Respondent to make such contributions would compel the Respondent to grant concessions to Local 455 that had not been achieved in negotiations, contrary to Section 8(d) of the Act.

The Regional Director's amended backpay specification does not seek to impose on the Respondent any terms in Local 455's subsequent collective-bargaining agreements with other employers; rather, the amended backpay specification uses a formula

[1] On November 1, 1987, the Teamsters International Union was readmitted to the AFL–CIO. Accordingly, the caption has been amended to reflect that change.

[2] We affirm the judge's finding that the Respondent is obligated to reimburse employees for unlawfully withheld dues and fees. The judge, however, inadvertently suggested that the reimbursement of dues and fees in this case is warranted by the Order in Independent Assn. of Steel Fabricators, 231 NLRB 264 (1977), remanded in pertinent part 582 F.2d 135 (2d Cir. 1978), cert. denied 439 U.S. 1130 (1979). Such reimbursement was ordered in Independent Assn. of Steel Fabricators, 252 NLRB 922 (1980), enfd. sub nom. NLRB v. Koenig Iron Works, 681 F.2d 130 (2d Cir. 1982).

We find it unnecessary to rely on the judge's analysis and findings in secs. 4 and 7 of the supplemental decision concerning wage claims on behalf of discriminatees Ariano and Cangemi because those claims were abandoned in the amended backpay specification.

We affirm the judge's finding that the Respondent must reimburse discriminatees Waldman and Braver $16,847.08 and $43,400.04, respectively, for their net earnings lost.

The judge inadvertently miscited Independent Assn. of Steel Fabricators in sec. 8, part a, pars. 3 and 5. The correct citations are 231 NLRB 264 (1977) and 231 NLRB at 272.

based on continuing the terms of the parties' expired agreement. As the Respondent never bargained to impasse with Local 455[8] before unlawfully recognizing Teamsters Local 810,[9] the Respondent was obligated to continue giving effect to its expired contract with Local 455.[10] Thus, the General Counsel has met her burden of proving the gross amounts of backpay due. The Respondent, on the other hand, has not established any facts to negate or mitigate its liability.

Specifically, the judge denied all claims set forth in the amended backpay specification for vacation pay, overtime, and contributions to the Welfare, Pension, and Annuity Funds.[11] We will, therefore, order the Respondent to make the discriminatees whole by paying them the respective amounts set forth in the amended backpay specification for vacations and overtime and by making the contributions to the Local 455 Welfare Fund,[12] Pension Fund, and Annuity Fund on their behalf in the respective amounts set forth in the amended backpay specification.

2. The General Counsel has excepted to the judge's failure to include in the make-whole remedy reimbursement to Moshe Waldman, a striker who was never offered reinstatement, for out-of-pocket medical expenses incurred during the backpay period.[13] The amended backpay specification, to the extent supported by the documents the General Counsel introduced during the hearing, claimed $295.50 for Waldman's medical bills. As stated above, the judge summarily dismissed all fringe benefit claims, including medical expenses, for all discriminatees because he found that the fringe benefits provided as a substitute, the Teamsters Local 810 package, were substantially equivalent to the Local 455 fringe benefits. As Waldman was not reinstated in any respect, there can be no question of a setoff based on the Teamsters package for him during the backpay period.

It is customary to include reimbursement of out-of-pocket medical expenses in make-whole remedies for fringe benefits lost.[14] Because the Respondent has established no facts that would negate or mitigate its liability, we will order the Respondent to reimburse Waldman $295.50 for the documented out-of-pocket medical expenses during the backpay period.

3. The backpay specification also claimed that $840.28 in back wages is owed to Robert Scott on the theory that he should have been earning $7.84 per hour at the beginning of the backpay period, instead of the $7.30 per hour he actually earned. Before the strike, Scott earned $7.20 per hour as a mechanic; on his return to work November 19, 1976, he was paid $7.05 per hour as a mechanic. The measure of back wages due used in the backpay specification was the pay rate Scott earned before the strike, $7.20, plus increases granted similarly situated employees, less the rates he actually earned, multiplied by his hours worked.[15]

The judge rejected the claim for Scott because he found that pay rates set and increases granted before July 1, 1978, were not discriminatory and did not constitute continuing violations of the Act. This proceeding, however, is not an unfair labor practice proceeding. The unfair labor practice has already been found and affirmed by a court of appeals. Kuno Steel Products Corp., 252 NLRB 904 (1980), enfd. sub nom. NLRB v. Koenig Iron Works, 681 F.2d 130 (2d Cir. 1982). The judge apparently misunderstood the Kuno order. The Board specifically found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) by not fully reinstating strikers who individually returned to work before August 9, 1978, but ordered that, under the circumstances, the Respondent's backpay liability would run only from 6 months before the instant charges were filed.[16] Manifestly, the Board contemplated the use of Scott's prestrike pay rate and increases of similarly situated employees granted before the backpay period to determine the amount of back wages due. Accordingly, we will order the Respondent to make whole Robert Scott by paying him $840.28, as claimed on his behalf in the backpay specification.

[8] Although the Second Circuit in NLRB v. Independent Assn. of Steel Fabricators, 582 F.2d 135 (2d Cir. 1978), found an impasse in bargaining between Local 455 and the multiemployer association of which the Respondent had been a member, the Respondent under the circumstances was not relieved thereby of its obligation to bargain with Local 455 as an individual employer.

[11] Although the judge found that the benefits package available to unit employees during the backpay period, the Teamsters Local 810 package, was substantially equivalent to the Iron Workers Local 455 benefits package provided pursuant to the expired contract, the evidence demonstrates that the benefits were not comparable for the employees at issue. Further, the Teamsters Local 810 package was not even available to discriminatees Braver and Waldman, the strikers who were not offered reinstatement.

[12] The Respondent asserts that a discriminatee is made whole when he is reimbursed for the cost of premiums incurred in obtaining substitute health insurance coverage and for his out-of-pocket medical expenses to the extent that those expenses would have been reimbursed through the Local 455 Welfare Fund. In order to be made whole, however, a discriminatee must be restored to the position he would have occupied had the discrimination not occurred. This includes not only reimbursement of the discriminatee's premiums and medical expenses, but also requires the Respondent to contribute to the Welfare Fund according to the expired contract's terms so that the discriminatee's future interests in the fund will be ensured. "[T]he diversion of contributions from the union funds undercut[s] the ability of those funds to provide for future needs." Stone Boat Yard v. NLRB, 715 F.2d 441, 446 (9th Cir. 1983).

Hassett Maintenance Corp., 260 NLRB 1211 (1982), a cryptic decision on which the Respondent relies, focused on what it characterized as the double insurance costs that would result from requiring the employer (which had provided other coverage) in that case to make conributions to the welfare fund. Hassett did not address restoring the full range of an employee's interests in the welfare fund. The Hassett decision did not reconcile its limited remedial order with pre-Hassett precedent requiring employer contributions to union welfare funds on employees' behalf, see, e.g., Kraft Plumbing & Heating, 252 NLRB 891 (1980), affd. mem. 661 F.2d 940 (9th Cir. 1981), as does precedent decided after Hassett. See Stone Boat Yard, 264 NLRB 981 (1983), which the Ninth Circuit enforced. The court rejected the double-coverage/punitive claim: the "employer cannot complain of the extra cost of improperly created, substitute fringe benefits . . . . The company is merely required to repay what it has unlawfully withheld." Stone Boat Yard v. NLRB, 715 F.2d 441, 446 (9th Cir. 1983).

[13] The judge also rejected the claims for reimbursement of medical expenses asserted on behalf of Braver, Ariano, Cangemi, and Pagan. The General Counsel did not except.

Although the General Counsel's exceptions regarding Waldman's medical expenses do not fully comply with Sec. 102.46(b) of the Board's Rules and Regulations, we have decided to consider the claim as it is clear what portion of the judge's supplemental decision the General Counsel contends is erroneous. See, e.g., Fiber Industries, 267 NLRB 840 fn. 2 (1983); Giddings & Lewis, Inc., 240 NLRB 441 fn. 2 (1979).

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

Statement of the Case

James F. Morton, Administrative Law Judge. The General Counsel has issued a backpay specification which, as amended, seeks reimbursement from Master Iron Craft Corp. (Respondent) for dues and fees unlawfully deducted from the wages of its employees and backpay from it for six of seven of its employees whom the Board ordered it to reinstate as Respondent had discriminatorily failed to do. Respondent's amended answer seeks reconsideration of the dues/fees reimbursement remedy and it contests the backpay formula used in the amended specification on the ground that the Board, in the underlying case, has already directed the use of a different formula.

I heard this case, and five related cases, in New York City at intervals beginning September 1984 and ending October 1986. On the entire record in this case, including my observation of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel and Respondent, I make the following

Findings of Fact

I. GENERAL BACKGROUND

In 1975, Respondent was one of many companies in the iron and steel business in the New York City metropolitan area that had contracts with Shopmen's Local Union No. 455, International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Iron Workers, AFL-CIO (Local 455). Local 455's contract with Respondent covered Respondent's production and maintenance employees and expired on 30 June 1975. Contracts that Local 455 had with other employers also expired on that date. On 1 July 1975 Local 455 called a strike against Respondent and against other companies who had not reached agreement with Local 455 on a renewal agreement.

On 28 January 1976, notwithstanding that Local 455 was the incumbent representative of Respondent's production and maintenance employees, Respondent recognized Steel, Metal, Alloys and Hardware Fabricators and Warehousemen, Local 810, affiliated with International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL-CIO (Local 810) as the bargaining representative for those same employees and signed a contract with Local 810. The Board found, inter alia, in Independent Assn. of Steel Fabricators, 231 NLRB 264, 274-275 (1977), that Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(1) and (2) of the Act by its unlawful recognition of Local 810. To remedy the violation, the Board's order required Respondent to reimburse all former and present employees for all moneys unlawfully extracted from them for initiation fees, dues, and assessments under that contract, with interest thereon at the rate of 6 percent per annum. That portion of the Board's order was enforced by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. 582 F.2d 135 (1978). The court refused to enforce the Board's order insofar as it had required Respondent (and other companies) to reinstate alleged unfair labor practice strikers and remanded to the Board the question whether Respondent was obligated to bargain with Local 455.

On remand of the bargaining order issue, the Board's supplemental order directed Respondent to bargain with Local 455. See Independent Assn., 252 NLRB 922 (1980). That order was enforced by the court. As a result, bargaining began between Local 455 and Respondent in August 1982 and concluded with an agreement effective 1 July 1983.

When the court in 1978, as noted above, refused to order reinstatement of striking employees, Local 455 applied to Respondent on 9 August 1978 unconditionally for the reinstatement of the employees still on strike. Five of the original seven had previously returned to work. When Respondent declined to offer reinstatement to the remaining two, Local 455, on 2 January 1979, filed a new unfair labor practice charge against Respondent. That matter was consolidated with others and ultimately the Board issued a decision thereon. See Kuno Steel Products Corp., 252 NLRB 904 (1980). There, the Board held that the five striking employees, who had returned to Respondent's employ before 9 August 1978, had not been fully reinstated and that Respondent thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act; Respondent separately violated that section by having refused to offer reinstatement to the two employess who had not returned by 9 August 1978. The court enforced the Board's order thereon.

Recently, Local 455 was supplanted as bargaining representative of Respondent's employees when the Board, in a representation proceeding, certified Local 810 Teamsters as their exclusive bargaining agent.

II. THE CLAIM FOR REIMBURSEMENT OF DUES AND FEES

The amended specification in this case sets forth a schedule of the dues and fees claimed. Respondent, in its answer, does not question the accuracy of that claim. Instead, Respondent has urged that equitable considerations based on more recent developments in representation cases involving Respondent before the Board warrant reconsideration of the Board's remedial order. That is a matter that Respondent may pursue before the Board but I am bound by the Board order as it is.[1]

III. THE BACKPAY CLAIMS, IN GENERAL

In the remedial order in Kuno, supra, the Board directed Respondent to offer Anthony Ariano, Ben Braver, Vincent Cangemi, Guido Pagan, Robert Scott, Morris Waldman, and Enrico Amico immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions and to make them whole in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the administrative law judge's decision. Five of these seven had returned to work for Respondnet prior to 9 August 1978. The other two, Braver and Waldman, have never returned.

Respecting the backpay due the five who returned, footnote 5 of Kuno reads:

[1] Cf. Jaydon, Inc., 273 NLRB 1594 (1985).

> The General Counsel presented evidence establishing a prima facie case, which [Respondent has] not adequately rebutted, that economic and unfair labor practice strikers individually returned to work prior to August 9, [1978] and were not fully reinstated to conditions current at the time the strike began. Since an individual employee may make an unconditional offer to return to work, each individual employee who was reinstated pursuant to an unconditional offer was entitled to full reinstatement to the status quo which he occupied at the time he went on strike. Laidlaw Corp., 171 NLRB 1366, 1381-82 (1968), enfd. 414 F.2d 99 (7th Cir. 1969), cert. denied 397 U.S. 920 (1970). Accordingly, in light of [Respondent's] failure to rebut the General Counsel's prima facie case, we find [its] conduct in this regard to be violative of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.
> We agree with the Administrative Law Judge's recommendation that determination whether the total wages and benefits package these employees have received since returning to work is substantially equivalent to the wages and benefits they received prior to the strike—and thus satisfies the full reinstatement requirement—should be considered in the compliance stage of this proceeding. Under the circumstances of this case, we hold that [Respondent's] backpay liability to any employee who returned to work before August 9 shall run only from 6 months prior to the filing of charges herein. [i.e., from 1 July 1978].

The contract between Local 455 and Respondent, which was in force just prior to the start of the strike, contained provisions requiring Respondent to make contributions on behalf of unit employees to a pension fund, a welfare fund, and an annuity fund, and provisions for vacation, holidays, sick leave, and other fringe benefits. Those provisions were not in effect at least since an impasse had been reached in 1976, as found by the court of appeals and were also not operative throughout the backpay period in this case.

The next several subsections of this decision deal with the five discriminates who had returned to Respondent's employ. As footnote 5 of Kuno, supra, indicates, they were found to have been reinstated, but not fully; any backpay due them to be computed beginning 1 July 1978.

A. Anthony Ariano

Ariano had been a foreman in Respondent's employ, earning $8.90 per hour, when he joined the Local 455 strike on 1 July 1975 with the other unit employees. He abandoned the strike on 17 November 1975 and returned to that same position at the same rate of pay. The Board, at footnote 5 of Kuno, supra, found that the the General Counsel had made a prima facie showing that he was not fully reinstated to his former position, apparently because he was no longer receiving various fringe benefits provided for in the Local 455 contract, which had expired on 1 July 1975, e.g., pension fund coverage. Also as set out in footnote 5 of Kuno, the period for purposes of determining whether any backpay is due him began not with his return in 1975, but rather on 1 July 1978, the date 6 months prior to the filing of the unfair labor practice charge. Obviously any discriminatory act antedating 1 July 1978 is time barred. What is essential to determine is the extent, if any, to which he was discriminated against on and after 1 July 1978.

The General Counsel contends that Ariano's pay rate on 1 July 1978 should have been $9.70 per hour instead of $9.50, his actual rate. That contention is based on a backpay formula devised by the General Counsel on the theory that Ariano did not earlier receive percentage wage increases equal to the average percentage wage increases given other unit employees. Ariano's pay rate was higher than the rate paid other employees. Thus, the increases he received, when stated as percentages, were of course lower than the percentages calculated for the lower rated employees. In any event, a pay rate set before the start of the limitations period, as defined in Section 10(b) of the Act, even were the rate discriminatorily set, does not constitute a continuing violation of the Act simply because it stays in effect into the so-called 10(b) period. Cf. Machinists Local 1424 v. NLRB, 362 U.S. 411 (1960).

During the backpay period, Ariano received a 40-cent-per-hour raise in the first quarter of 1979, a 35-cent-per-hour raise in the third quarter of that year, another 35-cent-per-hour raise in 1980, a 70-cent-per-hour raise the year after, and another 70-cent-per-hour raise in late 1982. All other unit employees received the same raises in 1979. The other discriminatees who had returned to Respondent's employ received the same raises in subsequent years. One of the replacement employees who had been hired before 1 July 1978 (Anthony Calandra) received the same increase Ariano did, for the years he worked for Respondent. Two other replacements were hired apparently later in 1979. One of these (Fuiazzo Camillo) got a 35-cent-per-hour raise in 1980, the same as Ariano's. The second (Robert Reynolds) had been hired at a lower wage rate. Apparently, to bring him up to scale, he was given a 60-cent-per-hour increase in 1980.

I am unable to find any discriminatory treatment of Ariano, during the backpay period, insofar as his job duties or wage rates are concerned. He continued to work as a foreman—the same position he held before the strike. He got virtually the same raises as all other employees and indeed, even when calculated in percentage terms, his raises were at times higher than those given to employees who were hired as striker replacements. I therefore conclude that Ariano had been fully reinstated as of the start of the period defined in Kuno, supra, respecting his duties and his rates of pay. The issue of whether he was discriminated against on and after 1 July 1978 concerning his fringe benefits is considered next.

In the amended specification, General Counsel contends that Respondent must pay Ariano $30,942.70 to make him whole for the value of fringe benefits he lost as a result of his having taken part in the strike. That figure includes contributions that, according to the General Counsel, should have been made by Respondent on Ariano's behalf to pension, welfare, and annuity funds in accordance with the provisions of contracts that Local 455 entered into during the backpay period with other companies to supersede the 1975 contract that Local 455 had with many employers, including Respondent.

That claim assumes that Respondent and Local 455, but for the discrimination, would have reached agreement on a renewal contract for the period 1 July 1978 to 1 July 1983 (i.e., the backpay period). Making such an assumption would dictate a result directly opposite that provided by the actual history of collective bargaining between Respondent and Local 455 and would in effect compel Respondent to grant concessions to Local 455 that it had not obtained in negotiations. Section 8(d) of the Act forbids the compelling of concessions. The simple fact is that Respondent had for many years unsuccessfully maintained that Local 455 was bound to a successor contract to the expired agreement. Local 455 never filed any unfair labor practice charge to allege that Respondent had unlawfully made unilateral changes in fringe benefits of its unit employees. If there is a presumption to be applied, based on the foregoing, it is that Local 455 ultimately assented to those changes when it reached agreement on a renewal contract in 1983. More importantly, were Ariano to receive the fringe benefits the General Counsel claims for him, he would receive materially different treatment from that given others in the same bargaining unit; perhaps the only reason being an unlawful one—that he took part in a strike in which the others did not.

Respondent has, as noted earlier, contended that footnote 5 in Kuno, supra, calls for a comparison of the fringe benefits package as it existed on 1 July 1978, with the package in effect on 1 July 1975. Relevant to the contention are the descriptive booklets, written analyses, and other materials it placed in evidence to show that it provided these employees and all other unit employees with comparable pension and hospitalization/medical benefits and other fringe benefits. In general, that documentary material indicates that Respondent has made available to all unit employees, including these four discriminatees, benefits of a pension plan, of a health and welfare plan, and other benefits (overtime pay, vacations, and holidays), that are readily comparable to those these discriminatees enjoyed as of 1 July 1975.

The evidence proffered by Respondent discloses that, during the backpay period, its nondiscriminatory benefit package was substantially similar to, or better than, the benefit package that was available to the four discriminatees as of 1 July 1975. The General Counsel has the burden of proving the gross backpay contention, i.e., of demonstrating that Respondent's benefits package during the backpay period was materially deficient.[2] The General Counsel has failed to show that Respondent has discriminated against Ariano or the other four employees regarding the benefits they received on or after 1 July 1978.

Based on the foregoing, I conclude that, as of and since 1 July 1978, Ariano has been fully reinstated with respect to his total wages and benefits package and, in particular, that he has not been discriminated against by Respondent since 1 July 1978 because he had taken part in a Local 455 strike action for a 4-month period in 1975.

B. Guido Pagan

Pagan had been employed by Respondent as a mechanic earning $6.70 per hour when he joined the Local 455 strike on 1 July 1975.[3] He abandoned the strike on 17 March 1976 and returned to work for Respondent. He was the second striking employee to return. On his reinstatement in 1976, he was assigned to the same position he held when the strike began and at the same rate.

According to the General Counsel's backpay formula, Pagan should have been receiving $7.30 per hour as of the start of the backpay period, 1 July 1978. He actually was receiving more, $7.55 per hour. The General Counsel makes no wage claim in his behalf, effectively conceding, and I find, that he has not been discriminated against by Respondent regarding his wage rates throughout his backpay period.

The value of the fringe benefits claimed for him by the General Counsel is $27,958.05. The factual and legal premises therefor are identical to those on which the fringe benefits claims of Ariano was presented and rejected above.

Based on the foregoing, I conclude that Pagan had been, on and since 1 July 1978, fully reinstated by Respondent and that no backpay is due him.

C. Robert Scott

Scott took part in this Local 455 strike on 1 July 1975, having left his job as a mechanic with Respondent at $7.20 per hour. He abandoned the strike on 19 November 1976 to return to Respondent's employ. He was reinstated as a mechanic but at 15 cents per hour less than he earned when the strike began. By the start of the backpay period, 1 July 1978, he was earning $7.30 per hour. He received a 40-cent-per-hour increase in the first quarter of 1979—the same amount all unit employees received or at least all unit employees named in the specification, including replacements. Scott left Respondent's employ on 27 June 1979—the end of his backpay period.

The General Counsel contends that, based on wage increases given similarly situated employees before the start of the backpay period, Scott should have been receiving $7.84 per hour as of 1 July 1978. As I observed before, the General Counsel is in effect alleging that, based on wage increases given at a time barred by Section 10(b) of the Act, Scott had been discriminatorily treated in having been given a wage rate of only $7.30 and that his being paid that rate each week after the start of the backpay period constitutes separate acts of continued discrimination. That contention is rejected for the reasons set forth above. See Machinists Local 1424, supra.

A fringe benefit claim of $2,904.52 is asserted for Scott based on the same consideration rejected earlier for Ariano's.

[2] Mastell Trailer Corp., 273 NLRB 1190 (1984).

[3] Although so classified he was on special assignment working outside the bargaining unit but at the same pay scale.

I find, based on the foregoing, that Scott had been, throughout his backpay period, fully reinstated by Respondent and consequently that no backpay is due him.

D. Vincent Cangemi

Cangemi worked as a finisher, earning $7.40 per hour, for Respondent when he joined the Local 455 strike on 1 July 1975. He left the picket line on 16 November 1977 and returned to work as a finisher at $7.75 per hour. By the start of the backpay period, he was earning $8 per hour. During the backpay period, he received the same increases Ariano received, as set forth in detail above. The General Counsel contends that, based on percentage wage increases, he should have been earning 6 cents an hour more than the $8 rate he was receiving as of 1 July 1978. That contention is substanially the same as the General Counsel submitted on behalf of Ariano and, for the same reasons set forth above, it also is rejected. The fringe benefits claim of $30,898.50 made on Cangemi's behalf is also rejected as it parallels the same type claim, considered and dismissed above, that was made for Ariano.

I thus conclude Cangemi had been fully reinstated by Respondent as of and since 1 July 1978.

E. Enrico Amico

Amico was one of the five discriminatees who had left the Local 455 picket line to return to work for Respondent. He left Respondent's employ before the start of the backpay period. Consqeuently, the General Counsel seeks no backpay for him.

F. Claims of Ben Braver and Moshe Waldman

In the underlying decision, the Board found that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by having failed to honor Local 455's unconditional application, of 9 August 1978, on behalf of its striking employees to return to work. The Board ordered Respondent to remedy this violation by offering reinstatement to Moshe Waldman and Ben Braver and to make them whole for losses suffered by them from 9 August 1978. Respondent's offer of reinstatement of 21 July 1983 ended their backpay period. The General Counsel seeks backpay for them only until 1 April 1981 and 31 August 1981 for Braver and Waldman, respectively, as those are the dates they would have retired.

Respondent disputes the appropriateness of the formula used by the General Counsel to compute their gross backpay and raises other defenses, discussed further below. Waldman's claim is discussed next.

1. Moshe Waldman

According to the amended specification, Waldman would have been earning, based on wages of similarly situated employees, an hourly rate of $7.30 on 9 August 1978 for a 40-hour week and would have received specified raises during the remainder of his backpay period. Respondent contends that footnote 5 of Kuno, supra, dictates that the $6.70-per-hour rate he received at the start of the strike should be used throughout his backpay period. Respondent's contention is based on an erroneous construction of footnote 5, which obviously pertains to strikers who returned to Respondent's employ before 9 August 1978. Respondent does not otherwise contest the appropriateness of the formula used by the General Counsel or the computations made in applying it to Waldman.

Respondent's amended answer states that Waldman had "declined work with [Respondent] and elected not to return from a prior leave of absence."

Respondent was permitted to adduce testimony at the hearing relevant to this contention because it was unclear to me then when Waldman "declined work" or "elected not to return." A review of the testimony proffered discloses that Respondent seeks to establish that, prior to the start of the strike, Waldman had not returned to work from a leave of absence but had instead left Respondent's employ for permanent employment elsewhere. It is apparent that Respondent would have me find that, at the time the strike began and at all times thereafter, Waldman was not one of its employees. Such a finding would directly contravene the Board's holding, in the underlying decision, that Waldman was one of Respondent's employees whom Respondent had unlawfully failed to reinstate on and after 9 August 1978. I clearly have no authority to reverse the Board's earlier finding. In retrospect, it is clear that Respondent should have filed a motion for reconsideration with the Board to obtain leave to adduce testimony respecting this contention and that, without such leave, the testimony Respondent proffered regarding that contention should not be part of the record before me. Accordingly, I now strike such testimony from the record. This ruling has further support from findings in the earlier case. Thus, in Independent Assn., supra at 272, it was found that Waldman had applied to Respondent for reinstatement in February 1976 for employment and that his application was rejected.

Respondent separately maintains that Waldman, throughout his backpay period, abandoned employment in the industry in which Respondent is engaged. Respondent, in support of that contention, profered a document signed by Waldman—his pension application dated 28 December 1981. In this application he inserted in longhand "7/1/75" in a blank on a typed form which stated, in effect, that Waldman understood that, to get retirement benefits from the Local 455 Pension Fund, he had to withdraw from any further employment in work regularly performed by Local 455 members and that he was "therefore withdrawing from such employment starting 7/1/75."

The insertion of the 1 July 1975 on an application filed in 1981 is confusing because Waldman obviously could not in 1981 be withdrawing from employment in 1975. Quite possibly, Waldman misunderstood the printed statement. Respondent is, in raising this contention, speculating that Waldman in 1981 intended to state that he had retired completely from Respondent's employ in 1975 and from employment in the industry then. There would be no need for any speculation by Respondent had it honored its legal obligation to offer reinstatement to Waldman after having received, on his behalf, Local 455's unconditional application to return to work from the strike. If anyone should benefit from the confusion, certainly the last one to do so is Respondent. More significantly, the findings in the earlier case Independent Assn., supra at 282, disclosed that Waldman had not in 1975 retired from employment in the industry. I find no merit to Respondent's contention.

Waldman's claim also encompasses moneys based on Respondent's alleged obligation to make contributions, during his backpay period, to the various trust funds and to provide overtime compensations and other benefits, as provided for in agreements Local 455 had with other firms during Waldman's backpay period. For the reasons stated in the section dealing with the backpay claims of Ariano and of the other strikers who had returned to Respondent's employ, I find it is not appropriate to apply that formula to seek reimbursement for the fringe benefit claims advanced by the General Counsel in behalf of Waldman. It may be that certain of those claims, e.g., some medical bills, may have been reimbursable under fringe benefit programs provided by Respondent to unit employees. However, no such contention was ever submitted by the General Counsel and it is not appropriate for me to assume or to estimate such coverage. In that contention, compare Garsart Construction Corp., 282 NLRB 1331 (1987). See also Barkman Contracting, 276 NLRB 1062 fn. 3 (1985).

I find that Waldman is to be awarded backpay for the net earnings lost plus interest but that the fringe benefits aspects of his claim lack merit.

2. Ben Braver

In the underlying case, the Board found that Respondent unlawfully failed to reinstate Braver on 9 August 1978. According to the amended backpay and argues that his employment status with it ended prior to 9 August 1978, the start of the backpay period under the Board's finding. In support of this contention, Respondent points to the fact that Braver, in 1977, applied for early retirement to the pension fund, which has been established pursuant to contracts Local 455 has had with various employers. Braver testified that he applied for this pension and received it because he had been unable to find interim employment. The record before me indicates an employee, who accepted an early retirement pension, could return to active employment but his pension payments would be suspended. It seems then that an employee may not have irrevocably abandoned his career by accepting an early retirement pension. At best, from Respondent's standpoint, the record is unclear whether Braver unequivocably abandoned his job before Local 455 sought his reinstatement on 9 August 1978. Any ambiguity must, of course, be construed against the party whose acts contributed to it. All Respondent had to do in 1978 was to honor Local 455's application and to offer Braver his job back. Had he permanently been retired then, he would have declined and we all would have had an unequivocal answer to the issue now posed by Respondent. Respondent did not choose to do so. Instead, by failing to offer him reinstatement, Respondent in effect elected to be liable for the gross wages he would have earned, less interim earnings, as set out in the amended specification.

Respecting the fringe benefits claimed for him, I find, for the reasons set forth above as to Waldman's claim for such benefits, that it must be denied.

On the basis of the foregoing findings of fact, the entire record in this case, and pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, I issue the following recommended[4]

ORDER

The Respondent, Master Iron Craft Corp., Plainview, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall pay (1) to the employees named below the sums listed alongside, with interest as provided for in the Board Order, as enforced:

Morris Waldman	$16,847

and (2) to the employees whose names are listed below the dues and fees unlawfully deducted from their wages, as shown alongside their names, with interest as earlier provided for:

A. Ariano	$1,106
A. Amico	534
E. Amico	268
S. Amico	336
J. Auld	268
J. Belkin	282
A. Calandra	1,050
G. Calandra	604
V. Cangemi	88
D. Dworkin	422
C. Finazzo	478
C. Huntly	364
T. LaHache	13
C. Luick	212
D. Marchese	114
R. Mason	596
M. Mendicino	254
G. Pagan	1,084
J. Pisano	226
R. Reynolds	548
R. Scott	352
S. Stradtmore	128
J. Vogtle	11

In all other respects, the backpay claims are dismissed.

[4] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

International Union of Elevator Constructors, AFL-CIO, and Local Union 3, International Union of Elevator Constructors, AFL-CIO and Long Elevator and Machine Co., Inc. Case 14-CC-1878

July 28, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On March 30, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Hubuert E. Lott issued the attached decision. The Respondents filed exceptions and supporting briefs. The General Counsel filed cross-exceptions and a supporting brief.[1]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

We agree with the judge that the Respondent violated Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(A) by filing a grievance on behalf of employee Ritz that is predicated on a reading of article 14 of the collective-bargaining agreement that would convert it into a de facto hot cargo provision, in violation of Section 8(e). Although only one employee is involved in this case, the theory of Ritz' grievance would require neutral employer Long to permit all of its employees to refuse to work at the construction site because of the IBEW picket line, notwithstanding the existence of a reserve gate through which employees other than those of the primary employer, Soper, could enter. It is true that the picket line clauses found unlawful under Section 8(e) in Bricklayers Local 2 (Gunnar I. Johnson), 224 NLRB 1021 (1976), enfd. 562 F.2d 775 (D.C. Cir. 1977), were phrased differently from the clause by which the Respondent sought here to immunize Ritz' refusal to work, but the essence is the same. Like the union in Gunnar I. Johnson, the Respondent seeks a construction of the clause that would require Long to acquiesce in a work stoppage by its employees in support of the IBEW's dispute with Soper—i.e., a construction that would involve Long in a dispute "not [its] own." National Woodwork Mfrs. Assn. v. NLRB, 386 U.S. 612, 626 (1967).[2] The Union clearly could not lawfully encourage employees of Long to walk out in support of the IBEW's dispute with Soper, and we see it as equally unlawful for the Union to ratify such employee action by seeking to compel, through the grievance-arbitration procedure, Long's acquiescence in an employee's work stoppage for such an objective.

Because we have concluded that the contract clause as construed by the Respondent would violate Section 8(e), we may properly find the pursuit of the grievance coercive, notwithstanding the Supreme Court's decision in Bill Johnson's Restaurants v. NLRB, 461 U.S. 731 (1983). Although holding that the Board could not enjoin, as an unfair labor practice, the lawsuit at issue in that case, the Court expressly noted that it was not dealing with a "suit that has an objective that is illegal under federal law." 461 U.S. at 737 fn. 5. See also Teamsters Local 705 v. NLRB (Emery Air Freight), 820 F.2d 448 (D.C. Cir. 1987) (distinguishing between having an unlawful motive in bringing a lawsuit and seeking to enforce an unlawful contract provision).[3]

Finally, we do not agree with the Respondent that either Newberry Energy Corp., 227 NLRB 436 (1976), or Congoleum Industries, 197 NLRB 534 (1972), requires dismissal of the complaint here. In those cases the Board held that the respondent employers violated either Section 8(a)(1) or both Section 8(a)(1) and (3) by discharging employees because, in order to honor a picket line set up by a union involved in a dispute with a different employer, the employees refused to come to work. In Newberry there was no evidence that a reserve gate system had been set up; the decision speaks of a single "access gate" at which the primary picket line was set up. 227 NLRB at 440. Thus, the effect on the business of the neutral was merely incidental to the honoring of the primary picket line. See Electrical Workers IUE Local 761 (General Electric

[1] The General Counsel excepts to the judge's failure to include in the Order a visitatorial clause authorizing the Board, for compliance purposes, to obtain discovery from the Respondents under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure under the supervision of the United States court of appeals enforcing the Order. In the circumstances of this case, we find it unnecessary to include such a clause.

[2] Our finding in this regard is not at odds with the judge's observation that the "General Counsel does not contend that the clause at issue (Article 14, Paragraph 2) is a violation of Section 8(e) of the Act." We understand this to mean that the General Counsel does not contend either that the clause is unambiguously unlawful on its face or that Long originally agreed with the Respondent on the unlawful significance that the Respondent now seeks to incorporate into the clause through the arbitral process. Thus, the provision may be entirely susceptible of a lawful meaning, but we agree with the judge and the General Counsel that, given the theory of the Respondent's grievance, the Respondent is seeking to enforce an unlawful provision.

[3] Member Babson agrees with his colleagues that the Respondent engaged in coercive conduct by pursuing the grievance seeking to enforce a contract clause which, as construed by the Respondent, would violate Sec. 8(e). In so doing, however, Member Babson finds it unnecessary to pass on any suggestion by his colleagues that the pursuit of a grievance cannot constitute coercion under Sec. 8(b)(4) absent a determination that the contract clause sought to be enforced through the grievance would violate the Act either on its face or as sought to be construed by the Union.

Co.), 366 U.S. 667, 679–681 (1961), and cases there cited. In Congoleum, there was a reserved gate system, but the Board majority expressly noted that the issue whether the employees' refusal to enter the neutral gate might violate Section 8(b)(4) or Section 8(e) had not been alleged, litigated, or even argued. Thus, it concluded that the possible illegality of the employees' actions "cannot be determined here." 197 NLRB at 534 fn. 1. In the present case the issue is before us, and we find, for the reasons stated above, that the Respondent violated Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(A) by prosecuting a grievance aimed at immunizing a work stoppage by an employee of a neutral employer, notwithstanding the availability of a neutral gate.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondents, International Union of Elevator Constructors, AFL–CIO, and Local Union 3, International Union of Elevator Constructors, AFL–CIO, their officers, agents, and representatives, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

Steven D. Smith, Esq., for the General Counsel.

Jeffrey E. Hartnett, Esq., of Clayton, Missouri, and Francis J. Martorana, Esq. (O'Donoghue & O'Donoghue), of Washington, D.C., for the Respondent.

Fred M. Reichman, Esq., of St. Louis, Missouri, for the Charging Party.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

HUBUERT E. LOTT, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard at St. Louis, Missouri, on 26 September 1986,[1] on an unfair labor practice charge filed on 10 July by Long Elevator and Machine Co., Inc. (the Charging Party or Long) against International Union of Elevator Constructors, AFL–CIO and Local Union 3, International Union of Elevator Constructors, AFL–CIO (Respondents or Unions) and on a complaint issued 23 July alleging violations of Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(A) of the Act.

The issue in this case is whether the Unions by filing a grievance on behalf of its member who was disciplined for refusing to enter a reserve neutral gate are attempting to illegally enforce the "picketing clause" in the collective-bargaining agreement.

The parties were afforded an opportunity to be heard, to call, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to introduce relevant evidence. Since the close of hearing, briefs have been received from the parties in this case.

On the entire record,[2] including my observation of the witnesses, and in consideration of the briefs submitted, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Charging Party Long, a corporation with an office and place of business in St. Louis, Missouri, is engaged in the business of installing and repairing elevators. During a 12-month period ending 30 June, the Charging Party, in the course and conduct of its business operations, purchased and received at various jobsites located within the State of Missouri products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the State of Missouri.

Soper Electric Co. (Soper), a corporation with an office and place of business in St. Louis, Missouri, is engaged in business as an electrical contractor. During the 12-month period ending 30 June, Soper purchased and received at its jobsites located within the State of Missouri products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the State of Missouri.

Mead-McClellan, Inc. (Mead-McClellan), a corporation with an office and place of business in St. Louis, Missouri, is engaged in business as a general contractor in the construction industry. During the 12-month period ending 30 June, Mead-McClellan purchased and received at its jobsites located within the State of Missouri goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from suppliers located outside the State of Missouri.

National Elevator Industry Inc. (NEII), at the times material, has been an organization composed of employers engaged in the elevator construction and repair industry, and which exist for the purpose, inter alia, of representing its employer-members in negotiating and administering collective-bargaining agreeemnts with various labor organizations, including Respondent International. At all times prior to September 1984, Long has been an employer-member of NEII.

Respondent admits and I find that Long, Soper, Mead-McClellan, and NEII are now and have been employers in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act, and persons engaged in commerce or in an industry affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(b)(4) and Section 8(e) of the Act. It further admits and I find that the Unions and Local 1, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers (IBEW) are labor oranizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

In October 1985, Mead-McClellan, a general contractor, began a renovation project at the Monticello Apartments in St. Louis, Missouri. Mead-McClellan awarded work on this project to several subcontractors, but the two that are involved in this case are Long and Soper.

[2] The General Counsel's motion to correct the record, which is unopposed, is granted.

The employees of Soper are represented by the Congress of Independent Unions (CIU), which is not affiliated with the AFL-CIO. The employees of Long are represented by the Unions who are jointly named as Respondents. Long has 17 employees in the St. Louis area who are covered by a collective-bargaining agreement effective from 9 July 1982 to 8 July 1987. The collective-bargaining agreement is actually between multiemployer bargaining association NEII and the International Union. Long was a member of NEII and, although they discontinued membership in the association 2 years ago, they are still bound by the terms of the agreement.

Soper employees began working at the Monticello Apartment project on 15 October 1985 and remained on the project until its completion on 15 May. On 6 January, Local 1 IBEW commenced picketing at the Monticello project. The IBEW engaged in lawful informational picketing concerning the wages and working conditions provided by Soper to its employees. This picketing took place from 6 January until the completion of the project on 15 May.

In anticipation of the picketing, Mead-McClellan established reserve gates on 4 January. The west gate was reserved for neutral employers. A sign was posted at this entrance, which read, "This entrance is for employees of the following contractors only." Eight subcontractors were listed by name, including Long. Suppliers were not mentioned. The east gate was reserved for Soper, although no sign was posted at this entrance. Two picket or snow fences were erected from the Monticello building to the sidewalk in front of the building. The first snow fence was erected to the west of the east or primary entrance. The second fence was erected to the east of the west or neutral gate. The IBEW pickets walked back and forth on the sidewalk between the fences that demarcated the east gate. There was no picketing of the west or neutral gate and no evidence was offered that either reserve gate was compromised by the general subcontractors or their suppliers.

Long began assigning employees to work at the Monticello jobsite on 15 January. On 21 January, Ray Ritz, a member of Local 3, and one of the employees assigned by Long to work at the jobsite, reported to the Company's office. Patrick Long, the Charging Party's vice president, had a conversation with Ritz concerning Ritz' refusal to enter the neutral gate or work on the project so long as a picket line existed on the site. Ritz told Long that his decision not to work behind a picket line was his personal decision and a matter of conscience. Long responded by suspending Ritz. On 25 January, Local 3 Business Representative, Schergen contacted Patrick Long and asked him whether the Company would reinstate Ritz if Ritz agreed to work at the Monticello project. Long agreed to reinstate Ritz and on 27 January he returned to work. The suspension lasted 3-1/2 days, during which time Long was unable to perform any services on the job, although no attempt was apparently made to seek a replacement of Ritz.

On 6 February, the Unions, on behalf of Ray Ritz, filed a grievance alleging that Long violated article 14 entitled "Strikes and Lockout," specifically paragraph 2, which reads:

> No strike will be called against the Employer by the Union unless the strike is approved by the International Office of the International Union of Elevator Constructors. Sufficient notice shall be given to the Employer before a strike shall become effective. Except in the case of contract service work as specified in Article IX of this agreement, work stoppages brought about by lawful picketing or strikers by building trades local unions affiliated with Building Trades Councils shall not constitute a strike within the meaning of this Article.

The Unions contend in their grievance that the above provision allowed Ritz to refuse work under the circumstances in this case without being disciplined by Long. The grievance is pending before the National Arbitration Committee, which is set forth in step 2 of the grievance procedure. Step 3 of the grievance procedure calls for binding arbitration.

III. ANALYSIS AND CONCLUSIONS

No one contends that IBEW was engaged in anything but lawful primary picketing of Soper. Furthermore, the General Counsel does not contend that the clause (art. 14, par. 2) is a violation of Section 8(e) of the Act. Nor does anyone claim exemption under the construction industry proviso to Section 8(e).

The General Counsel does contend that the object of the union grievance is unlawful and that by pursuing their grievance, the Unions are forcing Long to enter into a hot cargo clause in violation of Section 8(b)(4)(A). The General Counsel argues that if the Unions' position in support of their grievance is adopted, Long would be required to permit its employees to refuse to work whenever those employees refuse to enter a neutral reserve gate. He asserts that this would be true even though the picketing union could not lawfully induce such a work stoppage, citing Bricklayers Local 2 (Gunnar I. Johnson), 224 NLRB 1021 (1976).

I agree with the General Counsel's argument and his interpretation of the Bricklayers case. In that case, although three of the picket line clauses were overly broad and therefore violative of Section 8(e), the Plumbers clause was very similar to the clause at issue here. The Board held in the Bricklayers case that construing the Plumbers picket line clause as permitting the employees to refuse to pass through a neutral reserve gate would have the same effect as permitting employees to respect a secondary picket line stationed at that gate. The arbitrator's interpretation in the Bricklayers case is the same as the Unions' position in this case. Both have an illegal object as their purpose and would only defeat the purpose of reserve gates. Moreover, for reasons stated above, deferral would not be appropriate.

Respondents attempt to distinguish between "lawfully permitted picket line" in the Bricklayers case and "lawful picket" in this case, but I see no distinction as far as the end result is concerned.

Respondents emphasize that they had nothing to do with Ray Ritz' decision not to work and that Ritz has a right protected by Section 7 of the Act to observe lawful picket lines. I agree that the Unions did not influence Ritz' decision, but I find that irrelevant in this case. The Board in the Bricklayers case answered Respondents' second argument by stating that the employees' response (in refusing to enter a neutral gate) does not comport with what has been traditionally deemed to be primary activity. The Board further stated that in cases like this it has never been held to be primary activity when employees refuse to work for their employer who is a neutral in the dispute because picketing of another employer is taking place nearby on the common situs.

Respondents also contend that Mead-McClellan failed to establish a proper reserve gate by neglecting to use the word "suppliers" on the neutral reserve gate sign and by failing to put any sign at the primary reserve gate. This, according to Respondents, had the effect of making the entire project subject to primary picketing. Thus, Ray Ritz was disciplined in violation of his contractual and Section 7 rights for observing a primary picket line. I find that although the neutral sign did not mention "suppliers" and there was no sign at the primary gate all the participants recognized the two-gate system. The IBEW pickets patrolled only the primary gate and did not picket the neutral gate. Likewise, there was no evidence that either gate was compromised by any contractor, subcontractor, or their suppliers. Therefore, I conclude that the reserve gate system established by Mead-McClellan was valid. Electrical Workers IBEW Local 332 (Lockheed Missiles), 241 NLRB 674 (1979).

Furthermore, I find that Respondents never advanced this argument in support of their grievance. Respondents relied solely on their interpretation of article 14, paragraph 2 to justify Ray Ritz' action, which I find in violation of Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(A) of the Act.

Finally, Respondents contend that the General Counsel's complaint is premature because the instant grievance may be disposed of informally, which would obviate the necessity for arbitration. This argument is spurious because Long would be put in the position of settling a case in order to neutralize an illegal result. If Respondents believed this argument, they would simply withdraw their grievance. The Charging Party should not be put to the expense of arbitration where the object of the grievant is illegal. See Teamsters Local 705 (Emery Air Freight), 278 NLRB 1303 (1986).

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Long Elevator and Machine Co., Inc., Sopher Electric Co., Mead-McClellan Inc., and the National Elevator Industry Inc. are engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Respondent Unions and Local 1 IBEW are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By attempting to enforce a picket line clause in their contract that would, in effect, protect employees from discipline for refusing for refusing to enter a neutral reserve gate, Respondents have violated Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(A) of the Act.

4. By attempting to enforce, through the grievance procedure, a picket line clause in their contract, which Respondents interpret as protecting employees from discipline for refusing to pass through a neutral reserved gate because a primary picket line was stationed elsewhere on the common work situs, Respondents are attempting to force the Charging Party to enter into an agreement in violation of Section 8(e) of the Act.

The above unfair labor practies are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondents have engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I recommend that they be required to cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act and that they post an appropriate notice.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[3]

ORDER

The Respondents, International Union of Elevators Constructors, AFL-CIO, and Local Union 3, International Union of Elevator Constructors, AFL-CIO, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from entering into, enforcing, or giving effect to picket line clauses in their contracts that result in permitting employees to refuse to pass through a netural gate under circumstances where there is a primary picket line stationed elsewhere on the jobsite or any other contract or agreement, express or implied, whereby employers agree to cease and refrain from handling, using, selling, transporting, or otherwise dealing in any of the products of any other employers, or from doing business with any other person in violation of Section 8(e) of the Act or agree that employees will not be required to, or will not be disciplined for failing to, perform services for another person, in violation of Section 8(e) of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Withdraw the Ray Ritz grievance, which is the bass for the violation of Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(A) of the Act.

(b) Post at its St. Louis, Missouri facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[4] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 14, after being signed by the Respondents' authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondents immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondents to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

[3] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[4] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

(c) Sign and mail sufficient copies of the notices to the Regional Director for Region 14 for forwarding to Long, Soper, Mead-McClellan, and NEII.

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES AND MEMBERS
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT enforce the picket line clause in our contract with Long Elevator and Machine Co., Inc. in such a way as to pemrit employees to refuse to pass through a neutral gate under circumstances where there is a lawful primary picket line stationed elsewhere on the jobsite.

WE WILL NOT force Long Elevator and Machine Co., Inc. to agree that employees will not be disciplined for refusing to pass through a neutral reserve gate where there is a lawful primary picket line stationed elsewhere on the jobsite.

WE WILL withdraw the Ray Ritz grievance because our position in support of his grievance violates the National Labor Relations Act.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On April 6, 1988, Administrative Law Judge Jay R. Pollack issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief. The Charging Party filed a brief in opposition to the Respondent's exceptions and in support of the judge's decision. The General Counsel filed a brief supporting the judge's decision.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Cooke's Crating, Inc., Los Angeles, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

As the judge discredited the testimony of the Respondent's president and sole stockholder, Brian Cooke, based on his demeanor, we find it unnecessary to rely on the judge's additional finding, in fn. 8 of the attached decision, that an adverse inference should be drawn from the Respondent's failure to call Supervisors Heiman and Aguilar and dispatcher Drake to corroborate Cooke's testimony.

Jean C. Libby, Esq., for the General Counsel.

Wendy J. Barsh, Esq. (Wohlner, Kaplon, Phillips, Vogel, Shelley & Young), of Los Angeles, California, for the Union.

Neil O. Andrus, Esq. (Jeffer, Mangels & Butler), of Los Angeles, California, for the Respondent.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAY R. POLLACK, Administrative Law Judge. I heard this case in trial at Los Angeles, California, on February 9 and 10, 1988. Pursuant to a charge filed against Cooke's Crating, Inc. (Respondent) by International Brotherhood of Painters & Allied Trades, AFL-CIO (the Union) on August 21, 1987, the Regional Director for Region 21 of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint and notice of hearing against Respondent on October 29, 1987, alleging that Respondent committed certain violations of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 151 et seq. (the Act). The complaint, as amended,[1] alleges in substance that Respondent unlawfully laid off employees Ell Clounch, Michael Milton, Robert Ott, and Daniel Williams for 1 day and unlawfully delayed a pay increase for employee Mark Jager in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. Further, the complaint alleges that Respondent independently violated Section 8(a)(1) through its president Bryan Cooke by unlawfully threatening employees, interrogating employees, and promising employees benefits in order to discourage its employees' union activities.

The parties have been afforded full opportunity to appear, to introduce relevant evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to file briefs. On the entire record, from my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and having considered the posthearing briefs of the parties, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS

I. JURISDICTION

At all times material, Respondent, a California corporation, has been engaged in the business of storing, crating, packing, shipping, and installing works of art. Respondent operates a facility located at 3124 East 11th Street, Los Angeles, California. During the 12 months prior to issuance of the complaint, Respondent sold and shipped goods and products valued in excess of $50,000 directly to customers located outside the State of California. Accordingly, Respondent admits, and I find, that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

The parties stipulated, and I find, that at all times material the Union has been a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background and Issues

During August 1987, Respondent's employees became interested in union representation. Daniel Williams, a crater for Respondent, contacted the Union. A meeting was set up with Bud Rymer, an organizer for the Union. By August 17, Williams had obtained signatures from 20 of Respondent's 22 production and maintenance employees authorizing the Union to represent them for purposes of collective bargaining. On August 18, Rymer met with Bryan Cooke, Respondent's president and sole stockholder, and presented the employee petition and a proposed collective-bargaining agreement. The instant case arises out of Cooke's reaction to the petition and the Union's demands.

Within this factual framework, the General Counsel contends that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by threatening employees, interrogating employees, and promising benefits as an immediate reaction to its employees' union activities. Further, the General Counsel alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by sending home four employees on the day after the Union's demands and withholding a pay increase previously granted to an employee in order to discourage its employees' union membership and activities. Respondent denies all such allegations.

B. The Facts

As mentioned earlier, Rymer met with Daniel Williams and several other employees on August 12. A petition authorizing the Union to represent Respondent's employees was drafted and signed by the employees. Williams took the petition home and had it typed. The typed petition was signed by Williams and circulated among employees on August 13. The petition was signed by 20 employees. At that time, Respondent employed 22 employees[2] plus 4 foremen whose unit placement was not litigated.

On August 18, Rymer took a copy of the signed petition and a proposed contract to Respondent's facility. Rymer and Damaris Rosado, his assistant, went to see Cooke at his office. Rymer introduced himself to Cooke and handed him a business card. Rymer said he wished to talk to Cooke about some problems concerning Cooke's employees. Rymer showed Cooke the employee petition and got Cooke to acknowledge that more than a majority of the employees had signed the petition. Rymer told Cooke that he wanted to set up a negotiation meeting and that he wanted a committee of employees to be included. Rymer gave Cooke a proposed collective-bargaining agreement. Rymer said he would give Cooke time to review the proposal before they met to negotiate. Cooke offered to meet on the morning of August 24 and Rymer agreed. Rymer and Rosado then left the facility.[3]

Shortly after Rymer's visit, Cooke went into the crating area and spoke to employees. Williams and Robert Fenwick, another crater, testified that Cooke spoke to employees Williams, Fenwick, Robert Ott, Rob Corning, and Michael Milton and asked if the employees wanted "to go Union." No one answered and Cooke said nobody is saying anything. Fenwick then answered that "Our names are all on the petition." Cooke told the employees that he had once helped the Teamsters Union organize a business where he had worked. That company, according to Cooke, went out of business because of the union. Cooke said he would not allow that to happen to his Company.

Cooke said that he was going to have to sell the business. According to Williams, Fenwick, Ott, and Milton, Cooke said that the Union would put him out of business and that he "wasn't going to die a slow death." Cooke then said that if the employees wanted the Union then he would have to tighten up the work force. He said that he would have to lay off some employees and that the remaining employees would have to work a 40-hour week.[4] Cooke told the employees that he would no longer give time off for their other pursuits and if an employee was late 3 days, the employee would be fired. Cooke said he would have to "hire a straw boss to make sure that the employees were working." Fenwich said that the employees needed a union to help them in obtaining raises and better benefits. Cooke answered that he would give benefits.

Williams asked Cooke if he had read the proposed contract and Cooke answered that he had. Fenwick told Cooke that it was "just a starting proposal" and that there would be negotiations to work out something that was fair to everyone. Williams told Cooke that the employees were not trying to put him out of business. Ott asked Cooke to try and meet the employees half way. Cooke answered that Ott took too long to finish a crate and that other employees did not like to work with Ott. Corning began discussing health benefits and Cooke answered that he had helped organize an employer for the Teamsters Union and had seen that company go out of business. Cooke said he would not let his company die a slow death. Milton mentioned time off and Cooke answered that if the Union came in there would not be any time off. Fenwick mentioned wages and Cooke responded that he had given Fenwick a Christmas bonus. Fenwick answered that he did not think the bonus was sufficient. The meeting ended with Cooke leaving and saying something to the effect that he would have to negotiate.[5]

Later that same day, Cooke spoke with employee Mark Jager. Jager had just recently been promised a wage increase and Cooke was surprised to see his name on the employee petition. According to Jager, Cooke asked him what he thought "about this Union thing." Jager answered that he would let the Union speak for him. Cooke said that the raise that Jager was expecting would be withdrawn. Jager answered "Okay." Respondent's payroll records reveal that Jager received the promised wage increase on August 27, retroactive to August 10. Thus, despite Cooke's statement to Jager, Jager's promised wage increase was not withdrawn or delayed.[6]

[3] The above conversation is based on the credited testimony of Rymer and Rosado. To the extent that Cooke's testimony differs, he is not credited. I found Cooke to be most willing to adapt his testimony to suit the perceived needs of his case. In general, I do not credit Cooke unless his testimony is corroborated by documentary or other credible evidence.

[4] Respondent's employees were musicians and artists. One advantage of employment with Respondent, frequently stressed by Cooke, was the flexibility of the work schedule that allowed the employees to pursue their artistic careers.

[5] The above conversation is based on the credited testimony of Fenwick and Williams, which was corroborated by Ott and Milton. Cooke's account of this conversation is credited only to the extent that it is consistent. Al Aguilar, an admitted supervisor, was present at the conversation but did not say anything. Aguilar was not called to corroborate Cooke's version of the conversation.

[6] Jager's testimony is credited. However, the documentary evidence reveals that Jager was incorrect about dates. I find that this does not affect his credibility. I have used the dates established by the payroll records.

On August 19, when Williams reported for work, he was met by Cooke. Cooke referred to a list of employees and told Williams that the other employees had seniority over Williams. Cooke told Williams that Respondent did not have enough work for Williams and sent Williams home. Williams worked the next day without incident. Williams credibly testified that during his employment with Respondent, employees had never before been sent home. Rather, work was found for employees to do. According to Williams, there was crating work to be done on August 19.

Ell Clounch, a crater, was told on August 19 by Al Aguilar, crating foreman,[7] that there was no work and that Clounch should talk to Cooke. Clounch asked Cooke if there was any work and Cooke answered that since the Union was coming in, Cooke was going to have to do things according to the union method, i.e., by seniority. Cooke said that Respondent had work for three craters and that Clounch was fourth in seniority. Clounch asked if there was trucking or any other kind of work he could do. Cooke answered that he had a list of all employees by department and Clounch would only be working as a crater. Clounch left but returned to work the next day. Prior to this incident Respondent did not assign work based on seniority nor did Respondent restrict employees to a particular department. On previous occasions when work was slow, usually in the summer, employees were asked to volunteer to take the next day off. However, employees had not been sent home after they had reported to work.

When Ott reported for work, he was told by Cooke that there was no work. Ott asked why there was no work since there had been work left over from the previous day. Cooke answered that there was only enough work for three or four craters. Ott said he did not understand and Cooke said he was assigning the work according to seniority. Cooke showed Ott a seniority list that had Ott's name near the bottom. Cooke concluded that there was no work for Ott and sent the employee home. Ott returned to work the next day.

When Milton reported on August 19, Cooke came up to Milton and said, "If we are going to run this place like a union, when there is no work we are going to send you home. There is no work for you today." Cooke showed Milton a seniority list and said he was going to send home Ott, Milton, and Williams. Milton said Cooke should have given him notice so that Milton could have arranged his schedule. Milton left the office but returned and filled out his timecard to show 15 minutes for reporting to work. Milton told Cooke that if Respondent was going to lay off anybody, Milton wanted to be the first laid off. Cooke answered that Milton was not the last to be hired. Milton returned to work the next day and worked on the same project that he worked on before this day off. Milton testified that before this incident, he had been asked on several occasions if he wished to take the next day off because work was slow but had never before been sent home after reporting for work.

When Fenwick reported for work on August 19, Ott, Clounch, Milton, and Williams had already been sent home. Fenwick went to see Cooke and said, "Bryan, I don't think you ought to be doing this; I don't think you ought to be laying people off; the Union will take you to court." Cooke answered, "This is what is in the contract, that layoffs are going to happen by seniority when there is no work." Fenwick answered that there was nothing in the proposed contract to that effect. Fenwick said the contract gave the employees a 40-hour week. Cooke answered that the contract was not signed. Fenwick said he thought that they should work out the matter in a friendly way. Cooke said he was still running the business and the conversation ended.

C. Respondent's Defense

Cooke testified that late on the evening of August 18, he was told by Carol Heiman, a supervisor, that there was no crating work and that nobody told the craters not to come in. Cooke testified that because of the excitement concerning the Union, he and Heiman had neglected to discuss scheduling. On the morning of August 19, Cooke obtained the crating files and discovered that he only had enough work to keep one employee busy in the crating department. Cooke looked at the trucking log and found that a number of jobs were canceled or postponed.[8] Cooke testified that while Respondent did not have a strict seniority system, he generally tried to have work for more senior employees and had the junior employees volunteer when days off were necessary.

Cooke testified that he told the employees of his experience with a company he helped organize for the Teamsters Union. That company eventually went out of business. Cooke denied threatening to close the business or promising any benefits to the employees. As stated earlier, I credit the employees' version of the conversation over Cooke's denials.

After consulting with an attorney, Cooke canceled the meeting scheduled for August 24 with Rymer. As mentioned earlier, Respondent granted Jager the promised wage increase as scheduled.

D. Analysis and Conclusions

1. The statements to employees

Based on the credited testimony of Williams and Fenwick, I find that Cooke unlawfully interrogated employees about the Union by coupling his questions with threats to sell the business and to impose harsher working conditions. Carpenter Trucking, 274 NLRB 300 (1985); Sierra Hospital Foundation, 274 NLRB 427 (1985).

[7] The parties stipulated that Aguilar was a supervisor within the meaning of the Act.

[8] Respondent produced the trucking log which revealed that jobs had been postponed or canceled. The log did not reveal when the jobs were canceled.

Respondent did not produce any records from the crating department to dispute the testimony of the employees that there was crating work to be done on August 19.

Further, Heiman, Aguilar, and Paul Drake, dispatcher, were not called to testify. Respondent's failure to produce such documents and witnesses leads to an inference that such evidence would be harmful to its case. Martin Luther King, Sr., Nursing Center, 231 NLRB 15 fn. 1 (1977); Musicians Local 47 (American Broadcasting), 255 NLRB 386, 390 (1981).

I further find the threats to sell the business and the threats of less favorable conditions and harsher working conditions violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Williamson Memorial Hospital, 284 NLRB 37 (1987); Continental Can Co., 282 NLRB 1363 (1987); Brunswick Corp., 282 NLRB 794 (1987).

Although Jager eventually received his raise without suffering any monetary loss, I find that Cooke's statement withdrawing the raise unlawfully placed the onus of denying the raise on the Union. Bay State Ambulance Rental, 280 NLRB 1079 (1986); Trover Clinic, 280 NLRB 6 (1986). Further, on August 19, Cooke violated the Act by placing the onus of the 1-day layoffs on the Union. Rood Industries, 278 NLRB 160 (1986).

Respondent argues that Cooke's statements to the employees were permissible under Section 8(c) of the Act.[9] Cooke was simply giving his truthful opinion of the consequences of the proposed contract on his business.

The distinction between threat and prediction is not easily recognized. The United States Supreme Court in NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 618 (1969), recognized the right of an employer to make a prediction about the precise effects he believes unionization will have on his company. In such a case, however, the prediction must be carefully phrased on the basis of objective fact to convey an employer's belief as to demonstrably probable consequences beyond his control. That test is applicable irrespective of the employer's sincerity.

Here, Cooke's expression of his belief that the Teamsters Union caused his former employer to go out of business is permissible under Section 8(c). However, Cooke's threats to impose harsher working conditions and to go out of business were not predictions based on objective facts. Rather, these were threats phrased in terms of Cooke's choice of action if the employees forced unionization on him. Accordingly, I find that Cooke's statements violated Section 8(a)(1) and were not privileged by Section 8(c) of the Act. See, e.g., Crown Cork & Seal Co., 255 NLRB 14 (1981); Bacchus Wine Cooperative, 251 NLRB 1552 (1980).

2. The 1-day layoffs

In Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), enfd. 662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981), cert. denied 455 U.S. 989 (1982), the Board announced the following causation test in all cases alleging violations of Section 8(a)(3) or violations of Section 8(a)(1) turning on employer motivation. First, the General Counsel must make a prima facie showing sufficient to support the inference that protected conduct was a "motivating factor" in the employer's decision. On such a showing, the burden shifts to the employer to demonstrate that the same action would have taken place even in the absence of the protected conduct. The United States Supreme Court approved and adopted the Board's Wright Line test in NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393, 399–403 (1983).

For the following reasons, I find that the General Counsel has made a prima facie showing that Respondent was motivated by a desire to discourage its employees' union activities. On receipt of the employee petition and the Union's demands, Cooke immediately questioned the employees and threatened to sell or close the business. Further, he threatened to tighten up working conditions, to impose less favorable and harsher conditions, and to lay off employees. Shortly thereafter, he questioned Jager and, receiving no response, informed Jager that the employee's raise had been withdrawn. Although informing employees of the alleged lack of work on August 19, Cooke's statements reveal his intent to dramatize the negative effects of unionization to the employees. Thus, on August 19, Cooke made good on his threats of the previous day to impose harsher conditions and to lay off employees. Finally, the credible testimony of five witnesses establishes that there was, in fact, crating work to be done that day.

The burden shifts to Respondent to establish that the four employees would not have worked on August 19, even in the absence of their protected activities. Respondent established that trucking work for August 19 was postponed or canceled. However, there is no evidence to establish that Respondent could not have followed its usual practice of asking for volunteers to take the day off.[10] More important, the credible evidence establishes that there was crating work to be done. Respondent failed to produce any records to corroborate Cooke's denials of the employees' testimony. Further, neither Heiman nor Aguilar was called to corroborate Cooke's testimony. Under the circumstances, I find Respondent's lack of a credible defense further buttresses the General Counsel's case. I, therefore, find that Respondent has not rebutted the General Counsel's prima facie case and that a violation of Section 8(a)(3) has been established.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent Cooke's Crating, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce and a business affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union, International Brotherhood of Painters & Allied Trades, AFL–CIO, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by laying off employees Ell Clounch, Michael Milton, Robert Ott, and Daniel Williams on August 19, 1987, in order to discourage its employees' membership in the Union.

4. Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by coercively questioning employees about their union activities, threatening to sell or close its business, threatening to impose less favorable or harsher working conditions, telling employees that a previously granted wage increase

[9] Sec. 8(c) provides:

> The expressing of any views, argument, or opinion or the dissemination thereof, whether in written, printed, graphic, or visual form, shall not constitute or be evidence of an unfair labor practice under any of the provisions of this Act . . . if such expression contains no threat of reprisal or force or promise of benefit.

[10] As noted earlier, Respondent failed to call any witnesses to corroborate Cooke's testimony that he did not learn of the cancellations until the morning of August 19. Cooke is not credited on this point.

was withdrawn because of the Union, and telling employees that the Union caused their layoff.

5. Except as specifically found above, Respondent did not violate the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent engaged in unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it take certain affirmative action to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Respondent shall be ordered to make the four employees whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered by reason of the 1-day layoffs, with interest computed in the manner set forth in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987). See generally Isis Plumbing, 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[11]

ORDER

The Respondent, Cooke's Crating, Inc., Los Angeles, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discriminating against employees in regard to layoff in order to discourage membership in International Brotherhood of Painters & Allied Trades, AFL-CIO or any other labor organization.

(b) Coercively questioning employees about their union activities, threatening employees with closing or selling the business, threatening employees with less favorable or harsher working conditions, telling employees that wage increases were withdrawn because of the Union, telling employees that their layoffs were because of the Union or threatening any other form of retaliation for its employees' union activities.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Make whole all four employees laid off on August 19, 1987, for any loss of pay they may have suffered as a result of the unlawful layoff, in the manner set forth above, in the remedy section of this decision.

(b) Remove from its files any reference to the layoffs described above, and notify each of them that this has been done and that evidence of such unlawful layoff will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions.

(c) Preserve and make available to the Board or its agents all payroll and other records necessary to compute the backpay rights set forth in the remedy section of this decision.

(d) Post at its Los Angeles, California facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[12] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 21, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT discriminate against employees regarding layoff to discourage membership in International Brotherhood of Painters & Allied Trades, AFL-CIO or any other labor organization.

WE WILL NOT coercively question employees about their union activities, threaten employees with closing or selling the business, threaten employees with less favorable or harsher working conditions, tell employees that wage increases were withdrawn because of the Union, tell employees that their layoffs were because of the Union, or threaten any other form of retaliation for our employees' union activities.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL make whole Daniel Williams, Ell Clounch, Michael Milton, and Robert Ott for any loss of pay they may have suffered as a result of the unlawful layoff of August 19, 1987, with interest.

[11] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[12] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

WE WILL remove from our files any reference to the layoffs described above, and WE WILL notify each of the four employees that this has been done and that evidence of such unlawful layoff will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions.

DECISION AND DIRECTION

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

The National Labor Relations Board, by a three-member panel, has considered determinative challenges and objections in an election held February 5, 1988, and the Regional Director's report recommending disposition of them. The election was conducted pursuant to a Stipulation and Agreement for Second (Rerun) Election. The tally of ballots shows 11 for and 7 against the Petitioner, with 4 challenged ballots. The challenged ballots are sufficient in number to affect the results of the election.

The Board has reviewed the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has adopted the Regional Director's findings[1] and recommendations.[2]

We agree with the Regional Director's conclusion that the Petitioner's organizer, David Freeland, did not violate the Board's rule governing conversations between a party representative and a prospective voter waiting to cast a ballot when he told an employee that the Employer was going to challenge her vote. See Milchem, Inc., 170 NLRB 362 (1968). In so concluding, the Regional Director relied on the findings that the conversation between Freeland and the employee did not take place within the polling place or in the corridor leading to the polling area, the employee was not in line waiting to vote, the polls had not opened, and in any event, the conversation was brief.

The Employer, citing Monroe Mfg., Co., 200 NLRB 62 (1972), contends that Freeland's brief remarks are objectionable under Milchem. We disagree. In Monroe Mfg., Co., supra, the company's official approached the line of voters while the polls were opened and advised three employees waiting in line that they could go home as they were ineligible to vote because their names did not appear on the eligibility list. These voters then left the line. The Board adopted the judge's finding that the official's action violated the Milchem rule (even though his remarks concerning eligiblity were accurate) because his remarks to employees in line to vote while voting was taking place conveyed the impression that the Employer had some effective connection with, if not control over, the election. Thus, the Employer's comments in Monroe Mfg. could reasonably be interpreted as indicative of the Employer's authority to unilaterally dictate who could and could not vote. None of the factors relied on in Monroe Mfg. are present in the instant case. Here the conduct at issue occurred outside the polling area and before the polls opened. Further, the substance of Freeland's comments could not be interpreted as exhibiting control over or an official connection with the election process. In such circumstances, the Milchem rule does not apply.

DIRECTION

IT IS DIRECTED that the Regional Director for Region 9 shall, pursuant to the Board's Rules and Regulations, and within 14 days of the date of this Decision and Direction, open and count the ballots of Oga Combs, Grace Shepherd, Catherine Wireman, and Brenda Patton, and thereafter issue and serve on the parties a revised tally of ballots and the appropriate certification.

IT IS FURTHER DIRECTED that the above-entitled matter is remanded to the Regional Director for Region 9 for further processing consistent with this Decision and Direction.

[1] In the absence of exceptions, we adopt pro forma the Regional Director's recommendation to overrule the challenges to the ballots of Oga Combs, Grace Shepherd, Catherine Wireman, and Brenda Patton; and to overrule the Employer's Objection 3.

[2] The Employer's exceptions, in our opinion, raise no material or substantial issues of fact or law that would warrant reversal of the Regional Director's recommendations or require a hearing.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On September 30, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Earldean V. S. Robbins issued the attached decision. Respondent Metro Foods, Inc. (Respondent Metro) filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order[3] as modified.[4]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondents, Metro Foods, Inc. and Brice Bros., Inc., San Francisco, California, their officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 1(f).

"(f) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act."

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT refuse to recognize and bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative of our employees in the appropriate unit with respect

[1] Respondent Metro has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

In sec. III,H, par. 6, of her decision, the judge found that Office Manager Lee's questioning of employee Danette Petersen on January 15, 1987, whether Petersen would go with Owner Leo Englert to Metro or stay with the Union was coercive and therefore violated Sec. 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. However, in par. 8 of her conclusions of law, the judge determined that the interrogation violated only Sec. 8(a)(1). The complaint alleged that Lee's questioning of Petersen violated only Sec. 8(a)(1). Accordingly, we correct the inadvertent error in sec. III,H, par. 6, of the judge's decision and find that the interrogation violated only Sec. 8(a)(1).

[2] In its exceptions, Respondent Metro argues that the facts in Victor Valley Heating & Air Conditioning, 267 NLRB 1292 (1983), where no alter ego relationship was found, present a stronger basis for making an alter ego finding than the facts in the instant case. We disagree. In Victor Valley, the husband and wife owners of a company had a collective-bargaining agreement with a union. The husband, as president and manager of the company, decided to terminate part of the company's operations because of unprofitability caused by competition from nonunion business. During the time of this decision, the husband and wife's son, with his parents' assistance and a large monetary gift from the son's grandmother, formed a company engaged in the same type of business being terminated by his parents. The parents' former secretary became the bookkeeper and secretary for the new company and the son hired his brother-in-law, a former employee of the son's parents, as his superintendent. The son bought equipment no longer needed by his parents because of their partly terminated operations, and the parents referred customers to their son.

The Board adopted the judge's decision finding that the parents' assistance to their son involved routine matters and did not include direction of employees, business management, or control of any daily operations. At the son's company, the brother-in-law alone was responsible for hiring, firing, and assigning work. At the parents' company, the husband was singularly in charge of labor matters. The parents also had no financial stake or ownership interest in their son's company and the son's company received no financial benefit from the parents' business. Although the husband was registered as his son's responsible managing officer, the registration was a mere paper transaction designed to qualify the new company for a state license. The registration did not give the husband any financial interest or ownership in the new company.

In the instant case, Leo Englert created Metro Foods, Inc. to benefit himself and to avoid his contractual obligations with the Union. We note that Englert had substantial ownership interests in both Brice Bros., Inc. and Metro Foods, Inc., was the dominant voice in labor relations matters at both companies, and openly espoused his desire to rid himself of the Union. Accordingly, we find that Victor Valley is clearly distinguishable from the instant matter and we adopt the judge's conclusion that Brice Bros., Inc. and Metro Foods, Inc. are alter egos.

[3] The General Counsel has requested that the order include a visitatorial clause. We find no need for such a remedial provision in the circumstances of this case. See Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

[4] In par. 4 of her Remedy, the judge recommended issuing a broad cease-and-desist order against the Respondents. In her Order, however, the judge issued a narrow cease-and-desist order. Because we agree with the judge that a broad order is appropriate under the circumstances of this case, we shall modify the Order and issue a new notice to employees.

WE WILL acknowledge that we are bound by the collective-bargaining agreement between the Union and the San Francisco Produce Association and the Terminal Dealers' Association effective by its terms from February 1, 1986, to February 1, 1989, andWE WILL abide by the terms of said agreement, both retroactively and prospectively.

WE WILL make our employees whole by paying retroactively the wage rates provided for in our collective-bargaining agreement with the Union and by paying all contractually required contributions to the various trust funds established by the collective-bargaining agreement and by reimbursing employees for any expenses they may have incurred because of our failure to make such required payments.

WE WILL offer each of the employees named below immediate and full reinstatement to his or her former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his or her seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed and WE WILL make him or her whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from his or her discharge, less any net interim earnings, plus interest.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

EARLDEAN V. S. ROBBINS, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard before me on 8 through 11 June 1987 in San Francisco, California. The initial charge in Case 20-CA-20928 was filed by Freight Checkers, Clerical Employees, and Helpers, Teamsters Local Union No. 856, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL-CIO (the Union) and served on Metro Foods, Inc. and Brice Bros., Inc. (Metro, Brice, Brice Bros., or Respondents). On 22 January 1987 a first amended charge in Case 20-CA-20928 was filed by the Union and served on Respondents on 9 March 1987. The initial charge in Case 20-CA-20982 was filed by the Union and served on Respondents on 10 February 1987, and a first amended charge in the case was filed by the Union and served on Respondents on 9 March 1987. The consolidated complaint, which issued on 13 April 1987 alleges that Respondents have violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act).

The basic issues are:

1. Whether Metro and Brice are alter egos and a single employer within the meaning of the Act.

2. Alternatively, whether Metro is a successor to Brice obligated to recognize and bargain with the Union and, if so, whether it has failed in this obligation.

3. Whether Respondents unlawfully terminated certain named employees or, alternatively, if Respondents are not alter egos or a single employer, whether Metro Foods has unlawfully refused to hire those employees.

4. Whether Respondents have unlawfully refused to furnish the Union with certain requested information.

5. Whether Respondents have bypassed the Union and dealt directly with employees by soliciting employees to abandon the Union and enter into individual employment contracts.

On the entire record,[1] including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel and the Respondents, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

At all times material until 31 January 1987, Brice Bros., Inc., a California corporation, with an office and place of business in south San Francisco, California (the Brice facility), has been engaged in the nonretail sale and distribution of produce. At all times material since 1 February 1987, Metro Foods, Inc., a California corporation, with an office and place of business in San Francisco, California (the Metro facility), has been engaged in the nonretail sale and distribution of produce. During the 12-month period ending 1 February 1987, Brice Bros., in the course and conduct of its business operations, sold and shipped from its south San Francisco, California facility products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly to enterprises located within the State of California, each of which is directly engaged in interstate commerce. Based on a projection of its operations since 1 February 1987, at which time it commenced its operations, Metro, in the course and conduct of its business operations, will annually sell and ship from its San Francisco, California facility products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 to enterprises located within the State of California, each of which is directly engaged in interstate commerce.

The complaint alleges, Respondents admit, and I find that Brice Bros., until 31 January 1987, and Metro Foods, since 1 February 1987, each has been an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION

The complaint alleges, Respondents admit, and I find that the Union is now, and has been at all times material, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Brice Operations

Brice Bros. has been in business as a wholesale produce distributor operating out of the Golden Gate Produce Terminal in south San Francisco for more than 25 years. In 1978, Leo Englert and Frank Luporini each acquired a 50-percent interest in Brice Bros. At that time Brice Bros. was a member of a multiemployer bargaining group, bound by a collective-bargaining agreement with the Union. In 1980, 1983, and 1986, successively, 3-year contracts were entered into by the Association and the Union. At no time did Brice Bros. make an attempt to withdraw from the multiemployer bargaining unit, and there is no evidence that prior to the incidents involved Brice made any attempt to encourage its employees to abandon the Union.

Englert testified that at the time he and Luporini acquired Brice they anticipated that responsibility for Brice's operations would be divided. Englert would be responsible for the buying and selling of produce and Luporini would be responsible for labor and the warehouse. However, Englert admits this division of responsibility was never successful. According to him, Luporini did not carry out his responsibilities to Englert's satisfaction, and he admits that during the past 5 to 7 years he has made negative comments regarding Luporini to employees. Brice employees Danette Petersen, William Singleton, Harry Barsanti, Franklin Tying, and Gregory Thompson testified that Englert often made derogatory remarks about Luporini to employees and instructed them to ignore Luporini's orders. Tying testified that on a number of occasions Englert threatened to discharge him and other employees if they did not ignore Luporini's orders. According to them, Englert said he was the boss and that employees should only follow his instructions or that of Office Manager Beverly Lee or the Night Warehouse Supervisor Gregory Thompson. Englert did not deny giving such instructions. According to Thompson, Englert decided whether employees should work overtime. Singleton and Tying testified that Englert interviewed and hired them.[2] He also assigned Singleton the truck he was to drive. Further, there was a notation on the driver's schedule to see Englert regarding any changes.

The Brice facility was located in the Golden Gate Produce Terminal (the terminal). The terminal, located on 16.4 acres in south San Francisco, is comprised of 2 long buildings, 2 stories high, divided into approximately 72 stalls, and occupied by in excess of 20 produce wholesalers. The buildings are surrounded by docks on three sides with each stall having a door opening onto the dock. Some of the wholesalers are engaged in large volume operations requiring delivery to customers. Others are smaller operations that sell mainly out of their stalls in the terminal, referred to as selling "on the street." Although Brice did some limited selling "on the street," most of the products it sold were delivered directly to its customers.

[1] At the conclusion of the hearing, I left the record open for the purpose of receiving a list of the Metro employee complement during its first month of operations by name, classification, hire date, and separation date where applicable. That list, marked as G.C. Exh. 34, is received into evidence.

[2] Tying testified that he asked Luporini if there were any job openings, and Luporini told him he would have to speak to Englert.

Brice, which occupied three stalls in the terminal with a total of 5400 square feet, operated much the same as all other large produce distributors in the market. It purchased produce from various brokers through a process of bargaining for the best price possible from a supplier. Englert was the person who negotiated prices with produce brokers for the purchase of produce and determined the price for which Brice would sell to its customers. Luporini did this only when Englert was on vacation or because of illness. Luporini did the purchasing of frozen produce and of "shorts"—items purchased at the last minute on the street because they were perishable or to fill in missing items on a particular order. Luporini was also responsible for selling "on the street." However, it is undisputed that Englert discouraged such selling. Luporini was also responsible for handling the donation of distressed goods to senior citizen groups. Additionally, he oversaw the repacking of delicate produce such as avocados, much of which he did himself.

As to sales, the general practice of large wholesale produce distributors, including Brice and Metro, is to solicit a commitment from a customer to purchase produce. Many large customers have a policy of seeking bids from three wholesale distributors during any one period of time. On a weekly basis, the distributor sets the price it will charge a customer for each item of produce. When the price is communicated to the customer, the customer decides what item it will purchase from the distributor. In general, a customer will continue to order from the same distributor if the price is competitive and the quality of the produce and the service is satisfactory. If any of these three factors does not meet the customer's requirement, the customer may switch to another distributor. However, if a customer finds a distributor satisfactory as to all three factors, then the customer may use the distributor as its prime supplier for years. Brice had a group of customers who purchased on a regular basis and some who purchased only sporadically.

In January 1986 Brice's employee complement consisted of four drivers, one utility man, six porters,[3] two salesmen, and two office employees. The porters worked principally at night, placing and rotating stock in the freezers and iceboxes, repacking produce, and loading the trucks for deliveries. They also sorted produce and repacked certain delicate items. Much of the repacking was done by Luporini. The drivers began work at 4 or 5 a.m. and made deliveries until the early afternoon. Each driver was assigned a regular route, which covered a particular geographical area. The utilityman worked both as a porter and a driver. The office employees were supervised by Beverly Lee, an admitted supervisor. The porters were supervised by Night Supervisor Greg Thompson.

Brice's customers placed their orders either by telephoning Brice or by responding to calls initiated by Englert or the Brice office personnel. Then invoices are prepared by Brice office personnel stating the items ordered, after which porters removed the required produce from the freezer and/or icebox and loaded it onto the truck. Once the truck was loaded, the driver delivered the produce to the customer. Identical or similar procedures are used by Metro and all wholesale distributors who deliver produce to customers.

B. The Decision to Dissolve Brice, Sell the Brice Facility, and Distribute the Brice Assets

According to Englert, he and Luporini began discussing the dissolution of Brice Bros. in 1986 because they were growing further and further apart, and Luporini wanted to retire. They considered the possibilities of Englert buying out Luporini, of Luporini buying out Englert, and then selling or dissolving the business. After unsuccessful attempts to settle on either of the other options, they decided to dissolve the business. The principal assets of Brice Bros. was the warehouse and, according to Englert, it took approximately a year to a year and a half to find a buyer for the warehouse. They did finally find a buyer who paid $525,000 for the warehouse. Negotiations for the sale of the warehouse was completed around the first week in October. Escrow closed around the end of November. The terms of the dissolution provide, inter alia, that, at his election, Englert would receive all trucks and equipment owned by Brice in consideration for his assumption of all financial obligations and liabilities pertaining to such trucks and equipment. It was further agreed that upon final liquidation Englert, or "his new corporation," would buy Brice's remaining inventory for a price of 10 cents per box above actual cost. The agreed-on figure that Englert paid for the inventory, according to him, was $98,000. The agreement further provided that Englert and Luporini receive equal interest in all other assets of Brice and share equally in all other Brice fixed and contingent liabilities.

C. Rumors and Statements About the Closing of Brice

Around October or November 1986,[4] rumors began circulating that Brice would be moving. Danette Petersen testified that around that time she asked Lee if Brice was moving. Lee said they were thinking about it, that she and Englert had looked at a warehouse that would have a lunchroom and a private office for Lee. Lee further said she would like for Petersen to go with them when they moved. Petersen asked if Englert was going to stay in the Union. Lee said no. Petersen said she had been in the Union 6 years and wanted to stay in because of the benefits she had.

Petersen also testified that, in November or December, she asked Luporini if Englert was going to stay in the Union. Luporini said he did not think so, but he did not know whether Englert could get away with it. During a later conversation, according to Petersen, she asked Luporini what he was going to do. Luporini said he was going to retire. During a third conversation, Petersen asked Luporini if he had heard of any job openings. Luporini said Englert might need someone at his new place. Petersen again asked if Englert was going to stay with the Union. Luporini said no. On another occasion, according to Petersen, she told Luporini she had applied for another job and asked what he thought about that. Luporini said he would not hesitate to take another job because Englert would only think of himself. In another conversation, Luporini told Petersen the place had been sold. Petersen also testified that, at the beginning of January, she asked Lee what her benefits would be if she moved with Lee. Lee said she did not know any of that yet.

[4] All dates in September through December will be in 1986 and in January through March will be in 1987.

Employee William Singleton testified that in September or October he began to hear rumors from customers that the Brice warehouse was for sale, and customers began to ask him what was going on. He told Englert customers were saying they had heard Brice was closing, and they should not buy from Brice. Englert said Brice was not closing, was not going to go out of business, and Singleton should not say anything to the customers other than that Brice was not closing. In early November, according to Singleton, Englert said a customer told him one of the drivers said Brice was closing, and he assumed it was Singleton. Singleton denied this. Englert said, "[I]n the future, if anybody asks you, we are not closing."

Singleton also testified that the week before Thanksgiving Englert called him into his office and told him he was going to move the Company to another location in the area, that he was going to sell the warehouse, and the new company he was going to open would be nonunion. Englert said he was going to take only a few of his key employees with him. He said Leonardo Cadena would be head driver and take care of the San Jose and south route. Cuco Franco would be head porter. William Reyes would be head of the prepared department, Steve Mosunic would be a porter, and Singleton would be a driver and salesman. Englert also said the company was going to be nonunion, that he would not be able to pay what the employees were being paid in the Union, but he was going to supply a benefits package as good or better than the Union's. He said he realized Singleton would not remain with him if he did not make as much money, so he was offering Singleton a job as a salesman in which he would make a 2-percent commission, have a car, an expense account, and a gas card. Englert said there would also be a salary involved, but he did not know yet what the salary would be. Englert said Singleton should talk to Arthur Meier, the head salesman for Brice, so that Meier could fill Singleton in on information. Englert said because that week was very busy, a holiday week, Singleton should wait until the following week to talk to Meier.

According to Singleton, Englert further said he was going to get rid of Luporini. He said the union wages were killing him, and he could not afford to pay union prices; that the health and welfare was way out of line. He said he was going to get rid of some of the deadwood like Harry Barsanti, that Barsanti had 5 weeks' vacation every year and Englert could not afford to pay that. Englert said Barsanti's health and welfare and pension programs were all paid up in the Union, but Brice still had to pay it and that bugged him; that he did not want to pay that money. He said he could not compete with other nonunion houses such as Gallei Produce, Ralph Foods, and B&C Produce; but by going nonunion he could compete. He further said that within 2 years the entire industry would be nonunion. Singleton also testified that, in one of their conversations, Englert asked him not to say anything to anyone because he was only taking his key employees, and he did not want everyone to know. He said he wanted to get rid of the deadwood.

Gregory Thompson testified that in June 1986 he asked Luporini if the rumors about Brice Bros. being sold were true. Luporini said yes, they were in the process of trying to sell the business, and that his wife wanted him to leave the produce business because he was not making any money. He said they were trying to sell the stalls and had received a bid, but Englert was holding out for another $50,000 in cash above the value of the stalls, so that he would have a nest egg to start a new company.

Thompson also testified that in mid-June Englert told him he was trying to get out of the produce market and away from the Union because he was not making any money. He said he would finally get the chance to make some money once he got Luporini out of the business. He said he would have to move out of the market and away from the Union if the Company was going to survive. Englert continued to mention that he was looking for another warehouse and, on one occasion in September, took Thompson to a warehouse in south San Francisco that he was considering purchasing. Englert said that was what he could have if they got away from the Union and out of the market.

D. Notification to the Union and to Employees of the Closing of Brice and Negotiations with the Union with Respect Thereto

On 2 October Englert sent a letter to Union Representative Robert Rosa, which states:

> This is notification to the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Local 856, of the dissolution of Brice Bros. Inc. within 6 months. Please contact us so that we can meet and arrange the appropriate preparations.

At the time, Rosa was on extended sick leave so there was no response to this letter. On 30 December Peter Cooke, a management representative for Brice and the association of which Brice was a member, sent a mailgram to the Union, the body of which reads: "If you wish to meet with Brice Bros. prior to its being dissolved and closed on or before January 31 please contact me."

Rosa testified that he first became aware of the possibility that Brice Bros. might be closing when he returned from sick leave in mid-December and was given the October letter from Brice. According to Rosa, around the last week in December, he called Cooke, told him he had information that Brice Bros. was going to continue in business either under that name or a new name and would like to meet with Englert to ask some questions. Cooke agreed, and they scheduled a meeting for 12 January.

The meeting was held as scheduled. Present for the Employer were Luporini and Cooke. Present for the Union were Rosa and Union President Jack McLaughlin. Cooke said Englert had broken his foot and could not attend. Luporini said he was going to retire. According to Rosa, Cooke said Englert was going to go out of business. Rosa asked if they were planning to sell the equipment and accounts, and if they had notified the accounts that Brice was closing. Luporini said their attorney was going to work on a letter to be sent to all the accounts. Rosa asked if anyone from Brice was going to go with Englert. Cooke asked, "Go where?" Rosa inquired whether Lee was going to go with Englert. Cooke said no. Rosa then asked if Lee had any ownership interest in Brice. Luporini said no. Rosa said it was his understanding that Brice Bros. was going to continue in business either under that name or some other name, that and the Union had been told they were going to move into a warehouse in south San Francisco. Cooke said he had not heard anything about that, and that he had been assured that Englert was going out of business. Rosa said he wanted to meet with Englert because he was not satisfied with the answers he was getting. Cooke said he would contact Englert. Rosa said he wanted to talk about severance pay. Cooke mentioned either a $2000 or $4000 lump sum at that time. After some discussion Cooke proposed a $10,000 figure and said if they went to a $10,000 figure the Union would have to back off, and that the Union could disburse the money any way it wanted, but would have to agree not to pursue the matter further.

Later that day Cooke and Rosa spoke by telephone in an attempt to set up a meeting for 23 January. Rosa testified that he told Cooke he would be willing to talk about severance pay. He also testified that he said he suspected Englert was really continuing in business, and that Cooke should ask Englert. Neither Cooke nor Luporini testified.

On 15 January all Brice employees received the following notice with their paychecks:

> To our employees:
> As per our union contract, you are hereby officially advised that Brice Bros. Inc., will ceased [sic] to exist and discontinue your employment on or about January 31, 1987.
> If you need assistance on extended medical coverage, please contact Joanne, at Local 856, 863-7607.

According to Rosa, prior to the 23 January meeting, he spoke with Union Attorney Marie Rangone regarding his doubts that Brice was really closing and asked her to give him some questions to use during the meeting. On 21 January Rangone sent a letter to Englert, the body of which states:

> This office represents Teamsters Local 856. With respect to the closure of your business, about which you notified the Union on or about October 2, 1986, the Union has received information that you are in fact intending to carry on the same or a similar business in another location at the produce market. However, at a meeting to discuss the impact of the alleged closure of the business last week, you did not appear, and your representative Mr. Cooke was unable to answer our questions about the likelihood of your continuing to operate the business. As you are aware, our contract is binding upon you in the event you extend your business to another location; moreover, we feel that you are not being forthright in bargaining with the Union with respect to closure, if in fact closure of the business is your real intent.
> Therefore, we have this date filed unfair labor practice charges with the National Labor Relations Board. Our initial demand is for all information about the future, if any, of Brice Bros.' current business, whether or not the business is to be carried on under the same name or in the same location, or not, as the case may be. Thank you for your prompt response.
> The letter and the enclosed unfair labor practice charge were received by the Union on 22 January.

The meeting was held as scheduled on 23 January. Present were Rosa, Englert, Cooke, and Respondents' attorney, Randolph Roeder. According to Rosa, after they began discussing the closing of Brice Bros., he read a list of questions that had been dictated to him by Rangone. He first asked, "What stage of the dissolution are you in at the present time?" Englert said he was closing by the end of the month, but gave no further explanation. Rosa asked, "Have you sold the property? If so, to whom?" Englert said this was none of Rosa's business and refused to answer. Rosa asked, "Have you sold the goodwill of the company." Englert said he was working on it. Rosa asked, "Have you sold the business accounts, etc." Englert said he was trying to sell the accounts, the trucks, the office equipment, etc., but did not say to whom he was tryingto sell them. Rosa asked, "Are any of the officers of the corporation or anyone related to them going to continue in the business either under the name of Brice Bros. or any other name?" Englert said no, but gave no further explanation.

At this point, according to Rosa, either Roeder or Cooke asked for a caucus. Rosa left the office and, after 10 or 15 minutes, he was invited to return. Cooke explained that Roeder was there to handle the charges that had been filed against the Company, and Cooke would handle the closing of the Company and any severance pay issue. They then commenced discussing severance pay. Rosa made a demand of 1 week's pay for each year of service with the Employer. Cooke said that was unacceptable. Cooke said Brice could go as high as a $5000 lump sum, but the Union would have to agree to not pursue the matter any further; and, if the Union did agree to take the $5000 lump sum, the Union could disburse it anyway it saw fit. Rosa asked what Englert was going to do in the future. Englert either said it was none of Rosa's business or he was not sure. Rosa cannot remember which he said. No agreement was reached on the severance pay issue that day. Rosa said he had meetings in Honolulu the following week and when he returned they could meet to talk about severance pay and anything else necessary. He also said the contract would still be enforced. Rosa asked if they were going to pay all the employees their vacation, health and welfare, and pension. Englert said Lee was working on that. Rosa asked if Englert was going to take any of the employees with him. Englert said no. Thereafter, the Union made no further contact with Respondents.

Englert testified that after introductions Rosa asked why Roeder was there and remarked that Englert had brought in the heavy hitters. They then started talking about the closure of Brice Bros. Rosa asked to whom the business had been sold. Englert said they did not sell the business, they sold the warehouse. Rosa asked what they were going to do with the accounts. Englert said they were uncertain. Rosa asked what they were going to do with the equipment and the trucks. Englert said they are for sale and asked if Rosa knew anyone interested in purchasing the trucks. He also told him the office equipment was for sale. As to what his plans were, Englert said he was uncertain. They then began discussing severance pay. Rosa asked for $90,000. Cooke said no one in the produce industry had ever given severance pay and cited several examples. Rosa then reduced his demand to $50,000. Englert said that was totally unacceptable as Respondent was not making any money and did not have that type of money, that the sale of the building was going to pay debts. Englert then offered $2000 to $3000, which the Union could disburse any way it desired if they "could just clean all of the mess up and be done with everything." According to Englert, Rosa left very bitter and said, "I'll get you no matter where you go. I know what you're going to do, I know you are moving across the freeway." One of Respondents' representatives mentioned they would like to clear this matter up since Brice would be out of business in a few days. Rosa said he was going on a trip. No date was set for a future meeting, and there have been no further communications between Respondents and the Union.

E. Englert's Decision to Commence Operations as Metro and the Decision as to Which Brice Employees Would Move to the Metro Facility

Englert testified that as of 2 October he was uncertain about the future. Some of the options he was considering at that time was going to work for someone, taking a long vacation, acquiring a new partner, or buying into another business. He was also considering getting out of the Golden Gate produce terminal because the location was too open to the observation of the competition and the facilities there were too small and antiquated for the business. He further testified that, prior to finding the location at 1325 6th Street in San Francisco at the very end of January, he had not decided to start a new operation.

Yet, he admits that incorporation papers for Metro were filed with the State of California probably at least 3 weeks prior to 1 February. "Englert's newly formed corporation" was referred to in the Brice October Shareholders' Agreement and the Plan of Complete Liquidation and Dissolution of Brice Bros., Inc. Also Rosa testified that immediately after the conclusion of the 23 January meeting employee Lillian Fenech gave him an address of the warehouse in which Metro was located when it commenced operations, and told him someone from the telephone company had just called and said telephones would be installed at that address.

Further, Thompson testified that prior to the Christmas holidays he and Englert discussed on a continual basis which employees should be moved to the new company. Englert asked him to get together a crew that would form a foundation for the new warehouse. They discussed the people that Thompson thought should be on this crew—Cuco Franco (also known as Joaquin A. Laines), Willie Reyes, Arturo Cadena (also known as Leonardo), and Steve Mosunic. According to Thompson, as he mentioned the names that he wanted on his crew, Englert said he did not know whether Steve would be making the move. Thompson said Englert could not make the move without Thompson's support, and Thompson could not make the move without Steve Mosunic's support, that it was going to be a package deal with the five porters giving him support to make the move.

According to Thompson, Englert said he did not know, first of all, whether the new company would be able to afford Mosunic and, second, whether Mosunic was a "union man" or not. Englert said Cadena and Reyes were coming with him. He did not know whether Bill Singleton or Harry Barsanti would be. Thompson said, "Leo, how can you replace Harry, he's been driving in the Bay Area for 40 years." Englert said, "It's going to take me 15 to 20 years just to remember what he's forgotten about where stops are." They discussed Singleton and then being able to take care of the city route, handle the customers, and keep them busy. Englert said Franklin Tying would go whether he was paid $9 or $13.50 an hour. Thompson then mentioned the repacking crew, and Englert said they could find repackers anywhere. They also discussed the office staff. Englert said he definitely wanted to take Petersen to the new company, but he would not take Lillian Fenech.

On the day after the notices of termination were given to employees, according to Thompson, Englert told him Singleton and Barsanti had gone to the Union and they were out of the move, that they would not be coming over to the new company. Englert said Tying would come along but Singleton and Barsanti were definitely out because they had gone to see the Union. Thompson said it would be real bad to lose Barsanti. Englert said there was no way he was going to bring anyone who was a union man along to the new company. Thompson asked, "How are you going to stop this?" Englert said, "If I get to the new place and open the doors and the union shows up I'm just going to shut the doors."

Thompson further testified that later he asked Englert if he had made a decision on Mosunic. Englert said he did not know yet. Thompson said the crew was asking him about the wages and benefits at the new company. Englert said Thompson should tell them everything would stay the same. Thompson further testified that on the Wednesday before the move he asked Englert again what the situation was with pay and benefits. At that time, Englert told him the highest paid employee in the company would be making $500 a week with no medical benefits. Thompson said that would not cut it, that he had a family that he could not support on $500 a week. Englert said, "There is nothing I can do, I'm on a budget, my hands are tied, and that's what the highest paid people are going to be getting, $500 a week." Thompson asked whether this was gross or net. Englert said it was net. According to Thompson, he had been averaging between 15 and 20 hours a week overtime, which gave him a gross of a little over $1100 a week. He also had health and welfare and pension benefits under the union contract.

Petersen testified that on the day she received notice that Brice would be closing Lee asked if she had decided whether to go with them or stay with the Union. Petersen said she was going to try for a union job at the city of San Bruno and she would wait to hear about that. Lee said she was going to hire four girls in the office, that she did not know what Petersen's position would be nor what the salary or benefits would be, but she would like for Petersen to come with her and Englert.

Despite the definite plans to dissolve Brice Bros., the negotiations with the Union, and the notice to employees, Brice customers were never notified that the Company was being dissolved. Rather, according to several customers, they received assurances that the business was continuing despite the rumors. Thus, Linda Dionne, the buyer for the Santa Clara purchasing department, testified that, when she questioned Englert regarding the rumor she had heard about Brice closing Englert, assured her that Brice was not going out of business, that they were simply changing location and names because one of the partners had retired. Englert further assured her there would be no interruption in service and that she had no cause for concern.

Keiko Kovacs of Sky Chefs testified that around the end of January he heard that Friday would be the final day of business for Brice. Since he did not want to take the chance of not having a Saturday delivery, he decided to order from another source. When one of the office employees at Brice telephoned to inquire why he had not placed an order, he told her about the rumors he had heard. Shortly thereafter, Englert called and told him he was not going out of business, that he was just changing names and moving his location to downtown San Francisco. He said the deliveries would remain the same. Larry Brindley, who was then the buyer at the United Airlines Flight Kitchen at the San Francisco Airport, testified that 1 or 2 days before Brice closed Art Meier told him that as of Monday Brice was moving to a new location and becoming Metro Foods. Brindley asked if the price and delivery procedures would be the same, and Meier said yes.

However, during the last week in January, employees began to receive conflicting signals as to Respondents' intentions. Thus, Petersen testified that a few days before 31 January Lee telephoned her at home while she was on sick leave and asked her to clean out her desk because they were going to close up and sell everything. Petersen asked, "Are you going to be among the unemployed like me?" Lee said yes, she was going to go to Palm Springs for about 3 weeks, but Petersen should give her a call because Lee might have something for her later. Petersen asked who would pay all the bills and take care of the work. Lee said Luporini was going to do it and they were going to have a post office box. Petersen asked what was going to happen to all the billings and where was all the money going to go. Lee said they had opened a post office box for the mail.

Petersen further testified that when she returned to Brice Bros. on Friday, 30 January, to clean out her desk, she answered the telephone once. The caller identified himself and said he wanted to open a new account with Brice. Petersen put the customer on hold and told Lee "this customer wants to set up an account; I thought you were closing; why are they setting up a new account." Lee said the people that were taking over were going to keep all the customers. Then Englert took the call. Singleton testified that during the last week of January Englert was telling everyone that the trucks and the inventory had been sold to an unnamed company in San Jose.

Englert did not testify about any specific conversations with employees regarding the closing or moving of Brice Bros., the opening of Metro, or whether Brice Bros. employees would move with him to the new operation. However, he did testify that he asked certain Brice employees, that he felt were very efficient, worthwhile employees, to work for him in the new operation. According to him, he did not ask Harry Barsanti, Lillian Fenech, or Danette Petersen about working for him in a new business primarily because he wanted aggressive people to work for him. Further, according to him, their union sympathies had nothing to do with it as they were all in the Union when he spoke to them. Lee did not testify.

F. The Move to the Metro Facility and the Commencement of the Metro Operations

Metro occupies a 28,000-square-foot facility in San Francisco, about 14 miles from the old Brice facility and about 5 miles from its nearest competitor. It has three offices on one level as compared to four offices on two levels at the Brice facility. The telephone system is new and there is a FAX system connecting the facility with Englert's home, something that Brice never had. Initially, Metro had only one large icebox whereas Brice had two freezers and three iceboxes. According to Englert, this necessitated having to store some of the produce in Brice refrigerated trucks. A second box was obtained about 6 weeks after the move and a third one was in the process of being completed at the time of the hearing. Although the Brice boxes afforded multilevel storage, it appears that the Metro facility presently has more refrigerated storage area than did Brice. It also has more dock area.

The move to the Metro facility commenced on 30 January. Thompson testified that on Monday and Tuesday of the last week of January Englert told him that with the exception of three GMC trucks, all vehicles, forklifts, and everything in the warehouse that was not attached to the walls would have to be moved. On 30 January Englert put Thompson in charge of the move. According to Thompson, Englert said Thompson should load all the products into the trucks and transfer it from one warehouse to the other. However, it was not until that afternoon that Englert told Thompson they would be moving into a warehouse in the China Basin area, and it was not until midnight that he learned the name of the new company. At that time, according to Thompson, Englert telephoned and gave him specific instructions about what was being moved. Englert further instructed him to back the three GMC trucks against the side fence at the Brice facility so that on Monday morning when the Union came around they would see the black trucks backed in against the fence and think that Englert had actually gone out of business. Englert admits that the equipment used by Metro was the same equipment that had been at Brice Bros. This includes the trucks, one electric forklift, two manual pallet jacks, and a series of dock plates.[5] However, he denies he told Thompson to park the trucks in a manner that would deceive the Union. According to him, the trucks were always parked that way.

The trucks used by Metro are still registered in Brice's name.[6] Also, Metro continues to use gasoline credit cards that were issued to Brice. Further, at the time it commenced its operation, Metro had none of the licenses and health permits required for the operation of the business, and the only customers it had were former Brice customers. Metro continues to service these customers[7] except for those it lost because of unreliable deliveries. According to Englert, as of the time of this hearing it had retained only about 50 percent of Brice's customers. Metro has acquired some new customers, however, it is undisputed that it draws its customers from the same market as did Brice.

The payroll records show that of the nine employees hired by Metro on 1 February seven,[8] were former Brice Bros. employees.[9] During the first week of Metro's operation, 12 additional employees were hired, only 1 of whom had been formerly employed by Brice. It is undisputed that the Metro employees had essentially the same classification and job functions as those at Brice.

Drivers Cadena, Reyes, and Tying; porters Ensey and Franco; salesmen Meier and Ikeda; and Office Supervisor Lee began working for Metro on 1 February. Driver Tying began 2 or 3 days later. Of the 14 persons employed by Metro during its first week of operation who were not former Brice employees, only 2—a salesman and a porter—are still in Metro's employ. Three left during the first week of operation, two by the end of the second week, and three by the end of the month. One left at the end of March and one by mid-April. Of the four employees hired during Metro's second week of operation, two had left within 2 weeks, one had left by March, and one by mid-April. Of the 11 employees hired during the third week of operations, 1 lasted only 1 day, 4 had left by the end of the month, 2 by mid-March, 1 by the end of March, and 3 were still employed at the time of hearing. Of the two employees hired during the fourth week of operation, one had left by the end of the month and one within 2 weeks. Thus, Metro started with an employee complement of mine. Its employee complement was 18 during the first week of operations. There were 20 during the second week; 18 during the third week; and 22 during the fourth week.[10] Throughout this period, only eight of the employees were former Brice employees. By the time of the hearing, according to Ron Fong, Metro's total employee complement had stabilized at approximately 20, roughly the same number employed by Brice—including 4 drivers, 4 repackers, 4 porters, 3 salesmen, and 3 office clericals, Lee, Fong, and Englert.

As to supervision, Lee was employed by Metro on 1 February as office manager, the same position she held at Brice. However, it appears from the record that no other office employees were hired during Metro's first month of operation. Thompson, the night supervisor at Brice, decided not to move to Metro because of the drastic reduction in pay, and a night supervisor was not hired until 25 February when Steven Bazzini started work as night manager. Bazzini left on 14 March and Thompson commenced work as night supervisor on 16 March. According to him, he performed the same job functions at Metro as he had at Brice—overseeing the warehouse operations at night and supervising the porters. His authority over the porters was the same as it had been at Brice. Thompson also testified that he received no instructions to handle anything differently at Metro then at Brice. The only change in the ordering procedure was that the FAX machine was used to transmit information to Englert's home as to items, which needed to be purchased "on the street" so he could go directly to the Golden Gate Produce Terminal to make purchases without first coming to the Metro facility. At Brice, he had to come into the facility to obtain that information. Thompson further testified that although Metro had lost some of the Brice customers, as of March 16, Metro had only one customer who had not been a Brice customer. The forms used were the same except for the name on the headings in the month before Brice closed. According to Thompson, there were five porters and three repackers on his shift. When he worked at Metro, there were four porters and three repackers on his shift.

[6] Englert testified that Luporini refused to sign the necessary papers to change the title because he did not want his wife to learn about it.

[7] Petersen testified that she called the Brice telephone number in early February and got a taped message in Englert's voice, which said, "Hello, this is Brice Brothers. If you'd like to leave your order or message, please leave it at the sound of the tone. Thank you."

[8] This number includes Franklin Tying who did not actually report for work until 2 or 3 days later. However, his name is carried on the payroll as of 1 February.

[9] According to the testimony of Peterson and Thompson, as of the end of January, Respondents' employee complement consisted of five drivers—Harry Barsanti, Arturo Cadena, Willie Reyes, Franklin Tying, and William Singleton; six porters and repackers—Cuco Franco (also known as Joaquin Laines) Liborio Leon (also known as Ballentine), Oscar Canizales, Steve Mosunic, William Prieto, and John Ensey; two salesmen—Arthur Meier and Robert Ikeda; and two office employees—Danette Petersen and Lillian Fenech.

[10] Fong testified that the employee complement during the first week was about 35 employees and remained at that level for about 6 weeks.

Englert testified that he devotes 100 percent of his time to the buying and selling of produce. Lee has total responsibility for the office and Ron Fong has total responsibility for labor matters at Metro. He also testified that he and Fong made the decision about which Brice employees would move over to Metro and that Fong made the decision about wage rates at Metro without any input from Englert. According to him, Fong was retained by Brice as a consultant to assist in the closing of Brice and it was in his position as consultant that he made the determination about wage rates. He admits, however, that he discussed the wage rates with Fong and had to approve them. He then testified that it was Fong's final decision about what the wage rate would be. When questioned further, he testified that he and Fong discussed a wage range but it was Fong's decision about what to do. He admits that he would demand an explanation from Fong if he paid wages outside a certain range. He also admits that he made the determination that employees would not receive benefits for the first 3 months. Further, Thompson testified that when he tried to negotiate an additional 50 cents an hour in pay to compensate for loss of benefits, Fong told him he would have to get approval from Englert.

Fong testified that his responsibilities at Metro have been fairly constant throughout his employ—he seeks job applicants from various sources, reviews the applications, and decides who to hire. He has hired approximately 50 employees and, according to him, the final decision is his. According to him, he comes into the warehouse almost every evening for a half hour to an hour "to look around, talk to people, and watch what's going on." He also functions as a sales representative.[11]

Fong first testified that he discussed general wage ranges with Englert. However, when pressed to testify specifically about that discussion, he testified that they had no discussion. According to him, he would decide on a wage rate and later tell Englert what it was. He admits that he did discuss with Englert a general wage increase he wanted to grant. He also admits that he and Englert agreed on a 2-percent commission for salesmen. He denies that, prior to 1 February, he spoke to any of the former Brice employees or that they were hired prior to 1 February. When questioned how these employees knew to report to work, he testified, "I grabbed one of the list and begged them to come in."

Fong also denied that he and Englert ever discussed what his job would be. According to him he was retained by Brice as a consultant principally to assist Brice in selling equipment. Later Englert asked if he would help with Metro. He agreed and worked as a consultant to Metro for about a month. After about a month, he put himself on the payroll. However, according to Fong, he and Englert never discussed in what way he was to help. Fong testified that he is a self-motivator, so at some point he decided in what way he could be helpful but never shared this decision with Englert. When questioned how he happened to start hiring employees for Metro, Fong testified that when he arrived at the Metro facility on Sunday morning, 1 February, it was totally disorganized. No one was working. No one was scheduled to report to work. So he got out a phone list and started to call everyone he knew with produce-related experience, including former Brice employees. When people came in to work, he had them sign in on a yellow pad. In some instances he discussed the wage rate with the employee and in other instances he did not. If a wage rate was discussed, he wrote it on the yellow pad next to the employee's name. According to him, he only told Englert what the wage rate was when it was time to do payroll.

Franklin Tying denies ever discussing wages with Fong. According to him, on the last day of Brice's operation, Englert asked him to start work for Metro the following day at $9 an hour. After some hesitation, Tying said he would; however, he did not report to work the following day, 1 February. Lee telephoned him and then connected him with Englert who asked why he had not reported to work. Englert asked him to start at 3 a.m. and said that at the end of his shift they would talk seriously about pay.[12] Then Lee got on the phone and gave him the address of the Metro facility and directions for getting there. He heard Englert say something in the background and then Lee said, "By the way, your pay will be $10."

Tying testified that he drove the same truck for Metro on the same route as he had for Brice. On the first day he reported to work, Englert introduced him to Fong and said Fong was Tying's new boss. According to Tying, Fong basically does the hiring. He does not direct employees in the warehouse. On the 5 a.m. shift on which Tying works, Englert directs employees.[13] He has never seen Fong tell drivers what to do insofar as their routes and schedules are concerned. This is done by Englert.

Thompson testified that Fong hired him at $12 an hour with no benefits. When he tried to negotiate an additional 50 cents an hour, Fong said he would have to get Englert's approval. Thompson also testified that although Fong makes out the weekly schedules for drivers and porters he does not actually direct employees in the warehouse.

G. Conclusions Concerning Alter Ego Status

The threshold question here is the relationship between Brice and Metro. The complaint alleges that Metro is a disguised continuance and alter ego of Brice or, in the alternative, that Metro is a successor to Brice. However, the General Counsel's primary theory is alter ego. The controlling law is well established. A determination whether two employers are alter egos, of necessity, must turn on the facts of the particular case. The factors to be considered are: (1) interrelation of operations; (2) common management; and (3) common ownership and centralized control of labor relations. Thus, the [11] This job differs from that of the regular salesmen in that Fong also makes collections and qualifies customers as to credit applications.

[12] Even though Tying's affidavit relates several telephone conversations during this 2-to-3 day period, no reference is made to a direct telephone conversation with Englert. However, Englert does not specifically deny this conversation.

Board has generally found alter ego status where the two enterprises have substantially identical management, business purpose, operation, equipment, customers, and supervision as well as ownership. Crawford Door Sales Co., 226 NLRB 1144 (1976); Denzil S. Alkire, 259 NLRB 1323 (1982); Advance Electric, 268 NLRB 1001 (1984); Mar-Kay Cartage, 277 NLRB 1335 (1985); Super Save, 273 NLRB 20 (1984). No one factor is controlling and all need not be present. Complete identity in ownership is not a requisite, particularly when ownership resides in members of the same family. Crawford Door Sales Co., supra. However, centralized control of labor relations is the most important single factor. J. M. Tanaka Construction v. NLRB, 675 F.2d 1029 (9th Cir. 1982). A further consideration is whether the new company was created "to evade responsibilities under the Act." Fugazy Continental Corp., 265 NLRB 1301 (1982), enfd. 725 F.2d 1416 (D.C. Cir. 1984).

Here, it is clear that Metro has the same business purpose and mode of operation as did Brice. They both engaged in the wholesale distribution of produce in the same geographical area. They both made purchases in the same manner from the same pool of suppliers. Metro continued to use the Brice gasoline credit cards and Metro gas purchases are billed to Brice. In at least one instance, the bill was sent to Brice in care of Metro. For at least several months Metro did not have any of the licenses required by the local, state, and Federal governments. It is immaterial that Metro's facility is larger than, and in a different location from, the Brice facility. They are both warehouse facilities with refrigeration and freezer capacity. They use an identical mode of receiving produce, storing it, and preparing it for and delivering it to customers. Furthermore, this method of operation is not affected in any significant mannner by the fact that Metro is not located within the terminal. The only effect is that certain aspects of the operation, such as buying "shorts," are less convenient. Thus "shorts" are still purchased from within the terminal. The difference is now the purchase of "shorts" requires travel to the terminal. I therefore find that Metro and Brice had a substantially identical business purpose and mode of operation.

The record establishes that when Metro commenced operations it continued without hiatus to service the Brice customers. Indeed, the only customers Metro had were Brice customers. It was only later that Metro lost some of these customers because the quality of produce and the reliability of service were unsatisfactory. Further, it was several months before Metro acquired a new customer and, in obtaining this new customer and identifying potential customers, Metro draws from the same market as did Brice.

Accordingly, I find that Metro and Brice had substantial identical customers. It is undisputed that with the exception of refrigeration and freezer units,[14] Metro utilized the same equipment as had Brice, and because refrigeration and freezer capacity was inadequate for the inventory, some of the produce was stored initially in Brice trucks. Further, the titles and registration on the Brice trucks were not changed to reflect ownership by Metro and the registration of several vehicles was renewed in Brice's name.

Similarly, Brice and Metro had management and supervision, which, though somewhat different, had a substantial thread of commonality and the same person continued in control of labor relations. The record clearly establishes that Englert had dominant responsibility for the management, including labor relations, of Brice. He participated in multiemployer bargaining with the Union and handled labor relations matters with the Union. In fact, he admits to these responsibilities with Brice but claims that he assumed labor relations responsibilities there only because Luporini was not reliable and that at Metro he relinquished all such responsibilities to Ronald Fong.

This contention is not supported by the record. Englert admits he decided not to give employees benefits; it was also his decision to give salesmen 2-percent commission, and he admits he and Fong discussed a wage range prior to a determination of specific wage rates. Further, Respondents' reliance on the testimony of Englert and Fong is misplaced. I found both of them to be evasive, unreliable witnesses who attempted to tailor their testimony so as to downplay Englert's involvement in labor relations matters at Metro. Further, much of their testimony was inherently improbable. Thus, Englert testified that he only decided to open Metro in the last few days of January. Yet, he admits he had been looking for a new warehouse for at least 2 weeks before he had spoken to employees regarding working for his new company and had arranged for telephone installation to commence on 23 January. He testified he did not know the number of employees at Metro, but changed his testimony when asked to explain how he could work with a small complement of employees and not have some idea about the size of the employee complement.

I found Fong's testimony to be highly improbable. Thus, he testified that when Metro opened no employees were working and no employees had been hired. Yet Metro had produce valued at $98,000 in the warehouse and customers were expecting deliveries. I find it incredible that an experienced business person would have failed to hire some employees to handle this produce. I also find incredible Fong's testimony that Englert retained him as a consultant to Metro, yet they never discussed what Englert expected him to do; and his testimony that he had never been given authority by Englert to hire employees, that he was a self-motivator who had arrogated to himself such authority and who could set wages at whatever level he desired even though both he and Englert admitted that some parameters existed. I conclude that the only reason for such testimony was to shroud the truth that Englert had, and exercised, authority over such matters.

Based on the entire record and on my credibility findings, I find that Englert was the dominant voice in labor relations and other management matters at both Brice and Metro. In the circumstances, I find that the only difference in supervision and management between Brice and Metro was that Fong handled many personnel matters and made out the schedule for the drivers. Admittedly, Lee's function was the same. The record does not reveal the identity of a night supervisor until mid-March when Thompson was hired. I credit Thompson that his duties and responsibilities at Metro were the same as they had been at Brice. I found him to be an honest, straightforward witness who impressed me as endeavoring to tell the truth. In these circumstances, I find that Metro's management and supervision are substantially identical to that of Brice.

[14] The Brice refrigeration and freezer units were attached to the walls and included in the sale of the Brice facility.

Respondent argues that Metro and Brice cannot be alter egos because the ownership is different, and because Englert and Luporini negotiated at arm's-length about the dissolution and distribution of assets of Brice. However, as noted above, complete identity in ownership is not a requisite. Further, in these circumstances it is immaterial that negotiations as to the distribution of assets may have been at arm's-length. As found above, Englert was half owner and the dominant force in Brice. He is sole owner and the dominant force in Metro. Thus, there is a substantial continuity in the control of Brice and Metro. Accordingly, I find the ownership of Brice and Metro to be substantially identical for purposes of determining alter ego status.

The remaining consideration is whether Metro was created for legitimate reasons or to evade responsibilities under the Act. Here, the record is clear that the sale of Brice was initially motivated, at least in part, by Luporini's desire to retire and Englert's desire to rid himself of Luporini. However, it is equally as clear that once Luporini's retirement became an imminent possibility, most critical decisions thereafter were heavily influenced by Englert's desire to rid himself of the Union. In this regard, I credit the employee witnesses that for several years Englert had spoken to employees of his desire to get rid of Luporini and the Union and to get out of the Terminal away from his competitors. I also credit Thompson as to his conversations with Englert. Thus in mid-June, Englert told him he was trying to get out of the produce market and away from the Union because he was not making money and would have to do so in order to survive. Englert also told Singleton the new company would be nonunion, that union wages, which he could not afford to pay, were killing him, and that the union health and welfare plan was way out of line. He further said he could not afford to pay the contractual vacation, health and welfare, and pension to Respondents' most senior employee nor could he compete with nonunion employers. This is all indicia of a motivation to evade responsibilities under the Act.

Buttressing this conclusion is the secrecy and deceit with which Englert effected the creation of Metro. Thus, prior to the 15 January notices, he only told a few select employees. He did not inform customers, despite certain indications of customer concern regarding rumors that Brice was closing. Furthermore, Englert and Cooke specifically told Union Representative Rosa that Brice was going out of business and Englert had no intentions of continuing in the business under another name. Also, Englert instructed Thompson to park certain trucks at the Brice facility so it would appear to the Union that Brice had actually gone out of business. In these circumstances, I find that one of the principal motivating factors in the decision to close Brice and open Metro was Englert's desire to evade responsibility under the Act to bargain with the Union and to honor Brice's collective-bargaining agreement. Based on the foregoing, I find that Brice and Metro are alter egos. Mar-Kay Cartage, supra.

H. Conclusions Concerning Alleged Violations

It is undisputed that Metro has never recognized the Union as the collective-bargaining representative of its employees and that it has, at all times, failed to pay wages and benefits required under Brice's collective-bargaining agreement. As I have found that Metro is the alter ego of Brice, it has at all times since 1 February 1987, when it commenced operations, been obligated to bargain with the Union as the collective-bargaining representative of its employees, and to abide by the collective-bargaining agreement between the Union and the San Francisco Produce Association and the Terminal Dealers' Association. Accordingly, I find that by failing to recognize and bargain with the Union and to honor the collective-bargaining agreement, Respondents have violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

The complaint alleges that Respondents violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by refusing to furnish the Union requested information regarding the alleged closure of the Brice facility and the alleged sale and disposition of certain of Brice's assets, capital, and good will. It is undisputed that the Union requested and Respondents refused to furnish such information. Respondents argue that because of the Union's 3 months' delay in requesting the information, it is obvious that the purpose of the request was not to assist the Union in "effects" bargaining, but rather was sought to buttress the Union's claim that Brice was not really closing. Further, Respondents contend the questions asked were an attempt to bargain over the decision to close, which Respondents are not obligated to do. First National Maintenance Corp. v. NLRB, 452 U.S. 666 (1981). I disagree. It is well established that an employer's duty to bargain encompasses an obligation to provide information needed by the collective-bargaining representative of its employees for the proper performance of its duties. NLRB v. Truitt Mfg. Co., 351 U.S. 149 (1956). Here, the information requested clearly related not to a decision to close, but rather to whether Brice was in fact closing or whether the business was continuing through a successor or alter ego. Such information is clearly relevant. Hawg-N-Action, Inc., 268 NLRB 616 (1984).

I also reject Respondents argument that it had no obligation to furnish the requested information because the information sought related to the unfair labor practice charge. In support thereof, Respondents cite American Oil Co., 171 NLRB 1180 (1968). I find that case inapposite. There, the union argued that the payroll records requested were needed in connection with the formulation of union demands in contract negotiations scheduled to commence 3 months later. The administrative Judge found, under the circumstances, that this reason was a pretext and that the union was seeking the information in connection with the pressing of the unfair labor practice proceedings. Accordingly the judge in finding the refusal to furnish the records was not unlawful, concluded (above a 1188): "There are ways to procure relevant evidence in the possession of an adverse party . . . but the '8(a)(5)-request' route is not one of them." Here, the information sought was requested both before and after the filing of this unfair labor practice charge. Further, in view of the "imminent" closing of the Brice facility,[15] the layoff of unit employees, the severance pay negotiations, and the information the Union had indicating that Englert was moving to a new facility, the Union's obvious need for the requested information was immediate. Accordingly, I find that by not furnishing the Union the information sought, and by furnishing misleading information to the Union regarding its intentions to open Metro, Respondents have violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

In view of my crediting employee witnesses about their conversations with Englert, I find that Englert solicited them to abandon the Union and enter into individual employment contracts. I, therefore, find that Respondents bypassed the Union and dealt directly with unit employees in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

As I have found that Metro is an alter ego of Brice created to evade Respondents' responsibilities under the Act, I also find that the Brice employees were terminated on 31 January because they were represented by the Union in an attempt by Respondents to evade their contractual and statutory obligations. Accordingly, I find that they were unlawfully terminated in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

Further, based on the undenied testimony of Petersen, which I credit, I find that Lee's questioning of Petersen on 15 January whether she would go with them to the new facility or stay with the Union was coercive in that it required her to make her union sympathies known and to abandon the Union or be terminated. I, therefore, find that Respondents violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Metro Foods, Inc. and Brice Bros., Inc. are employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Freight Checkers, Clerical Employees and Helpers, Teamsters Local Union No. 856, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL-CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent Metro is the alter ego of Respondent Brice, established for the purpose of evading Respondents' responsibilities under the Act.

4. The following employees of Respondents constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All employees covered by the collective-bargaining agreement between the Union and the San Francisco Produce Association and the Terminal Dealers' Association, effective by its terms from 1 February 1986 to 1 February 1989.

5. At all times material the Union has been the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the appropriate unit set forth above within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

6. Respondents violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by:

(a) Refusing to recognize and bargain with the Union as exclusive representative of its employees in the appropriate unit by refusing to honor the collective-bargaining agreement with respect to such employees, and failing to apply to such employees the terms and conditions of the agreement.

(b) Bypassing the Union and bargaining directly with the employees regarding the terms and conditions of their continued employment.

(c) Refusing to furnish the Union with requested information regarding the alleged closure of Respondents' south San Francisco, California facility, and the alleged sale and disposition of certain of Respondent Brice Bros., Inc.'s assets, capital, and good will, which information is necessary for, and relevant to, the Union's performance of its function as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the unit; and providing the Union with misleading or inaccurate information when responding to certain aspects of the Union's request for information.

7. Respondents violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by terminating the employees in the appropriate unit described above because they were represented by the Union and because they were covered by a collective-bargaining agreement.

8. Respondents violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by coercively interrogating an employee as to union activities and sympathies.

9. The above violations are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondents have violated Section 8(a)(5), (3), and (1) of the Act, I shall order that Respondents cease and desist from engaging in the conduct found unlawful and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that Respondent Metro is the alter ego of Respondent Brice and has continued to operate its business, but has failed and refused to recognize the Union or to apply the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement between the Union and Brice, I shall recommend that Metro recognize and, on request, bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit; that Metro acknowledge that it is bound by the collective-bargaining agreement between the Union and the San Francisco Produce Association and the Terminal Dealers' Association, effective by its terms from 1 February 1986 to 1 February 1989; that it abide by the agreement; and that it make the employees in the appropriate unit whole by paying retroactively the wage rates provided for in its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union and by paying all contractually required contributions to the various trust funds established by the collective-bargaining agreement[16] and by reimbursing employees for any expenses they may have incurred because of Respondents' unlawful failure to make such required payments, as provided in Kraft Plumbing & Heating, 252 NLRB 891 fn. 1 (1980), enfd. 661 F.2d 940 (9th Cir. 1981).

[15] The collective-bargaining agreement provides that it is binding on successors, assigns, etc.

Having found that Respondents unlawfully discharged their employees named below in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act, I shall recommend that Respondents be ordered to offer each of them immediate and full reinstatement to his or her former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his or her seniority or any other right and privilege previously enjoyed, and make each of them whole for any loss of earnings he or she may have suffered by reason of the discrimination against them by payment to them of sums of money equal to that which they normally would have earned absent the discrimination, less net interim earnings during such period, computed on a quarterly basis in the manner established in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest computed as described in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977), and New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1183 (1987). See generally Isis Plumbing & Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

As the unfair labor practices committed by the Respondents are of a character striking at the very heart of the Act, I shall recommend that Respondents be ordered to cease and desist from infringing in any other manner on the rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record,[17] I issue the following recommended[18]

ORDER

The Respondents Metro Foods, Inc., and Brice Bros., Inc., San Francisco, California, their officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to recognize and bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative of its employees in the appropriate unit with respect to wages, hours, working conditions, or other terms and conditions of employment of those employees, refusing to honor the collective-bargaining agreement applicable to those employees, and failing to apply to such employees the terms and conditions of the agreement.

(b) Bypassing the Union and bargaining directly with the employees regarding the terms and conditions of their continued employment.

(c) Refusing to furnish the Union with requested information regarding the alleged closure of Respondents' south San Francisco, California facility, and the alleged sale and disposition of certain of Respondent Brice Bros., Inc.'s assets, capital, and good will, and providing the Union with misleading or inaccurate information in response to such requests.

(d) Discouraging membership in the Union, or any other labor organization, by terminating its employees because they are represented by the Union or any other labor organization, or because they are covered under a collective-bargaining agreement, or by otherwise discriminating against its employees in regard to hire, tenure of employment, or other terms and conditions of employment.

(e) Coercively interrogating their employees about their union activities and sympathies.

(f) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of their rights under Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Recognize Freight Checkers, Clerical Employees and Helpers, Teamsters Local Union No. 856, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America AFL-CIO as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of its employees in the appropriate unit described below and, on request, meet and bargain with the aforesaid Union concerning wages, hours, pension, and welfare benefits, and other terms and conditions of employment; and, if an understanding is reached, embody it in a signed document. The appropriate unit is:

> All employees covered by the collective-bargaining agreement between the Union and the San Francisco Produce Association and the Terminal Dealers' Association, effective by its terms from 1 February 1986 to 1 February 1989.

(b) Acknowledge that it is found by the collective-bargaining agreement between the Union and the San Francisco Produce Association and the Terminal Dealers' Association effective by its terms from 1 February 1986 to

[16] Because the provisions of employee benefit fund agreements are variable and complex, the Board does not provide for interest at a fixed rate on fund payments due as part of a "make-whole" remedy. We, therefore, leave to further proceedings the question of how much interest Respondents must pay into the benefit fund in order to satisfy our "make-whole" remedy. These additional amounts may be determined, depending on the circumstances of each case, by reference to provisions in the documents governing the fund at issue and, where there are no governing provisions, to evidence of any loss directly attributable to the unlawful action, which might include the loss of return on investment of the portion of funds withheld, additional administrative costs, etc., but not collateral losses. See Merryweather Optical Co., 240 NLRB 1213, 1216 fn. 7 (1979).

[18] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

1 February 1989, and abide by the terms of agreement, both retroactively and prospectively.

(c) Make its employees whole by paying retroactively the wage rates provided for in its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union and by paying all contractually required contributions to the various trust funds established by the collective-bargaining agreement and by reimbursing employees for any expenses they may have incurred because of Respondents' unlawful failure to make such required payments.

(d) Offer each of the employees named below immediate and full reinstatement to his or her former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his or her seniority or any other right and privilege previously enjoyed, and make each of them whole for any loss of earnings he or she may have suffered by reason of the discrimination against them in the manner set forth in the remedy section.

(d) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful terminations and notify each of the employees in writing that this has been done and that the terminations will not be used against them in any way.

(e) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(f) Post at its facility in San Francisco, California, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[19] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 20, after being signed by the Respondents' authorized representatives, shall be posted by Respondents immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondents to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(g) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps have been taken to comply.

July 26, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On December 31, 1985, Administrative Law Judge Winifred D. Morio issued the attached decision. The Respondent Employer filed exceptions and a supporting brief, the General Counsel filed a brief in response and a brief in support of the judge's decision, and the Respondent Union filed a memorandum in support of the judge's decision.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions[3] and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Washington Heights-West Harlem-Inwood Mental Health Council, Inc., d/b/a The Council's Center for Problems of Living, New York, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge as to the Union is adopted and the complaint in Case 2-CG-33 is dismissed.

Carole Sobin, Esq. and James Paulsen, Esq., for the General Counsel.

Richard J. Reibstein, Esq. and Ina A. Plotsky, Esq. (Epstein, Becker, Borsody & Green, P.C.), of New York, New York, for Respondent Washington Heights.

Vicki Erenstein, Esq. (Sipser, Weinstock, Harper, Dorn & Leibowitz), of New York, New York, for Respondent Union.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WINIFRED D. MORIO, Administrative Law Judge. These cases were tried on various dates during May, June, July, September, October, November, and December 1984 and January 1985 at New York, New York. The complaints were consolidated by order of the Regional Director for Region 2 on 24 January 1984. The complaint in Case 2-CA-19596, which was issued on 23 January 1984, alleges, in substance, that Washington Heights-West Harlem-Inwood Mental Health Council, Inc., d/b/a The Council's Center for Problems of Living (Employer/Center) discharged and, thereafter, refused to

[1] The Respondent Union's name was changed after the commencement of these proceedings. The caption reflects the Union's name as represented in its memorandum filed with the Board February 25, 1986.

[2] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[3] The judge found, and we agree, that the September 29, 1982 strike was an unfair labor practice strike. The judge further found, applying the doctrine of Mastro Plastics Corp. v. NLRB, 350 U.S. 270 (1956), that the Respondent Union was excused, because of the nature of the strike, from the notice requirement of Sec. 8(g) of the Act. We agree. Hospital Employees District 1199E (CHC Corp.), 229 NLRB 1010 (1977). Although the strike was delayed 1 day from the time originally specified by the Union, we find no basis for concluding that the resultant delay operated to remove the Union's strike from the Mastro Plastics rationale. Finally, the judge found that the Union, in fact, complied with the notice requirement of Sec. 8(g). Having adopted the judge's conclusion that the Union was excused from complying with the notice requirement of Sec. 8(g), we need not pass on the judge's finding of actual compliance.

The judge found that the Respondent Employer refused to meet with the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service for mediation. The judge found this conduct provided another basis for releasing the Respondent Union from its obligation to comply with the notice requirements of Sec. 8(g). Because we adopt the judge's finding that the notice requirement of Sec. 8(g) was excused because the strike was an unfair labor practice strike, we need not pass on this finding regarding the failure to take part in mediation.

At fn. 53 of her decision, the judge relies on an alternative theory concerning the nature of the employees' activity on September 15, 1982, giving rise to the dispute underlying the strike. The judge analyzes this in light of NLRB v. Burnup & Sims, 379 U.S. 21 (1964). We do not rely on this alternative theory.

The Respondent Employer contends that the Regional Director's issuance of, and consolidation of, the complaints deprived it of due process. We have examined the record and have examined carefully the arguments on this matter. We are not persuaded that the substantive or procedural rights of any party were prejudiced by the conduct of this hearing. All parties had notice of the hearing, and of the issues, and had opportunity to present evidence and to cross-examine witnesses. The complaints in this case involved inconsistent theories, which were predicated largely on the same facts. The Regional Director's consolidation of these cases promoted administrative and judicial economy and efficiency.

The Respondent Employer's exception that the complaint in Case 2-CA-19596 is barred by Sec. 10(b) of the Act, insofar as the complaint is predicated on events beyond the 6-month period, is meritless. The predicate facts—the events of September 1982 (including the discharges)—are not remedied by our decision, but merely indicate the nature of the later (April 1983) conduct examined in the complaint.

In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

reinstate its employees who had engaged in a strike on 29 September 1982, which strike was caused or prolonged by unfair labor practices committed by the Center when it discharged certain employees on 17 or 20 September 1982.[1] The complaint in Case 2-CG-33 alleges, in substance, that on or about 16 September 1982 District 1199, National Union of Hospital and Health Care Employees, RWDSU, AFL-CIO (Union) gave written notification to the Center and the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service (FMCS) of its intention to strike and picket on 28 September 1982 at 9 a.m. However, according to the allegation in the complaint, the Union did not commence its strike and did not began its picketing until 29 September 1982 (1 day after the time stated in its written notification) and the Union failed to notify the Center 12 hours prior thereto of its intention to engage in such conduct. The complaint also alleges that, commencing in December 1982 and continuing thereafter, the Union engaged in intermittent picketing and it failed to give written notice to the Center and the FMCS 10 days prior thereto of its intention to engage in such conduct.[2] The Center filed an answer in which it denied that it had violated the Act, and in which it asserted several affirmative defenses, including a defense based on its position that the 11 employees who had been discharged were engaged in unprotected activity. The Union also filed an answer in which it denied that it had violated the Act, and in which it asserted as an affirmative defense that the strike was caused by the Center's unfair labor practices.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after consideration of the briefs filed by the parties, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

The Center, a New York nonprofit membership corporation with its principal office and place of business in New York, New York, is, and has been at all times material, engaged in the operation of a community center providing medical and professional care services for the mentally disabled. Annually, the Center, in the course and conduct of its business operations, derives gross revenue in excess of $500,000 and receives reimbursements valued at in excess of $50,000 from the United States Government under Medicaid and other Federal programs. The parties admit, and I find, that the Center is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act and a health care institution within the meaning of Section 2(14) of the Act. The parties admit, and I find, that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. PRELIMINARY STATEMENT

These cases present an unusual situation, as noted by the Regional Director in the order he issued when he consolidated the cases. Thus, the Regional Director stated, "The Complaints referred to above are in large part mutually inconsistent because the resolution of the central unfair labor practices in both cases are dependent, to a great extent, on credibility resolutions which cannot be properly made at an administrative level." In Case 2-CA-19596 the General Counsel claimed that the Center violated the Act when it discharged and refused to reinstate 34 employees in April 1983 because those employees commenced a strike on 29 September 1982 to protest the unfair labor practices committed by the Center when it discharged 11 employees on 17 or 20 September 1982. The General Counsel also claimed that the Union gave proper notification as required by Section 8(g) of the Act before the strike began on 29 September 1982. However, it was also the position of this General Counsel that although the Center is a health care facility, the Union was not required to notify the Center prior to commencing the strike on 29 September 1982 because the notification requirements of Section 8(g) of the Act are not applicable when employees engage in a strike to protest the unfair labor practices committed by an employer.

However, in Case 2-CG-33 it was the position of the second General Counsel that the strike, which commenced on 29 September 1982, was an economic strike and the Union failed to comply with notification requirements of Section 8(g) of the Act, both with respect to the initial strike and picketing and with respect to the intermittent picketing that occurred after December 1982.

In addition to the confusion caused by these inconsistent positions, the record in this case was complicated by the introduction of testimony concerning the discharges of 11 employees by the Center on 17 or 20 September 1982. Those discharges were the subject of earlier complaints in Cases 2-CA-19132 and 2-CA-19140, which were issued by the Regional Director for Region 2 in January 1983. The issues raised by those complaints, including whether the discharges were violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, were not litigated because the Center executed a settlement agreement that provided for payment of backpay, offers of reinstatement for the 11 employees, and the posting of a notice. During the negotiations for the settlement of Cases 2-CA-19132 and 2-CA-29140, the Union filed the charge in the instant case on 21 April 1983, in which it alleged that the Center had discharged 34 unfair labor practice strikers. The settlement agreement contained both a nonadmission clause and a reservation-of-rights clause. These clauses read as follows:

> 1. Reservation of Rights—The signing of this Agreement shall not preclude the introduction by any party of any evidence contained in Case Nos. 2-CA-19140 or 2-CA-19132 in any forum, in any other proceeding or investigation.

[1] The complaint also stated that if the strike was not found to be an unfair labor practice strike then it was an economic strike, and the Union gave the proper notice.

[2] Motions were made during the hearing to amend the complaint in Case 2-CG-33 to include additional periods of time when the Union engaged in the intermittent picketing. The motion was granted.

> 2. The instant Settlement Agreement outlines only the unfair labor practice charges in Case Nos. 2-CA-19140 and 2-CA-19132 and does not settle any other case currently pending before the Regional Office, the Office of Appeals or the Office of the General Counsel or the Board nor does it constitute a waiver of any claim that any party may have.

Notwithstanding the execution of the settlement agreement, the complaint in Case 2-CA-19596, the instant case, referred to the complaints, which had issued about the discharge of the 11 employees, to the fact that the discharges were in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act and to the settlement agreement entered into with respect to those discharges. As noted, the Center, in its answer to the complaint in the instant case, admitted that it had entered into a settlement agreement with respect to the discharges, but denied that the discharge of the 11 employees constituted an unfair labor practice. Counsel for the Center, in his opening statement, said that he would prove that the 11 employees were discharged for legitimate, nondiscriminatory reasons. However, during the hearing counsel for the Center did not call witnesses to testify concerning the discharge of the 11 employees but he did cross-examine, extensively, the witnesses produced by the General Counsel who testified with respect to those employees. In December 1984, several months after the hearing started, counsel for the Center made a motion to amend the answer with respect to two issues. Counsel, for the first time, contended that the settlement agreement precluded any litigation of matters relating to the discharge of the 11 employees in September 1982. Counsel also stated that some of the 34 employees who had been discharged in April 1983 had engaged in conduct which precluded them from being reinstated. Subsequently, counsel withdrew the contention relating to the alleged misconduct by some of the 34 discharged employees, although advised by the administrative law judge that it was proper to litigate the issue in the unfair labor practice proceeding and not in the backpay proceeding.[3]

V. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

The Union has been the recognized collective-bargaining representative since 1974 for the registered nurses and the professional and technical employees employed by the Center. The most recent written collective-bargaining agreement between the parties covered the period from 1 January 1979 to 31 December 1980. During the period between the expiration of that contract and September 1982 there was no written agreement between the parties, although the parties did reach agreement about wages, and this agreement, apparently, was implemented. Negotiations for a new agreement were scheduled to commence on 16 September 1982.

B. Events Prior to 15 September

Commencing about June 1982,[5] the employees began to have discussions about what they perceived were problems at the Center. The employees drafted a petition to Dr. Clyde Pemberton, the executive director of the Center, about these problems, but the record does not reveal what happened to that petition. However, according to an employee, Olubayo Buchinji, during a staff meeting Dr. Pemberton did ask about the petition and he stated that employees would be discharged for circulating any petition that was critical of the Center. At another point during the summer months, William Hatcher, chairman of the board of the Center, urged the employees to abandon the Union and start their own in-house black union rather than continue their membership in a union that Hatcher considered to be a Jewish union. The employees reported these events to David White, a vice president of the Union, and he wrote to Pemberton and asked him to cease making these statements to the employees. Pemberton and Hatcher did not testify about these events.

[3] Although counsel for the Center contended that the Regional Director did not investigate the allegations of misconduct by some employees, he failed to offer evidence to establish that the issue was raised or that, if raised, an investigation was not conducted.

[4] Bowers was called by the Employer as a witness, although he also testified for the Union on the issue of the intermittent picketing.

David White testified that beginning about July he met with the employees to discuss various problems they had, including the concern of the employees that Pemberton's failure to sign the prior collective-bargaining agreement could result in the termination of their medical benefits.[6] On 2 September, during a union meeting, the employees decided to engage in a series of demonstrations to protest these various grievances. The demonstrations were to be held from noon to 1 p.m. on the first day, from noon to 2 p.m. on the second day, and from noon to 3 p.m. on the third day. The employees also decided to send a 10-day strike notice. However, the strike notice was not sent and the demonstrations were not held between 2 and 15 September.

On 14 September Celeste Gordon, an employee and member of the union negotiating committee, and Irma Quitcon, an employee and union delegate, met with other employees to discuss mutual concerns and they decided that they needed to meet with a union official to discuss their lack of knowledge concerning the negotiations that were scheduled to begin. Gordon contacted White and asked him to meet with the employees, and White agreed to be at the Center at noon to meet with the employees. Management representatives, frequently, had permitted White and other union representatives to meet with employees and had permitted employees to hold union meetings on the premises. These meetings, generally, were held at noon or after 5 p.m. in room 153. According to undisputed testimony given by Quitcon, under a prior administration it had been necessary for employees to request permission, verbally, to use room 153 and permission had been granted if the room was not being used for other functions. Quitcon testified that sometime prior to the events in this case there had been a conflict between two sections of the Center about the use of the room and, thereafter, Dr. Sitgraves had stated that if a group wanted to use the room they would be required to post on the door of the room when the room would be occupied and if such a notice was not posted the room could be used by others. Quitcon did not state that Sitgraves, specifically, referred to the use of the room for union meetings but she, apparently, assumed that the statement included use of the room for such purposes. Quitcon did not state when she checked to see if the room was available, but she claimed that she did check and found that the only meeting scheduled for 15 September was the regular staff meeting in the morning. It is undisputed that no specific permission to use the room for a union meeting was given by any employer representative. It is unclear about when or how the employees became aware that a union meeting was scheduled for 15 September.

C. Events on 15 September

Wednesday, 15 September, was the day when regularly scheduled staff meetings were held and when employees received their paychecks. The staff meeting was held between 9 and 11 a.m. and was attended by members of the bargaining unit and representatives of management, including Pemberton. According to the employees who testified, at the end of the staff meeting an employee announced that the union meeting scheduled for noon would not be held until 2 p.m. It is unclear whether Pemberton was present when this announcement was made. Pemberton did not testify concerning this incident.

White testified that when he realized that he would be unable to be at the Center at noon he called the Center and explained the difficulty. An unidentified employee responded that it would not cause a problem, employees could rearrange their lunch schedules to be present for the meeting at 2 p.m. The record reveals that at that point the Center did not have specific hours for lunch periods or breaktimes, employees took their free periods whenever it was convenient for them to do so.[7] In addition, on alternate Wednesdays the employees were allowed an extra one-half hour to cash their paychecks and there was no set time when they had to use this free time. Gordon, Buchinji, Harris, and de la Torre, unit employees, testified that they used their lunch period to attend the meeting. Thus, Gordon testified that on 15 September, at some point after noon, she took a cab to a nearby bank to cash her check. After she cashed the check, which did not involve more than 15 to 20 minutes, she returned to the Center where she worked until 2 p.m. when she went to the union meeting. Gordon initially testified that she used her lunch hour to attend the meeting. On cross-examination, Gordon conceded that in a note she gave to Pemberton, after she received a disciplinary letter, she told him that she had been at lunch between 1:30 and 3 p.m. on 15 September. Gordon explained that she was entitled to take the 1-1/2 for lunch because she was allowed an hour for lunch and two 15-minute break periods. Buchinji testified that she went to the union meeting between 2 and 3 p.m. and she used her lunch period to attend the meeting, although she admitted that there was a notation in her appointment book that her lunch hour on that day was at 1 p.m. Harris testified that after she left the staff meeting she met with a coworker and discussed with her various problems about parents and family groups. The discussion lasted for about 1-1/2 hours, and she then returned to her own office where she continued to work. Harris claimed that she used her lunch hour to attend the meeting. De la Torre testified that after the staff meeting she cashed her check, and then saw clients until 2 p.m. when she attended the meeting. She admitted that she had a 2:30 p.m. but she claimed that she told the receptionist where she would be in the the patient arrived. This was not an unusual procedure at the Center. The patient did not arrive. De la Torre also claimed that she used her lunch period to the meeting.

[6] There had been some rumors that benefits would cease if Pemberton did not sign some agreement.

[7] On 16 September Pemberton, by memo, advised all supervisory employees that they were "hereby directed to strictly adhere to assigning specific lunch periods to each staff person." In July 1983, supervisory employees were advised that commencing in August 1983 the official lunch hours would be between 12 and 2 p.m.

The union meeting was held at 2 p.m. in room 153 and it was chaired by White. The Center did not call witnesses with respect to this event. White and employees Celeste Gordon, Olubayo Buchinji, Roseanne Harris, and Dora de la Torre did testified and although their testimony varied in some respects they were in agreement about many of the details of the overall event. According to the testimony of the above-named individuals, the meeting began with a discussion about Pemberton's failure to sign the prior contract, the possibility of a loss of employee medical benefits, and the coming negotiations. At some point, the employees decided to ask Pemberton to attend the meeting to ascertain why he had not signed the contract, and White instructed Richard Villa, a union representative, to find Pemberton to ask him to attend the meeting. As Villa left the room, Pemberton entered through another door, asked White what he was doing there, told White to leave, and instructed the employees to return to work. White responded that it was a regular union meeting and that he would leave when the meeting was finished. According to Gordon and Quitcon, the employees attempted to tell Pemberton that they were on their lunch hour, but he refused to listen to them and left the room. Notwithstanding Pemberton's instructions, White claimed that he continued the meeting because he thought permission had been secured to hold the meeting. After Pemberton left, Dr. Charles, the medical director, entered the room, he had a notepad, and he appeared to be taking the names of those employees who were present. Subsequently, Pemberton returned and, according to the employees, they tried again to speak to him but he refused to talk, said the meeting was illegal and that he had a job action on his hands and he left the room. Charles returned and he made a list of the employees present in the room. There is no evidence that there was any discussion about a strike or demonstration during this meeting. According to White, as he was about to conclude the meeting, about 3 p.m., some employees entered the room and said that the timecards had been pulled. White, together with a large number of the employees, went to the second floor to speak with Pemberton about the timecards. Pemberton's office, as well as areas for patients, is on the second floor. White and the 10 employees were stopped in their efforts to see Pemberton by a security guard, and White explained that the employees wanted to speak to Pemberton about the missing timecards. The guard relayed the message but Pemberton refused to meet with anyone but White. White, however, refused to meet Pemberton without an employee being present. According to White, he refused to see Pemberton alone because union policy prohibited the union representatives from meeting with employer representatives without the presence of an employee delegate in order to avoid any claim of a "sell out" to management.

The record does not reveal the exact number of employees who went to the second floor after they discovered that their timecards were missing, although Celeste Gordon estimated that there were about 30 to 40 employees on the second floor. According to Gordon, she had no appointments scheduled for the afternoon of 15 September.[8] On direct examination, Gordon testified that after the union meeting she went to the second floor where she remained for only a few minutes. However, on cross-examination, Gordon admitted that she was on the second floor between 3 and 4 p.m.[9] Buchinji claimed that after the meeting she went to the second floor where she remained for about 10 minutes before she returned to her office to ask the receptionist whether a client, who was scheduled for a 3 p.m. appointment, had arrived. Buchinji was not sure whether it was before or after 3 p.m. when she questioned the receptionist about whether the patient had arrived. Buchinji admitted that when she was told that the patient had not arrived she returned to the second floor, where she remained between 3:15 and 5 p.m., except for two occasions when she left to check about whether the client had arrived. Harris claimed that after she attended the meeting she returned to her office where she worked until 4:30 p.m., her regular quitting time. Harris maintained that she did not go to the second floor and did not know that the timecards had been pulled until she went to clock out and found her card was not in the rack. She went and told her supervisor, Guerrero, about it and she signed a paper to indicate the time she left. De la Torre testified that after the meeting she went to her office, picked up charts, and returned them to the medical records section, which was on the second floor. She then returned to her office on the third floor where she saw Pemberton and Charles who said hello to her. De la Torre admitted that a patient who was scheduled for a 3 p.m. appointment had signed in the patient's logbook at 2:50 p.m., but she did not see that patient. De la Torre claimed that sometime after 3:30 p.m. she was told by a coworker that the timecards had been pulled and she went to the second floor to find out what had happened but she remained there only a few minutes and then she returned to work where she stayed until 5 p.m.

Some of the employees who testified claimed that the employees who assembled on the second floor were orderly when they arrived in the vicinity of Pemberton's office. However, the picture that emerged from the testimony of other employee witnesses and White was that the second floor was a scene of confusion and noise. Employees were milling about, chanting in unison that they wanted their timecards, and demanding to see Pemberton. This state of noise and confusion continued until about 4:45 p.m. when the police advised White and the employees that if they did not leave the premises they would be arrested. White then stood on a chair and directed the employees to leave because their dispute was not with the police but with the Center. The employees then left the premises. At some point, while the events described above were in progress, employer representatives decided to close the doors to the Center. According to White, he viewed the combined actions of the removal of the timecards and the closing of the Center as a lockout. He then instructed his office to send the 10-day strike notice.

[8] Counsel for the Center attempted to establish that Gordon had failed to keep appointments scheduled that day by use of service rendered documents (SRD), which are reports of the employee's daily activities. However, the document was rejected because there were unexplained erasures, cross-outs, etc., on it.

[9] In a note that Gordon sent to Pemberton, dated 20 September, she objected to the amount of time Pemberton had docked from her pay but admitted that he was entitled to dock her for the time between 3 and 4 p.m.

D. The Warnings—16 September

When the employees arrived at work on 16 September, they found that their timecards were not in the rack but there was a notice that directed them to report to the second floor, which they did. When the employees arrived on the second floor they were not permitted to sign in but were told to remain until their names were called. About 9:30 a.m., Charles called the first employee, Lydia Thomas. When Thomas entered the room she was handed a letter, which stated that the employees had engaged in an illegal work stoppage on 15 September, had ignored a direct order to return to work, and that such action in the future might result in their termination, and they were docked for the hours between 2 p.m. and the close of their regular duty. When the other employees became aware of the contents of Thomas' letter, they demanded that Richard Villa accompany them to their meeting with Pemberton. Villa's efforts to attend the next meeting caused a confrontation between Pemberton and Villa, which almost resulted in a physical fight between the two men. After approximately a half-hour, Villa and Ida Newton, an employee and delegate, were allowed to be present when the employees received their disciplinary letters. Approximately 26 employees received these letters at 5-minute intervals and, apparently, each employee was asked to sign a receipt that they had received such a letter which, on advice of the union representative, they refused to do.

Celeste Gordon testified that while she waited for her letter she asked Charles on several occasions to allow her to leave the floor to attend to the children who were her responsibility and Charles refused to allow her to do so. About 10:30 a.m., Gordon was called into Pemberton's office, given a disciplinary letter, and told by Pemberton to leave the floor. Roseanne Harris claimed that she was called into Pemberton's office between 11 and 11:15 a.m., was given a disciplinary letter, and told by Pemberton to return to work. Dora de la Torre stated that she did not receive her letter until about noon. She did not testify that Pemberton told her to return to work but she did admit that she heard Charles about 10:30 a.m. tell employees to return to work, when they received their letters. According to Olubayo Buchinji, she was called to Pemberton's office about noon, where she received a disciplinary letter from Pemberton who asked her to sign it, which she refused to do. Buchinji did not recall that Pemberton told her to return to work. Thus, according to the combined testimony of these employee witnesses, the procedure involving the issuance of these letters commenced about 9:30 a.m. and continued at least until noon on 16 September and at some point during that time the employees were told to return to work when they received their letters.[10]

E. Employees Draft Letter—16 September

On 16 September, after they received the disciplinary letters, some employees drafted a letter of protest to Pemberton about the disciplinary letters that they had received. The only testimony concerning the drafting of this letter was given by Gordon, de la Torre, Buchinji, Harris, and White. According to their testimony, a number of employees went to the first floor of the Center and at some point between 11 a.m. and 2 p.m. they drafted the letter of protest. The record does not disclose the names or numbers of all the employees who engaged in this activity.

Gordon testified that after she received her letter of discipline she went to the nursery, which was her usual workplace. The children in the morning session apparently had been supervised by another employee while Gordon waited for her letter of discipline. It does not appear that there were children in the nursery when Gordon arrived because she testified that she spent some time putting toys away and arranging the room for the afternoon session. Gordon claimed that as she was doing this work Supervisor Orlando Guerrero passed by and observed her in the room. Guerrero did not testify. At some point, after 11 a.m., other employees came to the first floor, where the nursery is located, and they decided to draft a letter to Pemberton to protest the disciplinary letters they had received. Gordon joined the group who were drafting the letter and, according to her, the entire process took only a few minutes. She then went to lunch and later returned to the nursery for the afternoon session. Gordon could not recall who was present when the letter was drafted.

De la Torre claimed that after she received her letter of discipline, around noon, she went to the first floor where she observed that employees were drafting a letter to Pemberton. De la Torre admitted that she remained with the group who were drafting the letter for about 50 minutes. In her testimony, de la Torre claimed that the employees drafted the letter between 1 and 2 p.m. and at that time she was on her lunch hour. However, in an earlier unemployment hearing de la Torre stated that she took her lunch period on that day at 12:20 p.m. and she finished at 1 p.m.

Buchinji stated that after the employees received the disciplinary letters they decided to go to the first floor to discuss what they should do. When they arrived on the first floor, about 12:30 p.m., the employees decided to draft a letter of protest. Buchinji denied that she was involved in drafting the letter, although she admitted that she stayed on the first floor for about 20 minutes. Buchinji could not recall who drafted the letter or the name of any employee, other than Kamala Mottl, who was present when the letter was being drafted, although she stated that the employees who were present were the employees who had received the disciplinary letters that morning. Buchinji claimed that she saw Gordon in the nursery with one of the children while the employees were drafting the letter. She did not recall whether de la Torre, Harris, or Chris Sowley were present. According to Buchinji, she thought the drafting of the letter took about 20 minutes, after which she left and returned to work. Buchinji did not recall if she saw any patients between noon and 1 p.m. but she thought she took her lunch period between 1 and 2 p.m. on that day. Harris testified that after she received her letter of discipline, she returned to work where she assisted Randolph[11] to find the children. At about noon, she joined the employees who were preparing a letter to management and she remained with them for about 10 to 15 minutes. She did not recall Gordon, de la Torre, or Buchinji being in the vicinity when the letter was drafted. After about 10 to 15 minutes, she left, had lunch, and returned to work.

[10] Although counsel for the Center attempted to establish, on cross-examination, that all employees had received their letters by 10:30 a.m., there was no credited testimony offered to support that contention.

According to White, when he came to the Center around noon on 16 September everything appeared to be normal and, in fact, he saw Pemberton and said hello, and Pemberton responded. White testified that he did observe that two employees, who he thought were Kamala Mottl and Chris Sowley, were engaged in writing a letter to Pemberton but he did not observe that any other employees were with them at the time. White testified that although he had "misgivings" about the letter writing, he did not express these feelings to the employees. The evidence fails to reveal that the employees who engaged in this letter writing were noisy, disruptive, or interfered with patient care.

F. Negotiations—16 September

The first negotiation meeting was scheduled for 16 September and, notwithstanding the events of 15 and 16 September, the meeting was held as scheduled at 3 p.m. in room 271 at the Center. An attendance sheet was signed at the start of the meeting, and an examination of that document establishes that the Center was represented by Pemberton, Charles, Sitgraves, and other Center representatives, including Geven Wise, Rosemari Mealy,[12] Thurmon, Myers, and Halif Braithwaite. The Union was represented by White, Villa, two other unidentified union representatives, and employees, Gordon, Newton, Adams, Quitcon, Bowers, and Baptiste. White presented the Union's proposals to Pemberton.[13] However, before the parties discussed the proposals, White requested Pemberton to sign the collective-bargaining agreement, which Pemberton had failed to do, for the period from January 1981 to June 1982. Pemberton refused to discuss that issue on the ground that it was not a proper subject for the present negotiations. White then requested that Pemberton sign an interim agreement in order to allow employees to continue to receive their benefits. There was some discussion about Pemberton's belief that there was some collusion between union representatives and representatives of the fund over the continued payment of benefits. At some point, White asked whether the events of 15 and 16 September could be discussed and Pemberton refused to discuss the matter, contending that the warning letters that had been issued were the result of actions by the board members of the Center and were not a proper subject for the negotiations. The parties then discussed the various union proposals, including the term of the contract, the wages, vacation periods, daycare for children of employees, etc. There was no agreement reached on any issue. Pemberton testified that prior to the meeting he had decided that he would listen to the Union's proposal and not make any specific proposals of his own. At the conclusion of the meeting, White proposed that the parties engage in round-the-clock negotiations, a suggestion rejected by Pemberton because he believed that the Union had delayed the start of the negotiations. The witnesses for the Center claimed that the Union set the date of 22 September for the next meeting and they agreed. The Union's witnesses claim that it was the Center's representatives who set the date and they accepted. In any case, the next meeting was scheduled for 22 September.

As the meeting was about to conclude, Pemberton received notification that the Union had sent the Center a telegram about the start of a strike. The next day the Center received the telegram, which stated that the Union would commence its strike on 28 September 1982 at 9 a.m. This was the only written notification that the Center received.

G. The First Discharges—17 September

Employees worked their usual schedules on 17 September. However, at 5 p.m., when employees went to punch out, some 13 employees discovered that their timecards were not in the rack. These employees went to the second floor where they received letters of termination from Pemberton, Charles, or other managerial representatives. The employees refused to accept these letters because they had not received their paychecks. These letters then were rescinded, but on 20 September when Mary Austen, Olubayo Buchinji, Dora de la Torre, Ingrid del Rosario, Lillian Font, Celeste Gordon, Beverly Gould, Rose Ann Harris, Kamala Mottl, Christopher Sowley, and Lydia Thomas arrived at work they received letters of termination.[14] The letter the employees received stated the following:

> Following your signing into work on September 16, 1982 and your receipt of a warning letter, you were specifically instructed to return to your work station. This you refused to do. Indeed the substantial time which elapsed until you reported to your work station, leads to the determination that you again participated in a work stoppage, that of the a.m. of September 16, 1982.

Other than the statement contained in the letter of termination, employees were not told specifically on 20 September the reason for their discharge. White testified that when he went to the Center on 20 September he asked Pemberton why the 11 employees had been discharged and Pemberton replied that he had discharged those employees who had engaged in work stoppages on two occasions, i.e., on 15 September and on 16 September. The record discloses that the 11 employees who were discharged were on the list prepared by Charles at the union meeting on 15 September.[15] However, the record fails to reveal the basis on which the Center determined that these 11 employees had engaged in a work stoppage on 16 September or when that alleged stoppage had occurred on 16 September.

[12] This name appears in the record with different spellings, but the attendance sheet was signed as noted above.

[13] There was some conflict between Pemberton and Charles over who chaired the meeting and who was the main speaker for the Union. However, it appears that it was White who had the main role for the Union.

[14] It is not clear from the record why the number of discharged employees changed from 13 to 11 between 17 and 20 September.

During the hearing, the parties entered into a stipulation with respect to the reason for the discharge of the 11 employees. The stipulation, in pertinent part, states, "The discharges were in part based upon the warnings which were previously issued to those employees on 16 September 1982, as described above in paragraph 2."[16]

H. The Union Meetings—20 and 21 September

After the discharge of the 11 employees, a union meeting was held at a nearby church. The meeting, which was attended by a substantial number of the bargaining unit employees, was chaired by White and it focused on the discharge of the 11 employees. Although there were some variations in the testimony given by Gordon, Harris, de la Torre, Buchinji, and White, the one fact about which they agreed was that the employees decided to engage in a strike rather than a demonstration and that the discharge of the 11 employees was the reason for this decision.[17] It appears that at this meeting the employees decided that the strike would commence on 28 September.

A second union meeting was held on 21 September, also in the church. At this meeting an employee, Ida Newton, reminded the employees that 29 September was a payday and if they struck on 28 September they might not receive their paychecks. The employees decided to change the day the strike would commence from 28 September to 29 September. It is undisputed that the Union did not give written notification to the Center or FMCS about this change of dates.

I. The Negotiations—22 September

The second negotiation meeting was held, as scheduled, on 22 September in room 271 at the Center. The Center was represented by Pemberton, Charles, Sitgraves, Braithwaite, Mealey, Ansari, and Myers. The Union was represented by White, Adams, Baptiste, Gordon, Bowers, Quitcon, and Newton. Pemberton, Charles, and Sitgraves testified about this event for the Center. White, Adams, Baptiste, Gordon, and Quitcon testified for the Union about the meeting. The meeting lasted for 2 hours. According to Pemberton, the meeting began with a discussion of whether the Center would sign the 1981–1982 contract or an interim agreement and he advised the union representatives again that those issues were not proper subject matters for discussion. He also advised the union representatives that the Center was prepared to continue the employee benefits and he then began to discuss the Union's proposals. He stated that the Center would not agree to the inclusion of a hiring hall clause, but would consider hiring individuals referred by the Union. Pemberton testified that at this meeting he agreed to the concept of a daycare program, to the Union's proposal on severance pay, and he made a counteroffer with respect to the Union's wage proposal. At some point, according to Pemberton, White apologized for what had occurred on 15 September and stated that if he had known that permission to use the room had not been obtained he would have dismissed the meeting. White indicated that if Pemberton had approached him in a less hostile manner he would have ended the meeting, but Pemberton's actions in front of the members had placed White in a difficult position. White then asked Pemberton to reconsider the actions taken by management over the events of 15 and 16 September and Pemberton responded that the decisions made because of those events were decisions by the board, he could not overrule them but he would relay any proposal that White wanted to make about the matter to the board. The union representatives then caucused and when they returned White offered to put in writing his apology about the events of 15 September and he asked when the next meeting could be held. Initially, according to Pemberton, Adams proposed 24 September for the next meeting, but that date was rejected by both Pemberton and White.[18] Adams then proposed 27 September, which White, after checking a black appointment book, rejected.[19] Adams then asked whether 29 September was an acceptable date and, at that point, Quitcon whispered something to Adams. According to Pemberton, he heard the word "strike" mentioned by Quitcon but he did not hear the rest of the conversation. White then said that the Union had given the 10-day strike notice and they were free to strike at the expiration of the 10 days within a 72-hour period. White also said that if the Union did not strike in the 72 hours it would be necessary to give a new notice but that would not pose a problem. Both parties agreed to meet on 29 September. Pemberton denied that either White or any other union representative stated when the strike would occur. He also denied that any union representative used the words, "hit the street."

[16] Although counsel for the Center signed this stipulation, he did so subject to his objection about the introduction of any testimony or evidence pertaining to the termination of the 11 employees in mid-September 1982.

[17] In a telegram sent by White to Pemberton, on 5 October 1982, he stated that the reinstatement of the discharged employees "would open the way to negotiate all issues." Union literature issued after the strike started also referred to the discharges as the reason for the strike.

[18] On 24 September, White did write a letter to Pemberton in which he stated that had he been aware that permission to use the room had not been secured he would not have continued the meeting, and he requested Pemberton to reinstate the "discharged employees because such an action would be a great step toward coming to an understanding between the administration and the Union."

[19] Pemberton, subsequently, testified that the discussion about possible dates occurred among the union representatives, and the Center's representatives were not party to those discussions. He also stated that he did not object to any date.

The testimony given by Sitgraves and Charles about this meeting was substantially the same as the testimony given by Pemberton. Both denied that any union representative stated that the strike would begin on 29 September. Sitgraves recalled that after the union representatives caucused, White said that the Union was free to strike within 72 hours of the 10-day strike notice. According to Charles, after White proposed the date of 29 September there was some "agitation" on the Union's side of the table, someone passed a note to White and White said he knew what he was doing, and they could meet 29 September.

White's testimony about the events on 22 September was similar in many respects to Pemberton's testimony. According to White, Pemberton agreed to the Union's proposal on severance pay and agreed to the concept of a daycare program. White claimed that he asked Pemberton to reconsider the discharge of the employees and Pemberton agreed to discuss the matter with the board members. White explained that he did not know the meeting on 15 September was unauthorized, if he had known he would not have held it. According to White, when the union members heard this statement, they became upset and he asked for a caucus. White went outside with the members and they told him that they had engaged the room as they had in the past and there was no reason why White should apologize to Pemberton. White told the members that if he had to apologize to get the discharged employees reinstated, he would do it. The employees also were upset that White had agreed to meet on 29 September because that was the day the strike was to begin. White told the employees that they had to meet in order to avoid a strike. White testified that when the union members returned to the meeting, he told the Center's representatives that "we have a marriage, that we are here and we are going to stay here." White also claimed that he told the Center's representatives, "If we have not settled the issues that exist between us by the 29th, when the 29th comes we're going to find ourselves on the street." White testified that he did not explain why the date of the strike was changed to 29 September.

Celeste Gordon testified, initially, that after the union members caucused they returned to the meeting and it was at this point that White said that he was unaware that the union delegate had not secured permission to use the room on 15 September and he apologized for the disturbance. White then said that the Center and the Union had to learn to live together, that it was like a marriage, the parties had to work out the details and if they could not work it out, "then we were going to walk on the 29th—we were going to strike Wednesday." On cross-examination, Gordon stated after White apologized for the events of 15 September, the Center's representatives said that the next negotiation meeting should be on 29 September and then the union members caucused to discuss the date suggested by the Center.

According to Irma Quitcon, when the union members returned to the meeting after their caucus, White said that the Center and the union had a marriage, they had to work together, he was willing to work 24 hours a day until the following week and that if within that week they had not reached agreement the Union would strike the following Wednesday. Quitcon claimed that it was the Center's representatives who set 29 September as the next day for negotiations and that when the union members caucused, they discussed whether they could meet because the strike was set for that date and White told them they had to meet with the Center's representatives for negotiations, notwithstanding the possibility of the strike. Quitcon did not recall White looking at a black notebook and she denied that White set the dates for the next meeting or that she conferred with Adams about the dates.

Adams testified that after the parties discussed the Union's proposals, White apologized for the confrontation on 15 September. Adams also claimed that the Center's representatives proposed 29 September for the next negotiation meeting. The union members asked White to caucus because they wanted to express their displeasure to him about his apology. During the caucus, White told the members that he would do anything to get the employees rehired. The group then discussed why White had agreed to meet on 29 September when the strike was set to start on that day and White responded that nothing could interfere with the negotiations. The members then returned to the room and White told the Center's representatives that the Union was not going away. He said they did not want to walk on 29 September, but they would do so if they had to. Adams recalled that White did look at an appointment book but he denied that White conferred with him or Quitcon about the date for the next negotiation session.[20]

Carl Baptiste claimed that at this meeting on 22 September the parties discussed the Union's proposals, and then White spoke about the employees who had been discharged and apologized for the events of 15 September. Baptiste testified that the union members were upset by White's apology and asked for a caucus. During the caucus, White explained that he would do anything he had to do to get the discharged employees reinstated. The union representatives then returned to the meeting and White repeated that he would do everything possible to get the employees rehired. White then told the Center's representatives that the Center and the Union were like a married couple; they had to sit down to iron out their difficulties. At this point, according to Baptiste, White stated that if they worked out their difficulties it would not be necessary to "walk" but if no agreement was reached the Union would have no other choice other than to be on strike on 29 September. Baptiste also testified that it was the Center's representatives who proposed 29 September as the next day for the negotiations.

As noted, Lloyd Bowers was an employee-member of the negotiating team and a representative of the Union at the meeting on 22 September. Bowers was called, initially, as a witness by the Center. Bowers was not asked to testify about what happened at the meeting on 22 September. However, he was asked when he first learned that the Union was going to strike on 29 September. Bowers responded that he secured that information from other employees in the late afternoon on 28 September.[21]

[20] In the affidavit given by Adams in the investigation, Adams stated that he did not recall whether the parties set a date for the next meeting at the meeting of 22 September.

J. Strike Preparations—22 to 27 September

Although Charles claimed that he held individual meetings with coordinators[22] between 22 and 28 September, he did not testify about the details of those meetings. Terri Reid Payne, a project coordinator, testified that on 22 September she attended a regularly scheduled junior management meeting, chaired by Charles, during which there was a general discussion about what coordinators would do in the event of a strike. This meeting was attended by Sitgraves, Braithwaite, and coordinators Norma Burgos, Rose Fabian, Gil Calcano, Lavernne Crumpler, and Marvin Sessions. On direct examination, Payne testified that those present at the meeting discussed who would be available to work in the event of a strike. On cross-examination, Payne claimed the coordinators were told by Charles to bring information about their units to the meeting on 22 September, at some point before the meeting, but she was confused about when or where the coordinators were given these instructions. She also recalled, on cross-examination, that at this meeting Braithwaite stated that the Center would provide transportation for those who wanted to work.

According to testimony given by Sitgraves, on 22 September she attended a regularly scheduled coordinators meeting, which was chaired by Charles. During the meeting, she discussed how her unit would operate if a strike occurred, and the number of staff members who would be available. Sitgraves claimed that she was not given any particular assignment for which she was to be responsible in the event that there was a strike. Someone did mention at this meeting that a notice had been received and that the strike was to commence on 28 September.

Norma Burgos, coordinator of the adult day treatment program, testified that about a week prior to the strike[23] a special meeting was called to decide what arrangements needed to be made in the event of a strike. The meeting was held in the conference room at the Center and Pemberton, Charles, Ana Perira, Thurman Myers, Elizabeth Payne, Marvin Sessions, and Wade were present. Burgos stated others also may have been present at the meeting.[24] The discussion centered around what coverage would be needed in each unit in the event of a strike, who would be available, and what food would be needed. However, according to Burgos, the specific date that the strike was to commence was not mentioned, although because of the strike notice it was anticipated that it would be 28 September.

It was Pemberton's testimony that he held two meetings with members of senior management to discuss preparations for the strike. The first meeting was held on 24 September and the second meeting was held on 27 September. The first meeting was held in room 271, the conference room at the Center, and was attended by Charles, Braithwaite, Elizabeth Payne, acting administrator, and Ana Perira, director of transitional housing. Although Pemberton claimed that copies of a strike plan were distributed at this meeting, other witnesses who testified about the meeting did not refer to that fact and Charles, who was asked about such a plan, denied that a written strike plan was reviewed at the meeting on 24 September and denied that copies of such a plan were made available to those present at the meeting.[25] Pemberton also claimed that at this meeting he designated Braithwaite as strike plan coordinator and he directed the others to refer any questions to Braithwaite and he instructed Braithwaite to secure the names and phone numbers of those employees who would not be on strike. Braithwaite was not called to testify. It was Pemberton's testimony that at this meeting he announced that the strike would commence on 28 September, that staff leaves would be canceled, and that the staff would be required to start work at 8:30 a.m. rather than 9 a.m., the usual starting time.

The most significant change that Pemberton claimed he announced at this meeting concerned the adult day treatment program, which was normally located at the Center. Pemberton testified that he directed that the program be transferred from the Center to the Hudson Hotel and he advised those present that Perira would be in charge of the program. He claimed that he instructed Perira to arrange for the transfer of medical records and medication for the clients to the hotel and he told her to secure a catering service to provide food for the clients at the hotel. According to Charles, the adult day treatment program is a clinical program, normally under the direction of Norma Burgos, who was located at the Center. Burgos was not present at this meeting, allegedly because she was sick on that day. However, it does not appear from this record, that she was advised about the transfer of this program, nor does it appear that others on her staff were at the meeting or advised of the transfer. Perira was in charge of the transitional program and in that capacity she was responsible for the housing program, which, according to Charles, was not a clinical program. Perira, in her capacity as head of the transitional program, prior to the events in this case, spent part of her time at the Hudson Hotel.

The second meeting, Pemberton testified, was held in his office on 27 September. Present at this meeting were Charles, Braithwaite, and Elizabeth Payne. During the meeting, Braithwaite advised Pemberton that he had not completed the list of employees' names and phone numbers and Pemberton instructed him to finish the process. There was some discussion about the possibility of moving some units from the fourth to the first floor of the Center and about having all phones ring on the first floor. Pemberton directed Braithwaite to contact the phone company to make the necessary arrangements.

[21] Bowers returned to work after being on strike for several months.

[24] On cross-examination, Burgos recalled that Braithwaite was present at the meeting and she thought that he was designated strike coordinator.

[25] Charles did testify that prior to the meeting on 24 September he personally reviewed a strike plan, which he had in his files and which had been prepared for an earlier strike.

Charles' recollection of these meetings differed in some respects from the testimony given by Pemberton. Charles testified that the meeting held on 24 September was a joint meeting with senior management members, Pemberton, Braithwaite, Sitgraves, Mealy, Perira, and Guerrero, and coordinators Myers, Burgos, and Dr. Jiminez in attendance. Pemberton chaired the meeting and he announced that the meeting was being held because of the strike that was scheduled to begin on 28 September. However, as noted, Charles did not recall any mention about a strike plan. Pemberton announced at the outset that staff members would have to be assigned to different posts to ensure that the Center would continue to operate. The group decided that children in the child care program would enter the building through the basement to avoid potential danger and that it would be the responsibility of senior staff to supervise the classrooms. In addition, the group agreed that the adult day treatment program and the staff responsible for it would be transferred to the Hudson Hotel, and catering services would be contacted to provide food at the hotel for the clients. There were also discussions about where pickup points should be located for nonstriking employees.

Charles did not recall a meeting held in Pemberton's office, which was attended by only Pemberton, Charles, Braithwaite, and Payne. However, he did recall a meeting on 27 September that was held in the conference room and was attended by the same people who had been at the meeting on 24 September. At this meeting, individuals reported on their progress with respect to the duties that had been assigned to them at the earlier meeting. Braithwaite reported about the employee list that he was preparing, Guerrero explained about his contacts with various ambulette services, and Sitgraves discussed her investigation into the availability of catering services.

It was Sitgraves' testimony that she attended a meeting that took place on 24 September at which Pemberton, Charles, and coordinators Sessions, Myers, Mealy, and Guerrero were present. During this meeting, Sitgraves discussed how her unit would operate, about the management of Guerrero's unit, which she supervised, and about contacting parents to assure them that the daycare program would be in operation. During this meeting, those present were told that the strike was expected to commence on 28 September. Sitgraves did not testify that during this meeting plans were made to transfer the adult daycare program to the Hudson Hotel, nor did she testify that Pemberton discussed a strike plan or reviewed such a plan with those who were present. Sitgraves claimed that at this meeting she was given the assignment of contacting catering services to provide food for the staff who would be transferred to the hotel. However, she did not contact catering services because she claimed that she was not given information beyond the meeting of 24 September "as to a strike being more imminent and our needing to have food brought in for that day, so I didn't contact them."[26]

Ana Perira testified that she attended a meeting on 24 September at which Pemberton, Charles, Braithwaite, and Elizabeth Payne were present and during which Pemberton told the group that there would be a strike the following week. At the meeting, Pemberton decided that the adult day treatment program would be transferred from the Center to the Hudson Hotel and be under her supervision. She was instructed to arrange for the transfer to the hotel of the records and medication for those patients in the program and told also to make arrangements for food to be delivered to the hotel for the patients. Perira testified that Pemberton instructed that these changes be completed by 28 September but she was not told during the meeting when the strike would start.

Elizabeth Payne, who was acting administrator at the time of these events,[27] testified that she was unaware of any specific preparations or plans that were made for the strike before it started. Payne stated that on the Tuesday before the strike started, at a regularly scheduled management meeting, there was a general discussion based on what had happened in an earlier strike, that supervisors would be responsible for the duties of employees who were on strike. She was also present on the next day for part of a regularly scheduled meeting for coordinators during which there was a general discussion about what had happened in an earlier strike. Payne denied that she attended any meeting where Pemberton appointed Braithwaite as strike plan coordinator or where he requested Braithwaite to make a list of the names and telephone numbers of nonstriking employees. Payne also denied that she was present at any meeting before the strike started at which Pemberton reviewed a written strike plan or distributed copies of such a plan. In fact, according to Payne, if such plans were distributed it would have been her job, as acting administrator, to make the distribution. In response to a question whether there was a written strike plan, Payne replied, "To the best of my recollection there was something from a previous strike, but I don't recall anything from this strike and I wasn't present at the first strike." Payne also testified that there had been no discussion at any meeting at which she was present, before the strike started, about the transfer of the day treatment program to the Hudson Hotel or about the need to secure a catering service. It was Payne's testimony that the first meeting that she attended where plans for the strike were discussed occurred 1 week after the strike started.

According to Perira, after Pemberton's instructions to her about the transfer of the adult treatment program, she had a meeting with Terri Payne, project coordinator, and Marla Delgado and Pam Pannell, assistant project coordinators, on 27 September. Perira claimed that during this meeting she discussed with Payne, Delgado, and Pannell the transfer of the adult day treatment program to the Hudson Hotel and she instructed Payne and Delgado to call those clients in the Supportive Living Program to tell them to report to the hotel, rather than to the Center, on the following day. Perira also told the staff to make certain that medications of those patients who were to be transferred were current and that there was sufficient medication. According to Perira, she directed Payne to arrange for food to be at the hotel for the clients and to have files and chairs transferred to the hotel and to rearrange staff schedules to provide sufficient daytime coverage.

[26] Sitgraves testified that she was not convinced in her mind that there was going to be a strike.

[27] Payne was not employed by the Center at the time of the hearing. It appears that she had been discharged.

Payne testified that on 27 September, about 2 p.m., she attended a meeting with Perira, Delgado, and Pannell during which Perira advised them that the adult treatment program was to be transferred to the Hudson Hotel. During the meeting, Perira told Payne to instruct Delgado and Pannell concerning their duties in the event a strike occurred and told her also "to look into food preparation for the day treatment program that was going to be moved to the Hudson residence." At this meeting, Payne then instructed Delgado and Pannell to change their schedules and to begin work the following day at 9 a.m., rather than noon, to contact clients and tell them to go to the Hudson Hotel, to check clients' medications to determine if they were current, and to arrange to have chairs transferred to the hotel.[28] Payne admitted that she "did not take any steps in terms of the food preparation."

According to Pannell, on 27 September at a meeting with Perira, Payne, and Delgado,[29] she was told to contact clients to tell them to report to the Hudson Hotel the following day. She also was instructed to transfer clients' files and chairs to the hotel and, after the meeting, she had a member of the staff make the transfer of the files and chairs and she called about 15 clients and told them that because a strike was expected the adult day treatment program was being transferred to the hotel on the following day.

K. Pemberton and FMCS—27 September

On either 17 or 24 September, but after the strike notice had been sent, Herbert Robinson, a commissioner with the FMCS, went to the Center and attempted to meet with Pemberton. However, Pemberton refused to meet with the mediator, according to Pemberton, because it was his opinion that Robinson had not helped when the Center requested his assistance to resolve an issue about a wage dispute that existed between the parties. On 22 September, Robinson forwarded telegrams to both the Center and the Union requesting their presence at a meeting with the mediator on 27 September at 11 a.m. On 24 September, Pemberton responded that he could not attend because he had a prior commitment and because the notice had not allowed him sufficient time to appear. In fact, although Pemberton claimed that he was away from the premises at some point in that day, the record reveals that he was at the Center for at least some period of time during the morning of 27 September and after 1:30 p.m. in the afternoon. Pemberton did not suggest that the parties meet with the mediators at another time on that day or any other day. According to Pemberton, he had decided not to meet with the mediators because he did not believe there then existed a need for mediation. The union representatives, apparently, unaware that Pemberton had refused to come to the meeting, were present for the meeting at the mediators' office on 27 September.

L. The Center—The Hudson Hotel

At the time of the events in the instant case, the Center operated a transitional housing program, which appears to have been funded by the Office of Mental Health of the City of New York. The purpose of the program was to prepare individuals who had been institutionalized in mental institutions for some time for a return to living in the community. The program was divided into two major parts, under one part, the Supervised Living Program, clients who came directly from the institutions were housed at the Hudson Hotel and were under 24 hours' direct supervision by staff members of the Center. As the clients progressed they were transferred to the second part, the Supportive Living Program, where the time of direct supervision by the staff was reduced to 8 hours a day and where the clients resided in apartments or with their families at various locations in the community.[30]

Patients in both programs reported to the Center for the adult day treatment program, which was under the direction of Norma Burgos and which occurred between 9 a.m. and 3:30 p.m. After the completion of the program, the clients in the 24-hour supervised program returned to the Hudson Hotel, which was their residence, while those in the 8-hour supervised program returned to apartments in the community.

The record establishes that prior to 28 September, the Center had for some time operated a number of programs at the Hudson Hotel. In July 1982, the Center received certification from the State to operate a community resident program at the hotel and since about that time negotiations had been in progress between the Center and the city for the Center to assume the entire management and operation of the hotel to commence on 28 September. Perira testified that in anticipation of the Center's assumption of responsibility for the operation of the hotel, sometime prior to 28 September, she had hired a manager, security guard, secretary, and handyman.

Pemberton testified that on 20 September he spoke with a Donald Powell[31] about the possibility of employment with the Center. According to Pemberton, Powell was notified on 20 September that "he was to come aboard as an employee of the Center effective Tuesday, the 28th."[32] When asked why Powell was hired, Pemberton stated the following:

[28] Payne testified that she directed Delgado and Pannell to check the clients' medication with Dr. Ford because he was present at the Center on Mondays.

[29] Delgado did not testify.

[30] It appears that some clients in this program were tenants in apartments in the hotel.

[32] Pemberton claimed that he spoke to Powell again on 24 September but he did not disclose the details of that conversation, other than to indicate that it concerned Powell's employment with the Center.

> Mr. Powell was being hired along with about six other employees of the Bronx Psychiatric Center to provide coverage to the Adult Day Treatment and Transitional Housing Programs. To escort patients from the apartment program, the Supportive Living Program, to the Hudson Hotel in the event that there was difficulty in the patients getting from apartments to the Hudson Hotel.

On 27 September, Pemberton introduced Powell to Perira and told Perira that Powell would be coordinating the new staff to be hired from the Bronx Psychiatric Center and that he should be at the Hudson Hotel the following day. Pemberton advised Powell that he would report to Perira who was the director of the unit. Perira indicated that Pemberton told her in this conversation on 27 September that Powell was hired to assist her with the community residence program during the strike.

M. Events of 28 September

Perira testified that beginning about the time when the Center began operating the residency program at the Hudson Hotel, in July, it was her custom to stop at the hotel before she went to the Center and in anticipation of the takeover of the management of the hotel she had been in the habit of arriving early at the hotel. On 28 September, she arrived at the hotel at 8:15 a.m. and she observed Pemberton's car outside the hotel. It is unclear from the record whether Perira had expected Pemberton to be at the hotel. When she went upstairs she met Pemberton who introduced her "to a group of fellows who had come from Bronx State who were going to assist me in carrying out the—maintaining the community resident program." Perira claimed that at the time she observed staff members directing clients to the north wing of the hotel. These clients, who Perira claimed had been advised to either stay at the hotel or to come to the hotel on 28 September for the treatment program, included not only those in the Supervised Living Program but also those clients who were in the Supportive Living Program.[33] Perira claimed that about 9:15 a.m. on 28 September she received a phone call and as a result of that call she told the staff that the clients could return to the Center because there was not going to be a strike. The adult day treatment program was then conducted at the Center on both 28 and 29 September.[34] Perira returned to the Center after 9:15 a.m. and began to make arrangements for the transfer of the management of the hotel from the existing operators to the Center.

Pannello, who was a member of Perira's staff, also recalled that she saw clients from the adult day treatment program who were in the Supportive Living Program at the hotel on the morning of 28 September, but she also could not recall the name of any client. Terri Reid Payne claimed that when she went to the Center on the morning of 28 September, around 9 a.m., she saw no evidence of a strike and she called the hotel, spoke to Perira, and told her that it did not appear that there was going to be a strike. Payne remained at the Center.

Pemberton claimed that on 28 September, about 7:30 a.m., he went to the Center, drove around the Center, and then went to his office where he remained for about 45 minutes. He then left the Center and proceeded to the Hudson Hotel where he met Powell and three or four other new employees. He awaited the arrival of Perira and when she arrived he introduced her to the new employees. Pemberton testified that during the time that he was at the hotel he did observe clients but only those clients who were residents of the hotel.

Although as noted Perira and Pannell testified that on the morning of 28 September they saw clients at the hotel who were in the Supportive Living Program and who, therefore, normally would not be at the hotel, they admitted that they could not recall the names of any of these individuals. Their testimony about this issue is in conflict with that of Charles. Charles, in response to a question whether patients in the adult treatment program who were not residents of the hotel came to the hotel on 28 September, responded:

> That's not precise. That's not correct. I would have to change part of that statement to indicate that its occasion in October, Friday the 1st of October when we first began taking patients over.

N. Conversations Regarding the Strike

Several employees testified about alleged conversations they had with their supervisors about the strike. Marie Font, a mental health worker whose supervisor was Norma Burgos, testified that on 23 September, after a strike vote had been taken, she had a conversation with Burgos. During the conversation, Burgos asked her what had happened at the meeting and she told Burgos that the employees had voted to strike. On the following day, when Font was in Burgos' office, Burgos told her to bring her notes up to date before she went on strike on 29 September. During a staff meeting on 28 September, in the presence of Gabriel Mack and Allen Anderson,[35] Burgos asked Font not to discuss the strike with the clients. Later that day, according to Font, as she was leaving work with two employees, Colinet and Naut, Burgos told the group that she would see them in a few months. Burgos admitted that during the week before the strike started the members of her staff worked on records in an effort to bring them up to date. However, she denied that she directed her staff members to do this. She also denied that she had a conversation with Font about the strike or that she told Font, Colinet, or Naut on 28 September that she would see them in a few months.

Mercedes Colinet, a clerk typist, testified that her supervisors, Norma Burgos and Rose Fabian, the clerical coordinator, spoke to her about the strike. According to Colinet, on 28 September, at some point between 1 and 3 p.m., Fabian told her that the Center would provide transportation for those employees who wanted to work, but Colinet told Fabian that she was going to strike. On 28 September Burgos also asked her for her keys and told her that she wanted them because Colinet was going on strike the next day. Burgos then told Colinet, Marie Font, and Marie Naut that she would see them in a few months. Colinet claimed that on 28 September there was general talk about the strike starting the next day. Fabian did not testify and Burgos denied that she asked Colinet for her keys or told her that she would see her in a few months.

[33] Perira could not recall the names of any of the clients who were in the Supportive Living Program who came to the Hudson Hotel on 28 September.

[34] According to Perira, at some point after 29 September the Center began to operate a treatment program at the hotel. This was a new program for clients with an acute illness as opposed to those who were considered chronically ill.

[35] The record established that Mack and Anderson were on Burgos' staff. They were not called to testify.

Audrey Singleton, who was purchasing agent at the time of the relevant events,[36] testified that on 28 September Mary Brown, who was her supervisor, called her to her office before lunch and at that time they had a conversation about the strike. During the conversation, Brown asked Singleton for the keys to her desk and told her to leave her bank because she knew the employees were going to strike the next day. Singleton claimed that she also had a conversation with Elizabeth Payne, the acting administrator, on 28 September. During this conversation, Payne asked Singleton whether she was going to strike the following day and when Singleton replied that she was going to strike, Payne told her that she did not have to strike and she showed Singleton an article in the New York Times that explained that employees did not have to join a strike called by a union. Payne also advised Singleton that the Center would provide buses for those employees who did not strike and she told Singleton the locations where the employees could meet the buses. Brown did not testify and Payne denied that she spoke to any employee on 28 September about the strike.

Azeeza Hurston, who was evening registrar at the time of the events in this case, testified that at the end of the day on 28 September when she turned in her papers to Elizabeth Payne, as was her usual practice, Payne told her that the people who did not come to work on the following day would be fired. Payne expressed the hope that Hurston would not be one of the employees who did not report to work. Hurston replied that management had put her in the unit and, although she had not voted to strike, she would strike the next day. That night Hurston received a call from Mary Brown, who was her supervisor. Brown told Hurston that she knew that Hurston did not want to strike and the Center was prepared to provide bus service for her. Hurston rejected the offer. As noted, Brown did not testify and Payne denied that she spoke to any employee on 28 September about the strike.

O. Security—The Picketing

Security services for the Center are supplied by the New York City Health and Hospital Corporation. Lieutenant Theodore Beasley, who has been employed by that corporation since 1963, was in charge of the security services at the Center. On 16 September, Pemberton notified Beasley that the Center was to be on strike alert and that the alert was to become effective on 20 September. According to Pemberton, he made the decision to put the Center on strike alert because he was about to discharge those employees who he thought had engaged in work stoppages on 15 and 16 September and he anticipated that there would be problems. Pemberton spoke to Beasley about the strike again on 24 September but he denied that in that conversation or any other conversation he told Beasley that the strike was to commence on 29 September.

Beasley testified that at the Center there are three tours of duty; the first tour is from midnight to 0800, the second from 0730 to 1530, the third from 1530 to 2400 hours. There are three security officers on duty on the first tour and four officers on the second and third tours and the officers, on a rotating basis, make entries in a logbook which is maintained in accordance with regulations of the Health and Hospital Corporation. It was Beasley's responsibility, at the time of the events in this case, to see that the logbook was maintained and that security conditions and other events that occurred at the Center were entered into this book. According to Beasley, when Pemberton advised him to put the Center on strike alert he spoke to all the security officers about the possibility of a strike and he instructed them to make entries in the logbook about the number of pickets, when the picketing began, and what the pickets did while at the Center. Despite these instructions, Beasley admitted that on several occasions, he was not certain how often[37] the officers failed to make entries about the presence of pickets at the Center when, in fact, they had been present. Beasley testified that on some occasions he failed also to record in the logbook the presence of pickets at the Center. The logbook was not corrected in either situation. The record also establishes that not all entries in the logbook were made on the basis of firsthand knowledge by the officer who made the entry and that the officer who was at post 1, where the logbook was maintained, could not see the vehicular traffic entrance from that post. Beasley did not have an independent recollection about the presence or absence of pickets at any point between September 1982 and August 1983, but relied rather on entries made in the logbook on that issue.

An examination of the logbook establishes that Beasley was on duty on the first tour on 28 September. On that tour, and on subsequent tours on that day, there were the usual number of officers on duty for each tour. Additional officers were not added and officers on duty were not required to work overtime. An entry made in the logbook on 28 September, about 5 p.m., notes, "Mr. Cavin Allen, the field representative,[38] called in reference to the strike 9/29/82, Wednesday." The entries made on 29 September, unlike the entries made on 28 September, establish that additional officers were on duty on 29 September. Thus, according to an entry in the logbook, there were six officers rather than the usual four officers on duty for the tour that began at 7:30 a.m. and the logbook contains the notation next to their names, "emergency standby."

[37] He thought it might not have occurred more than 10 times.

[38] Allen was a representative for the Health and Hospital Corporation.

It is the position of the General Counsel that the fact that the logbook does not contain references to the pickets for certain periods of time proves that the pickets did not engage in continuous picketing, but rather engaged in intermittent picketing and, when so engaged, they failed to give the proper notification. The following are the periods when the General Counsel contends that the pickets were not present at the Center:

December 16 through December 23, inclusive
December 29 through January 3, inclusive

1983

January 5 through January 27, inclusive
January 19 through February 11, inclusive
February 21 through February 24, inclusive
February 28 through March 14, inclusive
March 16 through April 25, inclusive
April 29 through May 11, inclusive
May 16 through May 18, inclusive
June 23 through June 27, inclusive
June 29 through July 28, inclusive
August 3 through August 5, inclusive
August 17 through August 19, inclusive

It is undisputed that the picketing, which commenced on 29 September, was continuous from that day through 16 December. An examination of the logbook reveals that there were several days in that period when no entries were made about the presence of pickets. Thus, on 29 September there is the following entry, "Tour #1 relieved but remaining on duty due to strike." There is no reference in any entry made on that day, the first day of the strike, about the presence of pickets. Although there is an entry on 1 October about strike conditions "being on," there is no reference to the presence of pickets. Furthermore, there is no reference about the strike or pickets in the entries made on 2, 3, 4, 6, and 9 October. A similar situation exists with respect to other days in October and November. The entry for 1 December states that a police officer was present at the picket line.[39] Although there is no mention whether pickets were present, there is the possibility that they were because the police were present. The entry for 3 December states that no demonstrators were present; however, at some point on that day Brathwaite called and requested the police who had left to return to the Center. The log entry does not state that pickets were present but again an inference can be drawn that they were present because of Brathwaite's request for the police to return to the site. The first entry for 6 December states that no demonstrators were present, however, later entries indicate that there were communications between the Center and the police department about whether police could be made available for duty at the Center. There are three entries for 7 December, none refer specifically to the presence or absence of pickets but one entry does state that the police were removed after consultation with Pemberton. The entries for 8, 9, and 10 December also do not refer to the presence or absence of the pickets but they do contain references to the presence of police at the site. The first time that pickets are mentioned in the first 2 weeks of December is on 13 December, and the entry on that date states, "the 'pickets' have arrived (4) pickets."

In the period between 16 and 23 December, when the General Counsel contends there were no pickets at the site, the log entries establish the following facts. The entries for 16, 17, 20, 21, and 22 December state that police were present at the site, they do not mention whether pickets were present or absent. However, the entry for 17 December refers to the police being on duty at the picket line and at another point on that date it states that there were two police officers "who were on strike patrol." Thus, the entries for the period from 16 through 22 December are similar to the entries made in October, November, and the first 2 weeks of December when the General Counsel does not dispute that pickets were present. In both the period before 16 December and the period thereafter, although there is no mention about the presence of pickets there, are references to the presence of the police at the site.

The second period when the General Counsel contends that pickets were not present at the site is from 29 December 1982 through 3 January 1983. The logbook for that period does not state that pickets were present but it does state that police were present at the site on 29 and 30 December. In the entry for 3 January, the officer noted that there were no police or pickets at the site.

The log entries for the period between 5 and 17 January, a period when allegedly there were also no pickets at the site, establishes these facts. There is no reference to either the police or the pickets in the entries for 5 January; the entry for 6 January states that the police made a check on strike conditions and on 7 January the entry states that there were no police or pickets present at the site. There is no reference to the police or pickets in the entries made between 7 and 17 January. On 18 January, the logbook contains a notation that there were 10 demonstrators on the picket line.

In the period between 19 January and the end of April, the logbook contains several references to the police and/or the strike. On 25 January there is a notation that the police called the check on strike conditions; on 2 February there is an entry that Beasley was instructed to allow all strikers, except those who had been discharged, to enter the building; on 11 February the logbook contains the statement that the Union was planning a demonstration on 14 February, and on 14 February; there is another reference to a union demonstration. A later entry for that day contains the statement that a union rally was going on; on 15 February there is a notation that the police had called to report about the possibility of another demonstration and there is a reference to the police being "on patrol for the strikers"; on 16 February there is another notation about demonstrators being on the picket line and about the police being present; on 18 February there is a notation that five demonstrators were walking the picket line; on 14 February the logbook contains a reference to police officers being present at the Center but it is unclear if they are present because of the strike;[40] on 25 February there is an entry about strikers walking the picket line; on 16 March there is an entry about strike walkers putting up a picket line and walking the line; on 26 April there is an entry that states that Pemberton directed Beasley to call the police to ask them to clear pickets from the main gate; on that day there is also a notation about demonstrators at the main gate; and later on that day there is a notation that six demonstrators were walking the picket line, on 28 April there is a notation that 10 demonstrators were at the main gate. In the period between the end of April and 11 May, there are no entries about police or pickets being at the site, but there are references about the union demonstrators in the entries made on 12, 13, 19, 20, 24, 26, 27, and 31 May. There are also references to the presence of strikers/or demonstrators in the entries made for 2, 3, 6, 7, 9, 10, 15, 16, 19, 20, 22, and 28 June; 29 July, 2, 8, 9, 10, 11, 16, 10 22, 23, and 26 August.

It was the position of the Union that the picketing was continuous throughout and in support of that position it submitted documentary evidence in the form of attendance and lunch money sheets, the testimony of Edward Lane, a union representative,[41] and the testimony of employees Lloyd Bowers, Audrey Singleton, Kamala Mottl, Mary Pearl Taylor, Mary Harviley, and Mercedes Colinet.

According to White, the Union maintained attendance sheets either at the strike headquarters located near the Center or at times at the picket line. Strikers were required to sign these sheets before they commenced picketing, although at times strikers signed them at various times during the day when they picketed. It was the responsibility of the strike committee and the organizers to see that these sheets were signed. Strikers were also required to sign sheets when they received lunch money on the day they picketed.

Lane testified that he went to the strike headquarters "each and every day" except Christmas Day. According to Lane, initially he had not been in charge of the strike headquarters but beginning in December he assumed responsibility for the headquarters and when he took charge he posted the attendance sheets on the walls of the strike headquarters and he directed the strikers to sign these sheets. He also required strikers who received lunch money to sign the list maintained for that purpose. Lane claimed that he picketed every day that he went to the headquarters through August 1983 and he picketed on an average of 5 hours a day. Lane also claimed that at times he was the only person picketing, but this occurred in early morning and as the day progressed other strikers joined him. A comparison of the days when the General Counsel contends there were no pickets and the days when Lane's name appears on the attendance sheet establishes the following:

Alleged Absences of Pickets	Lane's Name on Attendance Sheet
16 to 23 December	16, 17, 20–23 December
29 to 3 January	29 and 30 December
5 to 17 January	2, 5, and 14 January
19 January to 11 February	21, 24–28, and 31 January; 1, 2, 3, 7–9, and 19 February
21 to 24 February	22–24 February
28 February to 14 March	1–4 and 7–11 March
16 March to 25 April	16–18, 21–25, and 28–30 March; 5–8, 20, 22, and 25 April
29 April to 11 May	29 April; 3, 5, 9–11 May
16 May to 18 May	None
23 to 27 June	23, 24, and 27 June
29 June to 28 July	29 and 30 June; 1, 5–8, 11–15, 19–21, and 25–27 July
3 to 5 August	3–5 August
17–19 August	17–19 August

Bowers testified that when he picketed he signed the attendance sheet at the strike headquarters. According to Bowers, the Union paid the strikers a weekly allowance and therefore the strikers were required to sign when they picketed. An examination of these sign-in sheets establishes that Bowers signed in on the 21, 22, 23, and 29 December and on 5, 14, 25, and 26 January.[42]

Kamala Mottl picketed until May 1983 when she returned to work. Mottl claimed that she picketed every day between September 1982 and May 1983 for about 3 or 4 hours a day. She testified that usually she picketed early in the day but she also picketed in the afternoon and evenings. She claimed that she picketed every day that she signed the list for lunch money, however, there were times when she picketed but did not sign the attendance sheet. According to Mottl, after she returned to work in May she observed pickets every day at the Center and after work she would be at the strike headquarters to lend support to those on strike. Mottl testified that at times there were many pickets at the picket line and at other times there were only one or two pickets. Mottl claimed that there were a few occasions when she was the only picket. According to Mottl, the employees picketed on a continuous basis and although she claimed that she usually carried a sign when she picketed, she admitted that not all those who picketed carried signs.

Mottl signed the attendance sheets on 20–23 and 29–30 December; 14, 15, 25, and 26 January; 1–3, 14, 16, 18, 23, and 24 February, 1, 2, 4, 9, 15, 17, 18, 22–25, and 28 March; 5 and 20 April; and 3, 13, and 25–27 May. Her name appears on the lunch money list on 3, 7, 10, 11, 18, and 19 January, and 12 April.

Mary Pearl Taylor, who also was a striker, testified that she picketed at the Center and that when she picketed she signed an attendance sheet at the strike headquarters. She also claimed that she picketed on the days that she received lunch money and that she signed when she received the money. Taylor testified that she never spent less than 3 hours picketing and on some days she picketed for as much as 6 hours. There were times when several other employees picketed with her and times when she was the only picket. Taylor's name appears on the attendance sheets on 16, 21, 23, 27, and 30 December 1982; 5, 14, and 26 January 1983; 1, 2, 7, 8, 14–17, 23, and 28 February 1983; 1–3, 8–11, 14, 18, 22, 28, and 31 March 1983; 1, 15, 19, 21, 25, 28, and 29 April 1983; 9, 11, 12, 23, and 25–27 May 1983; 22–24, and 30 June 1983; 6, 8, 11, 14, 15, 21, and 27 July 1983; 3, 17, and 18 September 1983. Her name also appears on records that indicate she received lunch money on 10, 13, and 20 January 1983; 4 and 28 February 1983; and 11, 12, and 14 April 1983.

[40] There are several references during the entire period to the presence of the New York City police at the Center because of problems with the clients.

[41] Lane was a former employee of the Center who had been terminated. There was an arbitration about the discharge and the Center had been directed to reinstate Lane but had not done so at the time of this hearing.

[42] Bowers also signed in on 20 December, however, he apparently did not picket but went to the unemployment office.

Mary Harviley, Audrey Singleton, and Mercedes Colinet, employees who also went on strike, basically testified that on the days they picketed they signed attendance sheets and when they received lunch money when they picketed they signed to indicate that they had received the money. The records establish that Harviley signed attendance sheets on 4, 5, 14, 21, 24, 28, and 31 January 1983; 1–3, 7, 9, 10, 16–18, 22, 25, and 28 February 1983; 1–4, 7, 11, 14–18, 21–25, 28–30, and 31 March 1983; 4–8, 18, 19, 21, 22, 25, 26, and 29 April 1983; 3–6, 9, 10, 22, 12, 13, and 16–20 May 1983; 23, 24, 29, and 30 June 1983; 1, 5–8, 11–15, 19, 20, 22, 25, 27, and 28 July 1983; and 3, 4, and 18 August 1983. The records also establish that Harviley signed the lunch sheet records on 3, 6, 7, 11–13, and 18–20 January 1983; 4 and 28 February 1983; 11, 12, and 14 April 1983; 28 June 1983; and 22 and 29 July 1983.

Singleton's name[43] appears on the attendance sheet records on 16, 20, 21, 22, 28, and 30 December 1982; 4, 14, and 24 January 1983; 2, 7, 9, 14–18, 23–25, and 28 February 1983; 1, 3, 7–9, 14–17, 22, 24, 28, and 30 March 1983; 18, 19, 21, 22, 26, and 28 April 1983; 2, 3, 6, 10–13, 16, and 18 May 1983; 22 and 29 June 1983; 5–7, 11–12, 18, 20–21, 25, 26, and 28 July 1983; and 2, 3, and 8 August 1983. Singleton's signature appears on the lunch sheets on 16, 21, 28, and 30 December 1982; 3, 4, 6, 7, 10–13, 19–20, and 31 January 1983; 11 February 1983; 11 April 1983; and 9 August 1983.

Colinet's signature appears on attendance sheets on 16, 17, 21, 22, 27, 29, and 30 December 1982; 4, 21, 25, 26, and 31 January 1983; 1, 2, 8, 9, 16–18, 22, 23, 25, and 28 February 1983; 1, 3, 8, 9, 11, 14–16, 18, 21, 24, 25, 28, 30, and 31 March 1983; 5, 6, 8, 15, 18, 19, 21, and 22 April 1983; 2, 4, 9, 10, 11, 19, 20, 25, 27, and 31 May 1983; 23, 24, and 29 June 1983; 1, 12, 15, 19, 20, 22, 26, and 27 July 1983; and 3, 5, 18, and 19 August 1983.

As noted above, the General Counsel contends that from the 16 December 1982 through until August 1983 there were 13 different periods of time when the Union ceased picketing and then resumed it without giving the proper notification to the Center. However, Lane, Bowers, Singleton, Taylor, Colinet, Harviley, and Mottl testified that they signed either an attendance sheet or a lunch money sheet or both on the days when they picketed. An examination of those records establishes that there is either an attendance sheet or a lunch money sheet signed by Lane or one or more of the striking employees for each day in the different periods of time when the General Counsel contends that there was no picketing.

The strike began on 29 September and continued until August 1983. On 4 October 1982, a few days after the strike started, White reiterated the Union's request that the 11 employees be reinstated and stated that strike was in support of those who had been discharged. It does not appear that the Center responded to this appeal.

On 15 April 1983 the Center discharged the 34 employees in the instant case. During the hearing, the Center stipulated that the employees were discharged because they had engaged in an strike in violation of Section 8(g).

Discussion

A. The Alleged Denial of Due Process

It is the position of the Center that it was denied due process with respect to the investigation and trial of this case and in support of that position the Center raises certain arguments. The Center contends that the Regional Director failed to conduct an independent investigation in this case, and relied on the earlier complaints that had issued in Cases 2–CA–19132 and 2–CA–1940 with respect to the allegation that it was the Center's unfair labor practice in discharging 11 employees on 20 September which caused or prolonged the strike. The Center also contends that it was "patently impermissible" for the General Counsel to include in the instant complaint any reference to matters contained in those prior complaints in view of the fact that those cases had been settled and withdrawn. The Center further argues that the complaints in the instant cases that were issued simultaneously, involve inconsistent theories of law and, therefore, they negate each other. Moreover, the Center claims that the Regional Director continued to deny the Center due process when he consolidated these cases and refused to allow counsel for the General Counsel in the 8(g) case to cross-examine witnesses or to give counsel for the Center access to the Board's investigative file in order that he might properly fulfill the prosecutorial role, which had been abandoned by the counsel for the General Counsel. The Center argues that the result of this improper consolidation resulted in a lack of confidentiality that normally exists when a charging party produces witnesses and documentary evidence in support of its position. Finally, the Center claims that counsel for the General Counsel in the 8(g) case, unlike counsel for the General Counsel in the 8(a)(3) case, failed to rebut the affirmative defense advanced to the 8(g) case and thereby failed to introduce sufficient evidence to prevail on the 8(g) complaint.

An examination of all these arguments advanced by the Center discloses that they can be divided into three sections; the failure by the Regional Director to investigate certain allegations contained in the 8(a)(3) complaints, the prejudice suffered by the Center because of the consolidation of the 8(g) and 8(a)(3) complaints, and the violations of the terms of the settlement agreement by counsel's attempt to introduce evidence and seek an unfair labor practice finding concerning the discharge of 11 employees who were the subject matter of the settlement agreement. The Center's position with respect to the effect of the settlement agreement will be discussed under a separate heading.

There is no evidence in this record to support the Center's assertion that certain allegations contained in the 8(a)(3) complaint were not investigated. It is true that such statements were made by counsel for the Center during the hearing, but he did not testify regarding the basis for his statements and counsel for the General Counsel denied his allegations. It is difficult to understand how counsel could make such a claim in view of the fact that a counsel for a charging party or respondent is not privy to information concerning the manner in which an investigation is conducted. In view of the fact that statements by counsel do not constitute testimony, I do not find support in this record for this argument.

The Center contends that it was prejudiced by the consolidation of the cases. However, these two cases presented the Regional Director with an unusual situation. A crucial issue in both cases was whether the Union gave proper notification to the Center about when the strike would start. Several witnesses for the Center claimed that the union representatives did not tell them on 22 September that the strike would commence on 29 September, while several witnesses for the Union claimed that such a notice was given. If the Union gave proper notice about when the strike would start, as it contended, then the Center may have violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act when it discharged the 34 strikers. On the other hand, if the Union failed to give the proper notice then the Center may have been justified when it discharged the 34 strikers. Thus, the Regional Director was faced with a credibility issue, the resolution of which could determine the outcome of both cases. A Regional Director, however, does not have the authority to decide that type of credibility issue, such issues are within the province of an administrative law judge. While it may be that the allegations in one complaint could negate the allegations in the other complaint, as the Center claims, the Regional Director, faced with the credibility problem, had no alternative but to issue both complaints. Further, in view of the fact that the cases are inextricably intertwined and the resolution of one could possibly resolve the other it would have been inappropriate to have the matter decided by different administrative law judges at different times. The proper procedure, which was followed by the Regional Director, was to consolidate the cases. The Center contends, however, that the Regional Director's stated reason for the consolidation was to avoid unnecessary costs and delay and that purpose was not achieved, rather the consolidated proceeding resulted in protracted litigation. Although, it is true that one of the reasons advanced by the Regional Director for the consolidation of the cases was to avoid unnecessary costs and delay, it clearly was not the most significant reason. The Regional Director specifically stated, "The central unfair labor practice issue in both cases are dependent, to a great degree, on credibility resolutions which cannot be properly made at an administrative level." Furthermore, it is possible that had the cases not been consolidated the monetary costs and time expended could well have exceeded the expense and time spent in the instant cases.

Both the Center and the Union were timely notified of the procedure that both counsels for the General Counsel would follow and of the limitations on their respective roles. The Center and the Union also were advised that they were entitled to have counsel to fully represent them in those areas where counsels for the General Counsel would not pursue an active role. During the very lengthy hearing that ensued, counsel for the Center and the Union cross-examined witnesses extensively and both made detailed arguments on many points. Both counsels were afforded every opportunity to call witnesses, to cross-examine witnesses, and to present every argument in support of their respective positions during the hearing that began in May 1984 and was not concluded until January 1985. It is difficult to understand, in these circumstances, how the Center can contend that it was denied due process when every opportunity was granted to it to present its version of the events. Barrus Construction Co. v. NLRB, 483 F.2d 191, 195 (4th Cir. 1973); NLRB v. Bancroft Co., 516 F.2d 436, 446 (5th Cir. 1975), cert. denied 424 U.S. 914 (1976).

The Center argues that it was also denied due process because affidavits of its witnesses, which contained material on both the 8(g) and 8(a)(3) violations were given to counsel for the Union after the witnesses testified with respect to only one of the cases. It is true that both counsels for the General Counsel took the position that the affidavits of witnesses for both the Center and the Union would be given to the other side when a witness concluded his/her testimony with respect to either case. It was the position of the Government that the affidavits secured from witnesses for both sides during the investigation contained material with respect to aspects of both cases and that it would be difficult to separate the cases and the Government concluded, therefore, to give to counsel the entire affidavit when a witness for either side testified about either case. The Center contends that this action by the Government resulted from a misapplication of the "Jencks" rule. However, the central purpose of the "Jencks" rule is to limit the Government's right to refuse to produce affidavits that it has secured during the investigation of a case. Here, the Government was not attempting to withhold affidavits, rather because counsels for the General Counsel considered that the affidavits contained material relevant to both cases, they believed it would be difficult to comply with the rule unless an affidavit was produced once a witness testified. In fact, the majority of the witnesses who testified with respect to allegations in the 8(a)(3) case testified on direct examination about certain aspects of the 8(g) case. Counsel for the Center requested and was given their affidavits when they concluded their testimony. I do not consider the procedure that the Government followed to be a misapplication of the "Jencks" rule. Rather, I view it as an effort to fully comply with that rule.

The Center also claims that it was denied due process because counsel for the General Counsel in the 8(g) case did not object to evidence that was offered by the counsel in the 8(a)(3) case to establish that the Center had received constructive notice of when the strike would commence. In view of the fact that the counsel in the 8(g) case took the position that constructive notice as a matter of law would be insufficient, the Center contends that he should have objected to the introduction of factual evidence that was related to this constructive notice theory. However, the Center was aware that this procedure would be followed in order to allow the evidence in both cases to be presented. Counsel for the Center also claims that counsel in the 8(g) case did not fulfill his obligation as a counsel because he did not rebut "the affirmative defense that the strike on September 29, 1982 was an unfair labor practice strike." The complaint in the 8(a)(3) case alleged that the strike that commenced on 29 September was an unfair labor practice strike. The Center was aware that counsel in the 8(a)(3) case would seek to prove this allegation as part of her case and was also aware that it would need to defend against this allegation. Counsel for the Center was afforded the opportunity to cross-examine witnesses who testified with respect to this element and for many weeks he did engage in lengthy cross-examinations of those witnesses. The Center also was provided with the opportunity to call witnesses to rebut the assertion that the strike was an unfair labor practice strike, but it chose not to do so. It cannot now claim that it was denied due process when it failed to avail itself of the opportunity afforded to it. Barrus Construction Co., supra.

It may well be, as the Center contends, that if only the 8(g) case existed and the Union established an affirmative defense to that case, counsel for the General Counsel would have sought to rebut that defense. However, that was not the situation that existed and the Regional Director, faced with a conflict on an essential issue in two cases, decided to provide both parties with the opportunity to be heard, to produce witnesses or documentary evidence, and to argue their respective positions. It would have been unfair to both Charging Parties for the Regional Director to have followed any course other than the one he did. In fact, had the Regional Director decided the credibility issue against the Center and refused to issue the 8(g) complaint, the Center would have objected to that action. The Center cited Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 U.S. 471 (1972), in support of its argument that it was denied due process. The Morrissey case involved a parole revocation issue, the deprivation of a right for an individual to be free. This obviously is not the situation present in the instant case. However, even in the Morrissey case where the issue of the right to due process was posed in a criminal as opposed to a civil context, the Supreme Court stated that due process is flexible and calls for such procedural protection as the situation warranted. In the instant case, the situation required the Regional Director to give the parties their day in court, which he did. The fact that the Center declined to use the opportunity afforded to it to explain its actions does not mean that the Center was denied due process. In Confectionery Workers v. McElroy, 367 U.S. 886, 895 (1961), the Court stated that due process, unlike some other legal rules, is not a technical concept with a fixed content unrelated to the time, place, and circumstances of the event. Due process is concerned with substance and not with form. In the instant case, the Center was provided with the opportunity to present the substance of their position but they argued that form, who should present the substance of their position, was the important issue. The Center contended that it was the counsel for the General Counsel in the 8(g) case who should have advanced their argument and when he failed to do so they were denied due process. That argument might have some appeal if the counsel for the General Counsel was the only entity who could have presented the Center's position and if the Center had been denied the opportunity to present its position. That was not the situation in the instant case. Rather, the Center consistently was urged to present all the evidence it had to present. The Center either had no additional evidence to present or it made a calculated determination not to present additional evidence.

The Center also contends that counsel for the General Counsel in the 8(g) case abandoned his prosecutorial duties and it had to assume that role and, therefore, it was entitled to all the material secured during the investigation of the case. Both counsel for the Union and the Center were given affidavits of all witnesses who testified and the requests of both counsel were denied when they sought material contained in either file which was not disclosed at the hearing. In refusing the requests of counsel for both parties, the Regional Director followed the Board's consistent policy, which policy has been honored by the Courts, to protect confidential material contained in files that is not introduced at a hearing NLRB v. Robbins Tire & Rubber Co., 437 U.S. 214 (1978); Wellman Industries v. NLRB, 490 F.2d 427 (4th Cir. 1974).

The Center has cited several additional cases in support of its position that it was denied due process. However, an examination of those cases does not establish that the Center was denied due process. In Morgan v. U.S., 304 U.S. 1 (1938), the Court stated that the appellants were entitled to a full and fair hearing with the right to have a reasonable opportunity to know the claims advanced against them. In the instant case, the Center was represented by two competent attorneys who participated fully in the hearing which continued for several months. The Center was aware for some months before the hearing started of the allegations contained in both complaints and was on notice of the limited roles that both counsels representing the General Counsel would take during the hearing. There was no element of surprise in the actions of counsel for the General Counsel at the hearing. In Mathews v. Eldridge, 424 U.S. 319 (1976), the Court stated that a party had the right to be heard at a meaningful time and in a meaningful manner. It is evident in the instant case that the Center was given the right to be heard for several months at a hearing where its counsels participated in lengthy cross-examinations and detailed arguments. The real thrust of the Center's argument that it was denied due process arises from its view that counsel for the General Counsel in the 8(g) case should have defended the Center against the allegation that the strike, which began on 29 September was caused by the Center's unfair labor practices when it discharged the 11 employees on 20 September. It should be noted, however, that had the 8(a)(3) case been tried separately, as counsel for the Center advocates, then it would have been solely his burden to defend against the alleged 8(a)(3) charges. In the unusual circumstances of these cases, it was not an unfair burden or a denial of due process to require both Charging Parties to defend themselves against alleged violations of the Act, which both would have needed to do if the cases had not required consolidation.

The Center argues that its private interests have been affected by these proceedings and that it is a matter of record that if it was required to pay backpay it would render the Center bankrupt and thereby terminate the mental health services available to residents in the community. However, there is no evidence in this record to support the conclusion that a decision, which was contrary to the interests of the Center would cause either bankruptcy or the termination of the services provided by the Center. This institution provides services that are backed by various governmental agencies and what these agencies would decide to do in the event that the Center was required to pay backpay is an unknown factor.

B. The Effect of the Settlement Agreement

The Center argues that efforts by the counsel for the General Counsel to go behind the terms of the settlement agreement in order to establish that the discharge of the 11 employees on 20 September was an unfair labor practice constitutes both a denial of due process and a violation of the terms of the agreement. The Center concedes that the settlement agreement contains a reservation of rights clause but it maintains that that clause was inserted to protect the 8(a)(3) charge in the instant case and was not intended to permit litigation of the very cases that were being settled. The Center also claims that there is no basis to set aside the agreement because the agreement has not been breached and the instant case cannot be used to establish that there was postsettlement breach because the instant case was filed some several weeks before the settlement agreement was signed. Counsel for the General Counsel and for the Union maintain that the existence of the reservation-of-rights clause in the agreement and the action of the Center's representatives establishe that it was the understanding of all parties that the issue of the legality of those 11 discharged employees was reserved for litigation in the present proceeding. Both also contend that the Center waived the settlement agreement as a bar to litigating the original unfair labor practices by joining issue in the answer filed by it and by participating in the hearing on the merits. Both also argue that, notwithstanding the settlement agreement, the Union is entitled to litigate the legality of the 11 discharged employees because the Union has asserted as an affirmative defense that the strike was an unfair labor practice counsel for the General Counsel requests that if the administrative law judge is of the opinion that she cannot make a finding with respect to the discharge of the 11 employees because of the existence of the settlement agreement, then counsel requests the administrative law judge to set aside the agreement.

The record discloses that the charge in the present 8(a)(3) case was filed on 21 April 1983 and the settlement agreement in the prior cases was signed by the Center on 12 May 1983 and approved by the Regional Director on 1 June 1983. The Regional Director had not revoked his approval of the settlement agreement prior to the hearing in the instant case. However, as noted, counsel for the General Counsel did request the administrative law judge to revoke the settlement agreement if she deemed it necessary to decide certain issues in this case. A settlement agreement will not be set aside unless a respondent fails to comply with the terms of the agreement, commits unfair labor practices subsequent to the signing of the settlement agreement, or has committed presettlement misconduct of which the Regional Director was unaware through no fault of his own at the time he approved the agreement. In the instant case, there is no evidence that the Center failed to comply with the terms of the agreement. The Center offered the 11 discharged employees reinstatement, paid a substantial sum of money in backpay, and posted the required notice. Nor does it appear that the Center committed unfair labor practices subsequent to the signing of the settlement agreement. The instant charge was filed several weeks prior to the signing of the settlement agreement. In Electronics Equipment Co., 94 NLRB 62 (1951), the Board held that a settlement agreement could not be set aside on the ground that the employer had committed subsequent unfair labor practices when the settlement agreement was signed on the same day that a new unfair labor practice charge was filed. In the present situation, the charge was filed several weeks before the settlement was signed and, therefore, the Center's actions cannot be considered postsettlement conduct, which would require revocation of the settlement agreement.[44] Further, there is no evidence that the Center engaged in presettlement misconduct of which the Regional Director was unaware at the time he approved the settlement agreement. In these circumstances, I do not find a basis to set aside the settlement agreement.

It is well established that a settlement agreement disposes of all issues involving presettlement conduct of a charged party, unless the prior violations were unknown to the General Counsel, not readily discoverable by investigation, or specifically reserved by the mutual understanding of the parties. Universal Blanchers, 275 NLRB 218 (1985); E.S.I. Meats, Inc., 270 NLRB 1430 (1984);

[44] Counsel for the General Counsel cited Livernois Moving & Storage, 269 NLRB 299, 306 (1984), and Furr's Cafeterias, 251 NLRB 879 fn. 3 (1980), in support of her position that the agreement should be set aside. However, in both cases the employer's conduct, in fact, occurred after the settlement agreement had been signed. This is not the present situation. Moreover, in Tompkins Motor Lines, 142 NLRB 1, 3 (1963), the Board stated, "There is no contention or evidence that the Respondent engaged in any improper activity subsequent to entering the settlement agreement other than the very matter which was reserved at the time of the signing." This is the situation in this case.

In the instant case, there are two clauses that relate to the issue of reservation of rights. The first clause states specifically that the signing of the agreement shall not preclude the introduction by any party of any evidence contained in Cases 2-CA-19140 and 2-CA-19132 in any forum or proceeding. The second clause states that the agreement settles only the unfair labor practice charge in Cases 2-CA-19140 and 2-CA-19132 and does not settle any other cases that were pending before the Regional Office, the Office of Appeals, the office of the General Counsel, or the Board, nor does it constitute a waiver of any claim that a party may have. It is the position of the counsel for the General Counsel that these clauses "clearly reserved to the General Counsel the right to litigate and seek a finding with respect to the underlying unfair labor practices." Counsel maintains that it would be meaningless and illusory to include such a reservation-of-rights clause for the sole purpose of allowing presettlement conduct to be introduced as background evidence, this counsel can do without a reservation-of-rights clause. In support of her position, counsel cites Tompkins Motor Lines, supra. In Tompkins, the Board found that despite the absence of a written reservation-of-rights clause the parties had agreed that the settlement agreement, which normally settles all presettlement conduct, would not bar a new charge from being filed by the charging party about presettlement conduct. The Board further stated that the "Trial Examiner properly held that it was proper to consider evidence predating the settlement agreement in this case to establish the employer's motive." The Board did not state that it would allow the introduction of evidence concerning the presettlement conduct as a basis for finding that the conduct settled by the agreement was a violation of the Act. In fact, in footnote 8, the Board stated that it would not make a finding of unfair labor practices based on the conduct that had been settled. In Metropolitan Alloys Corp., 233 NLRB 966 (1977), in which there was a reservation-of-rights clause, the Board stated, "Obviously the settlement agreement permits the General Counsel, in this proceeding, to introduce evidence concerning the matters disposed of by thesettlement agreement, but the use of such evidence is limited to that of shedding light on the issues raised by the amended complaint. No unfair labor practice findings can be made with respect to the allegations which have been disposed of in the settlement agreement." The Board did not adopt the administrative law judge's findings of independent violations. In Superior Sanitation, 234 NLRB 454, 467 (1978), in which there also was a reservation-of-rights clause, the administrative law judge found that he could not make findings of unfair labor practices with respect to the violations that had been settled, and his conclusions were affirmed by the Board.

The General Counsel argues that the Center, however, has waived its right to contend that the settlement agreement bars a finding about the settled cases because of its actions in this proceeding. The record reveals that the Center in its answer, as an affirmative defense, stated that the discharge of the 11 employees did not constitute an unfair labor practice because the conduct of those employees was unprotected by the Act. The answer also admitted that the settlement agreement had been executed by the Center and it further stated that the agreement "in its entirety speaks for itself." In addition, during his opening statement counsel for the Center gave a detailed presentation of the events of the 15 and 16 September, during which he contended that the employees had engaged in work stoppages on those days and he discussed whether the discharge of the 11 employees was an unfair labor practice and what the impact would be on the Union's obligation under Section 8(g) of the Act, if those discharges were found to be violative of the Act.[46] It does appear that the Center, notwithstanding the settlement agreement, was prepared to and did litigate, in this proceeding the issue of the status of the 11 employees. However, assuming that by that action, the Center did not waive any rights that it might have by virtue of the settlement agreement, the Center does concede that the reservation language in the settlement agreement permits the General Counsel to litigate the complaint allegations regarding the 34 strikers who were discharged on 15 April 1983. The decision whether the Center violated the Act when it discharged those 34 employees depends on whether those employees were engaged in an unfair labor practice strike, as the Union contends, or unprotected activity, as the Center contends. Thus, it appears that when the Center executed the settlement agreement it understood that the General Counsel reserved the right to establish the nature of the strike engaged in by the 34 strikers on and after 29 September and understand also that the General Counsel would seek a finding concerning the nature of that strike.

Further, it should be noted that the Union alleged, as an affirmative defense against the 8(g) complaint, that the strike was an unfair labor practice strike, and, therefore, that the Union was not required to give the notices normally required by Section 8(g) of the Act. The basis of the Union's assertion that the strike was an unfair labor practice strike is its claim that the employees who struck on 29 September did so because the 11 employees were discharged on 20 September in violation of the Act. In Hotel & Restaurant Employees Local 274 (Warwick Caterers), 269 NLRB 482 (1984), the issue was whether a union charged with a violation of Section 8(b)(7)(C) of the Act should be permitted to interpose as a defense to that complaint an allegation concerning an alleged 8(a)(5) charge that had been dismissed by the Regional Director and which dismissal had been upheld by the General Counsel. The Board in concluding that the Union was entitled to put in its defense stated, "'We acknowledge that under Section 10(b),' 'The person so complained of shall have the right to file an answer to the original or amended complaint and to appear in person or otherwise and to give testimony. . . .' 'Absent any limitation on these rights, the Board is bound to hear, receive, and consider the Respondent's answer at a trial-like hearing.'" and a subsequent case, Mine Workers

Local 1329 (Alpine Construction), 276 NLRB 415 (1985), involved violations of Section 8(b)(7)(C) of the Act. However, the language used by the Board in Warwick was broad in scope and did not indicate that a respondent's right to file an answer and to be heard with respect to defenses raised by the answer was limited to 8(b)(7)(C) situations. In sum, I find that I am obligated, in order to resolve the issues in the 8(a)(3) case, to decide whether the 34 employees were engaged in protected or unprotected activity when they struck.

C. The Reason for the Strike

It is undisputed that representatives of the Center were not present during the union meetings when the employees discussed the strike issue. Nevertheless, it is the position of counsel for the General Counsel that the employees struck for economic considerations and did not strike to protest the discharge of the 11 employees. In support of this position, counsel makes the several points. Months before the discharges, the employees had expressed concern over the Center's failure to sign a prior contract and about their belief that the Center had cheated them out of money. It was these topics and other economic issues that were of paramount interest to the employees and not the discharges. Although counsel concedes that there was some discussion about the discharges, he maintains that the union representatives did not push the issue when the Center stated that the discharges were not a proper subject for discussion at the negotiation meeting. Further, counsel argues that the fact that the employees did not strike when the discharges occurred also establishes that the discharges were not the cause for the strike.

The record reveals that the employees had been concerned for months before 29 September about the Center's failure to sign the earlier contract and its alleged failure to pay money that the employees believed were owed to them by the Center. Notwithstanding their unhappiness over these issues for several months, the employees did not strike or even vote to strike. It was in early September when the employees finally decided that some action was warranted, but even then the employees voted only to hold a series of demonstrations they did not vote to strike. Although that vote was in early September, the employees did not hold any demonstrations between early September and 16 September when the first negotiation meeting was held. At this first session, the Union presented its proposals, there was some discussion about the proposals and the parties agreed to meet again. The Center did not offer any proposals at that meeting, but in negotiations that is not an unusual situation and there is no evidence that the union negotiators considered this failure to offer counterproposals as evidence of a failure to bargain by the Center. At the second meeting on 22 September, there was further discussion about the Union's proposals, and Pemberton agreed to the concept of a daycare center, agreed to consider hiring members sent by the Union and made a counterproposal on wages. Although the Center did not make counterproposals, there was some evidence of movement by the Center on proposals made by the Union. The parties were in disagreement about which side proposed 29 September as the next day for negotiations. However, there is no dispute that the parties did agree to meet for negotiations on that day.

As noted, there was another situation that was unfolding as the parties met to negotiate. This situation involved the attendance of employees at the union meeting on 15 September, the receipt by the employees of warning letters because of Pemberton's belief that the employees had engaged in a work stoppage on 15 September, and the discharge of the 11 employees, first on 17 September and then on 20 September, because of Pemberton's belief that these employees had engaged in a second work stoppage on 16 September. There is no dispute that the Union and the employees were angered by the warning letters and the discharge of the 11 employees and they attempted to raise both topics at the negotiation meeting. It is true that when Pemberton said that the discharges were not a proper subject matter for discussion, the union representatives did not attempt to force the issue. It is possible that had the Union attempted to do so, the Center would have filed a refusal-to-bargain charge. However, it is inaccurate to say that the Union and employees abandoned the matter. To the contrary, White forwarded a letter to Pemberton on 24 September in which he stated that the reinstatement of the 11 discharged employees "would be a giant step towards coming to an understanding between the administration and the Union."[46] The record reveals that on the day the 11 employees were discharged a union meeting was called immediately to discuss the discharges. At this meeting, the employees expressed their anger at the discharge of the 11 employees and for the first time they voted to strike. The employees voted to strike unless the 11 employees were reinstated. The evidence further reveals that throughout the week that followed the issue of the discharges was the prime topic at all the union meetings. The Center contended that if the discharges were the cause for the strike then the employees would have struck on 20 September, it ignores the fact that the union representatives and the employees were of the belief that they could not strike before the date set in the strike notice, which was 28 September. The testimony by White and the employees establishes that during the negotiation meeting on 22 September White stated that if the issues that existed between the parties were not settled there would be a strike. One of those issues, as evidenced by White's letter and the testimony of the employees, was the discharge of the 11 employees. Based on the evidence in this record and my observation of the employees, I am convinced that the discharge of the 11 employees was the main, if not the only, reason for the strike.

[46] As noted, in his telegram of 5 October 1982, White reiterated that reinstatement of the discharged employees would help resolve the issues between the parties.

D. Whether the Issuance of the Disciplinary Letters and the Discharge of the 11 Employees Were Unfair Labor Practices

The Center's representatives did not testify as to why the disciplinary letters were issued on 16 September or why the employees were discharged on 20 September. However, in the warning letters that were issued to the employees, Pemberton stated that the employees were being disciplined because they had engaged in an illegal work stoppage and had ignored management's request to return to work. The letters do not disclose when Pemberton believed that the work stoppage had occurred nor does it state the basis on which Pemberton concluded that the employees had engaged in a work stoppage, and witnesses were not called to clarify either point.[47] However, the record does disclose that some employees attended a meeting between 2 and 3 p.m. on 15 September and that Pemberton told employees who were at the meeting to return to work. Gordon, Buchinji, Harris, and de la Torre credibly testified that between 2 and 3 p.m. employees, on a rotating basis, attended a union meeting, as they had several times before in room 153 at the premises of the Center. The Center did not dispute that employees had held union meetings at the premises before this meeting on 15 September.[48] However, counsel for the Center did state that one of the reasons the Center issued the disciplinary letters was due to the unauthorized use of the room by the employees. No evidence was offered to support the claim that the use of the room was unauthorized. In fact, Irma Quitcon testified, without contradiction, that she followed the practice established by Sitgraves; she checked to see if the rooom was available and she found that the room was not being used for any other purpose and, therefore, it could be used for the union meeting. Sitgraves testified and she did not refute that testimony.

The Center did not establish that an investigation had been conducted by its representative on either 15 or 16 September, before the disciplinary letters were issued, and that as a result of that investigation it had discovered that the employees had failed to perform their work. Notwithstanding this fact, counsel for the Center attempted, during cross-examination, to prove that the employees had neglected their duties in order to be present at the meeting.[49] Initially, he attempted to establish that the employees had taken their lunch period before 2 p.m. and, therefore, they were on worktime when they attended the meeting. Gordon, Buchinji, Harris, and de la Torre all denied that they had taken their regular lunch period before 2 p.m. Based on my observation of the witnesses, I credit those denials.[50] Subsequently, counsel attempted to show that the employees failed to keep scheduled appointments between 2 and 3 p.m. Gordon and Harris credibly testified that they did not have appointments scheduled for the afternoon of 15 September. Buchinji testified that she checked several times during that afternoon to ascertain whether a client who was scheduled for a 3 p.m. appointment had arrived and she found that the client had not come to the Center. The Center did not offer evidence to refute that testimony. De la Torre conceded that she did not see a client who she had scheduled for a 2:30 p.m. appointment and who had signed the client logbook on that afternoon. The record does not disclose the reason de la Torre did not see the client. The record does disclose that at times clients have signed the logbook but for some reason or another they have failed to keep a scheduled appointment. De la Torre also testified that after the meeting she returned to her office where she picked up records and returned them to the medical records division. Her testimony that she saw and spoke to Pemberton and Charles while at work at 3:30 p.m. was also not refuted. The Center did not produce any employee's supervisor to establish that an employee failed to perform duties that they had scheduled between 2 and 3 p.m. or thereafter. Nor did the Center produce a client to testify that any employee failed to keep a scheduled appointment. The Center did produce service rendered documents (SRD), which are the records maintained by employees to establish the work they performed and logbooks signed by clients when they come to the Center to support its contention that the employees had failed to keep scheduled appointments. As noted, the SRD for Gordon was rejected because of unexplained defects on the face of the document. The Center did not produce a SRD for Buchinji[51] or Harris for 15 September and, apparently, the SRD for other employees also were missing. These documents were within the control of the Center and the Center failed to offer an explanation why some SRD were missing or why the SRD for Gordon contained erasures, cross-outs, etc. De la Torre testified that on occasion when clients arrived at the Center they told the receptionist that they were to meet with de la Torre, although, in fact, they were not her patients or were not scheduled to see her. This type of situation arose because she acted as a translator for other therapists or doctors and the clients knew this. Further, other witnesses testified that clients sometimes came to see a therapist, although they did not have appointments. Thus, the logbooks would not always reflect whether a patient who signed the book actually was scheduled to see a therapist. In these circumstances, I do not consider either the SRDs or the logbooks as sufficiently reliable evidence to prove that employees failed to perform their duties between 2 and 3 p.m. on 15 September. Moreover, as noted, the Center failed to establish that it had examined any records prior to the time it issued warning letters to ascertain whether employees had failed to perform their duties.[52]

[47] The letters do not state, specifically, that the employees were being disciplined because they had failed to perform their duties.

[48] Counsel for the Center indicated that the meetings usually were held at noon or after 5 p.m.

[49] Counsel indicated that the employees were engaged in a demonstration rather than a meeting but he failed to offer evidence to support that assertion.

[50] Although Gordon initially testified she took her lunch between 2 and 3 p.m. and then admitted that she had sent a notice to Pemberton in which she stated that she had taken lunch between 1:30 and 3 p.m., I do not consider that this difference is sufficient to warrant the conclusion that her overall testimony was not credible.

[51] Buchinji could not recall if she had completed an SRD for that day.

The Center's representatives did not explain which particular situation on 15 September they considered to be the work stoppage. Counsel for the Center did state that employees did not work between 2 and 5 p.m. on 15 September. Based on my evaluation of the evidence in this record, I find that between 2 and 3 p.m. some employees attended a union meeting on their own time, as they had done on other occasions.[53] The evidence also reveals that the employees met with union representatives during that meeting to assist those representatives in their preparations for the upcoming negotiations. There is no evidence in this record to establish that the employees failed to perform their duties because of their attendance at the meeting or that the meeting disrupted the operations of the Center or interfered with patient care. It should be noted that due to the nature of their work these employees had great flexibility with respect to their lunch and break periods and with respect to arranging their schedules.

The Act protects the right of employees to form, join, or assist a labor organization and it is a violation of the Act to interfere with, restrain, or coerce an employee in the exercise of those rights or to discriminate against employees in order to encourage or discourage union membership. The Supreme Court has stated that Section 7 is not to be interpreted and applied in a limited fashion. Eastex, Inc. v. NLRB, 437 U.S. 556 (1978); NLRB v. J. Weingarten, 420 U.S. 251 (1975); NLRB v. Washington Aluminum Co., 370 U.S. 9, 14 (1962). In the instant case, I find that when the employees attended the meeting to assist the union representatives they were engaged in protected concerted activities and were not engaged in a work stoppage. Nor do I consider that the employees lost the protection of the Act because of events that happened after 3 p.m. It is conceded that some employees[54] went to the second floor to see Pemberton about the timecards, which he had removed from the rack while the employees attended the union meeting. I find that the confusion that occurred thereafter was attributable to Pemberton's action in removing the timecards and his adamant refusal to speak to the employees about the matter. It could be argued that when he pulled the cards Pemberton, in effect, discharged the employees. In these circumstances, it would be difficult to conclude that the employees had engaged in a work stoppage.[55] Although, it is true that these employees were health care workers, that fact does not mean that they lose the right to engage in protected concerted activity. Phase, Inc., 263 NLRB 1168, 1169 (1982).

In the letter of termination that was issued first on 17 September and then 20 September, Pemberton stated the following, "After your receipt of a warning letter, you were specifically instructed to return to your work station. This you refused to do. Indeed the substantial time which elapsed until you reported to your work station, leads to the determination that you again participated in a work stoppage; that of a.m. of September 16, 1982." In addition to that statement about the reason for the discharges, the Center stipulated that the employees were discharged "in part based upon the warnings which were previously issued to these employees on September 16, 1982." The Center did not call witnesses or produce documents to explain what it considered to be the second work stoppage. Nor did it produce evidence to establish that an investigation had been conducted between 16 and 17 September to ascertain the facts about this alleged work stoppage. The record does establish that on the morning of 16 September the Center's representatives prohibited employees from performing their duties in order to distribute to them the disciplinary letters. There is no evidence about how the work of these employees was performed or if it was performed during this period of time. In fact, some employees were kept from performing their duties for a much longer period of time than the hour they had spent at the union meeting. It is undisputed that employees were instructed to return to their work after they received their letter. According to the credited testimony of the employees, they did return to work. Gordon returned to the nursery, put toys away, and helped Rose Ann Harris to put children on the schoolbus. At this point, some employees came to the first floor and started to draft a letter to Pemberton requesting that the issue of the disciplinary letters be put on the agenda for contract negotiations. Gordon joined them for a few minutes and then she returned to work in the nursery for the remainder of the day. De la Torre did not receive her disciplinary letter until about noon. De la Torre had lunch at some point before 1 p.m. and, thereafter, she joined the group of employees who were drafting a letter to Pemberton, she remained with this group about 50 minutes and then returned to work. Buchinji received her letter also about noon, and went to the first floor. She observed employees drafting the letter to Pemberton and she stayed with the group about 20 minutes and then returned to work. Harris received her disciplinary letter between 11:30 and 11:45 a.m., and after she received it she went to the nursery and helped to put children on the schoolbus. She noticed the employees drafting the letter and she joined them for a few minutes and then returned to work. Counsel for the Center stated that the employees were not discharged for writing the letter because the Center's representatives did not know about it, they were discharged for not performing their work sometime on 16 September. However, counsel did not state what time of day the employees failed to perform their duties or what duties they failed to perform. Nor does the evidence disclose why the Center decided to discharge the 11 employees who were discharged. In sum, the Center has failed to establish any reason for the discharge of the employees other than its stipulated reason, i.e., because the employees attended the union meeting. In view of my finding that the employees were engaged in protected concerted activities at the time they attended the meeting, I find that the Center committed an unfair labor practice when it issued the disciplinary letters and discharged the 11 employees. Brodart, Inc., 257 NLRB 380, 384 (1981); Empire Steel Mfg. Co., 234 NLRB 530, 531 (1978).

[52] The Board has considered the failure by an employer "to conduct an investigation of an employee's alleged misconduct is evidence of discriminatory intent, especially when viewed in light of the employer's union hostility." Beverly Enterprises, 272 NLRB 83, 90 (1984).

[53] If this was the only time employees had attended a union meeting on the premises of the Center, Pemberton might have had some basis to believe this to be a work stoppage. As noted, however, this was not the first meeting. Moreover, Pemberton's good-faith belief would not be a defense if the employees, in fact, were engaged in protected concerted activities. NLRB v. Burnup & Sims, Inc., 379 U.S. 25 (1964).

[54] There is no evidence to establish whether the Center's representatives knew which employees came to the second floor. Harris, for example, claimed that she never came to the second floor. De la Torre testified that she came to the second floor after she heard about the timecards but she remained only for a few minutes.

[55] In fact, it would have been impossible for employees to keep any appointment after the Center's representatives closed the doors to the Center.

E. Whether the Union Was Required to Give Notice

Counsel for the General Counsel in the 8(a)(3) case and counsel for the Union contend that the employees struck to protest the Center's unfair labor practices and, therefore, the strike was an unfair labor practice strike. In these circumstances, they contend, that under the doctrine of Mastro Plastics v. NLRB, 350 U.S. 270 (1956), the Union was not required to give any notice. Moreover, both also argue that the Center's conduct during the 10-day period excused the failure, if there was a failure, by the Union to notify the Center about the delay in the start of the strike. Counsel for the General Counsel in the 8(g) case agrees that the notice requirement of 8(g) does not apply to a strike that is called to protest an employer's unfair labor practices. However, he maintains that in the instant case, the strike was an economic strike. The Center did not state specifically that the strike was an economic strike but it did claim that the union was required to give the 8(g) notices timely, which it failed to do. It further claims that the doctrine of Mastro Plastics was not applicable to the instant situation because in Mastro Plastics the Supreme Court dealt with a strike that occurred prior to the expiration of the 60-day "cooling-off period" mandated by Section 8(d) and prior to the expiration of the contractual no-strike period. Therefore, counsel argues, it has no application to a strike commenced after the time specified in the 10-day notice. Rather, counsel claims, the legislative history limits the application of Mastro Plastics to two situations, the Union may choose not to give a 10-day notice or if it gives such a notice it is not required to wait until the expiration of the 10-day notice before it strikes.

A strike caused by unfair labor practices is an unfair labor practice strike even if it also has economic objectives. NLRB v. Louisville Chair Co., 385 F.2d 922, 929 (6th Cir. 1967), cert. denied 390 U.S. 1013 (1968). The unfair labor practice need not be the sole cause of the strike, it is enough if it is one of the reasons for the strike. Crown Cork de Puerto Rico, 273 NLRB 243 (1984); Boyles Galvanizing Co., 239 NLRB 530 (1978); C & E Stores, 221 NLRB 1321 (1976). As noted, the various work-related issues that had concerned the employees for months had not caused them to strike or to even hold the demonstrations they had discussed. There is no evidence that at the union meeting on 15 September the employees discussed the possibility of a strike. However, when the Center issued the disciplinary letters and discharged the employees it did provoke the other employees to action. The undisputed and credited testimony of the employees establishes that it was these events that triggered the employees to vote for a strike unless the discharged employees were reinstated. Pemberton did not dispute White's claim that he raised the issue of the disciplinary letters and the discharges at the negotiation meetings. Nor did he dispute the assertion that he refused to discuss these issues. White's letter of 24 September makes clear that the Union and the employees were concerned about the employees who had been discharged. In fact, White told Pemberton that a resolution of that problem would go a long way to resolving the other differences between the parties. These outward expressions of concern by the Union and the employees about the discharged employees occurred several days before the strike commenced and were not afterthoughts to protect the employees who went on strike on 29 September. In these circumstances, I find that the strike that commenced on 29 September was caused, at least in part, by the unfair labor practices of the Center. I further find that the strike was prolonged by those unfair labor practices at least until the Center remedied those unfair labor practices.[56] In Waiters & Bartenders Local 500 (Mission Valley Inn), 140 NLRB 433, 438 (1963), a union claimed that it was picketing to protest unfair labor practices, although the case had been settled by an agreement to which the Union was not a party. The Board stated:

> The fact remains that under established and regular administrative procedures, any unfair labor practices embraced in the charges must be deemed to have been remedied. . . . For the Board to accord recognition to a continued protest against unfair labor practices thereafter would be inconsistent with its obligation to respect established administrative practice and would impinge on the statutory authority of the General Counsel.

Both counsels for the General Counsel agree that the legislative history of the health care amendments and the limited Board law in this area establish that under the doctrine stated in Mastro Plastics Corp., 350 U.S. 270 (1956), a union is not required to comply with the 10-day notice requirements of Section 8(g) when a strike is caused by an employer's serious unfair labor practices. However, counsel for the Center contends that the Mastro Plastics doctrine, by its very terms, does not apply to the strike in the instant case, which was commenced after the time specified in the 10-day notice. Counsel also argues that there is no indication in the legislative history of health care amendments that Congress intended to apply the Mastro Plastics doctrine to a strike that commenced after the 10-day period.[57] Moreover, counsel maintains that the failure by the Union to take economic action when the alleged unfair labor practices occurred misled the Center and lulled it into a situation in which the Center believed that the Union would strike, at the time specified and it was unprepared for the strike that occurred 24 hours later. Finally, counsel contends that the alleged conduct in the instant case does not constitute interference with rights of the employees to select their own bargaining representative, which was the situation that existed in Mastro Plastics.

[56] The settlement agreement was approved on June 1983, but the precise date when the Center complied with the terms of the agreement is unclear.

[57] It does not appear that this contention is being advanced by counsel for the General Counsel. However, counsel for the General Counsel in the 8(g) case does argue that this was an economic strike and not an unfair labor practice strike.

It is clear from the legislative history of the health care amendments that Congress recognized that the principles of the Mastro Plastics doctrine would apply even in the health care industry, notwithstanding the Congressional concern about patient care. Thus, the Senate Report states the following:

> Likewise, the public interest demands that employees of health care institutions be accorded the same type of treatment under the law as other employees in our society, and that the notice not be utilized to deprive employees of their statutory rights. It is clear, therefore, that a labor organization will not be required to serve a ten day notice or to wait until the expiration of the ten day notice when the employer has committed unfair labor practices as in Mastro Plastics Corp. v. NLRB, 350 U.S. 270, 37 LRRM 2587 (1956).[58]

Further evidence that the doctrine would be applicable even to the health care industry can be found in these statements by Congressmen Ashbrook and Thompson, who cosponsored the bill in the House. They made the following statement:

> Mr. Ashbrook: I would say to my colleague from Florida that the Supreme Court has clearly enunciated a policy which would override the 10-day requirement but it is in a very limited situation. Say, for example, that the hospital fired all employees. The Court has said in effect that the unfair labor practice was so aggravated that a nonstrike clause was not enforceable. Only a very narrow, limited number of situations would be covered. I would answer "yes" to his question. Despite the provision for a 10-day notice, in aggravated situations where the notice is meaningless, the union would not have to give this notice.
> Mr. Thompson of New Jersey: Mr. Chairman, this particular provision was written in because of the nature of the matter and would apply only to an aggravated unfair labor practice, as distinguished, in the normal course of events, under section 8(d)(3) of the act. If one was, shall we say, fired as in J. P. Stevens case, on the first day of wearing a union button, this gives the protection to the health care worker and is only applicable in that kind of case.[59]

The issue of the applicability of the Mastro Plastics doctrine to a health care institution has not been before the Board. However, in Cedarcrest, Inc., 246 NLRB 870 (1979), it was contended that the employer was a health care institution. Although the administrative law judge did not find the employer to be such an institution, he did state that if he had made such a finding then he would have concluded that the requirements of Section 8(g) would not be applicable because the employer in that case had committed serious unfair labor practices. The Board affirmed his findings, on this issue, without comment. Thus, based on both the legislative history and limited Board law it appears that the doctrine of Mastro Plastics is applicable even if the employer involved is an institution involved in the health care field.

Counsel's argument that Mastro Plastics, by its terms, does not apply to a strike that commenced after the time specified in the 10-day notice is not persuasive. Mastro Plastics, of course, did not deal with the notice requirements imposed on a union, either before or after the 10-day notice, and, therefore, in that sense it did not address the immediate issue. However, to say that the doctrine is not relevant to this case is to misunderstand the opinion of the Court. The Court in Mastro Plastics was concerned that employees who struck to protest an employer's unfair labor practice should not lose their status as employees because they failed to give notice in advance to an employer, who by its conduct, had caused the strike in the first place. Thus, the Court in seeking to protect these rights of employees in such circumstances held that, notwithstanding the explicit language of the Section 8(d), employees could strike prior to the expiration of the 60-day cooling-off period and prior to the expiration of a contractual no-strike period. The Court eliminated entirely the only type of notice required under the facts existing in the Mastro Plastics case. The scope of that holding was broad and demonstrates the Court's belief that an employer who has committed serious unfair labor practices is not entitled to receive advance notice of the strike that was caused by those practices. Congress, when it stated that the doctrine would be applied to employers in the health field who committed serious unfair labor practices, could not have meant that a union would be excused from giving the 10-day notice specifically required by the Act, but would not be excused from giving the 12-hour notice which is not set forth in the Act. Rather, I find that the rationale of Mastro Plastics applies whether the issue is the 10-day notice or the 12-hour notice.

Further, I do not find merit to counsel's contention that the only conduct by an employer that will excuse a union from the need to give the required notice is conduct which interferes with the employees' right to select their bargaining representative. That the conduct is not the only type of conduct that will eliminate the union's need to give advance notice of its intention to strike is evident from the following comment by Senator Williams. Thus, he stated:

> Second, it should be clear that the exception to the section 8(g) notice was never intended to be limited to the precise facts found in Mastro Plastics

> Corp. v. NLRB, 350 U.S. 270 (1956). Mastro Plastics involved a strike against an employer within the 8(d) waiting period and in the face of a no-strike clause solely because the employer discharged an employee because of his organizational activities in support of the union. The Court held that neither section 8(d) nor the no-strike provision prohibited employees from engaging in a strike to protest an employer's unfair labor practices.[60]

In the instant case, the issuance of disciplinary letters to the majority of the bargaining unit employees because they attended a union meeting and the discharge of a significant number of bargaining unit employees, at least in part, because they attended such a meeting constitutes the type of serious unfair labor practice that would relieve the Union of any obligation to give advance notice of its intention to strike.

Counsel for the General Counsel in the 8(a)(3) case and counsel for the Union also argue that the Center's conduct during the 10-day period after the Union gave notice of its intention to strike, even if it did not rise to the level of an unfair labor practice, nevertheless released the Union from its obligation to give the required notices. In support of this position counsel cites the following language from the Senate Report:

> . . . it is the sense of the Committee that during the ten-day notice period the employer should remain free to take whatever action is necessary to maintain health care, but not to use the ten-day period to undermine the bargaining relationship that would otherwise exist. For example, the employer would not be free to bring in large numbers of supervisory help, nurses, staff and other personnel from other facilities for replacement purposes. It would clearly be free to take extraordinary steps to stock up on ordinary supplies for an unduly extended period. While not necessarily a violation of the Act, violation of these principles would serve to release the labor organization from its obligation not to engage in economic action during the course of the ten-day notice. [S. Rept. 93-766, 93d Cong., 2d sess., Coverage of Nonprofit Hospitals Under the National Labor Relations Act.]

Counsel for the Union claims that the following conduct demonstrates that the Center undermined the collective-bargaining relationship and, therefore, the Union was not required to give any notice. The Center, after it received the 10-day notice, discharged 11 employees for their participation in a union meeting, refused to discuss the issue of the discharges, hired several employees as permanent replacements for the striking employees, moved a major program to another site, subcontracted food services, hired a private security agency, refused to meet with the Federal mediator, and refused to participate in mediation as requested by FMCS.

As stated, with respect to the discharge of the 11 employees, I have concluded that that conduct was violative of the Act. However, it should be noted that if the conduct had not been found violative of the Act, an employer's refusal to discuss legitimate discharges during negotiations would not necessarily indicate that an employer was attempting to undermine the collective-bargaining process. As will be discussed below, I do not consider that the Center hired additional employees, as replacements for the strikers. It is clear that employees were hired because of the anticipated takeover of the operation of the Hudson Hotel by the Center and these hirings were unrelated to the strike. Further, for reasons hereafter stated, I do not find that the adult day treatment program was transferred to the Hudson Hotel because of the strike or that the Center actually made arrangements to subcontract food services. The only conduct that I find the Center actually engaged in that could be considered to have an effect on the collective-bargaining process involved Pemberton's refusal to meet with the Federal mediators. Section 8(d)(C) states as follows:

> The parties shall participate fully and promptly in such meetings as may be undertaken by the Service for the purpose of aiding in a settlement of the dispute.

Pemberton admitted that he refused to meet with the Federal mediators both because he did not like the particular mediator and/or because he did not believe that the mediation was necessary. However, it does not appear that Pemberton communicated his belief that mediation was unnecessary to the FMCS. The Act states that the parties shall participate fully and promptly with the FMCS in an effort to resolve a dispute. That language does not indicate that either party has the discretion to decide whether to meet. In these circumstances, I find that Pemberton's refusal to meet with the mediators as required by the Act was conduct calculated to undermine the collective-bargaining process and, therefore, was conduct that released the Union from any obligation that it had to comply with the notice requirements of Section 8(g). Hospital Employees District 1199 (CHC Corp.), 229 NLRB 1010 (1977).

F. Whether the Union Notified the Center of the Delay in the Start of the Strike

As stated above, I have concluded that the Union was released from its obligation to give any notice of its intention to strike. However, I consider it necessary, in the circumstances of this case, to discuss whether the Union did comply with the notice requirements of Section 8(g). Section 8(g) states:

> A labor organization before engaging in any strike, picketing, or other concerted refusal to work at any health care institution shall not less than ten days prior to such action, notify the institution in writing and the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service of that intention. . . . The notice shall state the date and time that such action shall commence. The notice, once given, may be extended by the written agreement of the parties.

The Board has held that with respect to the 10-day notice the requirement that the notice state the time and date when the strike would commence was a mandatory and not a discretionary requirement. Operating Engineers Local 39 (Kaiser Foundation Hospitals), 268 NLRB 115 (1983), enfd. NLRB v. Operating Engineers Local 39, 746 F.2d 530 (9th Cir. 1984); Hospital & Institutional Workers Local 250 (Affiliated Hospitals of San Francisco), 255 NLRB 502, 504 (1981). In Kaiser Foundation Hospitals, the union argued to the Court that the Board had relaxed its literal interpretation of Section 8(g) and in support of that position the union cited the Board's holding in Greater New Orleans, 240 NLRB 432 (1979). The Court rejected that argument and noted the following distinction between the two cases. Greater New Orleans Artificial, the Court stated, involved the issue of the timeliness of the receipt of the notice, a matter not specifically addressed in the statute. On the other hand, Kaiser Foundation Hospitals involved the issue of whether the contents of the notice were in conformity with the specifics required by the statute. The Court held that in Greater New Orleans Artificial the Board had more flexibility in deciding whether the notice was timely, in Kaiser Foundation Hospitals the statute dictated the contents of the 10-day notice and the Board is not free to rewrite the second sentence of Section 8(g). Affiliated Hospitals of San Francisco, supra.

It is the Union's position that it fully complied with the 10-day notice requirements set out in Section 8(g), the notice was in writing, and it specified the time and date when the strike would commence. The evidence supports that position. However, the Union did not commence its strike until 24 hours after the time stated in the notice and the Center contends that it was not notified about this change and the Union, therefore, violated the Act. The issue then is whether the Union was required to notify the Center about the delay in the start of the strike and, if so, whether the notice had to be in writing and had to state the time and date when the strike would start.

As counsel for the Union has stated, the Act does not refer to what notice, if any, a union must give when it delays the start of a strike beyond the date contained in the 10-day notice. However, the legislative history does refer to that issue:

> The 10-day notice is intended to give health care institutions sufficient advance notice of a strike or picketing to permit them to make certain arrangements for continuity of patient care. It is not the intention of the Committee that a labor organization shall be required to commence a strike or picketing at the precise time specified in the notice; on the other hand, it would be inconsistent with the Committee's intent if a labor organization failed to act within a reasonable time after the time specified in the notice. Thus, it would be unreasonable in the Committee's judgment, if a strike or picketing commenced more than 72 hours after the time specified in the notice. In addition, since the purpose of the strike is to give a health care institution advance notice of the actual commencement of a strike or picketing, if a labor organization does not strike at the time specified in the notice, at least 12 hours' notice should be given of the actual time for the commencement of the action.[61]

The legislative history, therefore, establishes that Congress intended to permit a union to postpone unilaterally the start of a strike and to thereafter strike without giving a new 10-day notice provided the union followed certain conditions, i.e., the postponement of the strike could not be more than 72 hours after the time set forth in the initial 10-day notice and the union had to give at least 12 hours' advance notice to the employer of the actual time when the strike would commence. In the instant case, there is no dispute that the first provision was met, the Union struck within 24 hours after the time stated in the 10-day strike notice. Although the Union claims that it gave adequate notice to the Center about the delay in the start of the strike, the Center denies that it received any notice or that it was notified as to the actual time when the strike would commence.

White, Quitcon, Gordon, Baptiste, and Adams testified that at the negotiation meeting on 22 September, White told the Center's representatives that the employees would walk or strike on 29 September. Counsel for the General Counsel contends that the contradictions in the testimony given by these witnesses establishes that no such notification was given. It is true that these witnesses did not all testify precisely the same about White's statements and there was some conflict in their versions about the sequence of events. Nevertheless, I do not find that these contradictions are sufficient to undermine their basic testimony, which was that White said that the employees would walk or strike on 29 September. I credit their testimony not only on my observation of these witnesses, but on my evaluation of the actions of the Center's representatives after that negotiation meeting. On the day following the meeting Pemberton told the board of directors that he did not believe that the strike would start on either Tuesday, 28 September, or Wednesday, 29 September. It is undisputed that until the meeting on 22 September, the only date mentioned for the start of the strike was Tuesday, 28 September. It is significant that it was following the negotiation meeting that Pemberton, for the first time, mentioned Wednesday, 29 September, as a possible date for the strike to commence.

The Center's actions with respect to the security guards also supports the Union's position that they told Pemberton about the delay in the start of the strike. An examination of the logbook shows that the Center did not add additional security guards for the early shift, or for any other shift on 28 September but additional guards were added for 29 September. Further, the logbook contains the notation that a representative of Health and Hospital Corporation referred to the fact that the strike was to be on 29 September, there is no such statement for any entry on 29 September. In view of the fact that this representative was the liaison between the city and the Center, an inference is warranted that he gained his knowledge about when the strike would start from management representatives.

The Center, in support of its position that it was never advised of the delay in the start of the strike, points to the extensive preparation it made for the strike to begin on 28 September. An examination of the testimony given by the Center's representatives reveals that the extent of that preparation was limited to a general discussion about what would happen in the event of a strike. Although Pemberton claimed that on 27 September he discussed a strike plan with management representatives in anticipation of the strike on 28 September, both Charles and Payne denied that there was any such discussion. In fact, Payne claimed that the first preparations that were made for the strike occurred after the strike began. I credit that testimony based on my observation of Payne. Furthermore, Pemberton's own testimony establishes that he did not make preparations for the strike because he did not think one would occur. Thus, Pemberton told the board of directors on 23 September that he did not think there would be a strike on Tuesday, 28 September, or Wednesday, 29 September, and he refused to meet with the mediators because he did not believe that mediation was necessary. Neither Sigraves nor Terri Reid Payne, who allegedly was directed to make arrangements for catering services to provide food at the Hudson Hotel for 28 September, made such arrangements. It is difficult to accept that these supervisory personnel would have failed to follow through with the instructions given to them by the director of the Center. Perhaps the most significant act Pemberton alleged he did in anticipation of a strike on 28 September was to transfer the adult treatment program from the Center to the Hudson Hotel. I do not credit that claim. According to Pemberton, he gave the responsibility for the transfer of this program, including the medical needs of the clients in the program, to Ana Perira. However, Perira was not the supervisor of the clinical portion of the program, that was the responsibility of Norma Burgos. Burgos allegedly was ill when Pemberton spoke to Perira about the transfer of the program. However, this record fails to disclose that Pemberton had discussed this alleged transfer with Burgos at any time before 28 September and there is no evidence that he discussed the transfer with members of her staff before that date. It would appear that if Pemberton, in fact, planned to transfer such a program, he would have made arrangements with Burgos to do so some time before 28 September. There were no such arrangements made because Pemberton did not plan to transfer the program, he did not anticipate that there would be a strike. Pemberton may have discussed with Perira how the Center would conduct its operations at the hotel when it assumed management and control of the hotel on 28 September. Perira had been preparing for that eventuality since July and had spent a considerable part of her time at the hotel. I find that Perira and her staff were at the hotel because the Center was to assume control of the hotel on 28 September and they were not at that location because of the strike. I also find that the employees who were hired were hired in anticipation of this takeover of the hotel and not because of the strike. Although, the Center claimed that it was necessary to transfer the adult treatment program on 28 September because of the strike, there is no evidence that that program was transferred on 29 September when the strike started or was transferred thereafter to the hotel. In sum, I conclude that the Center did not produce convincing evidence that it prepared for the strike to start on 28 September and was lulled into canceling those arrangements because the strike did not start on that day.

Although I find that White did tell Pemberton that the strike would commence on 29 September,[62] the evidence fails to establish that he notified the Center of the actual time when the strike would start. Counsel for the General Counsel contends that this failure to give the specific time when the strike would start is not an insignificant requirement and not a de minimis violation. In support of that argument, counsel has cited several cases. However, an examination of the cases cited by counsel establishes that they refer to the specific details which are required to be included in the 10-day notice and they do not refer to whether the need for such specificity is required with respect to the 12-hour notice. It is true that the legislative history states that the Union should give notice of the actual time when the strike will start; however, I am not convinced that the failure to give the specific hour when the strike would start warrants the conclusion, in the circumstances of this case, that the Union failed to give the proper notice. The Center was on notice from 16 September that the strike would start on 28 September. Six days before the strike was to start, the Union notified the Center that the strike would be delayed 1 day. I do not believe that the failure by the Union to specify the exact hour when the strike would start is sufficient to establish that the Union failed to meet the requirements of Section 8(g). In Greater New Orleans, the Board quoted from comments made by Congressmen Ashbrook and Thompson, which comments were made in the context of a union's notice of the postponement of the initial time set for the start of a strike, a situation present in the instant case. The Board (240 NLRB at 435) quoted as follows:

> The Board, in considering extenuating circumstances, is expected to act in a reasonable manner consistent with the Committee's intent as stated in its Report. Furthermore, the status of strikers as "employees" would also be determined by the decision of the Board. Section 8(d) of the Act, which has been amended by this bill, clearly states "employees" will lose their status as such if they participate in a strike outside of the notice periods. Should the labor organization be in violation of Section 8(g), the employees would then, according to statute, lose their status as "employees." Consequently, the reasonableness of the Board in applying the intent of [62] I do not find that constructive notice by a union would satisfy a union's obligation under Sec. 8(g) of the Act, as contended by counsel for the General Counsel. Therefore, I did not rely on the conversations between supervisors and employees on 28 September to establish that the Union gave the required notice, but those conversations do support the conclusion that the Union notified the Center that the strike would commence on 29 September.

> the Committee to the facts is of major importance. [Emphasis supplied.]

e Board then stated:

> Therefore, the legislative history of the health care amendments demonstrates not only Congress' concern for the continuity of patient care, but also its concern that Section 8(g) not be rigidly applied in light of serious consequences flowing from noncompliance with its provisions, i.e., the strikers' loss of employee status under the Act. We believe that our decision herein satisfies both of these expressed concerns of Congress.

therefore, conclude that it would be unreasonable to d that the 34 employees should lose their status as em- oyees because the Union failed to state the specific our when the strike would start in circumstances where e Center was on notice about the actual day of the rike at least 6 days prior thereto.

G. The Intermittent Picketing

Based on my evaluation of the security logbooks, the ttendance sheet, and lunch sheet records described in etail above, I conclude that the Union picketed continu- usly from September 1982 through August 1983, al- hough as noted above I do not find that the picketing, fter the initial cases were settled, was to protest the dis- charge of the 11 employees.[63]

H. Conclusions

Based on the record in this case, I conclude that the issuance of the disciplinary letters to the employees on 16 September and the discharge of the 11 employees on 20 September because they engaged in protected concerted activities was violative of the Act. I further conclude that when the employees struck on 29 September to protest these violations, at least in part, they were engaged in an unfair labor practice strike and, therefore, the Union was not obligated to give the notices required under Section 8(g) of the Act. Moreover, I find that the Union did comply with the notice requirement of Section 8(g). Therefore, I find that the Center violated Section 8(a)(3) when it discharged the 34 employees who were engaged in protected concerted activities.[64] Finally, I conclude that the Union did not violate the Act as alleged in the complaint.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Washington Heights-West Harlem-Inwood Metal Health Council, Inc., d/b/a The Council's Center for Problems of Living (Center) is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and a health care institution within the meaning of Section 2(14) of the Act.

2. District 1199, National Union of Hospital and Health Care Employees, RWDSU, AFL-CIO (Union) is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By discharging and refusing to reinstate its employees because they engaged in protected concerted activities, the Center has violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

4. The above are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

5. The Union has not violated the Act as alleged.

REMEDY[65]

Having found that the Center has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that the Center cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

I shall recommend also that the Center be required to post the usual notice advising its employees of their rights and the result of this proceeding.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[66]

[63] Counsel for the General Counsel contends that the logbooks are reliable, probative evidence of when the Union picketed. However, as noted, the logbooks did not always reflect the presence of pickets in the period between 29 September and 16 December, a period when it is conceded that the Union engaged in continuous picketing.

[65] The Center's contention that there should not be a backpay remedy because it discharged the 34 strikers after it was advised that the Regional Director would issue the 8(g) complaint is without merit. The Regional Director's decision did not provide an excuse for or mitigation of the Center's conduct. Sav-On-Drugs, supra.

[66] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

ORDER

The Respondent, Washington Heights-West Harlem-Inwood Mental Health Council, Inc., d/b/a The Council's Center for Problems of Living, New York, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discharging its employees or otherwise discriminating against them with respect to their tenure of employment, or any term or condition of employment because they engaged in protected concerted activities on behalf of the Union, or any other labor organization.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of their Section 7 rights.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer immediate and full reinstatement to William Wright, Audrey Singleton, Roslyn Darzy, Barbara Ross, Michael Johnson, Marion Francis, Irma Quitcon, Sandra Powell, Jonny Ramos, Thelma Dije, Deborah Carroll, Mary Pearl Taylor, Wakil Shakur, Carl Baptiste, Lauri Taylor, Charles Vines, Doris Shepperson, Lillian Font, Almarie Simmons, James Rashard, Allen Anderson, Ernest Adams, Ida Newton, Victori Brown, Mercedes Colinet, Mary Harmly, Victoria Anderson, Edith Albatt, Norma Akamatsu, Judith McKenzie, Andaye Dela Cruz, Sandra McFall, Lyn Nortman, Edith Beauchamp, and Azeeza Burston to their former jobs and, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent jobs without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges and make them whole in the manner described in the remedy section. Further, the Center will expunge from its records any reference to the discharge of the above-named employees on 15 April 1983, and notify them in writing that this has been done and that evidence of these unlawful discharges will not be used as a basis for future personnel action against them.

(b) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(c) Post at its New York, New York facility, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[67] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 2, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

IT IS FURTHER RECOMMENDED that the complaint against the Union in Case 2-CG-3[illegible] be dismissed.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT discourage activities on behalf of District 1199, National Union of Hospital and Health Care Employees, RWDSU, AFL-CIO or any other labor organization by discharging our employees or otherwise discriminating against our employees with respect to their tenure of employment, or any term or condition of employment.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of their Section 7 rights.

WE WILL offer immediate and full reinstatement to William Wright, Audrey Singleton, Roslyn Darzy, Barbara Ross, Michael Johnson, Marion Francis, Irma Quitcon, Sandra Powell, Jonny Ramos, Thelma Dye, Deborah Carroll, Mary Pearl Taylor, Wakil Shakur, Carl Baptiste, Lauri Taylor, Charles Vines, Doris Shepperson, Lillian Font, Almarie Simmons, James Rashard, Allen Anderson, Ernest Adams, Ida Newton, Victoria Brown, Mercedes Colinet, Mary Harmley, Victoria Anderson, Edith Albatt, Norma Akamatsu, Judith McKenzie, Andaye Dela Cruz, Sandra McFall, Lynn Nortman, Edith Beauchamp, and Azeeza Burston to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent jobs, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, and make them whole in the manner described in the Remedy. Further WE WILL expunge from our records any reference to the discharge of the above-named employees on 15 April 1983, and notify them in writing that this has been done and that evidence of these discharges will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against them.

July 26, 1988

DECISION ON REVIEW AND ORDER

By Chairman Stephens and Members Johansen, Babson, and Cracraft

Following a hearing, the Regional Director on October 9, 1987, issued his Decision and Order Dismissing Petition. Thereafter the Employer filed a Request for Review of the Regional Director's decision. On December 24, 1987, the Board granted the request for review.

The National Labor Relations Board has reviewed the record in light of the request for review and has decided to affirm the Regional Director.

The Employer is engaged in the fabrication and sale of custom metal products. The Employer and the Union have had a collective-bargaining relationship for at least the past 20 years.[1] The most recent collective-bargaining agreement runs from September 1, 1987, to August 31, 1989. It contains a union-security provision.

The Petitioner, Tony Tettleton, has worked for the Employer since March 1968. He spends a minimum of 80 percent of his time performing unit work. He is a union member, pays union dues, and votes in union elections.[2] Subsequent to the filing of the deauthorization petition on September 11, 1987, the Union argued that Tettleton was a supervisor and thus ineligible to file the petition.

In his decision, the Regional Director determined that Tettleton was a statutory supervisor and was therefore ineligible to file the deauthorization petition. We agree.

We find that Tettleton is a supervisor under Section 2(11) of the Act.[3] Tettleton is responsible for assigning work to the unit employees, and he utilizes independent judgment to do so. When a work order is given to him by Foreman Keeter, Tettleton assigns the task to from six to eight employees based on his assessment of the skill level required by the work order, his knowledge of the skill level possessed by the individual employees, and the availability of the employees to work on the order. He has also transferred work from one employee to another. He can also instruct the unit employees to correct flaws in their work.

Tettleton also makes effective recommendations on discharges. He informs Foreman Keeter and Vice President Lehar of the progress of the unit employees. He also gives Keeter and Lehar his estimation of the employees' skill levels and whether they can perform the required work. After Tettleton expressed dissatisfaction with the work of employees Gates and Hamilton, they were terminated. There is no evidence that the Employer conducted an independent investigation to verify Tettleton's evaluations.

As noted, the Regional Director found that as a supervisor, Tettleton was barred from filing the deauthorization petition. We agree with the Regional Director's result but note that the Board has never directly addressed this question.[4]

After examining the language of Section 9(e) of the Act,[5] we find that a statutory supervisor is precluded from filing a deauthorization petition. This holding is consistent with our prior decisions precluding a statutory supervisor from participating in matters that concern solely the relationship between the employees and their collective-bargaining representative. Interpreting the former Section 9(e)(1) of the Act,[6] the Board in St. Paul & Tacoma Lumber Co., 81 NLRB 434 (1949), concluded that supervisors could not vote in union-shop authorization elections. The Board reasoned that as Congress had decided to let only "employees" vote in an election to authorize a union-shop agreement and as a supervisor was not an employee within the meaning of the Act, the supervisor was precluded from voting in the election. Having found that

[1] The unit description in the most recent contract is: All full-time and part-time production and maintenance employees employed by Rose Metal Products, but excluding professional employees, office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

[2] For purposes of our analysis, we have assumed arguendo that Tettleton is a unit member.

[3] The Regional Director also determined that Tettleton possessed apparent authority to act on behalf of the Employer and was therefore an agent of the Employer. We find it unnecessary to reach this determination as we have found that Tettleton is a statutory supervisor.

[4] We disavow the Regional Director's reliance on Hydraulics Unlimited Mfg. Co., 107 NLRB 1646 (1954), and Helena Cable T.V., 249 NLRB 542 (1980), as supporting the proposition that a supervisor is ineligible to file a petition under Sec. 9(e)(1). In both cases, the Board found that the individuals filing the petitions were not representatives of the employer, but were employees eligible to file a deauthorization petition. In neither case did the Board decide whether a supervisor is eligible to file a deauthorization petition pursuant to Sec. 9(e)(1).

> Upon the filing with the Board, by 30 per centum or more of the employees in a bargaining unit covered by an agreement between their employer and labor organization made pursuant to Section 8(a)(3), of a petition alleging they desire that such authorization be rescinded, the Board shall take a secret ballot of the employees in such unit and certify the results thereof to such labor organization and to the employer.

[6] Sec. 9(e) of the Act, which provided for elections to authorize and rescind union-shop agreements, was enacted by Congress as part of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947. Former Sec. 9(e)(1), which provided for elections to authorize these agreements, was repealed in 1951. Pub. L. 189-534 § (c), 65 Stat. 601 (1951). Congress eliminated the necessity for these elections because they had proven expensive and burdensome for the Board, and because they had almost always resulted in a vote favoring the union shop. H. Rep. 1082, 82d Cong., 1st Sess. 2-3, reprinted in 1951 U.S. Code Cong. & Ad. News 2379, 2381.

Congress did not intend to permit supervisors to vote in elections to authorize such agreements, we believe that it would be anomalous to conclude that Congress gave supervisors the right to file petitions to rescind such agreements.

Furthermore, the Board relied on similar reasoning to find that a supervisor could not file a decertification petition in Doak Aircraft Co., 107 NLRB 924 (1954). The Board noted that Section 9(c)(1)(A),[7] which provides for the right to file a decertification petition, refers only to "employees" filing such petitions. Declaring that one purpose of the Act was to delineate supervisors as representatives of management, the Board concluded that permitting supervisors to act as employee representatives by filing such petitions would defeat the Act's purpose because supervisors would then be faced with a divided allegiance to the employees and to management.

We are persuaded that Congress was guided by the same considerations in enacting the present Section 9(e)(1). Section 9(e)(1) refers to a deauthorization petition filed by "30 per centum or more of the employees in a bargaining unit." (Emphasis added.) We do not discern any indication that Congress was not equally concerned with the problem of divided allegiance in the situation when a supervisor files a deauthorization petition.

We therefore reaffirm our holdings in St. Paul & Tacoma Lumber, and in Doak Aircraft and subsequent cases,[8] that Congress did not intend to include supervisors under the term "employees" in Section 9(e) and Section 9(c)(1)(A). We thereby preclude the anomalous situation of a supervisor/-petitioner being a party in decertification and deauthorization cases. As a party, the supervisor/-petitioner could call, examine and cross-examine witnesses, file objections to the elections, and file requests for review. The supervisor/petitioner would act as the representative of the unit members but simultaneously would be an agent of the employer. Our holding today precludes a conflict arising under Section 9(e), just as Doak Aircraft foreclosed it under Section 9(c)(1)(A).[9]

Contrary to the Employer, we do not find Montgomery Ward, 115 NLRB 645 (1956), and its progeny[10] controlling. In Montgomery Ward Supervisor DuFour was a unit member and had been allowed to vote in the representation election by agreement of the employer and the union. The Board determined that DuFour's fellow employees viewed him as "one of themselves." Therefore the Board concluded that certain statements made by DuFour did not intimidate the unit employees and were not attributable to the employer. Thus, DuFour's statements did not violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

That line of cases is not inconsistent with Doak Aircraft, nor our holding today because the Montgomery Ward line of cases concern different concepts under the Act. Montgomery Ward concerned an alleged violation of Section 8(a)(1). The Board determined whether the employer "interfere[d] with, restrain[ed], or coerce[d] employees" in the exercise of their Section 7 rights. That determination turned on whether the supervisor's actions could coerce employees because they feared retaliation from management and, thus, whether the actions inhibited the exercise of their Section 7 rights. The finding that the employees viewed the supervisor as "one of themselves" and that management had not authorized his actions indicated that the employees could not feel coerced or intimidated. That issue is different from the one of whether a supervisor should act as a representative of the employees by filing a decertification or as here, a deauthorization petition on their behalf. The issue in Montgomery Ward, therefore, was employer liability for the conduct of its supervisor. As stated in Doak Aircraft, which we have reaffirmed today, a supervisor may not file such a petition because he is a member of management and may not engage in activities that would create the possibility of a divided allegiance. That determination is fully consistent with Montgomery Ward. Indeed, the Board emphasized in Montgomery Ward that the supervisor who was a unit member remained "an arm of management."

In light of our analysis and determination that Tettleton is a supervisor, we conclude that Tettleton was not eligible to file a deauthorization petition. Accordingly, we shall affirm the Regional Director's Decision and Order, and shall dismiss the petition.

ORDER

It is ordered that the petition is dismissed.

[7] The pertinent language of Sec. 9(c)(1)(A) is:

> (c)(1) Whenever a petition shall have been filed, in accordance with such regulations as may be prescribed by the Board—(A) by an employee or group of employees or any individual or labor organization acting in their behalf . . . .

[8] See, e.g., Times-Herald, 253 NLRB 524 fn. 1 (1980).

[9] Sec. 102.83 of the Board's Rules and Regulations provides further support for our conclusion. That section, in relevant part, states that a "petition to rescind the authority of a labor organization to make an agreement requiring as a condition of employment membership in such labor organization may be filed by an employee or group of employees on behalf of 30 percent or more of the employees in the bargaining unit covered by such an agreement." SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On November 17, 1986, Administrative Law Judge William F. Jacobs issued the attached supplemental decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a brief in support of its exceptions. The Charging Parties also filed exceptions and the Respondent filed a brief in opposition to the Charging Parties' exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the supplemental decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions[3] as modified, and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.[4]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Local 282, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL-CIO, Flushing, New York, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

Elliot J. Mandel, Esq., for the General Counsel.

J. Warren Mangan, Esq. (O'Connor & Mangan, P.C.), of Long Island City, New York, and Franklin K. Moss, Esq. (Cohen, Weiss & Simon), of New York, New York, for the Respondent.

Arthur Z. Schwartz and Daniel E. Clifton, Esqs. (Clifton & Schwartz), of New York, New York, for the Charging Parties.

Robert M. Ziskin, Esq. (Kimmel & Ziskin), of Melville, New York, for Hendrickson Brothers.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

WILLIAM F. JACOBS, Administrative Law Judge. This is a supplemental proceeding[1] to determine what, if anything, is due to the discriminatees under the make-whole order issued in these consolidated cases.[2] More specifically, there is the question concerning the amount of backpay and other benefits due John Kuebler and Charles Curd for losses they may have suffered by reason of Respondent's discriminatory implementation of

---

[1] On November 1, 1987, the Teamsters International Union was readmitted to the AFL-CIO. Accordingly, the caption has been amended to reflect that change.

[2] The judge made the following inadvertent factual errors that we find do not affect his ultimate conclusions. Contrary to the judge's statement, discriminatee Curd requested equipment trailer work on more than one occasion since his reinstatement. It was discriminatee Curd, not Kuebler, who testified that if he were still working at Willets and his Union told him to work behind the picket line, he would have done so. The judge failed to mention that Curd initially failed to report earnings from RCR, a construction company.

[3] The General Counsel listed earnings from Curd's cab and RCR employment as interim earnings only to the extent that, absent the discrimination, Curd's employment at Willets on particular days would have precluded employment with these employers. Other earnings from these employers were not listed as interim earnings, but as supplemental income not set off against gross backpay, inasmuch as they were considered earnings from a second job that he also held prior to the unfair labor practice and that he continued to hold during the backpay period. The Respondent excepts to those portions of the cab and RCR earnings that were treated as supplemental income. We find that the General Counsel was correct in her determination that portions of the cab and RCR earnings constituted supplemental income. Cumberland Farms Dairy of New York, 266 NLRB 855 (1983).

We adopt the judge's conclusion, to which no exceptions have been filed, that under the circumstances of this case, Curd and Kuebler did not waive their rights to obtain backpay from the Respondent Union by demanding that it withdraw its arbitration request to Willets Point and by signing general releases concerning that arbitration. We, therefore, find it unnecessary to pass on the judge's reliance on Michael M. Schaefer, 261 NLRB 272 (1982), enfd. 697 F.2d 558 (3d Cir. 1983), rehearing denied 702 F.2d 57 (1983). We also note that the judge's June 19, 1986 Decision and Order, cited by him at sec. I,6, par. 2 of his supplemental decision, was reversed by the Board in Teamsters Local 282 (Willets Point Contracting), 288 NLRB 56 (1988). This reversal does not affect the outcome of this case.

[4] We find that the judge made the following errors in his computation of backpay. The judge inadvertently calculated gross backpay, annuity, and pension fund contributions through June 30, 1983, 2 months past the May 2, 1983 reinstatement of the discriminatees. The computation for this quarter should, therefore, be recalculated, using a daily computation. Further, the record establishes that Curd earned $200 when he drove a truck to Florida on July 27, 1977, and that this trip continued through July 28. The judge erroneously failed to include these interim earnings in his calculations. Finally, the judge, in his supplemental order and in his appendix B, inadvertently calculated Curd's cab and RCR interim earnings based on the General Counsel's rejected backpay formula, rather than the Christman formula, which the judge in his decision had adopted.

their referral arrangement and the question whether contributions should be made on behalf of Kuebler and Curd to the Local 282 Health and Welfare, Annuity, and Pension Funds. The instant proceeding was held before me on various dates between 13 August 1984 and 4 October 1985 in Brooklyn, New York, based on a backpay specification that issued 29 July 1983 and an amended backpay specification that issued 23 September 1983.[3] All parties were afforded opportunity to participate in the hearing, to present evidence, examine witnesses, and to argue orally. Briefs were filed by the parties.

Issues

The issues are framed by the pleadings—the Region's amended backpay specification and Respondent's answer thereto that contains numerous affirmative defenses—all considered in light of the record and the legal arguments and citations included in the briefs.

The Backpay Specification Formula

1. Whether the Regional Director properly issued the backpay specification in accordance with the Board's Rules and Regulations and Compliance Manual.
2. Whether the formula selected by the Region in drafting the backpay specification is reasonable and appropriate or whether one of the four alternative formulas suggested by the Respondent would be more accurate and therefore preferable.
3. Whether the Woolworth formula should be used under the circumstances of this case and, if so, in what periods of time.

Additional Affirmative Defenses[4]

1. Whether union dues and assessments should be subtracted from backpay owed.
2. Whether Kuebler and Curd obtained substantially equivalent employment at Hendrickson Brothers.
3. Whether Kuebler and Curd waived their backpay claims by:
   (a) Demanding that the Union withdraw its arbitration request, and (b) signing general releases without reservation.
4. Whether Curd willfully concealed interim earnings and is therefore not entitled to backpay for those quarters in which he did so.
5. Whether Kuebler and Curd failed to make adequate efforts to mitigate damages by:
   (a) Failing to seek interim employment during certain quarters, and (b) voluntarily being absent an excessive number of days at their interim employers.
6. Whether Hendrickson Brothers is either soley or primarily liable for damages caused by its discharge of Kuebler and Curd.
7. Whether the fringe benefit computations in the Region's backpay specification are correct.
8. Whether the backpay claim is punitive and would endanger the Union's continuing viability.

On the entire record in this case, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BACKPAY SPECIFICATION FORMULA

1. In Respondent's first affirmative defense, as contained in its answer to the Region's backpay specification, Respondent asserts that the Regional Director failed to comply with the requirements of Section 102.52 and 102.53(a) of the Board's Rules and Regulations and of paragraph 10532.3(m) of the Board's Compliance Manual. Although this defense appears in Respondent's answer it is neither discussed nor argued in its brief. It would appear that the Respondent has abandoned this defense.

Section 102.52 deals with the issuance of the backpay specification and notice of hearing while Section 102.53(a) discusses the content of the backpay specification. The Regional Director has complied with both sections of the Board's Rules and Regulations.

Section 10532.3(m) of the Board's Compliance Manual requires that a copy of the backpay computation be sent to the Respondent together with a letter requesting payment. The record clearly indicates that the Regional Office sent a copy of the backpay specification to the Respondent, that the same was received by Respondent, and, indeed, that Respondent acknowledged receipt thereof. The Regional Director complied with the Rules and Regulations and with the Board's Compliance Manual and I shall recommend that Respondent's first affirmative defense pleading to the contrary be rejected.

2. On 15 August 1980 the Board issued its Decision and Order in the underlying case.[5] The Order provided inter alia:

> (b) Request Willets Point Contracting Corp. to immediately and fully reinstate John Kuebler and Charles Curd to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed.
> (c) Make whole John Kuebler and Charles Curd for any loss of pay and other benefits they may have suffered by reason of Respondent Union's discriminatory action in causing their discharge from Willets Point Contracting Corp. and its discriminatory failure and refusal to refer them to work assignments. In the event that that employer reinstate the above-named employees as requested, pay them backpay for all days they would have worked between October 21, 1977, and the date of their reinstatement. In the event that that employer will not reinstate them, continue to pay them backpay until such time as they have found substantially equivalent employment. Backpay with interest thereon shall be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950),

[3] The General Counsel's motion to amend backpay specification made at the hearing was granted.

[4] Although Respondent's answer contains 16 affirmative defenses, several are repetitive, and deal with the same subjects as contained in others.

> (d) In conjunction with Respondent Employers, with Respondent Union primarily liable, make whole John Kuebler and Charles Curd for any loss of pay and other benefits they may have suffered by reason of Respondent Union's discriminatory implementation of its referral system arrangement with Respondent Employers from July 25, 1977, to October 21, 1977. Backpay shall be computed in the manner set forth above. Further, in conjunction with Respondent Employers, with Respondent Union primarily liable, make whole the above-named employees by making contributions on their behalf to the Union's health and welfare and pension funds.[7]

The procedure chosen by the Region to effectuate the Board's Order consists of examining the seniority list of Willets Point Contracting Corp., where Kuebler and Curd would have been employed but for the discrimination against them, and ascertaining which employees were junior to them during the backpay period. As the individual who prepared the backpay specification, Field Examiner Comstock testified she examined Willet's shape sheets to see which of these junior employees were being referred to Frank Mascali Construction. She then looked up the earnings of those employees in the Mascali ledger and credited Kuebler and Curd with those earnings. Where the junior employees were sent to employers other than Mascali, and Comstock did not have access to their records, she assumed that the junior employees would work an 8-hour day and multiplied the hourly wage provided by the Teamsters Local 282 contract by the assumed number of hours worked to determine earnings. Comstock examined Willet's payroll records for the period 21 October 1977 through 2 May 1983, which showed for every one of its employees which days he worked and in most cases how many hours. Then, using the Willets' seniority list, Comstock determined which employees were immediately junior to Kuebler and Curd and substituted those employees' earnings for Kuebler and Curd on days when Kuebler and Curd should have worked. Comstock determined Kuebler's and Curd's places on the seniority list by referring to the underlying Decision and Order.

The backpay specification takes into account the days of work that should have been made available to Kuebler and Curd for the entire backpay period and those days that Kuebler and Curd testified to being unavailable. Interim earnings were also computed and deducted from gross backpay.

The General Counsel and Charging Party take the position that the backpay specification issued by the Region is reasonable, appropriate, and follows the mandate of the Board. According to Comstock, the formula used by the Region was selected because there were so many variables to be considered. Thus, the various drivers worked under different contracts from time to time, sometimes the excavation contract, at other times the materials contract. There were also different amounts of overtime worked by different drivers. There was premium pay for driving the equipment trailer and for towing. Because of the numerous variables, to simplify the backpay specification, the Region decided simply to take the earnings paid by Willets to the employees immediately junior in seniority to Kuebler and Curd and use such earnings as a basis for finding the gross earnings that Kuebler and Curd might have earned but for the discrimination against them. Whichever of these employers worked a particular day, his earnings were used in the computation.

The Region rejected the use of the formula suggested in the compliance manual in which a discriminatee's predischarge earnings are averaged and projected into the postdischarge period because the use of such a formula presupposes that employment throughout the backpay period remains steady, that it not be seasonal, and that the seniority position of the discriminatee involved remain constant. However, Frances Comstock, the Board agent who investigated the backpay situation and who formulated the backpay specification, testified that following the discriminatory failure to refer the discriminatees and their subsequent discharge, work opportunities increased at Willets Point, the construction industry being seasonal, and Kuebler and Curd moved far up the seniority list so that use of such a formula would not be equitable to the discriminatees.

Counsel for the Respondent, in his brief, agrees with the Charging Parties' counsel that an administrative law judge may adopt the General Counsel's formula so long as a rational basis exists for the formula used.[8] He states correctly, however, that when Respondent has presented alternative formulas the Board requires that the administrative law judge make recommendations to the Board concerning the most accurate method of determining the amounts.[9] That I intend to do.

Rather than my adopting the Region's formula, which Respondent terms irrational, Respondent urges that I adopt any one of four formulas contained in the Compliance Manual. Respondent charges that instead of taking the earnings of one representative employee or averaging the earnings of a group of representative employees, the Region's formula aggregates the earnings of junior employees and presumes that "Kuebler and Curd were available for work 365 days a year (including weekends) during the backpay period, and that they would in every case have been qualified and willing to accept all available overtime work, and to perform equipment trailer work which they did not perform prior to the backpay period or after its conclusion."

Respondent points out that as a consequence of the Region's methodology the gross backpay claimed by the General Counsel for Curd and Kuebler far exceeds the actual earnings of employees with much greater seniority than they, and who historically, both before and since the backpay period, have worked more regularly, sought more overtime, and earned much more than Kuebler and Curd.

Regarding Respondent's position concerning the failure of the Region's formula to take into account probable absences of Kuebler and Curd during the backpay period, Comstock admitted in her testimony that she relied soley on the testimony of the discriminatees, that if they said they would have been available for work, she credited them with whatever earnings any one of the junior employees who happened to work that day would have earned. She also admitted that she did not compare the amounts credited to Kuebler and Curd as gross backpay to amounts earned by senior employees. Rather, she stated that even if she had made such comparisons and found that she had credited them with greater earnings than more senior employees, she would merely have assumed that senior employees would have turned down available work that Kuebler and Curd were available for and willing to perform. Comstock testified that this assumption would have been made on the basis of resolving all doubts in favor of the discriminatees.

While under examination by Respondent's counsel, Comstock testified that she did not ask Kuebler or Curd whether they were ready, willing, and able to work at Willets Point each day, rather she asked them to identify any day when they were not ready, willing, or able to work. Their replies were that there were no such days. She also testified that she asked them if they were available for work every day that work was available for them at their interim employer, Hendrickson Brothers, and they replied in the affirmative that there were no days when they were not ready or willing or able to work. Under cross-examination, however, Kuebler freely admitted that there were a few times when work was available at Hendrickson Brothers when he did not shape because he was campaigning for union office, was ill, or was involved in litigation at the NLRB. Comstock testified that if she had been aware at the time she formulated the backpay specification that either Kuebler or Curd had missed work at Hendrickson Brothers because of illness not related to employment she would not have credited them with gross backpay due for those days.

Based on the testimony of Kuebler and Comstock, Respondent urges[10] that because the Region's formula does not take into consideration the discriminatees' absences, it is unreasonable and should be rejected in favor of one of those suggested in its brief and in the Compliance Manual because each of the formulas contain "normal or average amounts of absenteeism built into the computation."[11] I find Respondent's argument persuasive and one reason for rejecting the Region's formula in favor of one of the standard formulas suggested by Respondent.

A second argument put forth by Respondent for rejecting the Region's formula concerns its presumption that Kuebler and Curd would have been equipment trailer drivers. The record indicates that equipment trailer drivers receive a preminum pay and substantial overtime, working sometimes 15 or 16 hours a day. The drivers of 10-wheelers and flat trucks do not receive nearly as much overtime.

During the backpay investigation Comstock asked Kuebler whether he had ever operated an equipment trailer for Willets prior to his discharge. He told her that he had not. Kuebler, at the hearing, testified that he had never driven the trailer nor ever claimed the right to do so. Frank Daly, a member of Willets' management familiar with the duties of its employees, confirmed in his testimony that Kuebler never drove the equipment trailer, never was taught how to do so, and never expressed any interest in learning how to drive either the equipment trailer or the equipment carried thereon.

Since Kuebler's return to Willets he has been driving a flat truck and occasionally a 10-wheeler. At times when Kuebler had an opportunity to make more money driving a 10-wheeler, he turned down the opportunity in favor of driving the flat truck. He has also, on occasion, refused opportunities to work overtime and to accept available night premium work.

On the basis of the fact that Kuebler never drove an equipment trailer either before his discharge or after his return to Willets and his disinclination, at times, to accept premium work or overtime, Respondent argues that it is too speculative to credit him with backpay based on the equipment trailer rate. Comstock testified that although she felt that crediting Kuebler with the equipment trailer rate was speculative, she nevertheless did so because she did not know for certain that Kuebler would not have been given the trailer work before the junior employees, or made a claim for it. Nor did she know whether Willets would have trained him to perform such work.

She testified that the question of awarding Kuebler the equipment trailer work was resolved in his favor because when there are ambiguities they are resolved in favor of the discriminatee rather than the wrongdoer.

Although I am aware of the line of cases[12] that stands for the proposition that "the backpay claimant should receive the benefit of any doubt rather than the Respondent, the wrongdoer responsible for the existence of any uncertaintly and against whom any uncertaintly must be resolved," the application of that doctrine to the set of circumstances here extant would be unjust. To credit Kuebler with an equipment trailer rate when he had never performed such work before his discharge nor after his return, was not trained to operate the equipment he might have to carry, and showed no interest in operating the equipment trailer based on the mere possibility that he might have done so had he not been discharged strains the proposition beyond the bounds intended by the Board. It is far more likely that, but for the discriminatory actions of the Respondent, Kuebler would have continued to drive the flat truck and 10-wheeler just as he had before his discharge and after his reinstatement.

Like Kuebler, Curd did not drive an equipment trailer[13] for Willets either before his discharge or after his reinstatement. He did not drive an equipment trailer for Hendrickson Brothers nor did he ask to drive one. After reinstatement at Willets, Curd asked Daly for equipment trailer work. Daly replied that Curd was not qualified. Although Curd insisted that he was qualified, Daly refused Curd's request because in order to be able to drive the equipment trailer, the driver must not only know how to operate the tractor trailer itself, but must also be able to load and unload it. That is, he must also be able to drive the various pieces of equipment onto and off of the trailer. He must know, as well, something about the mechanics of the equipment so that when he is alone at the worksite at 4 or 5 a.m. and has to start the equipment, he must know what to do if an engine will not start. Daly testified that to learn to operate the various pieces of equipment, asphalt spreaders, dynahoes, graders, rollers, shovel loaders, etc., as well as the equipment trailer itself, it is a matter of experience. This experience is gained by accompanying an experienced equipment driver and learning from him on the learner's own time. Curd never asked Daly, who handles such matters, if he could learn to operate the various pieces of equipment in this way. Daly credibly testified that he had never seen Curd on the equipment trailer.

Although Curd, on the one occasion since his reinstatement, requested equipment trailer work, he had never done so before. When told by Daly that he was not qualified, Curd did not pursue the matter. He filed no grievance over the matter nor did he make a claim for the work when more junior employees were given the work he had requested. Finally, there is no indication that Curd attempted, as did other employees, to get the experience necessary to thoroughly learn how to operate the various pieces of equipment to qualify for the equipment trailer driver's job.

Because neither Kuebler nor Curd was qualified to operate the equipment trailer, nor seriously attempted to obtain the experience necessary for qualification either before his discharge or after his reinstatement, I find no basis for concluding that they would have been qualified or would have attempted to become qualified during the backpay period. Therefore, I find that the Region erred when it awarded Kuebler and Curd equipment trailer rates in its backpay specification. These unwarranted awards are persuasively a second reason for rejecting the Region's formula in favor of one of the standard formulas.

A third argument put forth by Respondent for rejecting the Region's formula concerns its presumption that Curd and Kuebler would have volunteered to be strikebreakers and work behind the picket lines at Aqueduct and Belmont Racetracks during the first and second quarters of 1979.

Sometime in 1974 a dissident organization within Local 282, FORE (Fear of Reprisal Ends) was founded. Its purpose was the reform of Local 282. To accomplish this purpose FORE distributed leaflets and periodically published newsletters critical of the Union's leadership. It also fielded slates of candidates during Local 282 elections in opposition to the incumbent leadership. In January 1977 Kuebler joined FORE and in June, Curd also joined.

In January 1978 there was a strike at Aqueduct and Belmont Racetracks and picket lines were established by the striking union, IBEW Local 3. Willets had the snow removal contract for both racetracks and made work available behind the picket line for its own employees and outside employees as well. Some of Willets' employees, including members of Local 282, chose to go through the picket line to work at the tracks.

On 15 February 1978 Walter Kudla, a member of FORE, wrote a letter to the president of Local 282, John Cody, charging that secretary-treasurer of Local 282, Robert Sasso, had given his permission to Willets' steward, Robert Worhacz, to have Willets' employees, members of Local 282, go through the picket lines at the racetracks and perform work that had previously been performed by the strikers. Kudla termed the strikebreakers "SCABS." In the May 1978 issue of the FORE newsletter, Kudla's letter was published, clearly placing FORE in opposition to Local 282's sanctioning of the strikebreaking activities of the membership. Although neither Kuebler nor Curd were mentioned in connection with the strikebreaking issue, another article in the same newsletter covered their longstanding feud with Worhacz and other members of Local 282's leadership.

In September 1978, FORE published another newsletter. Under the heading, "Reasons FORE Retiring Cody Sasso & Company" the article listed a number of grievances including the following paragraph:

> Secretary-Treasurer Robert Sasso allowed employee's [sic] of Willets Point Construction to cross a sanctioned picket line at Aqueduct & Belmont Race Tracks. This scab action was led by one of Sasso's top henchman, Shop Steward Robert Worhacz.

Neither Kuebler nor Curd, nor anyone else for that matter, signed this article. However, their names appear elsewhere in the newsletter in connection with other articles critical of Local 282's leadership and Curd testified that Worhacz had made the members cross the picket line and he was not happy about Worhacz leading this scab action.

In the last quarter of 1978, Kuebler and Curd were engaged in running for union office on behalf of the FORE faction against the incumbents. Kuebler ran for vice president of Local 282, Curd for delegate trustee. During their campaign for office neither Kuebler nor Curd took issue with any of the positions of FORE as reflected by the newsletter articles of May and September 1978.

[13] In the late 60s or early 70s Curd drove the tractor that was on the equipment trailer while on a job on Staten Island "all over the place." He also moved equipment "a couple of times" in East Meadow, Long Island. He testified that he had driven certain pieces of equipment "a long time ago" but had never driven other types of equipment. On one occasion, after being reinstated, an experienced equipment trailer driver let Curd take over the operation of the tractor for a few minutes. Curd told Daly about this when he asked for tractor trailer work. This, however, was the extent of Curd's experience.

In the winter of 1979 Willets again contracted to supply operating engineers and chauffeurs to work behind picket lines at Belmont and Aqueduct Racetracks where once again racetrack employees were on strike. Once again Willets offered this work first to its own employees, then to outside workmen. Kuebler testified, regarding this period, that much later, during the 1981 election campaign, when he was running once again for union office, he referred back to the period in 1979 when employees worked behind the picket line at the tracks and termed such work, "scab work." Kuebler explained, however, that if he termed such work, "scab work that shouldn't be performed by any union member," he did so in one of the newsletters, and was campaigning at the time and that "all is fair in love and war." He thus implied that this remarks should be merely considered campaign puffing and that whatever he said about working behind the picket line being scab work should be taken with a grain of salt and that had he been given the chance, he would have accepted the job himself. On another occasion, while testifying, Kuebler took an even more affirmative position stating that he would have gone through the picket line because he had been blackballed by the Union, was on the street and starving, and could have earned $17,000 for 7-1/2 weeks' work.

Curd testified in a fashion somewhat similar to Kuebler. He stated that IBEW Local 3 took a lot of jobs away from Local 282 and defied Local 282's picket line. Curd testified in explanation, "This is one of Sasso's reasons for getting even with them (Local 3). Basically it's an election year and I can yell about that because we weren't there and its an election. We tried to zing them with it." When asked if he agreed with what Sasso did, Curd replied:

> To an extent I did. Like I said, it shouldn't have went that far. We should have never let Local 3 get away with what they did. They took our jobs away and they took Teamsters jobs away and everything and they crossed our picket lines. Basically, what this is is an eye for an eye. Its [sic] not a Teamster local. If it was a Teamster Local, you don't cross their picket line, but this is not another Teamster Local . . . . As long as the Secretary-Treasurer of this Local orders me to cross the picket line, I'm going to cross it.

From the testimony and other record evidence cited, Respondent argues that in the absence of discrimination if Kuebler had continued to work at Willets, it is inconceivable that he would have compromised his publicly proclaimed principles and worked as a strikebreaker. Regarding Curd, Respondent argues that although Curd has no such principles and is capable of lying and being hypocritical, his closeness to and his respect for Kuebler would not permit him to go through the picket line if Kuebler refused to do so. However, Respondent's testimony when he said that if he were still working at Willets and his Union told him to work behind the picket line, he would have done so. If Kuebler would have worked behind the picket line, so would Curd. To this extent, the Region's formula is acceptable, but the use of any one of the four standard formulas is not inconsistent with this finding.

Respondent argues in the alternative that even if Kuebler and Curd would have worked as strikebreakers, the General Counsel's formula presupposes that Kuebler and Curd would have worked behind the picket line 7 days a week, 24 hours a day, for 2 months. Respondent points out that since no other member of Local 282 undertook such a grueling schedule, such a presumption is not well founded. In support of this contention Respondent points out that initially only one employee of Willets chose to work at the track behind the picket line and when others joined him, they all worked on an intermittent basis. Indeed the record shows that only a few employees worked the 24-hour schedule for as much as a few weeks. Most worked 2 weeks or less of the 24-hour schedule. In determining how much of the work done behind the picket line should be credited as backpay for Kuebler and Curd, I shall take into consideration Respondent's argument that no other employee worked a 24-hour schedule for the entire period during which the racetrack work was available.

A fourth argument put forth by Respondent for rejecting the Region's formula is that it is punitive in nature in that it results in Kuebler and Curd receiving far more than they would if any one of the traditional formulas were used. Respondent argues that when Comstock compared the amount of backpay due the discriminatees under the Region's formula with the amount that they earned prior to their discharge, a substantial difference, the backpay due being far in excess of the amounts earned prior to the discharge, she should have abandoned the formula used and replaced it with one of the traditional formulas. Respondent argues that her failure to do so was unfair to Respondent. Comstock, however, in her testimony, stated that she chose to keep the Region's formula because her evaluation was made from the standpoint of what would be fair to the Respondent.

The General Counsel points out, as noted above, that predischarge earnings would not have been an appropriate basis for a formula because job opportunities at Willets increased substantially during the backpay period and Kuebler's and Curd's place on the seniority list improved drastically during the backpay period. Therefore, to simply use the predischarge earnings as a basis for a formula would not put Kuebler and Curd in the position they would have been in but for the discrimination against them, but rather would unfairly penalize them. I believe that the General Counsel has the better of the argument and that it would have been unfair to Kuebler and Curd to use their predischarge earnings as a basis for the backpay formula.

Respondent argues further that before adopting the formula eventually used in the backpay specification, the compliance officer and Ms. Comstock should have compared the gross backpay awarded to Kuebler and Curd with the pay that other more senior employees earned during the backpay period. If this had been done, Respondent posits, it would have been determined that Kuebler and Curd were being credited with backpay far in excess of that earned by employees senior to them and that the formula used was unreasonable.

Comstock testified that she made no such comparison and was not obligated to do so. She stated that it is quite conceivable that under certain circumstances Kuebler and Curd could legitimately have earned more during the backpay period than employees with more seniority.

Without deciding that the compliance officer had any obligation to compare the backpay sums awarded to Kuebler and Curd with those earned by more senior employees, I find that the record reflects that this is the case and that this fact is some indication that the Region's formula may not be a reasonable one. Indeed, the fact that Kuebler's and Curd's calculated backpay is higher than the pay actually earned by more senior employees during the backpay period is merely the product of Comstock's failure to take into consideration the discriminatees' probable absences and her crediting them with trailer work that they never would have performed.

It is well established that any formula that approximates what the discriminatees would have earned had they not been discriminated against is acceptable if it is not unreasonable or arbitrary under the circumstances.[14] The Board is vested with broad discretion in selecting a backpay formula appropriate to the circumstances of a particular case. Where awards may be only close approximations, the Board may adopt formulas reasonably designed to produce such approximations.[15]

In keeping with these principles the General Counsel and the Charging Parties would have me adopt the Region's formula as a reasonable approximation of what Kuebler and Curd would have earned but for the discrimination practiced against them. However, even keeping in mind the well-established principle that, when there are uncertainties or ambiguities, doubts should be resolved in favor of the wronged party rather than the wrongdoer,[16] there are, in my opinion, reasons discussed above for determining that perhaps the Regions' formula should not be used to determine the amount of backpay due the discriminatees. On the basis of these reasons, I choose to adopt one of the four formulas proffered by Respondent rather than the one chosen by the Region's compliance officers. Indeed, it is not only my duty to determine, under these specific circumstances, whether the backpay formula proposed by the General Counsel is a proper method of determining amounts due, but also my duty to determine which of several conflicting backpay formulas is the most accurate method of determining backpay amounts.[17]

In my opinion, the General Counsel's formula, for reasons stated above, produces backpay calculations far in excess of the wages Kuebler and Curd would have earned if they had continued in the employ of Willets without having been discriminatorily discharged. Of the four standard formulas offered in its stead by Respondent, I agree with Respondent that the formula that uses Christman's income as its base is the fairest. This is so because, first of all, he was employed at Willets Point before, during, and after the backpay period. Second, Christman, like Kuebler and Curd, drove only 10-wheelers and flat trucks and did not drive equipment trailers as did employees used by the Region in its backpay formula. Third, Christman was close to both Kuebler and Curd on the Willets Point seniority list, being the employee immediately above Curd and just two above Kuebler on the list, during all relevant periods. I shall therefore recommend that a formula based on Christman's income be used to calculate backpay due Kuebler and Curd.

3. Respondent's second affirmative defense, the third issue listed above, states that the standard Woolworth[18] formula is inappropriate and should not be used in the backpay calculations. Respondent argues further that if Woolworth is used, it should be used for the entire period including 1977 when the Region's compliance officer used a daily computation.

It is first noted that Respondent did not argue against use of the Woolworth formula in its brief and appears to have abandoned this position. Moreover, Respondent urges adoption of the Christman formula that is attached to its brief. The Christman formula itself includes use of the quarterly Woolworth formula.

Finally, in the underlying Mascali[19] case, the Board, in its Order, stated in relevant part:

> Backpay with interest thereon shall be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977). (See, generally, Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962)).

I see no reason why the traditional Woolworth formula should not be used in this proceeding and Respondent has provided me none. I shall therefore use the Woolworth formula in computing backpay, just as originally ordered.

Similarly, I find the Region's use of the daily computation for the third quarter 1977 to be reasonable in light of the fact that the period is less than a whole quarter. Inasmuch as Respondent failed to give any basis for its objection to the use of the daily computation, I shall recommend approval of its use.

4. Respondent urges that union dues and assessments should be subtracted from backpay owed because Kuebler and Curd would have had to make such payments had they not been discharged. True enough. However, as the General Counsel states in his brief, the figure offered by Respondent as a deduction for dues has no basis in the record. Where the particular sums mentioned come from is not at all clear. That being the case, I find that Respondent has not maintained its burden of moving that these sums should be deducted from backpay.[20]

Moreover, the Board found in the underlying case that Respondent was responsible[21] for Kuebler's and Curd's discharges and for their loss of wages during the backpay period. Respondent would now have Kuebler and Curd pay for the privilege of being discharged. I find something basically inequitable in having the discriminatees pay for the very questionable disservices rendered to them by Respondent and reject its request for payment of dues for the backpay period.

5. Respondent takes the position that Kuebler and Curd obtained substantially equivalent employment at Hendrickson Brothers while the General Counsel and the Charging Party argue that they did not. In arriving at their divergent conclusions, the parties used separate factors but similar formulas. The General Counsel used the same formula used by the Region in computing gross backpay, aggregating the earning of less senior employees at Willets without giving due consideration to the type of work they performed and without giving proper weight to the likelihood that the discriminatees would have had some absences and would not have worked every single hour of overtime available. As noted earlier, Respondent objected to this formula and I have found, for reasons stated, that these objections are well founded.

Respondent, however, urges that Kuebler and Curd not only worked many hours at Hendrickson Brothers, but that they failed to work many hours at Hendrickson Brothers when work was available to them. By adding the hours worked to those available, Respondent derives a figure far in excess of what Kuebler and Curd could have earned at Willets. The problem with Respondent's calculations is that it is based on the same type of formula used by the General Counsel to which Respondent so strenuously objects. Thus, Respondent took whatever junior employee who showed up for work at Hendrickson Brothers when Kuebler and Curd did not and assumed that if they wished to do so Kuebler and Curd could have performed that work. But this formula for determining interim earnings suffers from the same inequities as does the Region's gross backpay formula. I shall therefore recommend against its use.

Respondent recommended for calculating overall backpay the Christman formula because Christman was just one position above Curd and performed the same work, i.e., driving flat trucks and 10-wheelers. I have accepted that formula as the fairest way of calculating backpay. I see no reason why I should not adopt the same formula for purposes of determining whether Hendrickson Brothers offered substantial equivalent employment to Kuebler and Curd. Therefore, using Respondent's own suggested formula, I find that Kuebler and Curd would have earned approximately the same wages during the backpay period as Christman minus 10 percent because Christman was higher on the seniority list and minus another 10 percent based on the fact that both Kuebler and Curd had voluntary absences at Willets in excess of that of Christman. Using this formula, I find that both Kuebler and Curd would have earned far more at Willets than at Hendrickson Brothers and that, for this reason, their employment at Hendrickson Brothers was not substantial equivalent employment, and that their employment at Hendrickson Brothers during the backpay period did not toll Respondent's backpay liability.[22]

6. Respondent claims that Kuebler and Curd waived their backpay claims by demanding that the Union withdraw its arbitration request and by signing general releases without reservation. Respondent argues that any backpay claims that Kuebler and Curd may have are not attributable to Respondent because once the decision was rendered in the underlying case, Respondent filed an arbitration demand on their behalf and fairly processed a grievance to obtain their reinstatement. According to Respondent, litigation with respect to the reinstatement of the discriminatees was still pending when Kuebler and Curd demanded that Respondent withdraw its efforts on their behalf. Respondent then complied with their demand and abandoned all efforts to obtain compensation or indemnification from Willets Point. Thereafter Kuebler and Curd executed general releases, which failed to reserve rights as against Respondent. Thus, Respondent argues, Kuebler and Curd waived any rights they may have had against it.[23]

I find Respondent's position untenable. On 16 June 1986 Case 29-CB-4937 was severed from the consolidated cases considered herein. On 19 June 1986 a Decision and Order issued in which it was decided that Respondent had violated the Act by coupling its demand for reinstatement of Kuebler and Curd at Willets with a demand that Willets assume the Union's backpay liability. The evidence underlying that decision indicated that Willets owed nothing to Kuebler and Curd, neither reinstatement nor backpay. The Union, by insisting that Willets reinstate Kuebler and Curd and pay them the backpay that the Union owed them, resulted in Willets refusing to do either. Finally, in order to get reinstated with Willets, Kuebler and Curd signed releases, relieving Willets of any liability. These releases had absolutely nothing to do with Respondent's liability and clearly no waiver was intended.

Moreover, Kuebler and Curd had no obligation to pursue their reinstatement rights through the Union's grievance and arbitration process. Indeed, the Board stated in Henrickson Bros.,[24] in which it was dealing with the same parties involved herein:

> The judge rejected the Respondent's contention, renewed in its exceptions, that the discharges should be deferred to contractual arbitration. He reasoned that neither the employees nor the Union, Teamsters Local 282, elected to use that forum, and that the Respondent made no effort to compel arbitration. We agree with the judge that deferral is inappropriate, but only for the following reasons. In United Technologies Corp., 268 NLRB 557 (1984), the Board held that cases alleging violations of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) and Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act are subject to deferral to arbitration. We shall not, however, defer Curd's and Kuebler's discharges, because deferral would involve representation by Teamsters Local 282, a union whose interest is clearly inimical to the dischargees. Further, the Respondent's own interest conflicts with Curd's and Kuebler's in ways that go well beyond the immediate discharge issue.

Although the Respondent and the Union were willing to arbitrate the discharges, Curd and Kuebler declined the Union's offer to represent them because, as the judge found, they distrusted the Union and doubted whether it would properly represent them in an arbitration proceeding. The judge documented at considerable length the longstanding animosity between Local 282 representatives and the employees, and we need not recount it here. We note, however, that Curd and Kuebler engaged in extensive efforts to oust Local 282's leadership and participated in various unwelcome challenges to the Local's administration of the collective-bargaining agreement. In Frank Mascali Construction, 251 NLRB 219 (1980), enfd. mem. 111 LRRM 2423, 95 LC ¶ 13,919 (2d Cir. 1982), the Board found that Local 282 committed numerous unfair labor practices against Curd and Kuebler in reprisal for their exercise of Section 7 rights and their filing charges with the Board, including causing their discharges, refusing to refer them to job assignments, preferring fraudulent intraunion charges against them, and refusing to process their grievances.

The Respondent's hostility toward Curd and Kuebler is also fully detailed in the judge's decision. He found that the Respondent's officals, including Foreman Brown and Executive Vice President Farley, openly resented and resisted their vigorous attempts to enforce the contract and improve working conditions. Given this background, in which both parties to the contract are plainly opposed to the employees' interests, we conclude that deferral to arbitration is inappropriate. The Board addressed a similar situation in Kansas Meat Packers, 198 NLRB 543, 544 (1972), stating as follows:

> [W]e conclude that it would be repugant to the purposes of the Act to defer to arbitration in this case as to do so would relegate the Charging Parties to an arbitral process authorized, administered, and invoked entirely by parties hostile to their interests. [Fn. omitted.]

So, in light of the Board's findings as to the existing animus of Respondent toward Kuebler and Curd, it would be folly to except Kuebler and Curd to place their trust in Respondent Union's processing of their grievance to obtain backpay from an innocent party rather than in the Board's processing of the ULP against the Respondent who was the cause of all their difficulties. Similarly, it would be equally unreasonable to decide that Kuebler and Curd waived their rights to backpay when they chose not to use Respondent's questionable offices to represent them against Willets.

Further, even if the issue of Respondent's animosity toward Kuebler and Curd were not controlling, as I have found it to be, the Board has stated:

> It is well settled that an individual may not waive, bargain away, or compromise any backpay which might be due him (or her) since it is not a private right which attaches to the discriminatee, but is, indeed, a public right which only the Board or the Regional Director may settle.[25]

Neither the Board nor the Regional Director entered into the agreement, which Respondent claims to be a waiver. Therefore, it is not.[26]

Respondent claims that Curd willfully concealed interim earnings and is therefore not entitled to backpay for those quarters in which he did so. Counsel for Curd argues that any discrepancies between reported earnings and actual earnings were unintentional and the result of misunderstandings or ignorance. The General Counsel takes the position that most of the unreportea interim earnings were not deductible because they were, for the most part, second job earnings similar to those earned before Curd's discharge and those that do not fall into this category were small amounts not sufficient to warrant disqualifying Curd for earnings during entire quarters.

In support of his position on this issue, counsel for Respondent argues that Curd did not report "off the books" earnings when initially asked to do so. The record supports this assertion. It was not until about November 28, 1983, that Curd reported to his attorney and then to the Region's compliance personnel that he had earned certain "off the books" income not previously reported. On 12 December 1983 Curd supplied to the compliance section a complete report of all "off the record" earnings during the backpay period. He also amended his tax return to reflect such earnings.

Curd testified that he had not reported his cab earnings because they were earned evenings and on weekends and he believed that he did not have to report them. It was only after he mentioned these earnings to his attorney and then to Comstock that he was told to report them and then did so. When Curd advised his attorney and the Board agent of his unreported cab earnings he also told them of his "off the books" earnings at Allied, a trucking firm. He was told to calculate, report, and pay taxes on those earnings as well, and he did so. Curd's explanation why he did not report the cab earnings or the Allied earnings was simply that they were "off the books" and he did not think they counted. Respondent, on the other hand, charges that Curd only belatedly reported his "off the books" earnings in 1983 when he heard that he was being investigated by a private detective. Evidence supporting this charge is, however, inconclusive.

Counsel for Respondent, during the hearing, examined Curd extensively concerning a large number of deletions in Curd's 1977 diary in which he maintained a record of earnings along with other information. When asked what had been deleted Curd, for the most part, testified that he could not remember. What appears to have been deleted are all references to employers for whom Curd might have worked during 1977. What was left undeleted were numbers, which would appear to reflect earnings for that year. With regard to these numbers Curd testified in most cases that he could not recall what the numbers referred to. In some few cases he denied that they reflected earnings while in still fewer cases he admitted that they were earnings. In defense of his lack of memory, while testifying at the hearing, Curd pointed out that the deletions had been made 8 years before. However, in the underlying case heard in 1978, just 1 year, or in some cases just a few months, after the deletions had been made, Curd's testimony concerning the entries in and deletions from his 1977 diary was no more enlightening[27] than at the hearing in the instant case.

Curd testified that he deleted certain entries in his 1977 diary in preparation for a series of meetings scheduled both before and after 31 December 1977 with certain union officals during which he was expected to show them his books indicating when he shaped and when he worked. He deleted everything from the diary that he thought was none of Respondent's business. This was done, of course, because of the demonstrated hostility of Respondent toward Curd and after Curd's discharge, which had been engineered by Respondent. Curd testified, and the record supports his testimony, that he made no deletions in any of the diaries he prepared for each of the following years, 1978 through 1983.[28]

Respondent's counsel argues that his extended examination of Curd concerning his entries in and deletions from his 1977 diary prove that Curd was lying and that the numerous references to $55 or $60 "undoubtedly refer to unreported or misreported RCR earnings." However, after analyzing the relevant documentation I cannot find evidence to support this charge. Indeed, Curd insisted that he earned $50 per day working at RCR and named the days when he did so. In his diary he marked 2 or 3 days when he purportedly worked at RCR when he earned $55 but there were more days when he earned $50 per day. The evidence on this point is inconclusive, and without something stronger, I will not credit Respondent's statement. Discrepancies do exist, but are minor and, I find, innocent.

Respondent's brief points out that Curd lost, misplaced, or threw away a piece of paper on which he had recorded his RCR earnings and infers something sinister about this fact. In light of the large number of records that Curd did, in fact, make available, his loss of a single sheet paper after carrying it around for 6 or 7 years is not, to me, a matter of great concern. I assume it was innocently lost or misplaced.

Respondent relies on American Navigation Co.[29] and C. R. Adams Trucking[30] for the proposition that where a discriminatee is found to have willfully concealed from the Board his interim employment, he will be denied backpay for all quarters in which he engaged in the employment so concealed. However, the cases cited are factually distinguishable. In American Navigation the Board found that the discriminatee had been employed during the backpay period and had concealed this fact and the amounts he had earned from that employment from the Board, lying during his testimony at the backpay hearing. In the instant case there is no evidence that Curd lied at the hearing or concealed earnings during his testimony at the hearing. Therefore American Navigation is not in point. Similarly, Respondent's reliance on C. R. Adams Trucking is misplaced. In the Adams case, the discriminatee earned several hundred dollars on a snow removal job in early 1982. In August 1982 when he submitted the compliance forms to the NLRB he neglected to include these earnings. The backpay specification issued 14 December 1983 and did not, of course, include the discriminatee's snow removal earnings. In January 1984 the discriminatee found a W-2 form that reflected the snow removal earnings. Nevertheless, the discriminatee did not report these earnings to the compliance officer. Just before the backpay hearing the Respondent's attorney somehow found out about the discriminatees' snow removal earnings and told the compliance officer about them. The compliance officer then confronted the discriminatee with the fact that he had concealed earnings and the discriminatee admitted having earned the unreported income. When questioned at the hearing why he had failed to report the snow removal income prior to the hearing, the discriminatee simply stated that he had forgotten about it. The judge determined that although the discriminatee might well have simply forgotten the snow removal income from the previous winter when he submitted his compliance forms the following August, he must have had his mind jogged by the W-2 forms containing the snow removal earnings information just 2-1/2 months before the backpay hearing and nevertheless chose not to report the income, thus concealing it, and thus making himself subject to forefeiture of quarterly backpay payments due to the concealment. Unlike the Adams case, Curd, in the instant case, was not discovered to have concealed earnings but rather, voluntarily admitted the unreported earnings to his counsel, then to the Board, and the matter was rectified by issuance of a revised backpay specification. So, I find, Adams is not the same type of case as that being considered.

> Curd's testimony also presents difficulties. If he had not kept a diary, he might have presented less of a problem, but he did. He kept a diary showing his day-to-day activities, but prior to this hearing, he had expunged the bulk of the entries, leaving only cryptic references to activities or numbers. His stated reason for this, that he feared reprisal from the Union against people and employers listed is plausible, but his assertions that he could not remember what any of the entries were, or stood for, is plainly incredible. Curd showed otherwise that his memory was not that bad.
> With respect to the credibility of that testimony, he lied about the contents of his diary in the sense that he testified that the deleted portions concerned only the names of persons he did not want identified for fear of reprisal, and other references to his private business. I believe, in fact, that the diary showed jobs and income which he received during the year which, for some reason, he did not want the Union, or anyone else, to know about.

[28] The exception that proves the rule: 29 April 1981.

[30] 272 NLRB 1271 (1984), enfd. 767 F.2d 1276 (8th Cir. 1985).

In the American Navigation case, the Board chose to consider two other cases that were clearly not factually on all fours with that case but which the Board felt should be reversed. Those cases were Big Three Industrial Gas[31] and Flite Chief, Inc.,[32] and are closer in point of fact to the instant case than either American Navigation or Adams. In both Big Three and Flite Chief, the Board had awarded backpay to discriminatees who had initially concealed interim employment, but who had subsequently admitted the employment. In Big Three the Board had earlier decided that a penalty had no place in the national labor law scheme because the Act is remedial, not punitive, in nature, and therefore the claimant's backpay should only be reduced by the amount of the belatedly admitted interim earnings. In Flite Chief the Board had earlier decided that a claimant's initial concealment of earnings had not undermined the Board's remedial processes and that a penalty would be inappropriate when the claimant had voluntarily admitted, at the 11th hour, the earnings he had previously concealed. Factually, in Big Three, the claimant admitted the previously concealed earnings while on the witness stand during the backpay hearing while undergoing questioning by Respondent's counsel; while in Flite Chief the claimant disclosed his concealed earnings to a Board representative on the day that the backpay hearing commenced.

The Board, in its American Navigation decision (268 NLRB at 428), noted that it disagreed with the rationale of the Big Three and Flite Chief decisions and overruled them because:

> As the Ninth Circuit reasoned in Flite Chief, supra at 993, to award full backpay to a claimant who attempts to pervert an order issued in the public interest into a scheme for unjustified personal gain is to reward perfidy.

Based on this philosophy, the Board stated:

> We find that a remedy which denies backpay for the quarters in which concealed employment occurred will discourage claimants from abusing the Board's processes for their personal gain and will also deter respondents from committing future unfair labor practices. This remedy will be applied, of course, only in cases where the claimant is found to have willfully deceived the Board, and not where the claimant, through inadvertence, fails to report earnings.

While the instant case appears to bear certain similarities to Big Three and Flight Chief, there is one very important difference, namely, that Curd voluntarily admitted the unreported income months before the hearing, in plenty of time to revise the backpay specification to Respondent's benefit. To hold that Curd must suffer forfeiture of wages because initially he failed to report all of his income despite the fact that subsequently he did, in fact, report all income, long before the hearing, would put a premium on concealment. Thus, in C. R. Adams, supra at 1276, as facts described supra, the judge made the following observation:

> Moreover, there seems to have been a "last clear chance" for avoiding willful deceit which Becker failed to take. He testified that he "found" the W-2 form reflecting the snow removal income about 4 months before the hearing, but he said nothing about the matter until the compliance officer, spurred by Respondents' counsel, inquired into it some 2-1/2 months later. When asked why on such a discovery, he had not promptly notified the Region, Becker testified, "it just—I forgot all about it, that's all." I find it difficult to conceive of Becker having his mind jogged by discovery of the form and then forgetting about the income for the second time.

The implication here is that if Becker, the discriminatee in the C. R. Adams case, had reported his snow removal earnings after finding the W-2 forms it would not have been too late to rectify the situation. But suppose, at the time, the Board had been applying American Navigation—Big Three—Flite Chief dictum to his and Curd's situation, as Respondent would have me do. That is to say, suppose Becker or Curd were told that if they belatedly reported previously undeclared earnings, the Board might charge him with concealing those earnings and dock him 3 months' backpay or more. Would such an approach be more or less likely to advance full disclosure of interim earnings? I think a person faced with this dilemma might well opt for concealing the previously undeclared earnings, whether they were initially deceitfully concealed or innocently overlooked. Thus, application of the cited cases to the factual situation here would have the effect of undermining the remedial purposes of the Act: punish honesty and reward dishonesty. Moreover, what would be the result of applying the rationale of the cited cases to the situation here discussed? Who would gain and who would lose? A discriminatee who is faced with the choice of declaring previously undisclosed interim earnings and possibly forfeiting large amounts of backpay who chooses not to reveal those earnings, if he succeeds, unlawfully cheats the Respondent out of deductions from interim earnings to which it is entitled. If a discriminatee who is faced with the choice of declaring previously underclosed interim earnings and possibly forfeiting large amounts of backpay chooses not to reveal those earnings, but is detected at the hearing and loses several quarters of backpay because of this concealment, the sole winner is the Respondent. Such a result hardly effectuates the purposes of the Act.

In the instant case Curd did not initially reveal all interim earnings to the Board. However, when his counsel advised him that it was necessary to do so, he did so honestly, making full disclosure of all income. He did so voluntarily in a timely fashion so that by the date of the hearing all parties were fully apprised by the contents of the backpay specification what interim income Curd had earned. For the reasons stated, I do not believe that the rationale of the Big Three—Flite Chief reversals as declared in American Navigation should be applied to this case. Where a discriminatee, in timely fashion, makes full disclosure of all interim earnings long before the backpay hearing commences, his failure to report all interim earnings earlier should not be considered a reason for requiring forfeiture of backpay.

8. Respondent claims that Kuebler and Curd failed to make adequate efforts to mitigate damages by failing to seek interim employment during certain quarters and by being absent an excessive number of days at their interim employers.

The record reveals that Kuebler and Curd did make good-faith efforts to find interim employment. Between the dates of his discharge and reinstatement at Willets Point Contracting Kuebler sought and obtained employment at Hendrickson Brothers, Inc., RCR Services, Rason Asphalt, Inc., Heckscher Nurseries, Inc., Peter Scalamandre & Son, and Typhoon Fence of L. I. Inc. Of the 23 quarters covered by the amended backpay specification, Kuebler worked and received interim earnings from the listed companies during 18 of them. Most of Kuebler's interim income was earned at Hendrickson Brothers. However, because of his low place on the seniority list, his employment with this company was irregular despite the fact that he shaped often. When not employed by Hendrickson or by one of the other companies listed above, Kuebler, at various times during the backpay period, sought employment, albeit unsuccessfully, at certain liquor distributors—Star and Knickerbocker, certain oil companies—Massapequa, Slomin, Reliance, and Agway, and certain trucking and warehousing companies—C & R Steel, Dubarry, and Block. Kuebler would seek employment at these companies during the winter season when construction was down or on a day-to-day basis during the busy construction season, after shaping, when he was unsuccessful at landing a job with Hendrickson Brothers. In April 1982, Kuebler was fired by Hendrickson Brothers, and thereafter remained jobless for the next four quarters, although during this period he sought employment at Nazzara,[33] Star, Knickerbocker, Landsdale,[34] C & R Steel, J. D. Pasilico,[35] S&W Hardware, and Atlas virtually every day. He also checked out help-wanted ads for limousine drivers. Some of the companies where Kuebler sought work were companies with contracts with Teamsters Local 282 and other Teamsters Locals while others were nonunion or were not construction or trucking companies. Throughout the backpay period, whether he was still employed at Hendrickson Brothers, but not working that particular day, or had been already discharged by Hendrickson Brothers, Kuebler continued to search for work. He sought work stacking shelves in a supermarket and inquired about jobs tending bar and pumping gas. But Kuebler was limited in his capacity to perform many jobs because of his age and lack of experience outside the truckdriving trade. In any event, he was unsuccessful in his attempts to find employment.

Between the dates of his discharge and reinstatement at Willets Point, Curd sought and obtained employment at Hendrickson Brothers, Inc., Bess & Co., RCR Services, Rason Asphalt, Inc., Herscher Nurseries, Inc., Sunshine Biscuits, Inc., and Star Industries, Inc. Of the 23 quarters covered by the amended backpay specification, Curd worked and received interim earnings from the listed companies during 20 of them. Like Kuebler, most of Curd's interim earnings were from Hendrickson Brothers. But he, like Kuebler, was not steadily employed. Although he shaped almost daily, he did not receive regular assignments because of his inferior position on the seniority list. Similarly, Curd made many unsuccessful attempts at finding employment. His credited testimony indicates that he tried to obtain employment, to no avail, with various oil companies during the winter seasons while still employed by Hendrickson and thereafter unsuccessfully sought employment with Conservative Express, Tempo, Star Liquors, Sunshine Biscuits, Knickerbocker Liquor, Landsdale, Newport Tire, Puritan, Petro, and other oil companies. In addition, Curd drove a cab on many occasions when one was available.

Respondent asserts that Kuebler and Curd failed to make continuing efforts to obtain interim employment, and correctly argues that, in order to receive backpay, a discriminatee must make reasonable efforts to obtain interim employment. Though granting that Kuebler and Curd did make such efforts, Respondent argues that the obligation to seek employment is a continuing one and that each period of time must stand on its own, citing Murbro Parking.[36] However, the discriminatee in the Murbro case admitted that during a certain portion of the backpay period he had joined the ranks of the discouraged unemployed and did not search for work because the labor market was flooded with teenagers. Neither Kuebler nor Curd made such an admission, but rather claimed to have shaped or sought employment virtually every day so that it remains the burden of Respondent to prove that they willfully incurred loss of earnings during the backpay period. Fugazy Continental Corp.,[37] citing Brown & Root.[38]

Respondent's brief notes that Kuebler and Curd meticulously kept daily diaries that showed periods of time during which they appeared to be regularly seeking work. It notes further that these diaries contain lengthy intervals of time in which the diaries reflect no efforts at all to obtain interim employment. Concerning some of these blank periods, neither Kuebler nor Curd could recall what efforts they had made to find interim employment. Respondent would have me decide on the basis of these incomplete records and the discriminatees' faulty memories that neither Kuebler nor Curd sought interim employment during these periods. I shall not, however, make such a finding. I am, in fact, impressed with the amount of information contained in the diaries of Kuebler and Curd and will not recommend reduction of their backpay simply because these two truckdrivers failed to keep records as accurately or completely as would a CPA. Indeed, they faithfully kept these diaries for 7 years while Respondent continued to refuse to pay them the backpay rightfully theirs, which was the remedy provided in the underlying case and which resulted from Respondent's violation of the Act. It is not essential that a discriminatee keep records at all to establish the extent of effort he had made to find interim employment. Teamsters Local 164.[39] But if a discriminatee has, throughout a multiyear backpay period, chosen to keep records of efforts to find interim income, it is not surprising that such records are less than perfect. Big Three Industrial Gas.[40] I find that the failure of Kuebler and Curd to account for every day in the backpay period is not evidence of inadequate efforts on their part to seek interim employment. And their inability to recall the specifics of where, when, and under what circumstances they sought employment during the periods unaccounted for in their diaries is neither surprising after a period of so many years nor evidence of a willful loss of earnings. Neely's Car Clinic.[41]

Kuebler and Curd both testified that they shaped a number of occasions at Star Liquor and Knickerbocker Liquor. Their diaries support their testimony. In fact, Curd did actually work at Star Liquor 1 day. Kuebler, in describing the shaping procedure at Star, credibly testified that Star did not require employment applications to be filled out but, rather, required the men to report to > a gigantic room like this and the men would come their 6:00 o'clock in the morning. The shop steward's name was Kelly. The dispatcher was White and it was a case of like the old days down on the dock.

> If you stayed there long enough and your face was in front, they'd pick you by familiar [sic] in accordance to how busy they were.

I found the particularity of Kuebler's description quite convincing.

Respondent produced two witnesses at the hearing, Fred Acquavita, the shop steward at Knickerbocker, and Alfred Ortiz, the dispatcher and shop steward at Star Liquor. Acquavita testified that he would be at the shape at Knickerbocker every morning at 5:30 in 1982 and that he would recognize and get to know the faces and names of men who came to shape regularly. When Acquavita was asked if he recognized the faces or was familiar with the names of Kuebler and Curd, he replied in the negative. He testified further that during the busy season if a man shaped regularly, he would remember that man, and in June or July 1982, a man who shaped frequently would have been hired.

Ortiz, also more generally known as Kelly, testified that he was present every morning at 5 a.m. for the shape at Star Liquor in 1982. He testified further that in July 1982 Star was very busy and was hiring. Ortiz, like Acquavita, stated that he did not recognize either Kuebler or Curd and was unfamiliar with Kuebler's name. He admitted, however, that Curd worked 1 day for Star, and that he was aware of this fact because his bookkeeper looked up the name and told him. This was done in preparation for the hearing. Finally, Ortiz testified in one place that he did not know if he would recognize, 3 years later, men who had shaped every day 3 years before. Elsewhere he stated that he would, after a while, recognize the faces of men who shaped every day. On cross-examination, Ortiz admitted that he could not recall the names of off-the-street extras who may have shaped 3 years before.

When Kuebler and Curd were asked to identify Acquavita and Ortiz, Kuebler could not do so, while Curd properly identified Ortiz as being behind the cage at Star Liquor but mistakenly placed Acquavita at the same location.

I am satisfied, despite Acquavita's and Ortiz' failure to identify Kuebler and Curd, that they did, in fact, shape at Star Liquor and Knickerbocker Liquor in 1982. It was 3 years by the time of the hearing since Kuebler and Curd shaped at Star and Knickerbocker. Their contact with Acquavita and Ortiz was minimal and over a period of years hundreds of men shaped at these two employers. It is quite understandable that neither of the two stewards could recognize Kuebler and Curd and their failure to do so is not controlling.[42] Teamsters Local 164, supra, Neely's Car Clinic,[43] Murbro Parking.[44] Moreover, Kuebler's and Curd's knowledge of the location of the two liquor distributors, their description of the layout of the shaping area and of the shaping procedure, Kuebler's recall of Kelly's name, and Curd's identification of Kelly at the hearing strongly support their testimony that they regularly shaped at Star and Knickerbocker and I so find.

Respondent argues that when a discriminatee has unexcused and unexplained absences from his interim employment, an amount reflecting the income lost as a result of these absences should be added to his actual interim earnings, citing Carter Lumber.[45] However, Carter Lumber is factually distinguishable from the instant case. In Carter, the discriminatee found a regular steady job as interim employment offering a 40-hour week or more. Nevertheless, the discriminatee chose to take off frequently just because he felt like it. His excessive absences were under those circumstances considered a willful loss of employment. In the instant case Kuebler's and Curd's employment at Hendrickson was neither regular nor steady. A day's work depended on their shaping each morning, which they did, and on whether work was available, which sometimes it was and sometimes it was not. Frequently, because of their low position on the seniority list, they were not assigned work. In the case of Kuebler and Curd at Hendrickson, I see no willful loss of interim employment similar to that found in the Carter case.

Respondent notes the frequency of Kuebler's and Curd's absences from Hendrickson, that in the summer Curd took long weekends and in the fall went on annual hunting trips, and that both took off to campaign for union office and to attend NLRB hearings. I do not consider these absences as willful loss of earnings, but only legitimate absences that will be given proper consideration in the calculation of backpay due. Mid-West Hanger Co.,[46] Sioux Falls Stock Yards,[47] and Wayne Trophy Corp.[48]

9. Hendrickson Brothers, the primary interim employer of Kuebler and Curd, unlawfully terminated them on 21 April 1982. Hendrickson Bros.[49] The Decision and Order in Hendrickson provided a make-whole remedy in which the company was ordered to make the discriminatees whole for any loss of earnings they might have suffered as a result of its discrimination against them. However, as of this writing there is no evidence that Hendrickson has complied with or intends to comply with the Board's Order despite the fact that the court of appeals ordered enforcement. Hendrickson may appeal further, may succeed in its appeal, may go bankrupt, or, for whatever reason, may never comply with the Board's Order. The most equitable decision to make at this juncture would be to order Respondent to pay the discriminatees full backpay and leave any set off from Hendrickson to future proceedings. To hold that Local 282 need pay no backpay due after 21 April 1982 on the supposition that Hendrickson might make the discriminatees whole for backpay due thereafter would be to undermine the Board's Order in the underlying case herein at the expense of Kuebler and Curd, the innocents, to the benefit of Respondent, the wrongdoer. This I am not willing to do. If, in the future, Hendrickson is made to pay all or a part of the backpay due the discriminatees after 21 April 1982, arrangements can at that time be made for an equitable set off. As of the moment, the discriminatees have waited long enough.

Respondent argues that Local 282 was in no way responsible for Kuebler's and Curd's discharges by Hendrickson Brothers in 1982. This is true. However, Respondent was, as found in the underlying case, responsible for their discharges from Willets Point[50] and, but for this action, Kuebler and Curd would never have had to obtain interim employment with Hendrickson. The case law is clear that when a discriminatee is discharged by an interim employer through no fault of his own, his backpay continues to run until he is offered reinstatement at his original job. Artim Transportation System.[51] I see no reason why this case law should not apply to the facts of the instant case.

Respondent points out that it vigorously protested the discharges of Kuebler and Curd by Hendrickson and sought immediately to arbitrate on their behalf. This is true as well as the fact that the grievances filed on behalf of Kuebler and Curd were ultimately withdrawn by the Union only because of their insistence that it do so. Respondent argues that by refusing to permit it to grieve their discharges from Hendrickson Brothers, Kuebler and Curd prevented the Union from obtaining compensation for them and thereby waived any right to demand money from the Union.

The answer to Respondent's waiver argument regarding the Hendrickson discharge is the same as the answer to Respondent's waiver argument regarding the Willets discharge. Neither Kuebler nor Curd was obligated to have Teamsters Local 282 represent them because that Union's interest was and is clearly inimical to that of the discharges.[52] Therefore, based on the Board's own rationale, I find that Kuebler and Curd did not waive their right to backpay from Respondent by refusing to take their grievances to arbitration.

Respondent urges that in the alternative, Local 282 should be found to be secondarily liable rather than primarily liable for damages caused by Hendrickson Brothers' misconduct. But the instant proceeding concerns backpay due Kuebler and Curd as a result of the Mascali decision. There is no allegation that Respondent is either primarily or secondarily liable for damages resulting from the Hendrickson Brothers' discharge of Kuebler and Curd. If and when there is a backpay hearing in the Hendrickson Bros. case, or if there are settlement proceedings in that case resulting in an award, Respondent can pursue a course to obtain an equitable setoff. Double recovery is not contemplated.[53] In the meantime, Kuebler and Curd should not be denied the backpay due them that resulted from Respondent's violation simply because they were unlawfully terminated by an interim employer. Nine years is long enough to have waited.

10. Respondent takes the position that the General Counsel's fringe benefit computations concerning the annuity fund, welfare fund, and pension fund are incorrect. Although Respondent concedes that its backpay obligation requires it to make Kuebler and Curd whole for fringe benefits lost as well as backpay, it asserts that the General Counsel's computations are wrong.

Regarding the Local 282 annuity fund, Respondent agrees that under the various Local 282 contracts, employers are obligated to make contributions to the fund. It concedes that the methodology used by the General Counsel in determining how much was due the annuity fund is correct, but denies the accuracy of the General Counsel's figures in two respects. First, Respondent notes that the General Counsel's gross annuity figures are based on his backpay formula to which Respondent objects. Because I do not intend to use the General Counsel's backpay formula, for reasons stated, I find Respondent's objection well founded. Respondent urges that if the Christman formula is used, then Christman's actual annuity fund contributions should be taken with proportional adjustments made. I agree with Respondent on this point and will follow its suggestion. Second, Respondent argues that although the General Counsel's computations of interim annuity payments accurately reflect actual annuity contributions, they fail to account for interim annuity contributions that would have been made had Kuebler and Curd availed themselves of all work opportunities at Hendrickson Brothers. However, because I have found that Kuebler and Curd did not sustain a willful loss of employment at Hendrickson Brothers, I reject Respondent's argument on this point. Similarly, I reject Respondent's argument that contributions will be made by Hendrickson Brothers pursuant to the Board Order in Hendrickson Bros. and that these should be taken into account because there is no guarantee that such contributions will, in fact, be made. The argument is premature and speculative. If and when set off arrangements are made, contributions to the annuity fund should also be considered at that time.

Regarding the welfare fund, Respondent concedes that it is obligated to Kuebler and Curd for any benefits covered by the fund that they failed to receive. Because Curd presented evidence of $54 in unpaid medical bills, Respondent concedes that it owes that amount. The General Counsel would, on the other hand, have Respondent pay all the contributions into the welfare fund that would have been made on behalf of the discriminatees had the discrimination not taken place. Respondent argues that contributions to the welfare fund would do Curd and Kuebler no good because contributions attributable to work during a particular quarter vest an employee with benefits only with respect to the succeeding quarter and would give Curd and Kuebler no present benefits. This is true.

Respondent argues further that the welfare fund did not suffer from the loss of contributions due to Kuebler's and Curd's unlawful terminations because the same amount of contributions to the welfare fund were made by Willets Point as would have been made absent discrimination because the work previously done by Kuebler and Curd was thereafter done by replacements and contributions were made on behalf of the replacements. Respondent takes the position that if Respondent were ordered to make contributions on behalf of Kuebler and Curd, the fund would receive an unjustified windfall serving a punitive, rather than a remedial, purpose. I find Respondent's argument persuasive and shall recommend that Respondent only be liable for the amount reflected by the medical bills for which it concedes liability. This is the standard-type remedy. Seligman & Associates.[54]

Regarding the Local 282 pension trust fund contributions, Respondent concedes that it is liable for such payments, but only to the extent necessary to make Kuebler and Curd whole. Contrary to Respondent, the General Counsel and the Charging Parties would have Respondent contribute payments to the pension fund over and above the amount necessary to give each of the discriminatees a full year's credit. They would have me require Respondent to pay the proper contractual sum into the pension fund for each hour that Kuebler and Curd would have worked but for the discrimination against them. The argument is that Kuebler and Curd and other beneficiaries of the pension system have a vested interest in the pension fund and in its being as solvent and as strong as it would have been but for the discrimination. In dealing with this question in Acme Wire Works,[55] the administrative law judge stated:

> Morever, the right of an employee to a pension benefit also implies, of necessity, the right to a viable pension fund. As the fund is maintained on certain actuarial considerations which include an estimate of the average contributions made on behalf of employees who are high and low earners, it seems clear that the fund would soon be depleted if employers were permitted to contribute the minimum amounts required to enable employees to obtain an additional year of credited service and not the amounts required in the collective-bargaining agreement. While it is no doubt true that the pension fund would not likely be jeopardized by the failure to make the full contributions on behalf of this one employee, it could reasonably be surmised that, in the aggregate, if employers who contribute to the fund could avoid full liability by discriminating against employees, this would serve, to some extent, as an inducement to violate the law. Finishline Industries, Inc. [181 NLRE 756, 760 (1970)]. It also might lead, in the aggregate, to an unwarranted depletion of the Fund's assets which would affect not only [the discriminatee's] ability to collect his pension benefits but also every other covered employee's ability to obtain such benefits. [251 NLRB at 1571.]

I shall follow the law of Acme Wire. The specific amounts that Respondent owes the Pension Fund on behalf of Kuebler and Curd will be treated infra.

11. Respondent argues that the backpay claim is so large as to be punitive and payment of the sum would endanger the Union's continued viability. I have already determined not to use the Region's formula, not because it results in a claim that is too large or because the payment of such a sum would impair the financial stability of Local 282. Indeed, such considerations are irrelevant, for the purpose of a backpay proceeding is to determine the amount due the discriminatees, not to determine Respondent's ability to pay. Teamsters Local 164;[56] Victoria Medical Group.[57] I have found the Region's formula inequitable and for that reason will not recommend its use. The size of the award is not the controlling factor.

II. THE CHRISTMAN FORMULA

The Christman formula takes Willets' employee, Christman, as a representative employee, and Kuebler and Curd are credited with his earnings during the backpay period. I find Christman a good choice for this purpose for reasons discussed supra. Respondent would adjust these earnings downward by approximately 19 percent because Kuebler's and Curd's earnings both before their discharge and after their reinstatement were considerably below those of Christman. I find the adjustment justified.

On these findings and conclusions I issue the following recommended[58]

ORDER

The Respondent, Local 282, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL–CIO, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall pay to John Kuebler and Charles Curd, in accordance with the computations contained in the revised backpay specification attached as Appendices A and B, the sums of $62,206 and $58,805, respectively, plus interest as provided in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977), less tax withholdings required by Federal and state laws. Similarly, Respondent shall pay into the Local 282 annuity fund on behalf of John Kuebler and Charles Curd, in accordance with the computations contained in the revised backpay specification attached as Appendices C and D, the sums of $3,605.58 and $3,524.79, respectively, plus interest as provided in the cases cited. Further, Respondent shall pay into the Local 282 pension trust fund on behalf of John Kuebler and Charles Curd, in accordance with the computations contained in Appendices E and F, the sums of $8846 and $8271, respectively, with interest as provided in the cited cases. Finally, Respondent shall pay Charles Curd $54 for unpaid medical bills owed to him under the provisions of the welfare fund with interest as provided for under the cases cited supra.

Communications Workers of America, Local 4354, AFL–CIO (American Telephone and Telegraph Company) and Julia A. Jefferson and Windy K. Holliman. Cases 9–CB–6608 and 9–CB–6614

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

On March 10, 1988, Administrative Law Judge Richard H. Beddow Jr. issued the attached decision. Charging Party Julia A. Jefferson filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and supporting brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions, and to adopt the recommended Order.

In adopting the recommended Order, we agree with the judge, as more fully set forth by him, that Jefferson was a member of Respondent CWA Local 4354 when she crossed its picket line on June 23 and 24, 1986. The judge found that when Jefferson was hired by Ohio Bell in 1973 she joined CWA Local 4310 and signed a dues-checkoff card. In 1983, following AT&T's divestiture of Ohio Bell, Jefferson was assigned to AT&T's Worthington facility. Although Worthington employees were represented by the Respondent, CWA Local 4354, rather than by CWA Local 4310, Jefferson neither resigned her membership nor canceled her dues checkoff. On the contrary, Jefferson supported the Respondent against Local 4310's rival claims by signing a petition in 1984 and by voting in a 1985 CWA-conducted election restricted to Worthington members. After the Respondent won this intraunion election, and the CWA designated it as the Worthington representative, the judge found, crediting the Respondent's witnesses, that Jefferson's Local 4310 membership automatically transferred to Respondent Local 4354. Finally, Jefferson honored the Respondent's picket line until she wrote the Respondent that, "As of Monday, June 23, 1986, I am officially resigning from the Union, Local 4354, CWA." Jefferson placed this letter in the mail on June 24 and the Respondent received it on June 25.

We agree that these facts demonstrate that Jefferson was a member of the Respondent on June 23 and 24. In addition, we find further record evidence to support this conclusion. Thus, although the judge found that Jefferson joined Local 4310 in 1973, the record demonstrates that, under CWA procedures, applicants for union membership sign cards with and join the CWA. The CWA, which receives all membership dues, determines the local having jurisdiction over the applicant, affixes a local sticker to the membership card and remits a portion of the dues to the designated local. When disputes arise between CWA locals, the CWA constitution provides for resolution by the CWA executive board or convention. Once the dispute is resolved, according to the credited testimony of the Respondent's president, "the Local with that jurisdiction will have the members at that location."

Therefore, by signing a membership card in 1973, Jefferson joined the CWA and bound herself to its rules. Although the CWA initially placed Jefferson and other Ohio Bell employees in Local 4310, Jefferson subsequently transferred to Worthington where Respondent Local 4354 had been granted jurisdiction. Indeed, when Local 4310 challenged the Respondent's jurisdiction, Jefferson supported the Respondent. And, once the CWA awarded jurisdiction to the Respondent, Jefferson and all Worthington members became members of the Respondent.

Under all these facts, we agree with the judge that Jefferson was a member of the Respondent on June 23 and 24. However, we reject the judge's alternative finding that the Respondent's internal charges against Jefferson would not violate the Act even were Jefferson not a member. We have held that a union's initiation of disciplinary proceedings against nonmembers, or the threat of such discipline, violates Section 8(b)(1)(A). See, e.g., Electrical Workers Local 213 IBEW (Rucker Electric), 217 NLRB 46 (1975); Mylen Iron & Aluminum Works, 216 NLRB 865, 870 (1975).

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

Wyrone A. Cravanas, Esq., for the General Counsel.

[1] There were no exceptions to the judge's dismissal of Case 9–CB–6614.

Charging Party Jefferson has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

It is unclear from his decision whether the judge stated that two of the Respondent's officials asked Jefferson to sign a union membership card or a dues-checkoff card in early 1986. In fact, she testified that she was asked to sign a membership card. We have considered Jefferson's testimony, but conclude based on the other factors here that Jefferson was and continued to be a member of the Respondent until she resigned during the strike.

Statement of the Case

Richard H. Beddow Jr., Administrative Law Judge. These consolidated cases were heard in Columbus, Ohio, on 23 and 24 April 1987. Subsequently, briefs were filed by all the parties. The proceedings are based on charges filed 20 and 29 October 1986,[1] respectively, by individuals Julia A. Jefferson and Windy K. Holliman. The Regional Director's consolidated complaint dated 10 December alleges that Communications Workers of America Local 4354, AFL–CIO (Respondent or Local 4354) violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act by bringing intraunion disciplinary charges against Jefferson and Holliman.

On a review of the entire record in this case and from my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

The Charging Parties are employees of American Telephone and Telegraph Company, a Delaware corporation with a place of business in Worthington, Ohio, engaged in furnishing interstate telephone communications. At all times material it has been an employer engaged in operations affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. It is admitted that the Respondent is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act and that it has a collective-bargaining agreement with the Employer. Accordingly, I find that inasmuch as the allegations of each complaint charge interference with the statutory rights of an individual, I find that it effectuates the policy of the Act to exercise jurisdiction, see Iron Workers Local 577 (Various Employers), 199 NLRB 37 (1972).

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE

Following the resolution of a jurisdictional dispute in January 1986, Respondent was determined to be the collective-bargaining representative of the American Telephone and Telegraph employees at the Employer's Worthington facility, where both Jefferson and Holliman are employed.

Respondent Local 4354 had jurisdiction at the Worthington location before 1984, however, another local contested its jurisdiction after various changes were made as a result of the court-ordered divestiture of the Employer. It was determined that a vote would be conducted in order to allow members to make their own determination.

Julia Jefferson began working for the Employer's predecessor, Ohio Bell Telephone Company, in October 1973. Ohio Bell employees were then represented by Local 4310 of the Union and Jefferson signed a membership card and dues-checkoff authorization card shortly after beginning her employment. In September 1983, after the divestiture, Jefferson was assigned to the AT&T Worthington facility where she continued her employment as a sales representative. During the course of the jurisdictional dispute, Jefferson signed a petition on 27 March 1984 expressing her desire to have Local 4354 as her representative.

Local 4354 won the election and was designated as the local affiliate for the Worthington location by the executive board of the International Union. In accordance with union practices, all members thereafter automatically came under the jurisdiction of Local 4354. Jefferson's union dues continued to be withheld by the Employer although she never signed another dues-checkoff authorization card. She testified that she was requested to sign a new card in early 1986 by Linda Morrison (Local 4354's treasurer), but told her that she "would think about it" and gave the same response to a request by another individual who was a union steward. This occurred at a time when the International Union was negotiating a new national contract and when the union local had sent all employees a memo that stated: "only members, which are those who have signed membership cards on file, have the right to direct the union and to vote in any election—and strike vote elections." On 31 May the contract between the Employer and Respondent expired and Respondent began a strike at the Employer's facilities, including its Worthington location. Jefferson did not cross the picket line until 23 June when she returned to work. The strike ended on 26 June and a new collective-bargaining agreement subsequently was signed.

Windy Holliman is a communications technician who started work for Ohio Bell in 1970. She became an AT&T employee in January 1984 at its Dayton, Ohio office and signed a membership and dues-checkoff authorization with Local 4354 at that time. In May 1986, she transferred to the Worthington facility, however, she asserts that in December 1985 she became "disgusted" with the Union and mailed a certified letter to Respondent containing her resignation from the Union. She testified that in a general conversation in the lunchroom she stated she "would not be honoring the strike and I was not a member of the local" (although she asserts that Steward Lawanda Martin was present on that occasion, she also stated that at that time she did not know that Martin was a union steward).

Despite her alleged statement, Holliman in fact did honor the picket line for about a week, asserting that it was "not so much because of the strike, but because I was moving from Dayton to Columbus." On 9 June, she crossed the picket line and returned to work.

As noted above, the Union began a lawful economic strike on 1 June in an effort to obtain a more favorable contract. All negotiations were done at the national level. Inasmuch as the collective-bargaining agreements governing the conduct of the parties in this case contained an agency-shop provision, the local union reviewed its membership list in preparation for the strike and it set up a procedure for the possible discipline of members who crossed the strike line.

[1] All following dates will be in 1986 unless otherwise indicated.

In May 1986, Steward Judy May prepared a list of nonmember employees by obtaining a complete list of all persons working at the Worthington facility and checked the list against membership cards on file at the union hall. Those persons without a membership card were recorded on a list designated nonmembers as of 6 June 1986. Several names had a notation "resigned" subsequently written after them. Neither Jefferson nor Holliman's names were on this union list of nonmembers. After the strike was underway, May prepared a list of members who had crossed the picket line. This list contained 25 names and notations that indicated if they were nonmembers or had resigned and the date of the resignation. Holliman was identified as having crossed from 9 June on, and as a "member no resignation." Jefferson was recorded as crossing on 23 and 24 June and as "member resignation in office 25 June 1986." May testified that she also checked membership cards, including Jeffersons, when she prepared this list. She also said that before the strike the cards were kept in locked files, however, during the strike the cards frequently were referred to and were often left out. Subsequently Respondent discovered that Jefferson's membership card was missing. Kent Cales, the president of the local, testified that he observed membership cards signed by both Jefferson and Holliman during the latter part of June when he was reviewing records after he had been informed that they had crossed the picket line.

After the strike was underway, charges in the form of affidavits were prepared by the union members detailing which individuals, including Jefferson and Holliman, had crossed the picket line. As noted, Steward May then checked the card file to determine if these individuals were members and if a resignation had been received.

In accordance with internal union practices, James Coles was appointed as "prosecutor" with duty to investigate the charges, see if the complaints had merit, and recommend action to the membership. He found that some charges were meritorious and that some others were not. He then instructed the Union that individuals would not be prosecuted if they were not members, or were members and had resigned, and that, for the individuals resigning, they would only be prosecuted for crossing the picket line before receipt of the resignation.

Based on his investigation and all the information he received, he determined that Jefferson, Holliman, and 10 other individuals should be charged under the constitution and bylaws of the Union. Once the determination was made to try an individual, the worker was notified of the charges, a trial date was established, and the individual was advised of his or her rights under the constitution and bylaws to be present, and to present testimony and witnesses in their defense. The 10 other people charged were tried by the Union in the fall of 1986, however, because both Jefferson and Holliman filed charges with the National Labor Relations Board before their trial dates, their cases were indefinitely postponed by the Union pending the resolution of this Board proceeding.

III. DISCUSSION

Under the provisions of the Act, a union has the right to regulate its own internal affairs including the right to discipline members who violate union rules that are reasonably consistent with the basic legislative purpose of the Act, NLRB v. Allis-Chalmers Mfg. Co., 388 U.S. 175 (1967), and Scofield v. NLRB, 394 U.S. 423 (1969). See also Electrical Workers IBEW Local 453, 263 NLRB 862 (1982).

Here, the General Counsel contends that the Union's attempt to enforce its rules by the mere filing of intraunion disciplinary charges against Jefferson and Holliman was improper because it is asserted that neither was a member of the Union at the time they were alleged to have violated the Union's rules.

Section 8(b)(1)(A), which is claimed to have been violated here, provides, that:

> (b) It shall be an unfair labor practice for a labor organization or its agent—(1) to restrain or coerce (A) employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7 . . . provided, That this paragraph shall not impair the right of a labor organization to prescribe its own rules with respect to the acquisition or retention of membership therein. [Emphasis added.]

It is well established that in furtherance of this right, any union discipline of members must relate to properly adopted rules which reflect a legitimate union interest, must impair no policy Congress has imbedded in the labor laws, and must be reasonably enforced, see Scofield, supra.

Here, there is no claim nor showing of proof that relates to any of the Scofield criteria, except the reasonableness of the Union's attempt to enforce its rules. The attack on the Union's enforcement effort otherwise begs the question and directs itself at the employees' potential defense to the charges, namely the assertion that each was not a member at the time she engaged in conduct in violation of the union rules.

First, the record shows that both Jefferson and Holliman had been union members and continued to be recorded on the Union's records as members. Because of a jurisdictional dispute between locals of the Union that arose out of the court-ordered reorganization of the Employer, and because of its preparation for an anticipated strike, the Union made extensive reviews of its membership list. Both Jefferson and Holliman were recorded as members. Subsequently, after the strike began, after charges were filed against a number of individuals who crossed the lawful picket line, and after the Union followed elaborate internal procedures to review the validity of the changes and each person's membership status (paying specific attention to any receipt of a resignation of membership), about 10 or more persons were formally referred to trial. There is no showing that the Union was made aware that either of the Charging Parties asserted her innocence to the union charges because of any change in their membership status at any time before their filing of the charges with the Labor Board.

The Charging Parties were not treated any differently than about 10 other persons who were charged with rules violations and scheduled for trial. They were given an opportunity to appear and present an appropriate defense in an internal trial procedure; however, they instead choose to file their own charges against the Union alleging an unfair labor practice. There is no showing that the Union's filing of internal charges was motivated by anything other than a desire to maintain union discipline validly related to rules pertaining to retention of membership. There is no showing that the Union knew or should have known that Jefferson and Holliman claimed nonmembership status by virtue of resignation (or any other reason) or that the Union otherwise acted unreasonably in pursuing the charges. The Union undertook a detailed investigation and had valid reasons to believe that Jefferson and Holliman were still members at the time each crossed the picket line and at the time it attempted to pursue charges against them. Here, I find that the mere existence of the possibility that a person charged could show a proper defense to the Union's allegations during the trial on such charges does not act to invalidate the reasonableness of the Union's rule enforcement effort. Accordingly, I conclude that the General Counsel has failed to substantiate his contentions that the Respondent has violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act and, accordingly, I recommend dismissal of the complaint.

I find that it is unnecessary to determine the truthfulness of the Charging Parties' assertions that they were not union members when they crossed the picket line to reach the conclusion that the General Counsel has failed to show a violation of the Act. However, I otherwise find that the record also fails to support a factual conclusion that the Charging Parties in fact did submit valid resignations from membership or otherwise took such actions or nonactions that effectively changed their status to that of nonmembers.

Jefferson's claim to nonmembership status is based on the fact that she initially signed a membership card with Local 4310 and never executed a card with Local 4354, although she was requested to do so subsequent to the resolution of the jurisdictional dispute in Local 4354's favor and before the strike in May 1986. During all this period, union dues continued to be deducted from her pay and she took no affirmative steps to specifically resign her membership from Local 4310 or the International or to otherwise check on her status.

To the contrary, she signed a petition 27 March 1984 in favor of Local 4354 and she participated in the jurisdictional vote. To so participate, it was necessary for her to be a member of the Communications Workers. Jefferson also honored the picket line from 1 June until 23 June. On that day she prepared a letter of resignation, which she mailed the next day to both Local 4310, Local 4354, and the International. Local 4354 received it on the 25th and it accordingly limited its charge against her to alleged rule violation only for the 2 days she worked before the Union's receipt of the resignation.

The General Counsel points out some actions that Jefferson did not take, such as allegedly not signing a new card for Local 4354 and not attending union meetings, as being indicative of nonmembership. Proof of negative indications, however, falls far short of being proof of an unequivocal separation from membership status. The General Counsel also seeks to draw some inference that Jefferson was not a member because the Union acknowledged that they could not locate her membership card. Two union officials, however, credibly testified that they saw and utilized her card during the course of preparing for the strike and the filing of charges and this testimony is corroborated by union records prepared as a result of these examinations. Although it seems probable that the card would have reflected her original membership in Local 4310, rather than a specific joining of Local 4354, I otherwise accept Respondent's position that the employees' membership automatically transferred to the properly authorized local when the question of jurisdiction was resolved by the noted election.

Jefferson admittedly signed a card with Local 4310 and I find that the current existence of the card is irrevelant to the question of Jefferson's membership status. I also conclude that it is not implausible that the card was mislaid during the unusual activities surrounding the strike. Jefferson professed to be unaware of Local 4354 union matters, however, she understood that her work location was under the jurisdiction of Local 4354 and she otherwise is shown to be an informed individual capable of fulfilling the responsible duties of a sales representative for the Employer telephone company. She made no inquiries about her status after the resolution of the jurisdictional dispute or when the Union went on strike. After she returned to work, she promptly prepared and mailed a resignation to both Local Unions, as well as the International. Under these circumstances, I find that it was her responsibility to take affirmative and unequivocal action to obtain nonmembership status. Here, it is not shown that she took one affirmative step that could be interpreted as conveying to the Union that she was resigning her membership.

Accordingly, I find that Julia Jefferson was a member of the Union on 23 and 24 June, the dates relevant to the union charge against her, and that she did not change, nor convey to the Union her intentions to change, her membership status until 25 June. Therefore, the Union acted properly and reasonably by considering her to be a member on those days she crossed the picket line before the receipt of her resignation from membership.

Holliman's claim to nonmembership status is based on her allegation that she became "disgusted" and resigned from the Union in December 1985. The Union asserts that no such resignation was ever received.

Holliman, who also is shown to be an informed individual that holds a responsible position as a communications technician, testified that she typed a letter of resignation at work in Dayton, and drove to Columbus, Ohio, where she maintained a post office box and mailed the letter from the main post office. In support of her testimony, she presented a sales receipt for certified mail that bears a stamp impression indicating that a letter was mailed on 9 December 1985.

She testified that she waited in line because of heavy traffic, told the postal clerk she wanted to mail the letter, paid him, and he stamped a receipt. He returned the top portion of it to her and she filled out the union name and address, and left. She asserts that she did not read the receipt, nor did the clerk ask her if she wanted a return receipt.

When Respondent began preparations for this proceeding, it observed that the stamp impression contained on Holliman's receipt was identical to that of two other individuals who allegedly sent resignations that also had not been received by the Union. In all three cases, the receipt for certified mail was stamped Columbus, Ohio M.O.C.U. with a date. Suspicions were further raised when one of the receipts was stamped on 21 April 1985, which was a Sunday.

Respondent requested the post office to conduct an investigation. This investigation resulted in a letter dated 4 February 1987, to the General Counsel's office and to counsel for Local 4354. The letter states that the main post office in Columbus, after searching its files, found there was no record of delivery or receipt for certified receipt, P 041 658 872 (the letter allegedly mailed by Holliman) or for one of the other receipts (P 050 010 474, dated 18 March 1985). The letter was prepared by Ruth Thompson, an employee of the consumer affairs section of the post office, who also testified that the stamp with the letters, M.O.C.U. (for Main Office Carrier Unit), is not available to the window clerks where Holliman claims to have mailed her letter and could not have been used by mistake at the window.

George Calhoun, a claims and inquiry clerk for the post office, researched Holliman's receipt. He found no record of delivery or return on this receipt. He indicated that he and another person conducted the search order to cross check each other and still no record could be found. Although they do lose a couple of receipts a day, there are 4000 to 6000 other receipts that are properly accounted for.

Charles Boren, the area manager for the postal service, testified that the M.O.C.U. stamp is only found in the main office carrier unit, which is located at least 100 yards from the window unit. The carrier unit is in the extreme rear of the building and the window unit is at the extreme front. The carrier unit is not accessible to the general public and the M.O.C.U. stamp is never available to the counter unit. Boren further testified that temporary employees are never used at the window unit and, further, window unit employees are trained to ask customers whether they want a return receipt. At the suggestion of the court, Boren made an attempt to review when receipts in numerical sequence with Holliman's receipt were used but reported back that he had no record of where such information might be kept.

It also was established that Holliman is well acquainted with a number of employees at the Columbus post office that are letter carriers, including her former husband, who is a clerk (but not a window clerk) and that a postal investigator interviewed her about this matter. To her knowledge, no charges against any postal employees were brought as a result of the investigation.

The General Counsel argues that where there is no evidence of actual delivery as here, it is presumed that membership resignations are received the day after mailing, citing Electrical Workers IBEW Local 340 (Hulse Electric), 273 NLRB 428 (1984).

In the instant case, however, the Respondent has persuasively shown the existence of irregular circumstances surrounding the purported mailing of the resignation letter. These circumstances include the fact: (1) that Respondent has no record of having received it, yet freely admits and has records of receiving a large number of other resignations; (2) that Holliman's testimony regarding the way in which she mailed and obtained a "receipt" (but not a return receipt) of mailing is directly at odds with the probative testimony of post office officials regarding the procedures and use of the involved "receipt" stamp; (3) that Holliman engaged in conduct inconsistent with her expressed "disgust" with the Union by failing to request a return receipt or otherwise seeking any confirmation of her membership status and then observing the picket line for approximately a week; and (4) that Holliman had the opportunity through her acquaintanceship with post office employees who has unique access to the receipt stamp used on her inappropriately stamped receipt slip.

I find that post office officials have persuasively shown that in the ordinary course of business Holliman could not have obtained a sales receipt bearing the stamp impression appearing on her asserted proof of mailing. The indication that postal investigators apparently did not find sufficient evidence to support any further action is immaterial to proof of the validity of Holliman's mail receipt stamped 9 December 1985. I conclude that the receipt stamped 9 December 1985 is not valid and is not entitled to any affirmative weight as proof of the mailing of a membership resignation.

I therefore find that the Respondent has shown that no presumption of mailing (and receipt) of Holliman's purported resignation from membership is warranted. Otherwise, the General Counsel has failed to show that the questioned receipt should be considered to be valid.

I further find that Holliman's testimony that she mailed a letter of resignation stands uncorroborated and, in view of all the circumstances, including the suspicion of possible fabrication, her testimony is not entitled to credible weight that could affirmatively establish that she resigned from membership prior to the date she crossed the picket line. Accordingly, the Union acted properly and reasonably by considering her to be a member at the time she violated union rules.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act and it has a collective-bargaining agreement with an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act, and it will effectuate the purposes of the Act to assert jurisdiction.

2. Respondent did not engage in an unfair labor practice in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act by charging Julia A. Jefferson and Windy K. Holliman with a violation of internal union rules and notifying them that a trial court concerning those charges would be conducted on 6 November 1986.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[2]

ORDER

It is recommended that the complaint be dismissed in its entirety.

---

[2] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

July 26, 1988

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On April 11, 1988, Administrative Law Judge Richard H. Beddow Jr. issued the attached supplemental decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the supplemental decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions,[2] and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.[3]

Discriminatee Wallace Coy, although subpoenaed by the General Counsel, did not appear at the hearing. As a result the Respondent was denied an opportunity to cross-examine him.[4] We shall order the Respondent to pay the amount found due Coy to the Regional Director for Region 9 to be held in escrow for 1 year.[5] The Regional Director will make suitable arrangements including, if necessary, further supplemental proceedings to afford the Respondent, together with the General Counsel, an opportunity to examine Coy, and any other witness with relevant testimony, and to introduce any relevant and material evidence bearing on the amount of backpay due. The Regional Director shall make a final determination whether any interim earnings or other amounts, in excess of those shown in the specification, or any other factors are revealed which may reduce the amount of backpay due under existing precedent. In the event the Regional Director determines that deductions are warranted, the amount so deducted shall be returned to the Respondent.[6]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge with the modifications listed below and orders that the Respondent, Beckley Belt Services d/b/a Beckley Belt Services and Roofing Co., Inc., Beckley, West Virginia, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Make whole discriminatees William Crawford and Neal Parrish as set forth in the recommended Order minus tax withholdings required by law.

2. Pay to the Regional Director for Region 9 the net backpay found due employee Wallace E. Coy. The Regional Director shall place this backpay in escrow for a period not exceeding 1 year from the date the money is deposited. If the Respondent seeks review and then deposits the money after court enforcement of the Board's Order, the escrow period will end 1 year after the money is deposited. Finally, if the Respondent deposits the money and then seeks review the escrow period will end 1 year after the Board's Order is enforced. The Regional Director shall make arrangements to afford the Respondent, together with the General Counsel, an opportunity to examine Coy, and any other witness with relevant testimony, and to introduce any relevant and material evidence bearing on the amount of backpay due. The Regional Director shall make a final determination whether any interim earnings or other amounts, in excess of those shown in the specification, or any other factors are revealed which may reduce the amount of backpay due under existing precedent. In the event the Regional Director determines that deductions are warranted, the amount so deducted shall be returned to the Respondent.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] The Respondent, in its brief, states that it agrees that the judge's award of $15,675.88 to Neil Parrish should be paid.

[3] The judge's recommended Order will be modified to deduct any tax withholding required by law.

[4] Unlike the judge, we attach no significance to the Respondent's failure to subpoena Coy since he had already been subpoenaed by the General Counsel.

[5] Starlite Cutting, 280 NLRB 1071 (1986) (Starlite I), as amended by Starlite Cutting, 284 NLRB 620 (1987) (Starlite II). Starlite I overruled Duncan Foundry & Machine Works, 222 NLRB 768 (1976), and stated that a respondent's backpay obligation in the absence of the discriminatee will lapse at the end of a 1-year escrow period and, absent the discriminatee's showing by a preponderance of the evidence that there were compelling reasons to justify the failure to come forward during that period, a respondent shall not remain obligated for the gross backpay amount specified for the discriminatee after the end of the 1-year escrow period. Starlite II clarified the starting date of the 1-year escrow period discussed in Starlite I. In Starlite II the Board majority held that the 1-year escrow period shall begin either on the respondent's compliance by payment of the backpay for deposit into escrow or on the date the Board's supplemental decision and order becomes final, including enforcement thereof, whichever is later. The provisions of Starlite I and II are applicable in the instant case with regard to backpay owed to Coy. For reasons stated in his concurring and dissenting opinion in Starlite I Chairman Stephens would not have Coy's backpay lapse if he should be unavailable during the escrow period. Similarly, Member Cracraft, who did not participate in Starlite I, agrees with former Member Dennis' dissent that backpay for unavailable discriminatees should not lapse after 1 year. However, so long as Starlite I remains Board law, Chairman Stephens and Member Cracraft will apply the remedy set forth in that decision.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

RICHARD H. BEDDOW JR., Administrative Law Judge. This matter was heard in Beckley, West Virginia, on January 12, 1988. Subsequently, briefs were filed by the General Counsel and Respondent.

The proceeding is based on backpay specifications dated November 4, 1987, following a consent judgment filed April 1, 1987, by the United States Court of Appeals for the Forth Circuit enforcing the Decision and Order of the National Labor Relations Board dated April 28, 1986, reported at 279 NLRB 512 the Decision ordered Respondent to make laid-off employees Neal Parrish, Wallace Coy, and William Crawford whole for any loss of pay suffered by their unlawful layoff.

On review of the backpay specifications, as amended, Respondent's answer and the evidence presented at the hearing, it appears that the primary issues presented are as follows:

1. Whether the formula used in the backpay specifications, based on the discriminatees' estimated share of total actual wages paid during the backpay period, should be reduced.
2. Whether medical expenses claimed by Crawford, Coy, and Parrish are reimbursable.
3. Whether Respondent tolled its pension obligation by terminating the contract in March 1984.
4. Whether Crawford, Coy, and Parrish were entitled to backpay during the first and second quarters of 1984.
5. Whether William Crawford was entitled to backpay after the second quarter of 1986.

Testimony

Claude Harrell, the Board's compliance officer, testified regarding his review and preparation of the backpay specifications and the basis for his conclusions.

He determined the ratio of "belting work" verses "roofing work" and then took all wages paid by the Employer and multiplied it by a factor to determine what percentage of belting work would have gone to each discriminattee. This method was devised because a request to the employer for pertinent records was not responded to. On cross-examination, Harrell answered that he did not take into consideration the Employer's alleged cancellation of the collective-bargaining agreement (in 1984) when he evaluated the pension contribution figures. He also stated that he looked at medical bills represented to be unreimbursed and, in the case of Parrish, a discussion with his wife resulted in the elimination of a significant portion of his initial figure because the bills had been otherwise reimbursed. He also was asked about his investigation of interim employment and answered that tax returns had been examined. These documents were made available to Respondent's counsel for examination and, after a 15-minute recess, counsel stated he had no further questions.

Discriminatees Parrish and Crawford were called and testified regarding their unreimbursed medical expenses and their search for employment.

The General Counsel did not call Wallace Coy but supplied Respondent's counsel with his underlying tax returns and W-2 forms, which had been obtained in the course of the Board's investigation. Respondent's counsel made a demand that the General Counsel produce Coy. When it was stated that an effort had been made to obtain his presence but that he did not appear, Respondent's counsel made no further attempt to seek the witness through issuance of a subpoena but stated it was willing to proceed. He then moved to strike the backpay specifications that related to Coy. The motion was denied and counsel called Respondent's president, Gary Stegal, as its only witness.

Stegal introduced a copy of an unsigned letter he allegedly sent on March 30, 1984, to District 29 of the Union. It purports to be a notice to terminate the existing labor agreement effective 30 September 1984. The letter also asserts that Respondent would not be bound by any contract negotiated by any association but was prepared to negotiate a new agreement. Such negotiation never occurred and the Union asserts its files do not contain the document. The Union and the General Counsel objected to the letter's authenticity, pointing out that the letter is not a carbon or Xerox copy of an original, it is not executed, and there is no showing that it was mailed or delivered to the Union.

Stegal testified regarding occasions after Coy was laid-off when he allegedly observed him going to work at Allen Belt Company. The General Counsel, however, indicated that the witness had examined the Board's documentation that shows that Coy's wife was employed at that company in 1984 and 1985; however, Stegal indicated that he believed the documents were false or inaccurate. Stegal also testified regarding an employment-subcontracting arrangement he made with laid-off employee Crawford during the backpay period.

Discussion and Conclusions

It is well established that the only burden on the General Counsel in a backpay proceeding is to show the gross amount of backpay due, and that the finding of an unfair labor practice presumes that some backpay is owed, see Hacienda Hotel & Casino, 279 NLRB 601 (1986).

Turning first to Respondent's contention that its pension obligations were tolled by its March 1984 letter terminating its contract, this letter is not shown to be authentic or entitled to be afforded any probative weight. I find that the asserted letter of termination is not a carbon or Xerox copy of an original, it is not executed, there is no showing that it was mailed, and it was not received by the Union. Otherwise, I conclude that the Respondent's testimony, standing alone, is inherently unbelievable[1] and insufficient to support the Respondent's burden to show that the pension contribution liability stated in the backpay specifications should be reduced. Moreover, the Board's Decision and Order of April 28, 1986, in this proceeding specifically ordered the Respondent to:

[1] There was no mention of any termination of the contract in the unfair labor practice hearing, which was conducted on May 22, 1984, and it was undisputed that Respondent was then a member of the Association of Bituminous Contractors.

> (d) Honor and give effect to the collective-bargaining agreement between the Respondent and the Union and make the employees in the above-described bargaining unit whole for any losses they may have suffered as a result of the Respondent's failure to honor, abide by, and apply to unit employees the term of the collective-bargaining agreement, including the wage rate, health and benefit plan, pension fund, and grievance arbitration procedure, in the manner set forth in the section herein entitled "The Remedy."

Respondent cannot unilaterally toll the backpay period except as provided by the Order, which requires an offer of immediate and full reinstatement to each discriminatee and, under these circumstances, I find that Respondent has not shown that its obligation to employees' pension fund was terminated at an earlier date.

Respondent's position on its pension obligation also appears to be inconsistent with its failure to dispute the fact that the discriminatees' medical expenses would be covered by the contract's insurance provisions. Here, the discriminatees are shown to be entitled to medical and dental insurance coverage under the National Coal Mine Construction Agreement, by which Respondent was bound. Although Respondent contended that Crawford and Parrish were covered by hospitalization plans and thus incurred no actual medical expenses, the Board's compliance officer and both Crawford and Parrish testified concerning their medical bills. Crawford testified that he did not obtain any medical insurance after January 1984, and that his wife was not covered by any insurance.

Parrish testified that he did not obtain any other insurance until January 1985 and that his new policy did not cover all items that had previously been covered by his contractual insurance plan under Respondent, nor did it cover 100 percent of expenses.

Inasmuch as the Board's investigation shows that the discriminatees incurred unreimbursed medical bills which would have been paid under Respondent's insurance coverage and their bills were not covered by any other insurance, they are entitled to reimbursment as set forth in the backpay specifications.

Respondent contends that the gross backpay amounts in the backpay specifications should be reduced because of changes in the distribution of work, however, it presented no evidence to support its contention and, otherwise, the compliance officer testified that application of Respondent's theory to the General Counsel's formula in fact would result in an increase in gross backpay.

Additionally, Respondent did not furnish any alternative computation of backpay, whereas the compliance officer looked at all wages paid to employees who performed belt work and roofing work during the year preceding the backpay period and computed the percentage of those wages which had been paid to each of the discriminatees. He applied the percentage for each discriminatee to the total belt and roofing wages for each quarter in the backpay period to compute gross backpay for each discriminatee. (This formula was used because the discriminatees had performed only belt work while employees who replaced them performed both belt work and roofing work and it was not appropriate to use the wages paid to replacement employees during the backpay period as gross backpay.)

Respondent's answer alleges that Crawford and Parrish made no attempt to find interim employment in the first quarter in 1984 and that Coy received unreported interim earnings during the first and second quarters of 1984. The only evidence in support of its contention was the testimony of Respondent's president that he had observed Coy going to Allen Belt. As noted, it appears that Coy's wife was employed at Allen Belt Co. and, otherwise, no effort was made to subpoena records or present evidence from Allen or its payroll records to show whether Coy had received any pay from Allen Belt prior to the third quarter of 1984.

The burden of showing interim earnings for mitigation of damages rests with Respondent. Rainbow Coaches, 280 NLRB 1420 (1986). Here Crawford and Parrish testified at length concerning their efforts to find work during the period and, otherwise, Respondent's testimony regarding his observation of Coy going to another company merely gives rise to speculation and falls far short of meeting its burden of proof that Coy concealed some of his income. Respondent was given the opportunity to examine the underlying documentation on which Coy's backpay specifications were based and to cross-examine the responsible compliance officer. Otherwise, counsel indicated his willingness to proceed and no attempt was made by Respondent to subpoena Coy's presence at the hearing and I conclude that the record fails to show that any change in the backpay specifications is warranted.

Respondent also contends that a proper offer of reinstatement was tendered to Crawford on May 22, 1986. No evidence was submitted of such an offer and Stegal affirmed that he did not send a letter offering reinstatement to Crawford. Crawford did some sporadic work for Respondent in 1986 that appears to have been principally in the nature of a subcontracting arrangement, although Respondent's payroll records reflect employee earnings for Crawford of $734 (less appropriate deductions) during May 1986.

The testimony indicates that Crawford had formed a business, Cardinal Belt, with another individual and sought to perform belt services for coal mines. Some of Cardinal Belt's services were performed in partnership with Respondent, using Respondent's equipment. Respondent claims that because Cardinal Belt failed to pay Respondent its share of the proceeds on such jobs, Crawford was subsequently terminated for cause as an employee.

Respondent made no apparent attempt to recover these funds and in fact again used Crawford's personal services in the third quarter of 1986 when Respondent's payroll records showed (by stipulation of the parties) that Crawford received $320. It therefore appears that

Crawford was not terminated for cause but continued to be called for sporadic employment. Inasmuch as such sporadic, casual employment does not meet the requirements of the remedial Order that Crawford be offered "full reinstatement" to his former position, I find that no action occurred that would effectively toll the backpay period and I conclude that it continues though the period alleged in the backpay specifications.

Under these circumstances, I concluded that the gross backpay computations in the backpay specifications are the most accurate possible estimates of backpay and that Respondent has failed to establish any reasonable alternative basis for a dimension of damages. I therefore conclude that gross backpay should be computed according to the backpay specifications.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[2]

ORDER

On the basis of the findings and conclusions set forth above and pursuant to Section 10(s) of the Act, it is ordered that Respondent Beckley Belt Services d/b/a Beckley Belt Services and Roofing Company, Inc., Beckley, West Virginia, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall make whole each of the discriminatees' named below by payment to each of them as reimbursement for medical expenses and backpay the amount set forth next to his name, plus interest to the date of payment as computed in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987),[3] and payment to the United Mine Workers of America pension fund the total of $10,204.46 plus interest, on behalf of the discriminatees.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On April 3, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Lowell Goerlich issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a limited exception and an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.[2]

In his recommended remedy, the judge provided that the Respondent make whole its employees for any loss of wages or other employment benefits they may have suffered as the result of the Respondent's failure to sign the contract, plus interest. The judge further provided that the loss of earnings shall be computed in the manner set forth in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). We modify the judge's recommended remedy to provide that the loss of earnings shall be computed in the manner set forth in Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 682 (1970), enfd. 444 F.2d 502 (6th Cir. 1971), with interest to be computed in the manner provided in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987).[3]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Zayre Department Stores, Racine, Wisconsin, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

Benjamin Mandelman, Esq. and Paul Bosanac, Esq., for the General Counsel.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

LOWELL GOERLICH, Administrative Law Judge. The charges filed on 10 October 1986 by United Food & Commercial Workers Union, Local 1444, as chartered by United Food & Commercial Workers International Union, AFL-CIO-CLC (the Union) was served on Zayre Department Stores (the Respondent) by certified mail on the same date. The first amended charge filed by the Union on 14 October 1986 was served on the Respondent on the same date. A complaint and notice of hearing was issued on 6 November 1986. The complaint, among other things, alleges that the Respondent since 23 September 1986 has failed to execute a written agreement with the Union in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act.

The Respondent filed a timely answer in which it denied that it had engaged in the alleged unfair labor practices.

This case came on for hearing in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, on 27 and 28 January 1987. Each party was afforded a full opportunity to be heard, to call, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally on the record, to submit proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law, and to file briefs. All briefs have been carefully considered.

On the entire record in this case and from my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE RESPONDENT

At all times material, the Respondent, a Delaware corporation with offices and places of business located in Racine, Wisconsin, has been engaged in the operation of general merchandise retail stores throughout the United States and operates two such stores located in Racine, Wisconsin.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

In adopting the judge's decision, we find it unnecessary to rely on his statement at fn. 8 of his decision that the Respondent was insisting that nonunion members participate in the ratification vote.

Member Johansen notes that Sec. 8(d) defines the obligation "to bargain collectively." The failure to bargain collectively is made an unfair labor practice by Sec. 8(a)(5) and Sec. 8(b)(3).

[2] The General Counsel has requested that the Order include a visitatorial clause. Under the circumstances of this case, we find it unnecessary to include such a clause. Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

[3] In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

During the past calendar year, a representative period, the Respondent, in the course and conduct of its business operations described above, received gross revenues in excess of $500,000, and during the same period, purchased and received goods valued in excess of $50,000 from points located directly outside the State of Wisconsin.

The Respondent is now, and has been at all times material, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The Union is now, and has been at all times material, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

The parties stipulated that a petition for an election was filed 12 July 1983. An election was conducted on 23 September 1983 to which exceptions were filed by the Respondent. Thereafter the Board issued a Decision and Certification of Representative on 21 March 1984 certifying the Union as the bargaining agent. The Respondent refused to bargain. A complaint was issued that culminated in a bargaining order on 28 September 1984 in 272 NLRB No. 84 (unpublished). On 16 August 1985, the United States court of appeals enforced the Board's order.

Thereafter, commencing on 22 October 1986 and concluding on 23 July 1986, the Union and the Respondent met in negotiation sessions. At the 23 July 1986 session, the Respondent presented the Union, as a final offer, a complete written contract except for the duration clause. The omission was supplied by the Respondent orally. The contract offer was for a period of 3 years to commence on the date of the signing of the contract. Irving Ritz, vice president of labor relations, was the spokesman for the Respondent during the negotiations and Paul Whiteside Jr. was the spokesman for the Union. Although the subject of contract ratification had not been discussed at any of the prior bargaining sessions, including the 23 July 1986 session, Ritz insisted that at the 23 July 1986 session he stated to the union representatives that "we were prepared to sign the agreement subject to acceptance or ratification by the employees."[1] According to Ritz, "There was no direct response, no objection, no grunts, no nods . . . until the end of the contract negotiations at which time they said the contract isn't acceptable to us, but we will take it to a vote." Whiteside denied that the Respondent had proposed as a condition precedent to the execution of the proffered contract ratification by the employees.[2]

At the 23 July 1986 bargaining session the Union reviewed the contract offer and, according to Whiteside, after discussion with the Respondent's representatives, the following subjects had not been resolved: union security, probationary period, seniority, polygraph, wages, and term of the contract. At the close of the session the Respondent was advised that the union representatives present would not recommend acceptance of the proposed contract but would, nevertheless, submit the contract to a ratification vote.[3] As testified by Ritz, "At the very end of negotiations, the Union said we cannot accept this contract, but we will take it to a vote." Prior to the conclusion of the 23 July 1986 session, arrangements were agreed on whereby the Union could use the Respondent's bulletin board to announce a ratification meeting.

Notices were posted as agreed. A ratification meeting was scheduled on 3 September 1986 at the union hall.[4] The ratification meeting occurred as scheduled. At this meeting the union conferees at the negotiating session reversed their position and recommended acceptance of the proposed contract. Whiteside made the recommendation. Nevertheless, the contract was rejected; a strike vote was taken, which failed to pass.

Ritz heard of the contract rejection the next day through one of the store managers.

Neither the Respondent nor the Union communicated with each other in respect to the status of the proposed contract until 19 September 1986, when the Respondent received the following mailgram from the Union dated 18 September 1986:

> In accordance with Article 23, Section D6 of the USCW International Constitution Local 1444 has ratified your final proposal as presented in the messages on 7-23-86. Accordingly, we will be preparing copies of the Labor agreement for your signature.[5]

By letter dated 18 September 1986, the Union sent the following message:

> This is a follow-up to our mailgram of September 17, 1986. The Western Union operator somehow made several errors in the message, which should have read:

[1] Ritz' demand is sometimes referred to at the "employee ratification" or "ballot clause."

[2] Had the Union agreed to Ritz' alleged proposition it would have violated the Union's constitution, which required an employer's final offer to be submitted to membership of the Union not the employees of the employer. (See infra.)

[3] The Union's International constitution, art. 23, sec. D3, required that an employer's final offer be submitted to the affected membership:

> The proposal judged by the President of negotiating committee to be the employer's final proposal for a collective bargaining contract or renewal of an existing contract shall be submitted to the affected membership for its consideraton. A majority vote of those present and voting shall be necessary to accept or reject the proposal.

[4] Daniel Welch, president of the Union, testified that the ratification meeting was delayed because it "was a heavy vacation period and a work period for us" and that "we wanted to consult with our International Union."

[5] Art. 23, sec. D6, provides:

> In the event of rejection of the employer's proposal judged by the Local Union President of negotiating committee to be the employer's final proposal for a collective-bargaining contract or renewal of an existing contract and the failure of the affected membership of the Local Union to approve a strike or other economic action by a two-thirds vote, the Local Union Executive Board shall, after notifying the International President and receiving acknowledgement of such notice, have authority to accept or reject such offer.

> In accordance with Article 23 Section D-6 of the UFCW International Constitution, Local 1444 has ratified your final proposal as presented and amended on July 23, 1986. Accordingly, we will be preparing copies of the labor agreement for your signature.
> The corrections are [italicized] and should clarify our previous communications. You should receive the contracts for signature in about two weeks.

Another letter dated 19 September 1986 followed:

> This letter should serve as additional notice that Local #1444 has accepted your final proposal as presented on 7/23/86.
> Attached is a signed copy of that document by the officers of Local #1444.
> We will be forwarding copies of the labor agreement for your signature.

A final letter dated 23 September 1986 contained the following language:

> Please find enclosed four (4) copies of the labor agreement covering your two (2) Racine stores.
> Please sign and return two (2) copies to this office.

The Respondent answered by a letter dated 29 September 1986.

> At the last collective bargaining meeting between us on July 23, 1986, you specifically stated that the contract then on the table was unacceptable to the Union, and though you couldn't recommend it, you would present it to the employees for a vote. It is our understanding that the employees also rejected the contract by majority vote on September 3, 1986. These facts clearly indicate that there was never a meeting of the minds, a requisite element for a contract, nor was there a lawful ratification by the Union or the employees. It is my belief, therefore, that it would be improper for me to affix my signature to the four copies of the contract which you have sent to me for that purpose. Under these circumstances, I am returning all copies to you herewith.

Ritz agreed that "[w]hat the Union said they were going to submit to the membership for ratification was a complete proposal"—on the part of the Company, "[a] three year agreement . . . [f]rom the date of signing." Ritz was unware of the Union's constitutional provision that permitted acceptance of a final proposal after rejection of the contract by the membership and the loss of a strike vote; nor was this information imparted to the Respondent by the Union. At no time has the Respondent withdrawn its final offer. Ritz explained why the Respondent did not sign its final offer:

> Well because I didn't feel that we had had a meeting of the minds in view of the fact that, number one, we had offered the contract subject to ratification by the employees and I was under the impression at the end of the agreement that the Union understood that when they said we can't accept it, but we will take it to a vote . . . there was no meeting of the minds because there was no ratification.

Ritz also explained why the Respondent had insisted that "employees favorably ratify the vote before the company would sign it":

> It was our impression that the Union had enduced [sic] employees to vote for them by making promises of more than what they were currently receiving and whatever resulted from the contract negotiations, our employees were going to have to live with and we were concerned about morale and we wanted them to be the ones who had the ability to determine whether or not they could live or wanted to live with the contract proposal.

Further, it would appear from the credible evidence in this case that, because the Respondent had never withdrawn its final offer, the acceptance of its final offer by the Union would have resulted in a meeting of the parties' minds as to all the provisions of the written offer 23 July 1986, including the duration clause that the Respondent orally offered. Not so, contends the Respondent, for it had imposed a condition precedent, a barrier so to speak, that had to be surmounted before there could be a meeting of the minds. This barrier was the "employee ratification" or "ballot clause." The Respondent's insistence on this barrier was unlawful because it concerned a matter without the scope of mandatory bargaining. "[I]t is unlawful to insist upon matters within the scope of mandatory bargaining and unlawful to insist upon matters without." (Emphasis added.) NLRB v. Borg-Warner Corp., 356 U.S. 342, 349 (1958). Additionally, in the Borg-Warner case, supra, the Supreme Court teaches that a ballot clause, such as the one in the instant case, was not a matter that fell within the scope of mandatory bargaining and that insistence by an employer thereon as a condition precedent to the consummation of an agreement was unlawful.[6]

To allow the Respondent to dictate the method of acceptance of its offer and insist thereon would deny the Union rights given to it by statute, for it would result in the consummation of an agreement with other than the statutory representative with which the Employer was required to bargain. As was said by Justice Harlan in his concurring decision in Borg-Warner, supra at 362:

> The employer's duty to bargain with the representatives includes not merely obligation to confer in good faith, but also ". . . the execution of a written contract incorporating any agreement reached if requested . . ." by the employees' representatives. § 8(d). I think its hardly debatable that this language must be read to require the company, if so

[6] The "ballot clause" in Borg-Warner, 356 U.S. 342, 345 fn. 3, read in part, "all employees in the bargaining unit to vote, by secret, impartially supervised, written ballot, on whether to accept or reject the Company's last offer, and on any subsequent offers made."

> requested, to sign any agreement reached with the same representative with which it is required to bargain. [Emphasis added.]

The Employer's stance in this case not only frustrates the objectives of good-faith collective bargaining but also affords the Employer a means by which it can avoid its obligations under Section 8(d) of the Act and dictate the Union's internal regulations as they pertain to the acceptance of a labor agreement.[7] Obviously, this may not be allowed.

The case of Southland Dodge, 205 NLRB 276, 279 (1973), disposes of the issues before me:

> Because an employer may not insist on a ratification of a collective-bargaining agreement by a "majority of its employees" (See Wooster Division of Borg-Warner Corporation v. NLRB, 356 U.S. 342 (1958)) the Respondent's refusal to execute a "written contract" upon the request of the Union constituted a breach of the Respondent's duty to bargain collectively within the meaning of Section 8(d) of the Act. [See also C & W Lektra Bat Co., 209 NLRB 1038, 1040 (1974).]

I find that the Respondent's insistance on the "employee ratification" or "ballot clause" and its refusal to sign an otherwise satisfactory agreement because such "employee ratification" or "ballot clause" was not complied with was in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) and Section 8(d) of the Act.

In view of my finding and conclusions, no useful purpose will be served by my determination whether Whiteside or Ritz lied about Ritz' presentation of the "employee ratification" clause at the 23 July 1986 bargaining session. For the same reason, the defenses raised by the Respondent in its brief are immaterial or are not well taken because they do not conform with the facts as found above.[8]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act, and it will effectuate the purposes of the Act for jurisdiction to be exercised here.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The following unit constitute an appropriate unit for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All regular, full-time and regular, part-time selling and non-selling employees, and employees in all leased departments of the Employer at its two stores located at 4101 Durand Avenue and 2210 Rapids Drive, Racine, Wisconsin; excluding all other employees, casual employees, seasonal employees, all leased department managers, confidential employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.[9]

4. The Union has been at all times material the exclusive representative of the employees in the aforesaid appropriate unit for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

5. By insisting that it would not sign its proposed labor agreement unless the employees in the appropriate unit ratified it, the Respondent engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

6. By unlawfully failing and refusing to execute a written contract embodying the terms and conditions of the agreement reached with the Union, as found, the Respondent engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) and Section 8(d) of the Act.

7. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of the Act.

THE REMEDY

It is recommended that the Respondent cease and desist from its unfair labor practices and take certain affirmatve action deemed necessary to effectuate the purposes of the Act. It is further recommended that the Respondent sign the collective-bargaining agreement marked General Counsel's Exhibit 12(b); that it give effect to such written contract retroactively to 20 September 1986;[10] that it continue the contract in effect for 3 years after 20 September 1986; and that it make whole its employees for any loss of wages or other employment benefits they may have suffered as the result of the Respondent's failure to sign the contract, plus interest. The loss of earnings, if any, under the recommended Order shall be computed in the manner set forth in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[11]

[7] "[I]t is for the union and not the employer, to construe and apply its internal regulations relating to what would be sufficient to amount to ratification." M & M Oldsmobile, 156 NLRB 903, 905 (1966).

[8] The credible evidence established that the Respondent did not refuse to sign the contract because its offer had expired or had been withdrawn, or because of a mutual misunderstanding, or because the Union had insisted on a termination date of 16 September 1989. (The mailgram acceptance was dated 18 September 1986 and was received by the Respondent on 19 September 1986.) It was the acceptance of the Respondent's offer as presented at the bargaining session of 23 July 1986, which became the parties contract.

This contract was rejected by the Respondent solely (as expressed by Ritz "there was no meeting of the minds because there was no ratification") because, although the contract had been accepted by the Union, it had not been accepted by the employees. In its brief the Respondent puts it this way: "The Company's refusal to sign is based on its contention that no meeting of the minds occurred because the Company's obligation to agree was conditioned on a favorable employee ratification vote which never occurred." Thus it is also clear that the Respondent was also insisting that nonunion members participate in the ratification vote.

[9] The Respondent admitted the appropriate unit. The appropriate unit and the unit described in the contract are the same.

[10] The date of 20 September 1986 is chosen because it is the first date a signed copy of the agreement was submitted to the Respondent.

[11] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

ORDER

The Respondent, Zayre Department Stores, Racine, Wisconsin, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Failing and refusing to sign the written contract containing the Respondent's proposal of 23 July 1986.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Forthwith sign the contract, containing the Respondent's proposal of 23 July 1986 to remain in effect for 3 years following 20 September 1986.

(b) On execution of the aforesaid agreement, give retroactive effect to the provisions thereof, make whole its employees for any losses they may have suffered by reason of the Respondent's failure to sign the agreement in the manner set forth in the remedy section.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its Racine, Wisconsin establishment copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[12] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 30, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT fail or refuse to sign the written contract containing our proposal of 23 July 1986.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL forthwith sign a written contract with United Food & Commercial Workers Union, Local 1444, as chartered by United Food & Commercial Workers International Union, AFL-CIO-CLC effective 20 September 1986 for a period of 3 years.

WE WILL give retroactive effect to the terms and conditions of the contract and WE WILL make whole our employees for any losses they may have suffered by reason of our failure to sign the contract, plus interest.

July 27, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

Upon a charge filed by the Union on September 10, 1987, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint against North Star Steel Company, the Respondent, alleging that it has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act.

The complaint alleges that on July 30, 1987, following a Board election in Case 18–RC–14119, the Union was certified as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the Respondent's employees in the unit found appropriate. (Official notice is taken of the "record" in the representation proceeding as defined in the Board's Rules and Regulations, Secs. 102.68 and 102.69(g); Frontier Hotel, 265 NLRB 343 (1982).) The complaint further alleges that since September 1, the Respondent has refused to bargain with the Union. On September 25, the Respondent filed its answer admitting in part and denying in part the allegations in the complaint.

On October 5, the General Counsel filed a Motion for Summary Judgment. On December 30, the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice to Show Cause why the motion should not be granted. The Respondent filed a Cross-Motion for Summary Judgment and a statement in support of its motion and in opposition to the General Counsel's motion.

Ruling on Motion for Summary Judgment

In its answer, the Respondent admits its refusal to bargain with the Union. It contends, however, that the Union's certification is invalid on the grounds that in the prior representation proceeding, the Regional Director improperly rejected the Respondent's objections to the election as untimely.

In her motion, the General Counsel contends that summary judgment is appropriate because the Respondent's answer raises no litigable issue of fact.

Effective September 29, 1986, the Board revised its Rules and Regulations regarding the time periods in which to file documents with the Board. Section 102.69(a) of the revised rules provides that objections to the conduct of a Board election be filed "within 7 days after the tally of ballots has been prepared." Section 102.111(b) requires that election objections be received by the Regional Director "on or before the close of business on the last day of filing." The Respondent contends that the revised rules should not be applied strictly in this case.

Review of the record establishes that the Respondent's position has already been fully argued to, and considered by, the Board in the underlying representation proceeding. We are fully aware of the circumstances that resulted in the Regional Office receiving the Respondent's objections shortly after opening for business on the day after they were to be received. In the representation proceeding we cited Drum Lithographers, 287 NLRB 22 (1987), to support our finding that the Respondent's objections were filed untimely. As we stated in Drum Lithographers:

> [A]ll parties were put on notice, with full explanation, that the new rule would be strictly applied, and that election objections now must actually be received in the Regional Office on the due date.
> The Board's rule is explicit: objections to election must be received—not just postmarked or otherwise transmitted—within 7 days.[1]

The Respondent, like the petitioner in Drum Lithographers, presents a particularly unpersuasive case for a reappraisal of our position. The Regional Office was a mere three blocks away from the Respondent's attorney's office. In order to ensure timely receipt—the gravamen of our rule—the attorney might have delivered the objections in person to the Regional Office.[2]

Furthermore, this is an unpersuasive case for returning to the Rio de Oro Uranium[3] rule as urged by our dissenting colleague. Even if we were to apply the former rule to the instant case, we cannot say that the Respondent "took every precaution necessary to assure compliance with the Board's rules."[4] The Respondent asserts that the delivery service took the objections to the Federal building in nearby St. Paul rather than the Federal building in Minneapolis located three blocks away from the office of the Respondent's attorney, and that by the time the mistake was discovered, it was too late for timely receipt. Yet, the Respondent itself failed to clearly signal to the delivery service which of the two Federal buildings was the destination for the filing. When initially telephoning the delivery service, the Respondent stated that the request included a filing at the Minneapolis offices of the National Labor Relations Board. However, the Respondent merely attached a note stating, "Please file with the NLRB immediately" to the Minneapolis-addressed filing, including with it a service of process for St. Paul.[5] Given the close proximity of the two Federal buildings, the Respondent should have highlighted the Minneapolis destination to ensure that the delivery service did not make a readily foreseeable mistake. We find that the Respondent's failure to do so falls short of the requirement that the objecting party take "every precaution necessary" to guarantee timely filing.

Unlike our dissenting colleague, therefore, we believe the Respondent fails to state any valid reason for our reevaluating what has already been established in Drum Lithographers or for contravening our well-established policy that a respondent in a proceeding alleging a violation of Section 8(a)(5) is not entitled to relitigate issues that were or could have been litigated in a prior representation proceeding. See Heuer International Trucks, 279 NLRB 127 (1986); Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co. v. NLRB, 313 U.S. 146, 162 (1941); Sections 102.67(f) and 102.69(c) of the Board's Rules and Regulations.

Accordingly, all issues raised by the Respondent were or could have been litigated in the prior representation proceeding. The Respondent does not offer to adduce at a hearing any newly discovered and previously unavailable evidence, nor does it allege any special circumstances that would require the Board to reexamine the decision made in the representation proceeding. We therefore find that the Respondent has not raised any issue that is properly litigable in this unfair labor practice proceeding. Accordingly, we grant the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment and deny the Respondent's Cross-Motion for Summary Judgment.

On the entire record, the Board makes the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Respondent, a Minnesota corporation, has been engaged in the manufacture of steel at its facility in St. Paul, Minnesota, where it annually sold and shipped goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 to points outside the State of Minnesota. We find that the Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Certification

Following the election held on July 23, 1987, the Union was certified as the collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All full-time and regular part-time clerical employees designated non-exempt by the Employer at the Employer's facility located at 1678 Red Rock Road, St. Paul, Minnesota, including pricing specialist, purchasing, sales, accounting, and inventory clerks, typists, sales receptionist and secretary, and office equipment operators, plant clerical employees, including rolling mill clerks, maintenance clerk, quality assurance clerk, melt shop clerk and shipping clerk; but excluding temporary employees, executive secretary, personnel secretary, confidential employees, guards, professional and professional trainee personnel, management and management trainee personnel, nurse, sales persons and supervisors, as defined by the National Labor Relations Act.

The Union continues to be the exclusive representative under Section 9(a) of the Act.

B. Refusal to Bargain

Since August 28, 1987, the Union has requested the Respondent to bargain, and since September 1, the Respondent has refused. We find that this refusal constitutes an unlawful refusal to bargain in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

CONCLUSION OF LAW

By refusing on and after September 1, 1987, to bargain with the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of employees in the appropriate unit, the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, we shall order it to cease and desist, to bargain on request with the Union, and, if an understanding is reached, to embody the understanding in a signed agreement.

To ensure that the employees are accorded the services of their selected bargaining agent for the period provided by law, we shall construe the initial period of the certification as beginning the date the Respondent begins to bargain in good faith with the Union. Mar-Jac Poultry Co., 136 NLRB 785 (1962); Lamar Hotel, 140 NLRB 226, 229 (1962), enfd. 328 F.2d 600 (5th Cir. 1964), cert. denied 379 U.S. 817 (1964); Burnett Construction Co., 149 NLRB 1419, 1421 (1964), enfd. 350 F.2d 57 (10th Cir. 1965).

[5] The delivery service asserts that it saw only Respondent's service of process for St. Paul and overlooked the filing for Minneapolis until it got to St. Paul.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, North Star Steel Company, St. Paul, Minnesota, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain with United Steelworkers of America, AFL–CIO, CLC as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the bargaining unit.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request, bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit on terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody the understanding in a signed agreement:

> All full-time and regular part-time clerical employees designated non-exempt by the Employer at the Employer's facility located at 1678 Red Rock Road, St. Paul, Minnesota, including pricing specialist, purchasing, sales, accounting, and inventory clerks, typists, sales receptionist and secretary, and office equipment operators, plant clerical employees, including rolling mill clerks, maintenance clerk, quality assurance clerk, melt shop clerk and shipping clerk; but excluding temporary employees, executive secretary, personnel secretary, confidential employees, guards, professional and professional trainee personnel, management and management trainee personnel, nurse, sales persons and supervisors, as defined by the National Labor Relations Act.

(b) Post at its facility in St. Paul, Minnesota, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[6] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 18, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

MEMBER CRACRAFT, dissenting.

The election in the underlying representation case was held on July 23, 1987.[1] The Union won the election. The filing date for objections was July 30. It is undisputed that on July 30 the Respondent's attorney retained a professional process server in the Minneapolis-St. Paul area to file and serve its objections to the election. The Respondent's attorney affixed the proper address to the objections.

The process server received the objections at 3:10 p.m. on July 30 and proceeded to the Federal building in St. Paul, Minnesota, rather than to the Federal building in Minneapolis, Minnesota, where the Board's Regional Office is located. Discovering the mistake, the process server returned to the correct address only to learn that the Regional Office had already closed. The next morning (July 31), at 8:25 a.m., the process server delivered the objections to the Regional Office. By letter written that same date, the Regional Director notified the Respondent's attorney that the objections had been rejected as they had been filed untimely.

On August 12, citing the above facts as the basis for its appeal, the Respondent filed exceptions to the decision of the Regional Director. By Order dated December 30, the Board denied the Respondent's exceptions. I dissented from the Board's denial of the Respondent's exceptions. Because I would have accepted the Respondent's objections as timely filed, I would deny the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment herein.

Revised Rule 102.69(a) provides that an objecting party may file objections within 7 days after the preparation of the tally of ballots. The objections in this case were accordingly due no later than July 30. In my dissent in Drum Lithographers, 287 NLRB 22 (1988), I stated my preference for the principles set forth in Rio de Oro Uranium Mines, 119 NLRB 153 (1957), when the objecting party "took every precaution necessary to assure compliance with the Board's rules" the objections should be considered timely.[2]

[6] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

[1] All dates are in 1987 unless otherwise noted.

In the instant case, the Respondent took certain precautions to assure compliance with the Board's Rules. The Respondent retained a process server at a time when it was clearly reasonable for the Respondent to assume that filing could be effected by the deadline. The properly addressed documents were picked up by the process server at the Respondent's attorney's office at 3:10 p.m. on July 30. The attorney's office is located only three blocks from the Regional Office.[3]

The Rules regarding the filing and service of objections have been developed and adopted for the purpose of providing orderly processing and prompt resolution of representation issues. However, we must avoid slavish adherence to form rather than substance in administering our Rules. In applying the rules, I would examine whether it was reasonable for the objecting party to expect that its objections would be timely filed. As the Board succinctly stated in Alfred Nickles Bakery, 209 NLRB 1058, 1059 (1974), in addressing this issue:

> In order to maintain the orderly processing of these cases, there must be adherence to the Board's Rules and Regulations. We do not say that there will be a "slavish" adherence to form rather than substance. What we do say, however, is that in order to support a variance or deviation from the clear requirements of the Board's Rules, there must be some showing that there has been an honest attempt to substantially comply with the requirements of the Rules, or, alternatively, a valid and compelling reason why compliance was not possible within the time required by the Rules.

See also Atlantic Forest Products, 282 NLRB 85 (1987).

I believe that the standard set out in Alfred Nickles is a standard which protects all parties as well as the policies and procedures of the Act. It requires strict compliance with the Rules and Regulations yet allows for an exception in extraordinary situations, such as the one before us. I would find that the Respondent made an honest attempt to substantially comply with the filing requirements. Finally, though certainly not the only consideration, I find it relevant that there is absolutely no prejudice shown here to any party to the proceeding if the Board accepts the objections on the merits. As I noted in my dissent in Drum Lithographers:

> The Board's preference in all proceedings which come before it is and should be to decide disputes on the merits. The Board's own regulations provide that its rules "shall be liberally construed to effectuate the purposes and provisions of the Act." 29 C.F.R. § 102.121 (1983). When, as in this case, the objecting party has acted diligently and in good faith, and there is no prejudice shown to any party to the proceeding, the objections must be accepted and considered on the merits. See NLRB v. Washington Star Co., 732 F.2d 974 (D.C. Cir. 1984).

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain with United Steelworkers of America, AFL-CIO, CLC as the exclusive representative of the employees in the bargaining unit.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

[2] The holding in Rio de Oro was generally applied to the late receipt of mailed objections prior to the most recent amendment to our Rules. Under Rio de Oro, objections postmarked before the filing date were treated as timely filed even if received after the due date. See, e.g., Nestle Co., 240 NLRB 1310 fn. 1 (1979); Chromalloy Mining & Minerals, 238 NLRB 688 (1978), enfd. in relevant part 620 F.2d 1120 (5th Cir. 1980); Gruber's Super Market, 201 NLRB 612 (1973), enfd. in relevant part 501 F.2d 697 (7th Cir. 1974). However, the Board also applied the Rio de Oro principles to filing methods other than mailing. Bechtel Inc., 218 NLRB 827 (1975); Sig Wold Storage, 205 NLRB 378 (1973).

[3] According to the affidavit of the process server's agent, the Respondent's attorney's secretary called the process server that morning to make arrangements for the pickup and delivery of the documents. At that time she informed the process server that the order was to be completed by 4 p.m. Contrary to my colleagues, I see nothing in the record before us that would indicate that the messenger's mistake in going to St. Paul rather than to the NLRB office in Minneapolis was caused by any carelessness on the part of the Respondent. Rather, the record indicates that the Respondent's attorney gave the messenger, the filing request for objections for the NLRB in Minneapolis at the same time that he gave the messenger a process service request for St. Paul. The Respondent's attorney's secretary had previously instructed the messenger that the objections were to be filed in Minneapolis. When the objections were delivered to the messenger the Respondent's attorney appended a written notation reminding the messenger that the objections were to be delivered to the NLRB Regional Offices. There are no NLRB offices in St. Paul. The fact that the messenger somehow got the destination for the process service request mixed up with the destination for the objections is certainly not attributable to the Respondent.

WE WILL, on request, bargain with the Union and put in writing and sign any agreement reached on terms and conditions of employment for our employees in the bargaining unit:

> All full-time and regular part-time clerical employees designated non-exempt by the Employer at the Employer's facility located at 1678 Red Rock Road, St. Paul, Minnesota, including pricing specialist, purchasing, sales, accounting, and inventory clerks, typists, sales receptionist and secretary, and office equipment operators, plant clerical employees, including rolling mill clerks, maintenance clerk, quality assurance clerk, melt shop clerk and shipping clerk; but excluding temporary employees, executive secretary, personnel secretary, confidential employees, guards, professional and professional trainee personnel, management and management trainee personnel, nurse, sales persons and supervisors, as defined by the National Labor Relations Act.

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

On June 30, 1987, Administrative Law Judge James F. Morton issued the attached supplemental decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, the General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed a brief in response to the General Counsel's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the supplemental decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Supplemental Decision and Order.

The Respondent's employees, represented by Local 455, went on strike July 1, 1975.[3] In January 1976, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by executing a contract with Teamsters Local 810 before communicating its withdrawal from the multiemployer group to Local 455.[4] In August 1978, Local 455 made an unconditional offer to return to work. In 1980, the Board found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) by failing to reinstate fully its striking employees.[5] Thereafter, the Regional Director issued the instant backpay specification.

The judge found, inter alia, that no discriminatee for whom the General Counsel sought backpay, pursuant to the make-whole order, was entitled to reimbursement for fringe benefits lost as a result of participating in the strike. Additionally, he did not find that Paul Beaudreau, Alf Lango, Joseph Morris, Peter Rebecca, and Siegbert Hicke were entitled to reimbursement of medical expenses. For the reasons set forth below, we disagree with the judge.

1. It is well settled that the "finding of an unfair labor practice . . . is presumptive proof that some backpay is owed by the [Respondent]."[6] The burden is on the General Counsel to prove the gross amount of backpay due.[7] The burden then shifts to the Respondent to establish facts that negate or mitigate its liability.[8]

In analyzing the General Counsel's backpay claims for Paul Beaudreau, Joseph Morris, William Daniels,[9] Miguel Quevedo, Peter Rebecca, Alf Lango, Siegbert Hicke, Ronald Michaud, and Richard White, the judge acknowledged that the collective-bargaining agreement effective just prior to the 1975 strike provided unit employees various fringe benefits. He found that the Respondent changed employees' fringe benefits beginning in late 1975. The judge mistakenly stated that the amended specification sought to make the discriminatees whole by requiring the Respondent to provide contributions to Local 455's Welfare, Pension, and Annuity Funds at the rates Local 455 had established in subsequent contracts with other employers during the backpay period. The judge then reasoned that requiring the Respondent to provide such benefits, as well as continuing the other fringe benefits established in the expired contract, would compel the Respondent to grant concessions to the Union that had not been achieved in negotiations, thereby contravening Section 8(d) of the Act.

The amended backpay specification does not seek to impose on the Respondent any terms in Local 455's subsequent collective-bargaining agreements with other employers; rather, the specification uses a formula based on continuing the terms of the parties' expired agreement. According to the circuit court, the Respondent's unlawful execution of a contract with Teamsters Local 810 before notifying Local 455 of its withdrawal from the multiemployer group was a violation of Section 8(a)(5).[10] The Board subsequently ordered the Respondent to bargain with Local 455.[11] As the Respondent never bargained to impasse with Local 455, it was obligated to continue giving effect to its expired collective-bargaining agreement with Local 455.[12] Thus, the amended backpay specification, based on the expired agreement's terms, correctly calculated the gross amounts of backpay due. The Respondent, on the other hand, has not established any facts to negate or mitigate its liability.

[1] The Union's name is changed to reflect the readmission of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters into the AFL–CIO, effective November 1, 1987.

[2] We affirm the judge's findings that the Respondent is obligated to reimburse employees for unlawfully withheld dues and fees and discriminatees Beaudreau, Daniels, Lango, Morris, Quevedo, and Rebecca for lost net earnings. We also affirm the judge's findings that Warren and Helene Riis are not the Respondent's alter egos and are not liable for backpay.

[3] The Respondent was a member of a multiemployer bargaining group whose collective-bargaining agreement with Local 455 expired June 30, 1975.

[9] We find no merit to the Respondent's exception that Daniels was unavailable for work because he was living in Mississippi during the backpay period. The mere fact that an employee moved and found interim employment out of town during the backpay period does not demonstrate that he would not have returned to his former position upon a valid offer of reinstatement.

Specifically, the judge denied all claims set forth in the amended backpay specification for vacation and severance pay, as well as contributions to Local 455's Welfare, Pension, and Annuity Funds. We will, therefore, order the Respondent to make the discriminatees whole by paying them the respective amounts set forth in the amended backpay specification for vacation and severance pay, and by making the contributions to the Local 455 Welfare Fund,[13] Pension Fund, and Annuity Fund on their behalf in the respective amounts set forth in the amended backpay specification.

2. The General Counsel has excepted to the judge's failure to include in the make-whole remedy reimbursement of the discriminatees for the purchase of substitute health insurance and out-of-pocket medical expenses incurred during the backpay period. The amended backpay specification, together with the documents introduced at the hearing, claimed $965.33 for Beaudreau's, $240.60 for Lango's, $268.30 for Morris', $1,342.21 for Rebecca's, and $1,438.93 for Hicke's substitute medical insurance premiums and out-of-pocket medical expenses during the backpay period. The judge, who, as stated above, dismissed all fringe benefit claims for all discriminatees, did not specifically address medical expenses.

It is customary to include reimbursement of substitute health insurance premiums and out-of-pocket medical expenses in make-whole remedies for fringe benefits lost.[14] Because the Respondent has established no facts that would negate or mitigate its liability, we will order the Respondent to reimburse Beaudreau $965.33, Lango $240.60, Morris $268.30, Rebecca $1,342.21, and Hicke $1,438.93 for their documented medical expenses during the backpay period.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders the Respondent, Mohawk Steel Fabricators, Inc., Deer Park, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, to make whole the employees named below by paying them the amounts of backpay set forth opposite their names, plus interest in the manner prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded,[15] less tax withholdings required by Federal and state laws, and by paying to the Welfare Fund, Pension Fund, and Annuity Fund of Shopmen's Local Union No. 455, International Association of Bridge, Structural & Ornamental Iron Workers, AFL–CIO, the respective amounts on their behalf set forth opposite their names, plus interest in the manner prescribed in Merryweather Optical Co.[16]

[13] The Respondent asserts that a discriminatee is made whole when he is reimbursed for the cost of premiums incurred in obtaining substitute health insurance coverage and for his out-of-pocket medical expenses to the extent that those expenses would have been reimbursed through the Local 455 Welfare Fund. In order to be made whole, however, a discriminatee must be restored to the position he would have occupied had the discrimination not occurred. This includes not only reimbursement of the discriminatee's premiums and medical expenses, but also requires the Respondent to contribute to the Welfare Fund according to the expired contract's terms so that the discriminatee's future interests in the Fund will be ensured. "[T]he diversion of contributions from the union funds undercut[s] the ability of those funds to provide for future needs." Stone Boat Yard v. NLRB, 715 F.2d 441, 446 (9th Cir. 1983).

Hassett Maintenance Corp., 260 NLRB 1211 (1982), a cryptic decision on which the Respondent relies, focused on what it characterized as the double insurance costs that would result from requiring the employer (which had provided other coverage) in that case to make contributions to the welfare fund. Hassett did not address restoring the full range of an employee's interests in the welfare fund. The Hassett decision did not reconcile its limited remedial order with pre-Hassett precedent requiring employer contributions to union welfare funds on employees' behalf, see, e.g., Kraft Plumbing & Heating, 252 NLRB 891 (1980), affd. mem. 661 F.2d 940 (9th Cir. 1981), as does precedent decided after Hassett. See Stone Boat Yard, 264 NLRB 981 (1983), which the Ninth Circuit enforced. The court rejected the double-coverage/punitive claim: the "employer cannot complain of the extra cost of improperly created, substitute fringe benefits . . . . The company is merely required to repay what it has unlawfully withheld." Stone Boat Yard v. NLRB, 715 F.2d at 446.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAMES F. MORTON, Administrative Law Judge. This is a proceeding to determine (a) how much backpay, if any, is due to three employees who had not been fully reinstated after returning to work from a strike, (b) how much is due eight strikers who had been refused reinstatement, (c) how much is due to those employees from whom dues and initiation fees had been unlawfully extracted, and (d) whether the two stockholders of Mohawk Steel Fabricators, Inc. (Respondent) should be personally liable, jointly and severally with Respondent, for backpay due.

In Case 29–CA–6895, reported as part of Kuno Steel Products Corp., 252 NLRB 904 (1980), enfd. sub. nom. NLRB v. Koenig Iron Works, 681 F.2d 130 (2d Cir. 1982), Respondent was found to have violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) in two respects by not having fully reinstated returned strikers and by refusing to reinstate other strikers. In Case 29–CA–4853, reported at 231 NLRB 264 (1977), enfd. in relevant part, sub nom. NLRB v. Independent Assn. of Steel Fabricators, 582 F.2d 135, 153 (2d Cir. 1978), Respondent was ordered to reimburse employees for initiation fes, dues, and assessments which had been unlawfully extracted from their wages. At the hearing before me, the General Counsel amended the backpay specification to allege that Respondent's president, Warren Riis, and his wife, Helene, stockholders of Respondent, should be held personally liable for any award.

The answer filed to the amended specification sets out defenses discussed separately below.

The hearing in this matter was held in New York City. It opened simultaneously with hearings in five related cases and closed on 7 October 1986. On the entire record, on due consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel and Respondent, and on my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

A. Background

In 1975 Respondent was a member of a multiemployer bargaining association which was then negotiating with Shopmen's Local Union No. 455, International Association of Bridge, Structural & Ornamental Iron Workers, AFL–CIO (Local 455) for a contract to succeed the one expiring on 30 June of that year. Local 455 struck the next day. Notwithstanding Local 455's status as exclusive bargaining representative of its employees, Respondent signed a collective-bargaining agreement on 9 January 1976 with Teamsters Local 810. That agreement contained union-security provisions that were applied to unit employees. Respondent's recognition and its execution of the contract with Local 810 were found unlawful. Respondent was ordered to reimburse its employees for all moneys exacted from its employees pursuant to the union-security provisions of that contract.

B. The Claim for Dues and Initiation Fees

The amended specification alleges that Respondent had unlawfully deducted dues and initiation fees from Teamsters Local 810 from the wages of three employees. Respondent's answer does not place that allegation in issue. Region 29's supervisory compliance examiner testified that the factual allegations set out in the amended specification were based on data and information furnished by Respondent. Based on the foregoing, I find that Respondent is obligated to make whole the following employees for having unlawfully deducted Local 810 dues and initiation fees by paying them the sums as set out below, with interest.

C. Backpay Claimed for the Returned Strikers

The amended specification alleges that Siegbert Hicke, Ronald Michaud, and Richard White had returned to Respondent's employ after having taken part in the strike referred to above and that they had not been fully reinstated to their former positions in which they received fewer fringe benefits than allegedly were due them. Respondent contends that it has, at least since the start of the backpay period, fully reinstated them and asserts that it owes them no backpay as to the fringe benefits claim. Relevant to these contentions, is the excerpt quoted below from footnote 5 at 906 of the underlying Board decision, discussed supra:

> The General Counsel presented evidence establishing a prima facie case, which [Respondent has] not adequately rebutted, that economic and unfair labor practice strikers individually returned to work prior to August 9, [1978] and were not fully reinstated to conditions current at the time the strike began. Since an individual employee may make an unconditional offer to return to work, each individual employee who was reinstated pursuant to an unconditional offer was entitled to full reinstatement to the status quo which he occupied at the time he went on strike. The Laidlaw Corporation, 171 NLRB 1366, 1381-82 (1968), enfd. 414 F.2d 99 (7th Cir. 1969), cert. denied 397 U.S. 920 (1970). Accordingly, in light of [Respondent's] failure to rebut the General Counsel's prima facie case, we find [its] conduct in this regard to be violative of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.
> We agree with the Administrative Law Judge's recommendation that determination whether the total wages and benefits package these employees have received since returning to work is substantially equivalent to the wages and benefits they received prior to the strike—and thus satisfies the full reinstatement requirement—should be considered in the compliance stage of this proceeding. Under the circumstances of this case, we hold that [Respondent's] backpay liability to any employee who returned to work before August 9 shall run only from 6 months prior to the filing of charges herein [i.e., from 1 July 1978].

The General Counsel acknowledges that these three returned strikers have been fully reinstated insofar as the hourly wage rates paid them are concerned. The amended backpay specification alleges that Hicke is entitled, under the Board's Order, to receive severance pay based on the contract with the Union which expired in 1975, on the closing of Respondent's plant in July 1984. The amended specification also claims certain vacation benefits for Hicke and Michaud. For example, the General Counsel claims that Hicke was entitled, under the 1975 expired contract, to have received 4 weeks' vacation in 1979 but, as he received only 3, that he is due 1 week's vacation for that year. Finally, the General Counsel claims that Respondent owes all three returned strikers for contributions and coverages it failed to provide for since July 1978 under the provisions for pension, annuity, and welfare benefits in contracts Local 455 has negotiated with other employers that superseded the provisions of the Local 455 agreement that expired on 30 June 1975.

In its answer, Respondent asserts that it has met the full reinstatement requirements expressly set by the Board in the language of its footnote 5, quoted above. In particular, Respondent urges that the total wages and benefits package these employees have received on their return to work is substantially equivalent to the wages and benefits they received prior to the strike.

The Board, at footnote 5, left open, for the compliance stage, the extent of backpay liability to these three employees since 1 July 1978—the start of the limitations period under Section 10(b) of the Act.

Neither party has provided an actual evaluation, if one could be made, of the respective wages and benefits packages—1 July 1975 versus 1 July 1978. The General Counsel apparently construes the Board's guidelines as requiring Respondent to continue to apply the basic benefits package under the 1975 association—union contract notwithstanding that Respondent had withdrawn from that bargaining and although an impasse thereon had been reached. When those considerations are taken into account, together with the rebuttable presumption that Respondent's actions in implementing fringe benefit changes late in 1975 (in 1976 and thereafter) were lawful, it seems clear that the General Counsel's construction of those guidelines is unwarranted. In effect, the General Counsel would interpret those guidelines to compel Respondent to maintain in effect contract terms it has not agreed to in any contract negotiations and which it apparently has been resisting since 1975. The compelling of a contract concession is itself expressly prohibited by Section 8(d) of the Act. I note too that there appears to be an inconsistency in the General Counsel's position. On the one hand, it uses the expired 1975 contract to determine the number of vacation weeks claimed for an employee, but applies the wage rates paid in 1978 and later that were much higher than those paid in 1975.

Respondent apparently would dismiss the claims of these three returned strikers simply by noting that they had been given substantial wage increases (e.g., Hicke received increases which raised his rate from $8 an hour between 1978 and 1984) and by finding that those increases easily offset any differences in fringe benefits as provided in 1975 and as provided on 1 July 1978, and thereafter. That view assumes that the "package" contemplated by the Board in its language in footnote 5, supra, would no include a requirement that a returned striker be given the raises granted replacements on a nondiscriminatory basis.

Neither the approach used by the General Counsel nor that used by Respondent addresses the basic purpose of a backpay specification. This compliance proceeding has been undertaken to ensure that there will have been no discriminatory treatment of the returned strikers since the start of the 10(b) period. Using that as the touchstone, it is obvious that Respondent's use of a literal application of certain language of the Board at footnote 5 as the "law of the case" is based on the assumption that the returned strikers would not have received the raises comparable to those that the replacements received. That is hardly a way to ensure that discriminatory conduct has ended. The General Counsel would have the Board give the returned strikers vastly better benefits than those enjoyed by the other employees, and this would have to be based ultimately only on the fact that they had originally taken part in the strike. The General Counsel's view also cannot be said to be aimed at ending discriminatory treatment of employees.

There is no evidence that Respondent has engaged in any discriminatory treatment of the returned strikers since the start of the backpay period. It may be that Respondent had, at some point, effected substantial unilateral changes in the wage rates or the other terms and conditions of unit employees and it may be that it did so after impasse, but no matter. I am concerned here with whether there has been discriminatory treatment of these employees since 1 July 1978. The figures set out in the amended backpay specification indicate that the wage rates they were paid were equal to or better than the rates paid to replacements. Indeed, and as noted earlier, the General Counsel acknowledges that no backpay claim can be made based on those wage rates. Nor is there even a suggestion that other employees received better fringe benefits.

Based on the foregoing, I find that, on and since 1 July 1978, the three returned strikers have been treated on a nondiscriminatory basis, and that they have been fully reinstated by Respondent.

D. The Claims of the Unreinstated Discriminatees

Nine employees of Respondent were found by the Board, in the underlying case, to have been unlawfully denied reinstatement since 9 August 1978. Their names are Beaudreau, Carmelo Consolo, Joseph Morris, William Daniels, Fritz O'Connor, Miguel Quevedo, Peter Rebecca, Alf Lango, and Max Stein. The General Counsel concedes that, under the backpay formula set out in the amended specification, Consolo and Stein would have had no gross backpay; Respondent's records established to the General Counsel's satisfaction that Respondent had no work available for either of them on or since the start of their backpay period. The General Counsel also seeks no backpay for O'Connor as he has refused to cooperate in the compliance investigation undertaken by Region 29.

In support of the amended specification, the General Counsel called the Supervising Compliance Examiner of Region 29 as a witness. He testified that the wage rates, hours, and other payroll data set out in the amended specification were all contained in payroll data obtained by a member of his staff from Respondent, and that he reviewed and edited the computations contained in the specification. Respondent, in its brief, would dismiss the specification as based only on hearsay evidence. Respondent, however, did not object to the General Counsel's acceptance of its records as the basis of the waiver of backpay claims for two of the discriminatees. Respondent's argument lacks merit. See Painters Orange Belt District Council 48 (Ghiannni Construction), 275 NLRB 1180, 1182 (1985), and particularly so in the instant case where the records relied on are in Respondent's control.

The gross backpay formula in the amended specification is a standard one-wage rate last earned by the discriminatees plus increases given to replacements multiplied by the work hours of the replacements. The amended backpay specification also concedes that the claims for Lango and Stein ended with their respective deaths on 31 March and 30 September 1981, and the claim for Morris ended with the retirement on 1 February 1980.

Respondent offered no data to controvert the computations contained in the amended specification. Rather, it contended that the Board should apply to the unreinstated discriminatees the forumla discussed above in the section dealing with the three discriminatees who had returned to Respondent's employ. That formula, as is obvious from the Board decision, applies only to the reinstated strikers. I find that the gross backpay formula proposed by the General Counsel is appropriate and supported by the evidence in the record. Accordingly, I further find that the six discriminatees, who were not reinstated and for whom backpay is sought, would have earned the respective sums claimed for them in the amended specification as lost wages and that, after allowance for their net interim earnings, Respondent owes each, with interest, the respective amounts claimed to be due them as net backpay.

The amended specification also seeks pension, annuity, welfare, and other benefits for these discriminatees. The basis therefor, as asserted by the General Counsel, is the same as that considered and rejected above, with respect to the claims of the three strikers who had returned to work. I reject those claims for the same reasons that those of the three returned strikers were denied.

E. The Joint Liability Issues

The General Counsel asserts that Warren Riis and his wife Helen, are personally liable, jointly and severally with with Respondent, for the backpay due under the Board Order in this case. The General Counsel alleges that they have been the directors, officers, and stockholders of Respondent, that they have integrated or intermingled corporate and personal assets, and siphoned off corporate assets to their personal benefit in an attempt to render Respondent insolvent and thereby to frustrate the efforts of the General Counsel to collect backpay for the discriminatees. The General Counsel asserts that Warren and Helen Riis are the alter egos of Respondent.

Helen Riis admitted, in the answer filed on her behalf, that she was "a nominal stockholder" of Respondent; Warren Riis, admitted in his answer that he was a director, stockholder, and chief operating officer of Respondent. They deny they commingled corporate and personal assets.

The record in this case reveals the following. In 1956 Warren Riis and another individual, Joseph Michaud, formed a partnership, trading as Mohawk Steel Company. Riis took care of the commercial aspects of the partnership while Michaud was in charge of the plant and field operations. The partnership was engaged in the structural steel business.

Respondent was formed about 1961. Its issued stock was owned one-third by Warren Riis, one-third by Michaud. Warren and Helen Riis were the directors and officers. Michaud, however, had and exercised the authority to issue corporate checks. Helen Riis' role with Respondent was inactive.

Riis and Michaud, from 1961 on, performed the same respective functions as they had performed for the partnership, Mohawk Steel Company. Thus, Riis handled all administrative matters while Michaud took care of prduction and installation work and he also operated a crane.

On 13 January 1961 Riis purchased real property in Deer Park, New York, and, in his capacity as Respondent's president, signed a lease agreement in which Respondent occupied those premises.[1] He also signed the lease in his capacity as an individual lessor. Respondent, on 1 January 1962, agreed in writing with Riis, as an individual, to pay (a) a yearly rental varying according to property taxes, (b) the mortgage payments due monthly, and (c) $100 a week each to Warren Riis and Joseph Michaud. Respondent also agreed to be fully responsible for the cost of maintaining and repairing the real property. By 1 January 1964, the total of these weekly payments to Riis and Michaud had increased annually from $10,400 to $15,500, and by 1 January 1968, to $17,600. By 1975, the total reached $30,550. Riis testified that he and Michaud agreed on those increases. Those moneys were paid into the partnership, which was founded in 1956 as discussed previously; partnership tax returns have been filed annually. The 1975 return shows income of $30,550 for the partnership and a deduction of $15,401 for real estate taxes. The General Counsel's brief notes that, under the lease, Respondent was obligated to pay those taxes in addition to the $30,550. If Respondent actually paid the taxes, it would appear that the partnership should not have deducted the taxes and that Michaud may not have received the amount due him under the partnership arrangement. That may have something to do with the matter before me, but there also may be other ramifications to the accounting aspects of these transactions. Absent explanatory testimony from an accountant thereon, I am left with only speculation. Along those lines I noted that the partnership tax returns for 1978, and later, do not claim any deduction for real estate taxes. The General Counsel observes in her brief that Riis maintained the fiction of a partnership by filing tax returns with Michaud. On the very limited evidence before me, I am unable to find that the partnership existed contemporaneously with Respondent since about 1961 as a fiction or that it at any time after 1961 was converted by Riis into a device to divert funds for his own use.

As compensation for services rendered, Warren Riis received a salary from Respondent; Michaud received a smaller sum as salary for his services. Both enjoyed fringe benefits. Thus Respondent paid for welfare and pension benefits for Michaud and it provided a family golf club membership for Warren Riis. Both drove automobiles owned by Respondent and maintained them using corporate credit cards. It appears that they used those cars both for business and for pleasure.

In 1984, Respondent discontinued its structural steel operations and sold its assets to two companies. Nationwide Steel Corporation and Calbar Construction Company. Riis has no ownership interest in either of these concerns. Respondent realized about $69,000 from the sale of those assets. Those moneys were placed into Respondent's bank accounts. In 1985, those accounts were closed out. Respondent notes in its brief that it "utilized the proceeds from the sale of its business to pay its creditors." The General Counsel offered no evidence to the contrary.

In 1984, Riis leased the Deer Park property to Nationwide and Calbar. The rentals therefrom were paid into the partnership owned by Riis and Michaud. They have filed partnership tax returns reflecting receipt of those rentals and disbursements of the profits to each in equal shares.

The General Counsel's argument, in furtherance of her contention that Warren and Helen Riis should be held personally liable for Respondent's backpay obligations, at times, assumes the very point it seeks to prove. Thus, it is argued that Riis decided to shut down Respondent and that he personally "negotiated the sale of its assets." From a corporate law point of view, it is more accurate to say, instead, that Riis, as corporate stockholder, officer, or director, decided on behalf of the corporation to discontinue its operations and that he, in his corporate capacity, negotiated on its behalf the sale of its assets. The General Counsel, along similar lines, assumes that Riis, in using corporate credit cards, "utilize[d] corporate expeditures for his personal gain" when the evidence discloses that the principal use of the cards was for business, e.g., the oil company cards were used to gas up the trucks and corporate cars for business.

The General Counsel notes too that, after Respondent ceased operations in 1984, Riis and Michaud continued to share in rentals paid by new tenants. There seems to be nothing mysterious about that as the record discloses that Riis and Michaud, as partners, were the beneficial owners of the realty leased to these tenants. I am told, in the General Counsel's brief, that Riis "used [Respondent] to capitalize his venture into real estate which continues to provide him with lucrative returns from his new tenants." The record before me does not bear that out. Rather, it appears that Riis in 1961 took out a mortgage on the real estate, that it had been paid off a long time ago, and that he and Michaud have continued over the years to receive increased rentals therefrom. Rather than characterization, the use of criteria cited in Respondent's brief and relied on by the Board in determining alter ego liability or, alternatively, liability based on a wrongful diversion of corporate assets, as discussed by the Board in Las Villas Produce, 279 NLRB 883 (1986), is to be preferred.

[1] In 1969, Helen Riis purchased a small adjacent lot that she leased to Respondent for the storage of its trucks.

In Las Villas, the Board observed that corporate officers may be liable as alter ego for corporate obligations based on a case-by-case examination of a group of factors constituting an initial "single employer" test and, as an additional element of proof, of the factor of a sham-disguised continuance. The Board also observed, in that case, that corporate officers may have limited liability, under a separate theory, to the extent that specific corporate assets had been wrongfully distributed to them in avoidance of backpay, citing F & W Oldsmobile, 272 NLRB 1150 (1984).

There is insufficient evidence to support a finding that Warren and Helen Riis were Respondent's alter ego. Rather, the evidence discloses that Helen was inactive and that Joseph Michaud (not named as a party herein) was a de facto principal in Respondent's operations, a one-third owner of its issued stock, and a codeterminant with Warren Riis of Respondent's business affairs. Neither is there evidence that corporate assets were improperly diverted to Warren and Helen Riis so as to frustrate payment of backpay due the discriminatees. Under either theory of stockholder liability as propounded in Las Villas then, the General Counsel's claim that Warren and Helen Riis are liable jointly and severally with Respondent for backpay due must be denied.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On May 20, 1985, Administrative Law Judge Marvin Roth issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings[1] and conclusions,[2] as modified, and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.[3]

In its exceptions and brief the Respondent raises various questions concerning the judge's factual findings, asserting, inter alia, that these findings are based on inferences rather than credibility resolutions. We have carefully examined the issues raised by the Respondent and conclude that the judge has made the requisite credibility resolutions and that his analysis of the facts is essentially sound. In this regard, we note the following.

The Respondent contends that the judge erroneously relied on Storeroom Supervisor Ogden's alleged remark to employee Erhard concerning Plant Superintendent Bilotte's stated motivation for asking Ogden to lay off Erhard. It is clear from the judge's decision, however, that while he credited Ogden's denial that Bilotte actually told Ogden that Erhard should be laid off because he was a "troublemaker," the judge also credited Erhard's testimony that Ogden conveyed Bilotte's sentiments to Erhard by using words to the effect that Bilotte asked her to lay off Erhard because he was a "troublemaker." In this regard, the judge credited Ogden's testimony that Bilotte told her that "maybe we should consider not having temporaries in the storeroom at all" because the regular employees were complaining. Given this testimony by Ogden as to what Bilotte told her and her failure to testify as to how she in fact conveyed Bilotte's sentiments to Erhard (other than to specifically deny using the words attributed to her by Erhard), the judge's factual determinations concerning this incident are, contrary to the Respondent, both plausible and consistent.

Regarding Erhard, the Respondent also contends that the record does not support the judge's findings that Erhard worked in the storeroom in February 1984 and that Erhard lodged complaints with Ogden in 1984 rather than during 1983. The record does contain conflicting evidence on these points. The Respondent's own exhibit (memo from Superintendent Povlich to C. R. Suvakas dated February 14, 1986), however, lists Erhard as working in the storeroom as of February 13, 1984. More significantly, whether Erhard's complaints to Ogden about his job assignment and rate of pay occurred in 1983 or 1984, it is clear that the conversation between Ogden and Erhard containing the reference to Erhard as a "troublemaker," described above, occurred in February 1984. Erhard testified that the conversation took place in February 1984, and Ogden, although differing about the substance of

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

The Respondent also has requested oral argument. The request is denied as the record, exceptions, and briefs adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties.

[2] We note that no exceptions were filed to the judge's recommendation that the alleged violation of Sec. 8(a)(4) and (1) and the alleged independent violation of Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act be dismissed.

[3] In the remedy section of his decision, the judge recommended that the discriminatees be given "preference in hiring and retention for temporary employment, in a non-discriminatory manner, and without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed." Because we agree with the judge's finding that the Respondent had abandoned use of a seniority list for hiring purposes by January 1984, we will delete reference to retention of "seniority" in the recommended Order and notice. The judge also recommended that the Respondent offer preference in hiring and retention for temporary employment to "all other employees who are entitled to such preference by reason of our past practice." Inasmuch as the issue of discrimination against a well "defined and easily identified class" has been litigated only for the unit 3 and unit 1 outages, however, we will limit the preferential hiring to "all other employees who are entitled to such preference by reason of our unlawful practice in connection with the unit 3 and unit 1 outages in 1984" rather than leave the determination of discrimination in future outages to compliance proceedings. Teamsters Local 328 (Blount Bros. Corp.), 283 NLRB 779 (1987). In this regard we note that inasmuch as the factual context and particular variables present in the 1984 Shawville unit 3 and unit 1 outages are essential predicates to our finding a violation pertaining to them, leaving the litigation of violations concerning subsequent outages to the compliance stage would be tantamount to leaving to the compliance stage the litigation of subsequent unfair labor practices. No agreement by the parties to litigate alleged discrimination in future outages, assuming the record supports such an agreement, permits the litigation of unfair labor practice allegations in compliance proceedings. The Order and notice are modified accordingly. Additionally, while the judge singles out former employees Hughes, Hampton, and Hubler to be made whole regarding the unit 3 and unit 1 outages at Shawville in 1984, it is not clear from the record that, even absent discrimination, these employees would have been employed during those outages. Hence, we leave this matter to compliance and shall modify the Order and notice accordingly.

In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

the conversation, testified that it took place in January 1984.[4] It is apparent from the content of the conversation that it was a reaction to Erhard's complaints and the grievances of the full-time stockkeepers in response to Erhard's assignment. In this light, the judge appropriately relied on Ogden's remarks as an indicium of animus.

Finally, the Respondent maintains that Superintendent Povlich was unaware of Shugerts' complaints regarding her work assignments and rate of pay. We agree with the judge's conclusion, however, that Povlich was aware of the complaints because, inter alia, as set forth by the judge, Supervisor Selvage referred Union Steward Leggs to Povlich for assistance concerning Shugerts' request for an upgrade in August 1983 and Leggs did talk to Povlich about the matter.[5]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Pennsylvania Electric Company, Shawville, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraphs 2(a) and (b).

"(a) Offer preference in hiring and retention for temporary employment at its Shawville, Pennsylvania facility to Violet Shugerts, Paula Kitko, Richard Diggs, Rex Neiger, David Graham, Leonard McCale, George Gould, Dennis Jury, Jacob Kukla, Frank Josefik, Randy Erhard, Dale McCracken, Richard Shirey, Scott Duckett, Michael Dubo, Paula Shepler Zitzelberger, Dessie Woodling Lee, Lorenzo Carella, Julia Short, Lorraine Stewart, Dennis Marino, Stephen Selfridge, Carol Frelin, Herbert Baumgartner, and James Butterbaugh, and to all other employees who are entitled to such preference by reason of its past practice in connection with the unit 3 and unit 1 outages in 1984, in a nondiscriminatory manner, and without prejudice to any rights and privileges previously enjoyed.

"(b) Make whole the above-named employees, and any other employees who are entitled to such preference in connection with the unit 3 and unit 1 outages at Shawville in 1984, for any loss of earnings they may have suffered by reason of the discrimination against them, as set forth in the remedy section of this decision."

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

APPENDIX

Notice To Employees
Posted by Order of the
National Labor Relations Board
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

We will not terminate employees, refuse to interview or hire job applicants, or in any other manner discriminate against employees regarding their hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment, because they or any of their fellow employees claim rights under a collective-bargaining contract, or because they engage in any other union or concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

We will not in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

We will offer preference in hiring and retention for temporary employment at our Shawville, Pennsylvania facility to Violet Shugerts, Paula Kitko, Richard Diggs, Rex Neiger, David Graham, Leonard McCale, George Gould, Dennis Jury, Jacob Kukla, Frank Josefik, Randy Erhard, Dale McCracken, Richard Shirey, Scott Duckett, Michael Dubo, Paula Shepler Zitzelberger, Dessie Woodling Lee, Lorenzo Carella, Julia Short, Lorraine Stewart, Dennis Marino, Stephen Selfridge, Carol Frelin, Herbert Baumgartner, and James Butterbaugh, and to all other employees who are entitled to such preference by reason of our past practice in connection with the unit 3 and unit 1 outages in 1984 in a nondiscriminatory manner and without prejudice to any rights and privileges previously enjoyed.

[4] Inasmuch as the unit 4 outage did not take place until February 1984, Erhard's date would appear to be more accurate.

[5] The Respondent also excepts to certain inferences drawn from the testimony of Murray, a maintenance supervisor. In this regard, we find it unnecessary to rely on the judge's finding that "Murray's testimony may properly be considered as an admission that the Company made a conscious decision to hire new employees for the July 1984 outage." Additionally, in his decision, the judge stated that the Respondent gave "inconsistent and demonstrably false reasons" for refusing to hire Shugerts for the February-March outage and for refusing to retain or rehire Shugerts and other temporary periodic employees "at the next two outages." The judge's reference is potentially confusing in its inclusion of Shugerts and other alleged discriminatees who were hired for the unit 3 outage in May-June. It is, however, correct, in view of the fact that we adopt the judge's findings that there was discrimination in the hiring and/or retention of certain employees during the unit 3 outage and the unit 1 outage in July-August. Nonetheless, for the sake of clarity, we note that the violation found concerns the core group employees who, although working during the May-June unit 3 outage, were not retained or hired for the subsequent unit 1 outage in July-August and any other core group employees who may have been discriminated against with respect to the unit 1 outage.

Additionally, we do not adopt the judge's finding that Howarth's stated reason for scheduling interviews for the July-August outage between the hours of 7:30 a.m. to 3 p.m. was "frivolous." We agree, however, that the Respondent's failure to provide for any procedure by which core group employees could be rehired for the July-August outage supports the judge's conclusions as it appears, without adequate explanation on the Respondent's part, to conflict with the Respondent's stated lawful interest.

WE WILL make whole those employees, and any other employees who were entitled to such preference in connection with the unit 3 and unit 1 outages in 1984 for any loss of earnings they may have suffered by reason of the discrimination against them.

PENNSYLVANIA ELECTRIC COMPANY

Charles H. Saul, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Anthony A. DeSabato, Esq., of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, for the Respondent.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

MARVIN ROTH, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard at Clearfield, Pennsylvania, on 20 and 21 December 1984 and at Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, on 23 January 1985. The charge and amended charges were filed respectively on 20 August and 5 and 15 October 1984 by Violet L. Shugerts, an individual.[1] The complaint, which was issued on 18 October and was amended at the hearing, alleges that Pennsylvania Electric Company (the Company or Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the National Labor Relations Act. The gravamen of the complaint is that the Company allegedly threatened employees with loss of employment because of their union and concerted activities; laid off and failed and refused to recall or rehire certain employees known as "temporary periodic" or "temporary non-recurring" employees, including Shugerts, because of Shugerts' union and concerted activities, and because she filed an unfair labor practice charge against the Company; and discouraged employees from engaging in such activity. The Company's answer denies the commission of the alleged unfair labor practices. All parties were afforded full opportunity to participate, to present relevant evidence, to argue orally, and to file briefs. The General Counsel and Respondent each filed a brief.

On the entire record in this case[2] and from my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and having considered the briefs and arguments of the parties, I make the following

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE COMPANY

The Company, a Pennsylvania corporation with its principal office in Johnstown, Pennsylvania, is engaged in the distribution and sale of electricity to residential and commercial users. In the operation of its business the Company annually derives gross revenues in excess of $250,000 and annually purchases electricity valued in excess of $50,000 directly outside Pennsylvania for use at, and distribution from, its Pennsylvania power stations, including the Shawville station which is involved in the present proceeding. I find, and the Company admits, that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local No. 1124 (the Union) is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Status of the Temporary Periodic or Nonrecurring Employees, Developments Before June 1984, and the Alleged Unlawful Threats

The Company maintains 10 generating stations at various locations (9 in Pennsylvania and 1 in Maryland) including the Shawville station. The Company's production and maintenance employees, including Shawville, have for many years been represented by the Union and covered by a series of collective-bargaining contracts. The contracts have provided and still provide for three categories of employees. Regular employees are those who have been hired into a regular job vacancy and have successfully completed a 6-month probationary period. Temporary probationary employees are those who have been hired into a regular job vacancy and are serving their probationary period. Temporary periodic or temporary nonrecurring employees are those who have been hired for a defined period of time or for specific job.[3] These temporary employees are entitled to the contractual wage rate for the work they perform, and they receive the same holidays as regular employees, including premium pay for holiday work. However they are not entitled to sick, vacation, personal, or military leave or pension and other contractual fringe benefits, they do not accumulate seniority, and they have no seniority rights. At the commencement of a period of employment, each temporary employee is required to sign an agreement that acknowledges that his or her employment "is strictly temporary" and "will be terminated whenever your services are no longer required." Like other employees, they are required to join the Union after 30 accumulative days of employment. (Subsequently at the end of a period of employment, they maintain inaccurate membership status until their next employment.) The contract language does not preclude temporary employees from presenting grievances. However, as will be discussed, the short duration of their employment may effectively prevent them from pursuing or even filing such grievances.

[2] Certain errors in the transcript have been noted and corrected.

[3] The collective-bargaining contracts use both the terms "temporary periodic" and "temporary non-recurring." For purposes of this litigation, the General Counsel prefers to use the term "temporary periodic," whereas Respondent prefers to refer to "temporary non-recurring" employees. However employee evaluation forms, which were introduced in evidence, indicate that the Company has consistently classified the employees, at least at Shawville, as "temporary periodic." In this decision I shall refer to the employees involved as "temporary" employees. If necessary, I shall refer to temporary probationary employees as "probationary" employees.

The Company conducts periodic maintenance outages at each of its generating stations. At Shawville the Company normally conducts one outage per year for each of four units. These outages are scheduled 4 or 5 years in advance. Because these outages entail a shutdown of the unit, the schedules must be approved by PJM Interconnection, a power pool of 12 companies that provide electricity in the Pennsylvania-New Jersey-Maryland area. However, the dates may be and frequently are revised before the actual outage. At Shawville an outage may run from 3 to 6 weeks, depending on the size and nature of the maintenance work involved. Preoutage preparation and postoutage cleanup usually each take 1 week. The Company has found it necessary to hire temporary employees to assist in conducting the outage and the pre- and post-outage work. The Company will normally hire from 30 to 60 temporary employees, again depending on the amount and nature of the work involved, e.g., more employees are needed for an "internal" outage, which involves breaking down a turbine engine. A smaller number, usually about 15, are used for preoutage and postoutage work. The Company hires temporary employees principally, but not exclusively, in connection with maintenance outages. The Company hires temporary employees for estimated periods of time, based on its protected needs, rather than for a specific outage or outages. Company records indicate that in recent years, one or two temporary employees might be kept on for an unusually long period of time (from 3 to 5 months). However, the evidence otherwise indicates that at Shawville, temporary employees worked either in connection with maintenance outages or performed cleanup or routine maintenance work during short intervals between outages (known as "back to back" outages, which will be discussed further).

At one time, the Company directly received all applications for temporary employment. However, in or about 1975, the Company began using the Pennsylvania Bureau of Employment Security (BES) as its exclusive source of applicants. The Company's personnel office would notify the local BES office of its anticipated needs, and request that BES schedule interviews with a designated number of applicants (usually about twice the number needed, at a designated place, date, and timeframe. The plant's maintenance supervisor and an official from the Company's personnel office in Johnstown would then interview the applicants referred by BES. The interviews were short (normally not more than 10 minutes) in contrast to the in-depth interviews for applicants for regular employment. The interviews would also consider recent evaluations of applicants who had previously worked for the Company. The interviewers would select the number of employees required from among the applicants, and notify BES of the names of the applicants hired and the dates they would start work. Charles Savukas, the Company's senior administrator for human resources, who has participated extensively in the hiring process, testified that the Company prefers temporary employees with a background in heavy industry. As the Company's generating stations, including Shawville, are located in predominantly semirural areas, it is unlikely that the Company would be able to draw from a significant number of applicants with such experience, except among applicants who previously worked for the Company. As part of the hiring process, prospective employees were referred for physical examinations when necessary. In practice, this meant that all new employees would be referred for physicals, whereas employees who worked three or four times a year for the Company would not have to take a physical for every period of employment. Thus in May 1984, only one among those hires who had worked an outage earlier that year was required to take a physical, whereas all new employees were required to do so.

Although temporary employees had no contractual seniority rights, the Company continually hired the same core group of about 30 individuals for its scheduled outages, supplemented as and if needed by new employees. In practice, these core people would reregister with BES on completion of each term of employment, BES would, absent special circumstances, invariably refer them to the Company for the next outage, and the Company would invariably hire them if a slot was available. Indeed, the Company not only gave preference to this core group, but even hired them in accordance with an informal seniority system. It is undisputed that, at least until the end of 1982, the Company maintained seniority lists of temporary employees, based on the number of days or hours previously worked, and followed this list in hiring and terminating at Shawville and other locations. Shawville Maintenance Superintendent Robert Povlich testified that when he assumed his position in March 1981, he was instructed by the personnel department to use this list. Thus temporary employees were hired in accordance with their seniority, and the first hired were the last laid off. Senior Administrator Suvakas testified that the Company discontinued this practice in late 1982 or early 1983. Union Assistant Business Manager Ardell Shirey, who was presented as a General Counsel witness, testified that he was informed in early 1983 that the Company discontinued its practice of following the seniority list. However, the testimony of Company witnesses indicates that at Shawville the Company continued to adhere to a seniority practice for temporary employees until 1984. In January 1984, Suvakas and Povlich jointly interviewed and hired applicants for a unit 4 outage. They testified, in sum, that after the interviews, when Suvakas said they should proceed with the selection process, Povlich said they needed the list of days worked for previous employees. Suvakas told him that they no longer used the list, and they proceeded to select employees without the list. It is evident from this conversation that before 1984, no one told Povlich that he should not use the list, and that he continued to use the list through 1983.[4] [4] Povlich testified that he stopped using the list "Last part of '82 to the middle of '83, somewhere in the area." However, "the middle of '83" was the last time before 1984 that temporary employees were hired at Shawville.

The January 1984 interview and hiring process is significant in several respects to the present case, which involves the termination and hiring of temporary employees since June 1984. The unit 4 outage was a relatively small operation, anticipated to last 3 weeks, which required only about 30 temporary employees. The interviews and selection were conducted jointly by Povlich, who knew the core group employees and was familiar with their performance, and by Suvakas, a high-ranking personnel officer who was familiar with the Company's hiring policies and had ostensibly informed Povlich that seniority was no longer considered as a factor in hiring temporary employees. If the Company had a practice of spreading work in the community, or for some other reason, of hiring a mix of new and experienced employees, then presumably this practice would have been reflected in the January 1984 hiring process. The result is enlightening. Suvakas and Povlich interviewed 59 applicants, 41 of whom had previously worked as temporary employees. They hired 31 employees, all of whom had previously worked as temporary employees at Shawville, and nearly all of whom had worked on a sufficiently regular or frequent basis to be regarded as part of the core group. Among the 10 experienced employees who were not hired, 2 had not worked at Shawville in recent years, 5 had worked only once or twice, and only 3 had worked often enough to be regarded as part of the core group (Violet Shugerts had worked 10 times in the preceding 4 years, and Lloyd Hampton and Richard Gulish worked 4 and 5 times, respectively, during that period).[5] Shugerts was placed on an alternate list with an applicant who had not previously worked for the Company. Shugerts testified without contradiction that office clerk David Butler, who notified employees concerning their hire and when to report, told her that she was not hired, but was the first name on the alternate list (which was true). However, when a vacancy developed, the Company did not hire Shugerts. Instead the Company hired John Bungo, an applicant who had no prior company experience and was not on the alternate list. Shugerts, who is the Charging Party in the present case, filed an unfair labor practice charge based on the Company's failure to hire her in January (Case 6-CA-17201). She filed the charge on March 16 and withdrew it on April 26.

Apart from the matter of Shugerts, which will be discussed further, the January 1984 hiring pattern plainly demonstrates that the Company, if it used a seniority list, preferred to draw initially from the core group in meeting its temporary needs. Moreover, other evidence introduced in this case, particularly evaluations of temporary employees, indicates that this was not merely a coincidence, but reflected a longstanding and well-established practice at Shawville, and that the Company was well aware of such a practice. Company officials based in Johnstown, specifically Manager of Labor Relations Richard Gallatin and Human Resources Administrator Gary Howarth, who were presented as Company witnesses, professed difficulty in thinking of work performed by temporary employees beyond "clean up type work." In fact, in the usual complement of temporary employees only about one-fourth would be classified as janitors and assigned primarily to cleanup work. Most of the employees were classified as "Utility B," and were assigned to assist regular employees in a wide variety of tasks which paralleled the scope of work of the regular employees. Some of these tasks required the exercise of mechanical or electrical skill. Jacob Kukla, a longtime and well-regarded core employee, testified concerning various equipment on which he worked, and that it took him four outages in which to learn to perform each job well. Much of the Utility B work involved obtaining equipment, parts, and supplies for regular employees. Such work did not require skill. However, the Shawville station is a seven-story structure, with four power units; equipment, parts, and supplies were stored at various locations throughout the plant; and some of these items required a parts order. Therefore the outage operation, in which time was of the essence, would be facilitated if the temporary employee was familiar with the plant and plant procedures. Even Howarth reluctantly admitted that this would be advantageous to the Company. Employee evaluations, which were prepared by first-line supervisors and relied on by the Company in the hiring process, indicated that the Company monitored the performance of its temporary employees and attached significance to their progression. For example, the Company determined that Frank Josefik "has maintenance skills, but needs to be exposed to a variety of jobs," that Alvin Hughes "would better productivity . . . with more exposure to plant and maintenance operations," that Dessie (Woodling) Lee was "willing and able to develop mechanical skills," and that Richard Shirey was "learning the plant, the location of equipment and the lubrication job well." The Company requested and received recommendations from its supervisors concerning rehire of temporary employees and their suitability for regular employment, contrary to the testimony of Maintenance Supervisor Blair Murray, the Company's evaluation records indicate that supervisors continued to make such recommendations in June 1984. Murray also testified that "sometimes a person who has been there several outages gets a bit complacent," but that "somebody new may be aggressive and desirous of really performing." However, the employee evaluations, which were introduced in evidence, indicate a different pattern, and this is particularly true regarding Violet Shugerts. In 1981 Shugerts received a mildly critical evaluation which indicated that she tended to waste time. Thereafter her evaluations were increasingly favorable.

Murray, who was presented as a Company witness, also gave testimony that is particularly significant to the ultimate merits of this case. Murray was a group supervisor of mechanical maintenance, who directed the work of several crews, and had been in that position for about 10 years. Murray testified that he was "upset with the decision to hire all experienced [sic] temporary employees" and that he expressed his dissatisfaction to Assistant Maintenance Manager William Selvage, Povlich's immediate subordinate, who directed the work of the mechanical maintenance department. Murray made clear in his testimony that he was talking about the July 1984 outage, i.e., "the outage that all the new people were hired for." In the context of Murray's testimony, it is evident that Murray meant "inexperienced," but was reluctant to say it. Murray's testimony may properly be considered as an admission that the Company made a conscious "decision" to hire new employees for the July 1984 outage, and that this result did not simply come about through happenstance.

[5] Alvin Hughes, who was not hired, worked an outage in 1982 and another in 1983, and he was later hired for the May-June 1984 outage.

As discussed, at least until 1984 the Company was satisfied with the performance of the core group at Shawville and routinely rehired them. However, beginning in 1983, several incidents occurred that brought the temporary employees in conflict not only with the Company's policies and practices, but also the interests of the regular employees. The core group, by virtue of their longstanding union membership and familiarity with plant personnel and conditions, became increasingly knowledgeable concerning contract wage rates, and although they were classified as "Utility B" or "Janitor," which placed them at the bottom of the wage scale, they sometimes were called on to perform work which at least arguably entitled them to a higher rate.[6] Violet Shugerts was particularly vocal in this regard. In March 1983 Shugerts complained to Assistant Maintenance Supervisor Selvage that a temporary employee with less experience was assigned to a forklift at an assistant rate (higher than Utility B), while Shugerts was "pushing a broom."[7] The Company did not change Shugerts' assignment, but shortly after her complaint, some temporary employees were downgraded.[8] In August 1983 Shugerts was working on the condenser. She and temporary employee Dennis Jury were assigned to paint the condenser. Under the union contract Shugerts and Jury would be entitled to an assistant rate for performing such work, i.e., a rate higher than that of Utility B for which they were classified. Jury received the higher rate, and Shugerts asked Group Supervisor John Norman if she could also get the assistant rate. Norman initially said he thought she could, but later that day he told her that she could not get the assistant rate because the Company had already upgraded four temporary employees, and budget limitations precluded any further upgrading. Norman testified that he told Selvage that he needed two people to paint and that he "probably" told Selvage that Shugerts wanted to be upgraded. Selvage refused to upgrade Shugerts. As a result, Shugerts was taken off painting work, and the Company had to make do with one temporary employee (Jury) doing the painting. Shugerts also complained to the Union. She spoke to Assistant Business Manager Ardell Shirey and Steward Charles Leggs. Leggs asked Selvage the rate of pay for employees working in the condenser. Selvage answered that Leggs "would have to take it up with Bob Povlich." Leggs testified that Povlich told him that one person in the condenser was upgraded to keep the job running, and the rest were paid at a lower rate. Selvage testified that he personally told Shugerts that they were permitted to upgrade only one person in the condenser work and that Jury was given the higher rate. Selvage testified that he never spoke to Maintenance Supervisor Povlich about the matter, and Povlich testified that he was not aware of any complaints by Shugerts concerning upgrading of pay or work assignments. However, they did not deny Leggs' testimony concerning his conversations with them. I do not credit the testimony of Povlich and Selvage to the effect that Povlich was unaware of Shugerts' complaint. Selvage would not have referred Leggs to Povlich unless Povlich was knowledgeable concerning the problem and in a position to make a final decision. If Shugerts' name was not mentioned when Leggs spoke to Povlich, then it is evident that Povlich already knew that Shugerts made the complaint. If he did not know, then it is probable that he would have inquired of Leggs, since it was evident from Leggs' question that there was a problem, from the Union's viewpoint, concerning the wage rates of temporaries working on the condenser. Moreover, there was no indication that anyone other than Shugerts was assigned to do work on the condenser at less than the contract rate. I find that Povlich was aware of and rejected Shugerts' complaint. Consequently, Povlich was aware of the matter in January 1984 when he and Suvakas refused to rehire Shugerts, and was specifically aware that by complaining about the matter and going to the Union, Shugerts frustrated the Company's effort to use temporary employees to perform work without paying them the rate they were entitled under the contract.

Shugerts was not rehired for the next outage, but the problems did not cease. In February 1984 temporary employees Randy Erhard and Dale McCracken were assigned to the storeroom as stockkeepers and initially at least paid the appropriate rate, which was higher than that for Utility B. Beyond that point the facts are in dispute. Erhard testified that they were downgraded, whereupon Erhard complained to Storeroom Supervisor Pam Ogden and to Union Assistant Business Manager Shirey. The Company agreed to upgrade Erhard and McCracken. Then lower rated regular employees complained because the temporaries were making more than them. Erhard testified that Ogden told him that Plant Superintendent Kenneth Bilotte asked her to lay off Erhard because he was a "troublemaker." Ogden, who was presented as a company witness, did not mention McCracken in her testimony. Ogden testified that Erhard was hired and paid at the "Stockeeper B" rate, which was higher than the Utility B rate, that his rate never changed because "There's no way he could have got upgraded or lower," and that Erhard never asked for a higher rate. Ogden testified that when Erhard began work, two regular stockkeeper employees filed a grievance, alleging that they were deprived of overtime work because Erhard was working in their place. Ogden denied that Bilotte told her that Erhard was a troublemaker, or that she told Erhard that Bilotte asked her to lay him off because he was a troublemaker. However, she testified that Bilotte told her that "maybe we should consider not having temporaries in the Storeroom at all," because the regular employees were complaining. Ogden did not testify about what she did tell Erhard. I credit Erhard. The Company's roster of temporary employees hired at Shawville for 1980-1984, which was presented in evidence, indicates that until 31 May 1984, when McCracken was hired as a "Stockkeeper," no temporary employee was hired directly into that classification. The roster indicates that in February 1984 McCracken was hired as a janitor.[9] Therefore it is evident that there must have been upgrading involved, and that Ogden's contrary premise was erroneous. I credit Ogden's testimony concerning her conversation with Plant Superintendent Bilotte. However, in the absence of any explanation by her of what she told Erhard, it is quite possible that she conveyed Bilotte's sentiments to Erhard in the manner described by Erhard. I find that the incident is significant in that it demonstrates that the Company was aware that core group complaints were resulting in conflicts between the regular and temporary employees, and that in such event the Company was inclined to favor the regular employees, even if this meant dispensing with the services of the core group personnel.

[6] Several company witnesses testified that it was common for employees, including temporaries, to request upgrading. However, as admitted by Group Supervisor John Norman, while it was not unusual for temporary employees to request more skilled work, e.g., to assist a mechanic instead of doing cleanup work, it would be unusual for a new employee to request a higher rate of pay under the union contract.

[7] Shugerts testified that Carol Frelin, the other employee, had not recently worked as a temporary employee. In fact, although Frelin had less experience than Shugerts, she had been working outages since early 1982 and by 1983 could be regarded as one of the core group.

[8] John Kukla, one of the downgraded employees, testified that Group Supervisor Murray told him that he and another employee were downgraded "because some girl went to the office complaining that she's an older employee and she's not upgraded," and that Shugerts told Kukla that she made the complaint. Murray testified that he never made the alleged statement to Kukla, that he was not aware of Shugerts' complaint, and that temporary employees were downgraded in March 1983 because the number of upgrade employees exceeded the allowable limit of four. Murray testified that according to his records, the employees were downgraded on March 3, 1983, more than halfway through the outage. If so, then it is evident that something must have occurred that called management's attention to the number of upgraded employees. The evidence fails to indicate any pertinent occurrence other than Shugerts' complaint. I credit Kukla, and I find that Shugerts' complaint precipitated the downgrading.

The complaint alleges that "in and about March and June 1984 (the exact dates being unknown)," the Company, acting through Group Supervisor Norman "threatened employees with loss of employment because of their Union and protected concerted activities." Jacob Kukla testified in sum that during several outages he asked Norman, who was his supervisor, to be upgraded to an assistant rate because he was assigned to perform mechanical work without a regular repairman being present, and under the union contract he could not perform such tasks at his present rate. Kukla testified that Norman always told him that "they are only upgrading certain ones and they couldn't upgrade" him. Kukla further testified that Norman told him that "if I go to the office and complain about you, Jake, maybe they won't call you back," and therefore he "dropped the matter." Norman in his testimony admitted that Kukla asked about upgrading. However, he denied telling Kukla that he might not be recalled if he asked to be upgraded. Norman testified that to his recollection, he handled Kukla's requests himself without consulting Assistant Maintenance Supervisor Selvage. However, Norman testified that he sometimes discussed such requests with Selvage, and that he could not recall the names of temporary employees who requested upgrading, other than Shugerts and Kukla. I find it unlikely that Norman did not at least inform Selvage of Kukla's requests, and I find it probable that both Povlich and Selvage were aware of those requests. However, I am not persuaded that the General Counsel has proven that Norman threatened Kukla with loss of employment. Kukla testified that Norman always rejected his requests because only certain employees were upgraded. He did not indicate that Norman threatened him more than once, and he did not indicate, even approximately, when the alleged threat occurred. I am not persuaded that Kukla's testimony is any more credible than Norman's denial. Bearing in mind that we are here dealing with a specific alleged unfair labor practice, I find that the General Counsel has not proven a violation by a preponderance of the credible evidence. Therefore I am recommending that the allegation be dismissed.

The General Counsel contends (Br. 10) that the circumstances of the Company's refusal to hire Violet Shugerts for the February-March 1984 outage May properly be considered as evidence with respect to the alleged unfair labor practices in the present case, occurring in and since June 1984. I agree. Evidence involved in a settled or withdrawn charge may properly be considered as background evidence in determining the motive or object of a respondent in activities occurring either before or after the settlement or withdrawal, which are in litigation. Steves Sash & Door Co. v. NLRB, 401 F.2d 676, 678 (5th Cir. 1968); NLRB v. Carpenters, 383 F.2d 89, 95-96 (8th Cir. 1967). The limitation period of Section 10(b) of the Act does not preclude receipt or consideration of such evidence, or other evidence predating the 10(b) period, e.g., concerning motive, animus, and knowledge of union or concerted activity, unless the General Counsel's case is inescapably grounded on evidence predating the 10(b) period. Here, the General Counsel's case is not so limited. Rather, the General Counsel is also relying on evidence within the 10(b) period, including alleged pretextual reasons for terminating and refusing to rehire the core group employees, departure from prior practice, and statements and admissions by the Company. Therefore the Company's refusal to hire Shugerts in January 1984 may properly be considered in the present case. See NLRB v. Carpenters, supra; Denzil S. Alkire, 259 NLRB 1323, 1329 fn. 4 (1982), revd. on other grounds 716 F.2d 1014 (4th Cir. 1983); Laborers Local 282 (Millstone Construction), 236 NLRB 621, 623 (1978). Moreover, it is not possible to intelligently evaluate the present allegations without considering the Company's hiring and termination practices in the February-March outage. Indeed, the Company is contending that its actions in June 1984 were lawful in that they reflected a continuation of practices that were initiated or followed in the February-March outage (see, e.g., Br. 3, 16, 18, 21). In furtherance of its position, the Company presented testimony concerning the manner in which employees were selected for that outage. Therefore the selection process, including the Company's refusal to hire Shugerts, was properly and fairly placed in litigation, and it is necessary for me to consider that process to determine its significance concerning the present alleged unfair labor practices.

[9] The roster fails to list Erhard for the February 1984 outage, although it is undisputed that he was hired and did in fact work at that time.

I find that the Company intentionally refused to hire Shugerts for the February-March outage because of her insistence at the previous outage that she receive the contract rate for painting the condenser, as a result of which the Company was forced to perform this work with only one temporary employee. Shugerts was one of only three case group employees who were interviewed but not hired at that time, and she had considerably more experience than the other two. Shugerts testified that she began working as a temporary employee in 1980, and that to her knowledge she worked every outage for which temporary employees were hired until 1984. The Company gave conflicting, and patently false, explanations for its failure to hire her for the February-March outage. Assistant Business Manager Shirey testified without contradiction that Maintenance Superintendent Povlich told him that her evaluation was good, but that the list was full and she was "first on the extra list in case somebody didn't make it." As indicated, Shugerts was told the same thing, and the Company's records indicate that she was first on the list of alternates, but when an opening developed, the Company hired a new employee who was not listed as an alternate. Union Steward Leggs testified that Povlich told him that Shugerts should not be concerned about this outage, but if she was called for the next outage (which she was) she should be concerned about improving her performance. Shugerts testified that Povlich told her that to his knowledge there was no reason why she was not hired, that she did nothing wrong, and that applicants were hired based on their evaluations and performance at the interviews. However, Shugert's evaluations indicate that the Company regarded her as a competent employee and after 1981 they contained no adverse remarks.[10] I find that the Company's discriminatory refusal to rehire Shugerts for the February-March outage is evidentiary with respect to its subsequent actions beginning in June 1984.

The Company's hiring and termination practices concerning the February-March outage are significant in other respects. As found, although the Company ostensibly discontinued using an informal seniority system at an earlier time, the admissions of Suvakas and Povlich indicate that the Company used the seniority system at Shawville until January 1984. If the Company used the seniority list in January 1984, then Suvakas and Povlich would have had to hire Shugerts, who was near the top of the list. However, by discarding the list, the Company could avoid hiring Shugerts. As the Company's abandonment of the list at that time was tainted by its discriminatory refusal to rehire Shugerts, that abandonment cannot validly be considered as evidence that the Company, for legitimate reasons, stopped giving preference to the core group before the events that gave rise to the present case. Rather, as indicated, the evidence indicates otherwise, because the Company hired only experienced temporary employees, with the exception of one new employee who was hired in place of Shugerts.

Before 1984 the Company consistently followed a practice at Shawville of first hired, last terminated. Those employees who were hired for preoutage preparation were retained for postoutage cleanup. The Company was thereby assured of the services of its most experienced employees throughout the operation, and the most experienced employees were assured of the maximum possible employment. However, in March and again in June 1984 the Company followed a practice of first hired, first terminated. At the completion of the General Counsel's case-in-chief, the Company moved for dismissal of the pertinent allegation, asserting that because the Company switched to a practice of first hired, first terminated in March, the subsequent application of such a practice in June could not be viewed as discriminatorily motivated. The difficulty with this argument is that the two situations were not comparable. Human Resources Administrator Howarth testified that the Company applied a practice of first hired, first terminated at Shawville in March "in order to equalize the work among the temporaries." However, this was a relatively small operation involving 31 temporary employees, all but one of whom had prior experience. The practical effect of last hired, first terminated in this outage was simply, as confirmed by the Company's records, to equalize work among the core group. Therefore, the Company still had the benefit of using experienced employees throughout the operation. However, the Company hired 38 employees for the May-June outage, of whom 12 had little or no prior experience. These 12 were in the second and last group hired. Therefore, for the first time, the Company retained a large group of new temporary employees for postoutage work while a substantial number of experienced core group personnel were terminated.

B. The May-June and July-August Outages and the Company's Alleged Unlawful Termination and Refusal to Rehire Core Group Temporary Employees

By letter dated 24 April to BES employment interviewer Marshall Shaw, Howarth requested that 70 applicants be scheduled for interviews on 3 and 4 May for temporary employment, estimated for about 5 weeks. Since November 1982, the Company had outages scheduled at Shawville for unit 3 during the weeks of 28 May and 4 and 11 June and for unit 1 during the weeks of 9, 16, and 23 July. Allowing 1 week before and after each outage for preparation and cleanup, the Company could therefore anticipate that there would be a 1-week interval (week of 25 June) between outages. In fact, by April 28 at the latest, Maintenance Superintendent Povlich knew that the unit 3 outage would be delayed 1 week, and that consequently there would be only a weekend between completion of cleanup for the unit 3 outage and commencement of preparation for the unit 1 outage. Povlich testified that in accordance with his request (by memo dated April 3) the unit 3 outage was rescheduled to commence on June 4, that the decision was made between March 25 and April 26, and that he was officially notified of the change by April 28, when he received the revised maintenance schedule.[11]

[10] Jacob Kukla testified that "acting supervisor" Dean Johnson told him that Shugerts was not rehired because she complained about not getting the assistant rate in the condenser in 1983, and "I guess" she would not be rehired because "She's more or less a troublemaker and she's never satisfied with her job." Johnson, who was presented as a company witness, denied that he had a conversation with Kukla concerning Shugerts. Johnson described himself as a repairman who was upgraded to temporary foreman and put in charge of a crew. Kukla admitted that Johnson was not acting as his foreman when they had their conversation. I am not persuaded that Kukla's testimony is more credible than Johnson's denial. Assuming that the conversation took place as described by Kukla, I would find in the circumstances, including Johnson's normal status as a rank-and-file employee, that Johnson was not speaking on behalf of the Company, and that Kukla did not have just cause to believe that Johnson was speaking on behalf of management.

On 3 and 4 May Povlich and Howarth interviewed and selected from among the applicants. One core group employee, Scott Duckett, commenced work on May 14. Sixteen additional hirees, all core group employees, including Violet Shugerts, Jacob Kukla, and Randy Erhard, were initially scheduled to begin on 28 May, but were subsequently told to report instead on Thursday, 31 May. The remaining 21 hirees, including 9 core group employees, commenced work on 4 June. As indicated, Povlich already knew that there would be a continuous need for temporary employees through both the unit 3 and unit 1 outages. Nevertheless, by letter dated May 16, Howarth requested BES interviewer Shaw to schedule interviews for 80 applicants on 12 and 13 June, commencing each day at 7:30 a.m., with 10-minute intervals, i.e., with a lunchbreak until about 3 p.m. Howarth specifically told Shaw that no interviews should be scheduled after 3 p.m., and that the Company would not give currently working employees time off for the interviews.[12] The temporary employees worked from 7 a.m. to 3:30 p.m. Therefore, as Howarth admitted in his testimony, he knew that the employees who were hired for the unit 3 outage were precluded by his own instructions from applying for and consequently working the unit 1 outage. BES policy did not preclude currently working individuals from applying for future work, so long as unemployed individuals were added to the list. As indicated, Shaw normally referred core group employees to the Company. Shaw contacted Violet Shugerts, who said she was working and would have to get time off. Office clerk Butler told her that Shaw was not supposed to call the employees who were not working, that they could not be interviewed, and therefore they could not work the July outage. On May 29 Shaw began setting up interviews. However, because of Howarth's instructions, he did not schedule any applicants who were currently working, i.e., working on the unit 3 outage. As a result, nearly all the interviewed applicants had not previously worked for the Company. The Company hired 42 temporary employees for the unit 1 outage, of whom 6 had previously worked for the Company. Three of the six (Linda McGonigal, Julia Short, and Dessie Lee) had worked the February-March outage and were interviewed but not hired in May. On 22 and 23 June the Company terminated 13 of the 16 employees who were began on 31 May, and these 13 individuals are specifically named in the complaint as alleged discriminatees. They are Violet Shugerts, Paula Kitko, Richard Diggs, Alvin Hughes, Rex Neiger, David Graham, Leonard McCale, George Gould, Dennis Jury, Jacob Kukla, Frank Josefik, Randy Erhard, and James Hubler.[13] Fifteen of the employees who began on June 4 were terminated on Friday, 29 June; the remaining six were terminated on 22 June. On Monday, 2 July, the Company began preparation for the unit 1 outage with 10 temporary employees. Four more employees began the next day, 25 began work on 9 July, and 3 more began work on 10 or 11 July.

The Company's hiring practice regarding the July-August outage was unprecedented. The Company had never scheduled interviews for temporary employees at a time when temporaries were currently working at Shawville. In recent years, the Company had consistently offered employment to core group applicants for every outage that required temporary employees, consistently preferred to hire them, and consequently, until July 1984, always had a temporary work force that consisted predominantly of core group employees. The Company offered conflicting and demonstrably false explanations for its failure to hire or retain core group employees for the July-August outage, both at the time of the events and through its witnesses at the present hearing. In June, union representatives met with company officials to discuss why core group employees were not being retained or interviewed for the July-August outage. Plant Superintendent Bilotte and Maintenance Superintendent Povlich told Union Stewards Semler and Leggs that the Union did not have the right to tell the Company who to recall, adding that the Company wanted to spread work throughout the community and therefore would not interview working employees for the next outage. Administrators Gephart and Howarth similarly told Union Business Manager Jim Brinker and Assistant Manager Shirey that the Company would not hire "just a certain group of people," but would spread out work because of unemployment, and therefore would not interview anyone on the payroll. However, Howarth testified that although the Company tried to spread out opportunities, he was "never instructed to do that," and he did not consider this factor when he scheduled the June interviews and hired temporaries for the July–August outage. In fact, as discussed, the Company had consistently and as late as May 1984 demonstrated a preference for core group employees.[14] Subordinate supervisors suggested that the Company was required by law to spread work through the community. Zitzelberger testified without contradiction that in June Selvage told her he wanted to keep her, but "the government is getting on us about hiring the same people all the time." Randy Erhard credibly testified that on 21 June we asked Group Supervisor Porter "why they were getting rid of all of us old timers and bringing new people in," whereupon Porter answered that he should "thank the governor because it was a new law in unemployment and the company had no choice."[15] In fact, no evidence was presented concerning any pertinent governmental requirement, pressure, or persuation, and the Company does not contend in this proceeding that the Federal or state government had anything to do with its failure to retain or rehire the core group employees.

[11] The asserted reason for the change is questionable. In his April 3 memo Povlich stated that he wanted to avoid the expense of holiday pay (Memorial Day) on the first day of the outage. Povlich testified that PJM would not allow the Company to begin an outage "during the middle of the week," i.e., on a Tuesday following a Monday holiday. However, such considerations of economy did not prevent the Company from commencing preparation for the unit 1 outage on July 2, shortly before a paid holiday (Independence Day), or as indicated by the Company's records, from scheduling 1985 outages to commence at Shawville on Washington's Birthday and at Conemaugh on Labor Day, both paid holidays.

[12] Shaw, who was presented as a company witness, testified that Howarth told him that he was not planning to give currently working employees time off for interviews, and therefore Shaw did not schedule them. Howarth testified that they spoke after 12 June, that Shaw said that some currently working employees were concerned because they were not interviewed, whereupon Howarth told him that the Company had already interviewed and made its selections. Shaw is a state government officer who has no motivation to testify falsely in this proceeding. I credit Shaw.

[13] Scott Duckett, who was hired on 14 May, and Richard Shirey and Dale McCracken, who began on 31 May, continued to work through and after the unit 1 outage. The Company's records indicate that Michael Dubo worked from 31 to 25 May. Although this was an obvious error, I have no other basis for determining the duration of his employment, and he is not specifically named as an alleged discriminatee.

As found, Group Supervisor Murray indicated in his testimony that the Company made a conscious decision to hire new employees for the July–August (unit 1) outage. Nevertheless, the Company contends, through the testimony of Superintendent Povlich, that the Company did not intentionally refuse to hire core group employees for that outage, specifically, those who worked the prior outage, but that its failure to hire them was unintentional and caused by a coincidental series of events. Povlich testified, and the Company's records indicate, that as of November 1982 the Company had scheduled the 1984 outages for unit 3 during the weeks of 28 May and 4 and 11 June and for unit 1 during the weeks of 9, 16, and 23 July, which would indicate a 1-week interval between postoutage cleanup for unit 1. Povlich testified that "probably" in the fall of 1983 he submitted a proposed budget to Johnstown that included the two outages and was based on the premise that there would be separate hirings for the outages. As discussed, in April the Company rescheduled the unit 3 outage to commence on 4 June, thereby indicating that preparation for the unit 1 outage would commence on the first workday after completion of cleanup for the unit 3 outage. On 4 May, the same day that the Company was interviewing applicants who later worked only the unit 3 outage, Povlich submitted a personnel request for replacement form (form PL-52A) to Johnstown, requesting authorization for temporary employees as follows: 15 for preoutage preparation from 30 June to 6 July, 50 for the unit 1 outage from 7 to 27 July, and 15 for postoutage cleanup from 28 July to 3 August. The request, which was approved on 17 May, said nothing about whether the temporaries should be newly hired or retained from the unit 3 outage. The original proposed budget for 1984, referred to by Povlich in his testimony, was not presented in evidence. At the present hearing, company counsel sought to prove that the Company had no alternative but to [illegible] separately for the 1984 outages because in 1982 Povlich anticipated that there would not be a continuous need for temporary employees and therefore submitted a proposed budget that required separate hiring for the unit 3 and unit 1 outages. However, Povlich did not cooperate. Despite leading questions from company counsel, Povlich indicated in his testimony that the PL-52A request was part of the ongoing budgeting process, and that he could have submitted a request which took changed conditions into consideration. Thus Povlich testified as follows:

> Q. What is a back to back to outage?
> A. It's a outage when there is little or no time between the outages, when they run right together. When that occurs I would treat them like one block of required need of people and that's the way I would budget for them.
> Q. How do you determine whether or not you're going to budget them as a single need or budget for them separately?
> A. How do I determine that?
> Q. Yeah.
> A. By the length of time between the outages.

[15] On direct examination Porter testified that he told Erhard that he did not know "why the temporaries that had been employed down there for several outages before weren't recalled." However, on cross-examination Porter inconsistently testified that at the time of the conversation he did not know whether the current employees would be working the July–August outage. I credit Erhard.

> A. No, I would probably already have the PL-51 A submitted, we would just treat as they were submitted. [Emphasis added.]

In summary, although company counsel was suggesting that the final decision was made when Povlich submitted his original proposed budget, Povlich was testifying only that he would not change his budgeting after the PL-52A was submitted. Povlich expressly conceded that the PL-52A authorization request is part of the budgeting process. Moreover, nothing in either the original budget proposal of the PL-52A authorization prevented Povlich from retaining the employees who began on 31 May through both outages, instead of hiring a completely new complement of employees. Povlich expressly admitted that the amount of wages paid to the temporary employees would have been the same, whether the same temporaries or a new set of temporaries was used. Indeed, it would have cost less to retain employees because the Company could have eliminated or reduced the need for interviews, physical exams, and the training and familiarization of new employees with the Company's operations. Additionally, Povlich's testimony, and the PL-52A forms themselves, demonstrate that those personnel authorization requests are not cast in stone, but are subject to change as warranted by changed circumstances. Thus the PL-52A form, which Povlich submitted concerning the unit 3 outage, indicating that the outage would begin on 28 May, and that was approved by Johnstown, did not prevent Povlich from requesting that the outage be moved to a later date. The forms also do not correspond with the number of temporaries actually hired. Povlich also testified concerning an outage in the summer of 1982, when a low-pressure rotor cracked. The outage was extended and temporaries were kept on to perform cleanup work, until Povlich ran out of budget money, while regular employees were assigned to work on the outage. Therefore it is evident that the maintenance budget was sufficiently flexible to allow for unanticipated costs including extended employment of temporary employees.

Much testimony was adduced in this proceeding concerning the Company's hiring and retention practices in "back to back" outages, where there was a short interval between outages. I am not persuaded that the present record indicates a situation precisely comparable to that involved in the present case, i.e., a 2-week interval between outages, in which cleanup for the first outage continued up to, but did not overlap preparation for, the second outage. The General Counsel presented in evidence the Company's roster of temporary employees since January 1980, including dates of employment. The Company presented records of actual or projected maintenance outages throughout its system since January 1982. The General Counsel's witnesses were rather vague in their recollection of the intervals between past back-to-back outages. Although the Company's employment roster indicates some relatively long spans of employment in 1981 and 1982, it is not possible to determine whether these involved back-to-back outages, which were two or more weeks apart, with no intervening needs. The Company's records indicate that in early 1982 and again in early 1983, there were two outages which fell 1 week apart. In each instance, the temporaries who began with preparation for the first outage continued through cleanup for the second outage, and those employees who started work at the beginning of the first outage (1 week after the first group) were terminated at the end of the second outage (1 week before the initial group). In these situations cleanup for the first outage would be performed concurrently with preparation for the second outage, thereby requiring nearly a full complement of temporaries during the intervening week. The Company's records fail to indicate, before May 1984, any other outages at Shawville that were sufficiently close together to be even arguably regarded as back-to-back outages. Administrator Howarth testified, and the Company presented records concerning 1984 outages, which were 3 weeks apart, at the Company's Seneca and Warren stations. Howarth testified that although the two stations are treated as one location, there was separate hiring for the two outages. However a 3-week interval would indicate that there was a 1-week period during which there would be no need for temporaries. Moreover, the evidence in this case indicates that at Shawville, the Company had a strong preference for the same group of temporaries, which was not necessarily the case at other locations, and that the Johnstown personnel administrators were, until May 1984, willing to accommodate this preference even if it differed from their asserted general policies. Administrator Howarth, who together with Povlich, interviewed and hired temporaries for Shawville in both May and June, testified that when outages were 2 or 3 weeks apart, he would use the same employees for both "if we have a need for those people during an interim period." Applying this policy, and given Povlich's strong demonstrated past preference for core group employees, it is probable that absent a discriminatory motive the Company would at the least have retained those employees who began on 31 May, as needed through cleanup following the second outage. I also find significant Howarth's adamant refusal to permit currently working employees to apply for the July-August outage. Howarth suggested that he scheduled the interviews from 7:30 a.m. to 3 p.m. as a personal accommodation, in order to enable him to get home to Johnstown by about 6 p.m. His suggestion borders on the frivolous. Howarth had no reservations about getting up in the middle of the night to drive 2-1/2 hours from Johnstown to Shawville to begin interviewing at 7:30 a.m. I find it unlikely that Howarth would have given priority to an early dinner hour if this meant the difference between hiring experienced and inexperienced employees. Even if Howarth sincerely wanted to conduct the interviews during the temporaries' working hours, it would have taken only 10 minutes of their time to be interviewed. Nevertheless Howarth adamantly made clear in advance that the temporaries would not be given any time off.[16] Howarth's actions were not only arbitrary and unreasonable, but more significantly, they were inconsistent with the Company's longstanding preference for core group temporaries at Shawville.

I find that the Company terminated the 13 named core group employees on 22 and 23 June, instead of retaining them through postoutage cleanup for the July-August outage, in reprisal for the activities of core group employees in claiming appropriate wage rates under the union contract, and as part of a campaign to discourage such claims by depriving them of the benefit of the Company's past practice of routinely favoring them in hiring and thereby assuring them of temporary employment on what in fact was a routine basis.[17] I further find that in furtherance of that campaign, the Company terminated additional core group temporaries hired on 4 June, at the end of the unit 3 outage, instead of retaining or rehiring them for the unit 1 outage, as the Company would have done had it followed its past practice of preferring their employment over that of new temporaries. The core group temporaries, who had been repeatedly hired by the Company, were Paula Shepler, Zitzelberg, Lorenzo Carella, Lorraine Stewart, Dennis Marino, Stephen Selfridge, Carol Frelin, Herbert Baumgartner, James Butterbaugh, and Lloyd Hampton.[18] The Company initially sought to discourage such employee activity by discriminatorily refusing to hire Violet Shugerts for the February-March (unit 4) outage. Shugerts was the first core group employee to vigorously invoke her asserted contract rights by complaining both to management and the Union, and by doing so she forced the Company to change its work assignment pattern. However, during that outage the Company found that Shugert's absence did not deter other core group employees, specifically Randy Erhard and Jacob Kukla, from claiming wage rates to which they and fellow temporaries were entitled under the union contract, and that these claims conflicted not only with the Company's policies, but also to some extent with the interests of the regular employees. Statements by higher management at Shawville demonstrated a hostility toward such claims and an inclination to refrain from hiring temporaries who made such claims. Thus Plant Superintendent Bilotte told Storeroom Supervisor Ogden, after Erhard and McCracken were upgraded and the regular employees complained, that maybe they should not have temporaries in the storeroom. Maintenance Supervisor Povlich told steward Leggs that if Violet Shugerts was called for the next outage, she should be concerned about improving her performance. However, Shugert's evaluations indicated that the Company regarded her as a competent employee, and that her performance compared favorably in all respects with the employees who were hired for the February-March outage. The inference is inescapable that by "performance," Povlich was referring to Shugerts' aggressive assertion of contract rights. At a lower level, Ogden told Erhard that she was instructed to lay him off because he was a troublemaker. The Company advanced inconsistent and demonstrably false reasons for refusing to hire Shugerts in February and similarly advanced inconsistent and demonstrably false reasons for refusing to retain or rehire Shugerts and other core group temporaries at the next two outages. The Company adamantly and pretextually deprived them of even an opportunity to apply to work the July-August outage, knowing that in light of its prior practice of favoring the use of such employees, the Company would be hard put to justify their rejection. In these circumstances, I find that the Company embarked upon a course of action to deprive the core group employees of temporary employment on a routine basis, in reprisal for the actions of core group employees in invoking their contract rights; and to discourage other employees from invoking such rights and reducing or eliminating such activity. See generally regarding motive, Shattuck Denn Mining Corp. v. NLRB, 362 F.2d 466, 470 (9th Cir. 1966); W. T. Grant Co. v. NLRB, 337 F.2d 447 (7th Cir. 1964). Shugerts, Erhard, and Kukla invoked the union contract in the honest and reasonable belief that they were entitled to the higher wage rate for the work assigned to them. Therefore, they were engaged in protected union and concerted activity, and the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by discriminating against the core group employees because of such activity. NLRB v. City Disposal Systems, 465 U.S. 822 (1984); see also Gulf Coast Steel, 236 NLRB 831, 832 (1978), enfd. 594 F.2d 238 (5th Cir. 1979); Crown Wrecking Co., 222 NLRB 958, 962 (1976). Where as here, an employer discriminates against a group or class of employees because of the union or other protected activities of some members of that group or class, the employees action is unlawful as to all the discriminatees, and all are entitled to relief. American Bottling Co., 99 NLRB 345, 352 (1952), enfd. 205 F.2d 421 (5th Cir. 1953), cert. denied 346 U.S. 921 (1954); Arnoldware, Inc., 129 NLRB 228 (1960). The evidence is insufficient to establish that Violet Shugerts' first unfair labor practice charge was a motivating factor in the Company's subsequent discrimination against the core group temporaries. Shugerts withdrew the charge in March, and Povlich may well have believed that this action improved her "performance." She was hired for the next outage. However, the employees' invocation of their contract rights presented a continuing problem to the Company.

C. Alleged Unlawful Discrimination Since August 1984

Evidence was introduced at the present hearing that indicated that in late 1984 and early 1985 the Company was following the same course of conduct that it initiat-currently working employees would not be given time off, Shaw would have no reason to schedule any of them for interviews. Rather, the Company's course of conduct is consistent with what clerk Butler told Shugerts, namely, that the Company decided not to interview or rehire any currently working employees.

[17] It is evident from the Company's records that there was sufficient work for them through the workweek beginning 30 July. The Company employed 15 temporaries during that week, none of whom were core group employees.

[18] I do not agree with the General Counsel's contention (Br. fn 10) that the names of all discriminatees should be left to the compliance stage of the proceeding, insofar as that contention relates to the 1984 unit 3 and unit 1 outages. The record evidence is adequate in this regard to enable me to specifically identify the discriminatees. The General Counsel's position regarding later or future outages will be discussed further in the next section and in the remedy section of this decision.

ed in the spring and summer of 1984, namely, of hiring core group temporaries for one outage but not the following outage. Randy Erhard testified that he was hired on December 3 and anticipated that he would be terminated on December 21, but that he did not anticipate working the next outage, sheduled to begin in January 1985, because he was not interviewed and the interviews had already taken place. The General Counsel was reluctant to delay the hearing in order to investigate the present situation. I permitted the General Counsel to amend the complaint in order to allege violations since July 1984, specifically to allege that since June 22 the Company has failed and refused to recall or rehire the 13 named core group temporaries and "other employees whose names are currently undetermined" to their former or substantially equivalent positions. The Company requested that if evidence were introduced concerning alleged discrimination subsequent to August 1984, it wanted an opportunity to respond to such evidence. I ruled that subsequent events could be litigated, if necessary, at the compliance stage of this proceeding. However, such litigation must of course, in accordance with usual Board procedure, be considered in light of the findings and conclusions in the unfair labor practice case, and decided in a manner consistent with the remedy and Order in the case.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Company is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By discriminatorily failing and refusing to retain or rehire Violet Shugerts, Paula Kitko, Richard Diggs, Alvin Hughes, Rex Neiger, David Graham, Leonard McCale, George Gould, Dennis Jury, Jacob Kukla, Frank Josefik, Randy Erhard, James Hubler, Paul Shepler Zitzelberger, Lorenzo Carella, Lorraine Stewart, Dennis Marino, Stephen Selfridge, Carol Frelin, Herbert Baumgartner, James Butterbaugh, and Lloyd Hampton because of the union and concerted activities of Violet Shugerts and other of those employees, and thereby discouraging membership in the Union, the Company has engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

4. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

5. The General Counsel has failed to prove by a preponderance of the credible evidence that the Company violated Section 8(a)(4) of the Act or through Supervisor John Norman, violated Section 8(a)(1) by threatening employees with loss of employment because of their union and concerted activities.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Company has committed violations of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, I shall recommend that it be required to cease and desist therefrom, and from like or related conduct, and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. Plainly, this is not a case like those involving the discriminatory discharge of a regular employee or a discriminatory refusal to hire for regular employment, in which a conventional order of reinstatement or offer of employment would be warrented. In cases such as the present case, involving discriminatory denial of intermittent temporary employment, it has been Board policy to direct the employer to offer employment to the discriminatees on the same nondiscriminatory basis that they enjoyed before to the unlawful discrimination. See Great Lakes Dredge & Dock Co., 169 NLRB 631, 635 (1968); Gallant Man, 154 NLRB 1795, 1808 (1965), modified in other respects 161 NLRB 1310 (1966), enfd. 389 F.2d 701 (5th Cir. 1968); Republic Corp., 260 NLRB 486, 514 (1982), enfd. 701 F.2d 221 (D.C. Cir. 1983). In summary, the Board will endeavor to restore the status quo, i.e., the "last peaceable uncontested status which preceded the pending controversy." Black's Law Dictionary (5th ed. 1979). In the present case, it would not effectuate the remedial purposes of the Act to require the Company to adhere to a rigid seniority system, either on the basis of prior days worked or other standard. The evidence indicates that although the Company used such indicia of seniority as a guide, it did not invariably hire or retain temporary employees on that basis. Thus the Company did not invariably hire or retain employees who had worked once or occasionally in the past, in preference to less experienced employees. However, the evidence does indicate that the Company consistently demonstrated a preference to hire and retain an identifiable group of core temporaries in preference to other employees or applicants. Specifically, the Company's records and other evidence indicates that 25 employees were hired for either the May–June or July–August 1984 outages and previously for at least each of the three preceding outages, i.e., that they were consistently hired, during a 1-year period preceding the present discrimination. It is also significant that the Company hired only experienced temporaries for the three outages which preceded the May–June 1984 outage, except for one applicant who was hired in place of Violet Shugerts for the February–March outage. I have included Shugerts in this category because the Company discriminatorily refused to hire her for that outage. The other core group employees in this category are Paula Kitko, Richard Diggs, Rex Neiger, David Graham, Leonard McCale, George Gould, Dennis Jury, Jacob Kukla, Frank Josefik, Randy Erhard, Dale McCracken, Richard Shirey, Scott Duckett, Michael Dubo, Paula Shepler Litzelberger, Dessie Wodling Lee, Lorenzo Carella, Julia Short, Lorraine Stewart, Dennis Marino, Stephen Selfridge, Carol Frelin, Herbert Baumgartner, and James Butterbaugh. I find that these employees are entitled to preference in employment by reason of the Company's established nondiscriminatory past practice. Therefore I am recommending that the Company be ordered to give them preference in hiring and retention for temporary employment, in a nondiscriminatory manner, and without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed. In this regard, the Company's records indicate that throughout 1981, 1982, and 1983, Violet Shugerts was invariably among those core group employees who were given top preference in hiring and retention for employment. The Company may not avoid this order by limiting such offers to applicants referred by BES because that procedure was tainted when the Company discriminatorily informed BES that it would not hire currently employed temporaries. The present record is inadequate for the purpose of identifying other experienced employees who are or may be entitled to equal or lesser preference in temporary employment on the basis of past practice. The Company's records indicate that some employees repeatedly worked for the Company in 1983 and in some instances also in early 1984, but were not interviewed or hired for either the May–June or July–August outages. This might indicate that they were no longer available or interested in employment. Alvin Hughes and Lloyd Hampton worked some but not all outages, and both were interviewed and rejected in January 1984. This might indicate that the Company was not entirely satisfied with their performance. (Hughes' evaluation in June 1984 was somewhat qualified.) James Hubler worked the last two outages in 1983 and the May–June outage in 1984, but was neither interviewed nor hired for the February–March outage. His status may depend on the reason why he did not work that outage. Therefore, I am leaving for the compliance stage of this proceeding, the identification of additional discriminatees, if any, concerning temporary employment after August 1984. However, Hughes, Hampton, and Hubler are entitled to be made whole for the discrimination against them in connection with the May–June and July–August 1984 outages. I am further recommending that the Company be ordered to make whole each of the discriminatees for any loss of earnings they may have suffered by reason of the discrimination against them, by paying each of them a sum of money equal to that which they normally would have earned from the date they were first discriminatorily terminated or denied employment to the date of the Company's offer of preferential employment in accordance with its prior practice. Because they were employed on a temporary basis, the net earnings to be subtracted from the gross backpay due them shall be only the money they actually earned on those days they would have been employed by the Company had it not discriminated against them. Great Lakes Dredge & Dock Co., supra, 169 NLRB at 636 fn. 19. The backpay for the said employees shall be computed quarterly in accordance with the formula in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest computed in the manner and amount prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[10] It will also be recommended that the Company be required to preserve and make available to the Board, or its agents, on request, payroll and other records to facilitate the computation of backpay due. I shall also direct posting of an appropriate notice. To assure adequate dissemination of the notice, I shall direct that the notice be posted for a 60-day period which includes at least a 21-day period of temporary work in connection with a maintenance outage, or for an additional 21-day period when such work is in progress.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[20]

ORDER

The Respondent, Pennsylvania Electric Company, Shawville, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Terminating employees, refusing to interview or hire job applicants, or in any other manner discriminating against employees with regard to their hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment, because they or any of their fellow employees claim rights under a collective-bargaining contract, or because they engage in any other union or concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer preference in hiring and retention for temporary employment at its Shawville, Pennsylvania facility to Violet Shugerts, Paula Kitko, Richard Diggs, Rex Neiger, David Graham, Leonard McCale, George Gould, Dennis Jury, Jacob Kukla, Frank Josefik, Randy Erhard, Dale McCracken, Richard Shirey, Scott Duckett, Michael Dubo, Paula Shepler Zitzelberger, Dessie Woddling Lee, Lorenzo Carella, Julia Short, Lorraine Stewart, Dennis Marino, Stephen Selfridge, Carol Frelin, Herbert Baumgartner, and James Butterbaugh, and to all other employees who are entitled to such preference by reason of its past practice, in a nondiscriminatory manner, and without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed.

(b) Make whole those employees, and any employees who were entitled to such preference in connection with the units 3 and 1 outages at Shawville in 1984, including Alvin Hughes, Lloyd Hampton, and James Hubler, for any loss of earnings they may have suffered by reason of the discrimination against them, as set forth in the remedy section of this decision.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its Shawville, Pennsylvania facility, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[21] Copies of

July 27, 1988

DECISION AND DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

The charge in this Section 10(k) proceeding was filed October 19, 1987,[1] by the Employer, Puerto Rico Marine Management, Inc., alleging that the Respondent, Local 1575, International Longshoremen's Association, AFL–CIO (Local 1575), violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the National Labor Relations Act by engaging in proscribed activity with an object of forcing the Employer to assign certain work to employees it represents rather than to employees represented by Local 402, Office and Professional Employees International Union, AFL–CIO (Local 402). The hearing was held November 30 and December 1 and 2, 1987, before Hearing Officer Harold E. Hopkins Jr.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board affirms the hearing officer's rulings, finding them free from prejudicial error. On the entire record, the Board makes the following findings.

I. JURISDICTION

The Employer, a Delaware corporation, provides marine transportation or related services between Puerto Rico and the mainland of the United States and in interstate and foreign commerce. It has its principal office and place of business in Elizabeth, New Jersey, and maintains other places of business and port facilities throughout the United States, including those located within the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico. During the 12 months prior to the hearing, the Employer has derived gross revenues in excess of $500,000 from the handling and transportation of cargo in interstate and foreign commerce in connection with its service as manager and operator of vessels and related facilities owned by Puerto Rico Maritime Shipping Authority, a public corporation. During the same period, it has performed services valued in excess of $50,000 for companies located outside the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico. The parties stipulate, and we find, that the Employer is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and that Local 1575 and Local 402 are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE DISPUTE

A. Background and Facts of Dispute

In 1968, TransAmerican Trailer Transport commenced operations in Puerto Rico and utilized Roll-on/Roll-off (Ro/Ro) vessels to transport sea cargo between Puerto Rico and various locations on the mainland. Ro/Ro vessels are ships in which the cargo is loaded and unloaded by means of vehicles that drive onto the ship and haul cargo to and from the vessel. No predetermined on-board location is assigned to the cargo as Ro/Ro vessels are equipped with ballast-adjusting mechanisms. Before 1974, Sea-Land Services and Seatrain Lines also operated sea cargo transport services between Puerto Rico and the continental United States using Lift-on/Lift-off (Lo/Lo) type vessels. These vessels are loaded and unloaded by a crane, which lifts cargo to a specific location on the Lo/Lo ship. The cargo is loaded pursuant to a specific plan that is necessary in order to balance the Lo/Lo ships as they are not equipped with ballast-adjusting mechanisms. In 1974, the Puerto Rico Maritime Shipping Authority purchased some of the Ro/Ro and Lo/Lo vessels of the aforementioned companies and contracted with the Employer to run its newly acquired sea cargo operations. The Employer, on initiating its operations, recognized both Local 1575 and Local 402, and has negotiated and signed several successive collective-bargaining agreements with both labor organizations. Currently, Local 402-represented employees, called stowage coordinators, write the cargo plans for the Employer's Lo/Lo operations.[2] The stowage coordinator uses a calculator and other mathematical tools to determine the proper balancing location of cargo.

The work in dispute, the Ro/Ro cargo planning work, had been performed by employees represented by Local 1575 under TransAmerican and currently, Local 1575-represented employees have been assigned the work by the Employer. In assigning the work, the Employer uses a seniority list of five cargo planners represented by Local 1575. The disputed work consists of boarding a Ro/Ro vessel and registering the location of trailers, which hold cargo, on a cargo plan form. The cargo planner makes the cargo plan form entries while on board and prepares a summary inventory sheet off the vessel. The entire process requires 10-15 hours, including 1 hour to prepare the summary inventory sheet in an office.

[2] At the time of the hearing, the Employer employed two employees in this classification.

In 1983, Local 402 made a claim for the disputed work. In November 1986, it filed a grievance in which it reiterated its demand that the disputed work be assigned to employees it represents rather than to employees represented by Local 1575. An arbitration was scheduled for April 1987. A Local 1575 attorney appeared at the arbitration and requested time to consider whether Local 1575 would participate. The arbitration was rescheduled for August. The Employer's director of industrial relations testified that Local 1575 made no strike threats between April and August. The arbitration was again rescheduled for October 20 and 21. In early October, the Local 1575 president warned the Employer that he would not accept any arbitral decision resulting from Local 402's grievance. During a meeting between the Employer and Local 1575 on October 16, he also warned that "the resources which the contract established have to be used or else the ILA would picket." The Employer's director of industrial relations testified that Local 1575's president stated that Local 1575 would not participate in the arbitration and if the arbitrator's decision was adverse to the ILA and the work was assigned to OPEIU-represented employees, "they would stop our vessels." Accordingly, on October 19, 1987, the Employer filed the instant 8(b)(4)(D) charge.

B. Work in Dispute

The notice of hearing defines the work dispute concerning the Ro/Ro vessels in the following manner:

> Cargo Planning Checkers: Their work entails registering the location of the trailer in the cargo plan form. This they do by including the prefix number, origin, destination, weight, equipment type, measurement of trailer. Once this complete inventory is done they proceed to do three breakdowns, first by equipment, then by ports, and weight distribution by decks. They then photostat cargo plan copies, ten (10) in total: one copy for the vessel, one for Marine Department, three for Trailer Control, one for costs clerk, one for Port Authority and three for destination port.

C. Contentions of the Parties

The Employer contends that reasonable cause exists to believe that Local 1575 violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act and that the work in dispute should be awarded to the employees represented by Local 1575 currently performing the work. With respect to the merits of the dispute, the Employer relies on the factors of its collective-bargaining agreement with Local 1575, the Employer's practice at its other locations, relative skills, economy and efficiency of operations, and the Employer's preference and past practice.

Local 1575 contends that this is a case in which Local 402 is attempting to obtain work that Local 1575-represented employees are performing. Local 1575's president threatened to strike the Employer if the Employer reassigned the work to Local 402-represented employees. It also argues that there is no method for voluntary adjustment of the dispute to which both Unions are bound. It also admits it prefers that the Board decide this jurisdictional dispute. Local 1575 also argues that the disputed work should be awarded to employees represented by it based on the Employer's preference, past practice, relative skills, and economy of operations.

Local 402 contends that the Board lacks jurisdiction over the dispute because there has been no genuine threat or other action prohibited by Section 8(b)(4)(D) to trigger the 10(k) hearing. Local 402 argues that the notice of hearing should be quashed because the timing of the charge, occurring only 2 days before the scheduled October arbitration, shows the sham nature of Local 1575's strike threat. Moreover, no threats were made between April and early October and both the Employer and Local 1575 admit that they would prefer having the dispute settled before the Board. Finally, Local 402 maintains that other contractual remedies are available for settling the dispute. At the hearing, Local 402 argued that because Local 1575 voluntarily entered into arbitration initiated by Local 402, there is an agreed-on method for the voluntary adjustment of the dispute.

Local 402 also contends that if the Board asserts jurisdiction, the disputed work should be awarded to employees it represents because the disputed work is merely a clerical listing function that can be performed by these employees. Local 402 also argues that the work should be awarded to employees it represents based on its collective-bargaining agreement with the Employer, specialized skills, economy and efficiency, job impact on employees represented by Local 402, and employer preference regarding the off-ship portion of the cargo-planning work.

D. Applicability of the Statute

Before the Board may proceed with a determination of dispute pursuant to Section 10(k) of the Act, it must be satisfied that there is reasonable cause to believe that Section 8(b)(4)(D) has been violated and that the parties have not agreed on a method for the voluntary adjustment of the dispute.

As discussed above, the president of Local 1575 specifically threatened the Employer with picketing if the Employer reassigned the disputed cargo-planning work to Local 402-represented employees. Local 402 argues that this threat is a sham because of Local 1575's admission that it would prefer to have the dispute settled by the Board, the absence of strike threats from April to early October, and the timing of the 8(b)(4)(D) charge. We disagree. The Employer's director of industrial relations testified, without contradiction, that Local 1575 threatened to halt operations if the arbitration resulted in an assignment of the work to Local 402-represented employees. The statement on its face constitutes a threat to strike and there is no evidence that the threat was not made seriously or that Local 1575 had in any way colluded with the Employer in this matter.[3]

Local 402 also claimed that Local 1575 agreed to participate in the October arbitration resulting from Local 402's grievance over the disputed work. On the contrary, the record indicates that Local 1575 refused to participate and threatened to strike if the arbitration award assigned the disputed work to Local 402-represented employees. Local 1575 is not bound by the arbitration provision in the OPEIU contract. We therefore reject Local 402's contention that the parties have agreed on a method to voluntarily adjust this dispute.

We find reasonable cause to believe that a violation of Section 8(b)(4)(D) has occurred and that there exists no agreed-on method for voluntary adjustment of the dispute within the meaning of Section 10(k) of the Act. Accordingly, we find that the dispute is properly before the Board for determination.[4]

E. Merits of the Dispute

Section 10(k) requires the Board to make an affirmative award of disputed work after considering various factors. NLRB v. Electrical Workers IBEW Local 1212 (Columbia Broadcasting), 364 U.S. 573 (1961). The Board has held that its determination in a jurisdictional dispute is an act of judgment based on common sense and experience, reached by balancing the factors involved in a particular case. Machinists Lodge 1743 (J. A. Jones Construction), 135 NLRB 1402 (1962).

The following factors are relevant in making the determination of this dispute.

1. Employer preference and past practice

Since its inception in 1974, the Employer has assigned cargo-planning work for Ro/Ro vessels to employees represented by Local 1575 and prefers to maintain this assignment. We therefore find the factor of past practice and employer preference favors an award to employees represented by Local 1575.

2. Relative skills and efficiency of operations

The record indicates that employees represented by Local 1575 possess the necessary skills to perform Ro/Ro cargo-planning duties. Although the Employer admits that these skills are of such a nature that the Local 402-represented stowage coordinators could learn them, the record also shows that employees represented by Local 402 do not currently possess the skills. The Employer maintains that it would require at least 6 weeks to properly train Local 402-represented employees to become Ro/Ro cargo planners. Local 402 admits that the portion of Ro/Ro cargo-planning work done on board the vessel requires a familiarization with a Ro/Ro ship's configuration.

Local 402 argues that awarding the work to employees it represents would be more economical because these employees are paid a lower hourly rate[5] than Local 1575 cargo planners. Local 402 also argues that an award to Local 402-represented employees would require less overtime because stowage coordinators work in shifts, unlike a Local 1575 cargo planner who completes an entire job. The Employer, however, maintains that reassigning the disputed work to employees represented by Local 402 would require several weeks of costly training and would disrupt the Employer's operations. Local 1575 cargo planners would also have to be discharged in order to hire and train Local 402-represented employees to perform the disputed work. The displacement of one group of employees for another group of employees would add to the disruption of operations. We find that the employees represented by Local 1575 possess the specialized skills to perform the work in dispute and the assignment of the work to Local 1575-represented employees would be more efficient and less disruptive of the Employer's operations. Accordingly, this factor favors an award to employees represented by Local 1575.

[3] See Teamsters Local 6 (Anheuser-Busch), 270 NLRB 219, 220 (1984).

[4] We therefore deny Local 402's motion to quash the notice of hearing.

[5] The Board does not consider wage differentials as a proper basis for awarding disputed work. See Painters Local 91 (Frank M. Burson), 265 NLRB 1685, 1687 (1982); Cincinnati Mailers 17 (S. Rosenthal & Co.), 265 NLRB 1052, 1055 fn. 10 (1982).

3. Collective-bargaining agreements

The Employer has voluntarily recognized and signed a series of agreements with both Unions. Both Unions were certified with the companies whose assets were previously acquired by the Puerto Rico Maritime Shipping Authority. Local 402 relies on the recognition clause of its National Master Agreement, which includes "all office and clerical employees" in arguing that the disputed work should be assigned to employees it represents. Local 402 also points out that Local 1575's agreement with the Employer excludes office workers. Local 1575 relies on its contract with the Employer, recognizes Local 1575 as the representative of employees in the "manual operations of loading and unloading of ships" and "classification of cargo."

There is no reference to the position of Ro/Ro cargo planner in either collective-bargaining agreement. We find that this factor favors neither group of employees.

4. Area and industry practice

The Employer's vice president of industrial relations testified that one other company in Puerto Rico has Ro/Ro operations, but that all Ro/Ro duties for that company are performed by employees represented by the Teamsters. He also testified that in the Employer's other Ro/Ro operations in the United States, Local 1575-represented employees perform cargo-planning duties.

Local 402 presented the Puerto Rico Minimum Wage Board definitions for office and clerical employees that are used in the Puerto Rico transportation industry. Local 402 argues that cargo planning is encompassed in these definitions. Based on the limited evidence the parties have presented regarding area and industry practice, we find that these factors are inconclusive and do not favor an award of the disputed work to either group of employees.

Conclusions

After considering all the relevant factors, we conclude that employees represented by Local 1575 are entitled to perform the work in dispute. We reach this conclusion by relying on the Employer's past practice and preference, and skills and efficiency of operations. In making this determination, we are awarding the work to employees represented by Local 1575, not to that Union or its members. The determination is limited to the controversy that gave rise to this proceeding.

DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

The National Labor Relations Board makes the following Determination of Dispute.

Employees of Puerto Rico Marine Management, Inc. represented by Local 1575, International Longshoremen's Association, AFL-CIO are entitled to perform the Roll-on/Roll-off cargo-planning work at the Employer's facilities in Puerto Rico. The work involves registering the location of the trailer on a cargo plan form; by including the prefix number, origin, destination, weight, equipment type, and measurement of the trailer; breaking down the complete inventory by equipment, ports, and weight distribution by decks; and making 10 photostat cargo plan copies for distribution.

July 27, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On August 19, 1983, Administrative Law Judge Roger B. Holmes issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Charging Party filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings,[1] findings, and conclusions as modified and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.

The facts are set out more fully in the judge's decision. Briefly, the judge found that since 1955 the Respondent, a general building contractor, has had various collective-bargaining agreements with the Laborers Union, and has employed members of the Laborers Union since that time. On December 30, 1980, the Respondent signed a collective-bargaining agreement entitled "Laborers' Short-Form Agreement" with the Union.[2] The agreement was effective July 1, 1980–June 15, 1983, with annual renewals thereafter unless notice was given by a party as provided for in the contract.

On April 14, 1982, the Respondent sent two mailgrams to the Union, each of which stated that the Respondent was terminating and/or repudiating any agreement existing between it and the Union. On June 17, 1982, Mike Sullivan and Associates, Inc., a management consulting firm, sent a letter on behalf of the Respondent to the Union. The letter stated, inter alia, that Mike Sullivan and Associates was the exclusive bargaining representative for the Respondent; that the short-form agreement between the Respondent and the Union was an 8(f) agreement; and that from June 17 forward, the Respondent was implementing unilateral changes in the contract, i.e., it would no longer abide by the union hiring hall provision or the mandatory union membership requirements. Commencing about June 1982, the Respondent, without prior notification to or bargaining with the Union, failed to make accurate reports and required contributions to certain pension, health and welfare, and other trust funds as required by the contract; failed to comply with the contractual hiring hall provisions; and failed to adhere to the union-security provisions. After June 1982, the Respondent made contributions only to the Union's pension trust fund. The Respondent placed health and welfare coverage for its employees with a private company.

Analyzing the evidence pursuant to the then-applicable "conversion" doctrine, the judge found that the parties' bargaining relationship "ripened" in July 1979 from a prehire relationship into an 9(a) relationship and, therefore, since July 1979 the Union was the exclusive representative under Section 9(a) of the Act of the unit of laborers employed by the Respondent.[3] Accordingly, the judge found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by repudiating the collective-bargaining agreement between it and the Union and by making unilateral changes in wages, hours, and working conditions of unit employees.

In John Deklewa & Sons, 282 NLRB 1375 (1987), the Board overruled R. J. Smith Construction Co., 191 NLRB 693 (1971), enf. denied sub nom. Operating Engineers Local 150 v. NLRB, 480 F.2d 1186 (D.C. Cir. 1973), abandoned the conversion doctrine, and modified unit scope rules in 8(f) cases. As set forth more fully in Deklewa, supra at 1377–1378, the Board decided to apply the following principles in 8(f) cases:

> (1) a collective-bargaining agreement permitted by Section 8(f) shall be enforceable through the mechanisms of Section 8(a)(5) and Section 8(b)(3); (2) such agreements will not bar the processing of valid petitions filed pursuant to Section 9(c) and Section 9(e); (3) in processing such petitions, the appropriate unit normally will be the single employer's employees covered by the agreement; and (4) upon the expiration of such agreements, the signatory union will enjoy no presumption of majority status, and either party may repudiate the 8(f) bargaining relationship.

The Board also noted, at footnote 41 of Deklewa, that it will require the party asserting the existence of an 9(a) relationship to prove it.

Under Deklewa, we find that the General Counsel, although asserting that the Respondent is

[1] The Charging Party contends that the Respondent's exceptions fail to comply with Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, and therefore should be disregarded. We find no merit in the Charging Party's contention, and accordingly deny it.

[2] The Respondent previously had timely withdrawn bargaining authority from the Associated General Contractors of California, Inc., a multiemployer association.

[3] No exceptions were filed to the judge's finding that the parties' bargaining relationship prior to July 1979 was pursuant to Sec. 8(f) of the Act.

bound to recognize the Union under Section 9(a), has failed to establish that the relationship between the Respondent and the Union is anything other than a relationship governed by Section 8(f) of the Act. Thus, as the evidence shows that the Respondent is engaged in the construction industry and that it entered into its contractual relationship with the Union at a time when the Union's majority status had not been established, we find that the relationship between the Respondent and the Union is governed by Section 8(f) of the Act.

Further, applying Deklewa, we agree with the judge's conclusion that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act on June 17, 1982, when it repudiated the 1980–1983 contract between it and the Union, and implemented unilateral changes in the terms and conditions of employment of the unit employees. We note, however, that under Deklewa the Union enjoyed no presumption of majority status following the expiration of the 1980–1983 contract, and therefore the Respondent was free to repudiate the contract upon its expiration.[4] We shall limit the make-whole remedy accordingly.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Charging Party is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The following constitutes an appropriate unit for the purpose of collective bargaining under the Act:

> All laborer employees including craft foremen, employed by the Respondent within the work jurisdiction of the Charging Party union, in the area known as Southern California, and more particularly described as the counties of Los Angeles, Inyo, Mono, Orange, Riverside, San Bernardino, Imperial, Ventura, Santa Barbara, San Luis Obispo and Kern, and the offshore islands of Richardson Rock, Santa Cruz Island, Arch Rock, San Nicholas Island, Santa Catalina Island, San Clemente Island, San Miguel Island, Santa Rosa Island, Anacapa Island, Santa Barbara Island, and all offshore man-made islands and drilling platforms in the aforementioned counties and offshore waters, excluding all non-laborer employees, executives, civil engineers, superintendents, assistant superintendents, master mechanics, timekeepers, messenger boys, office workers, or any other employees above the rank of craft foremen.

4. By repudiating its 1980–1983 collective-bargaining agreement with the Union and making unilateral changes in the terms and conditions of that agreement, including failing to make accurate reports and required contributions to certain pension, health and welfare, and other trust funds as required by the agreement; failing to comply with the contractual hiring hall provisions; and failing to adhere to the union-security provisions of the collective-bargaining agreement, the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

5. The unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, we shall order it to cease and desist and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. We shall order the Respondent to comply with the terms of its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union from June 17, 1982, through the expiration of the agreement on June 15, 1983.[5] We also shall order the Respondent to make the unit employees whole as prescribed in Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 682 (1970), for any losses they may have suffered as a result of the Respondent's failure to comply with the 1980–1983 contract, with interest as computed in the manner prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded.[6]

In accordance with Deklewa, supra, this make-whole remedy does not extend beyond the expiration date of the July 1, 1980–June 15, 1983 contract. The question of whether interest must be paid on trust fund contributions shall be left to the compliance stage of the proceeding. Merryweather Optical Co., 240 NLRB 1213 (1979).[7]

[5] In view of the Respondent's timely withdrawal of bargaining authority from the multiemployer association, the Respondent is not bound to any changes in the 1980–1983 Master Labor Agreement negotiated after its withdrawal.

[6] In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621) shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

[7] Whether there are any individuals entitled to be made whole because they were denied an opportunity to work because of the Respondent's unlawful failure to continue using a contractual hiring hall is best left to the compliance stage of this proceeding. See, e.g., Southwestern Steel, 276 NLRB 1569 fn. 1 (1985), and Wayne Electric, 226 NLRB 409 (1976).

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, W. E. Colglazier, Inc., Cathedral City, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Repudiating the July 1, 1980–June 15, 1983 collective-bargaining agreement between the Respondent and the Union, and making unilateral changes in the terms and conditions of the 1980–1983 collective-bargaining agreement between the Respondent and the Union, including: (1) failing and refusing to make accurate reports and required contributions to certain pension, health and welfare, and other trust funds as required by the collective-bargaining agreement; (2) failing to comply with the contractual hiring hall provisions; and (3) failing to adhere to the union-security provisions of the collective-bargaining agreement.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Make whole its unit employees, in the manner set forth in the remedy, for any losses they may have suffered as a result of the Respondent's failure to adhere to the contract with the Union from June 17, 1982, through June 15, 1983.

(b) Comply with the terms and conditions of the above-described contract from June 17, 1982, through June 15, 1983, including making the contractually required contributions to the trust funds.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of money due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its facility in Cathedral City, California, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[8] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 21, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Sign and return to the Regional Director sufficient copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix" for posting by the Union, if willing, in conspicuous places where notices to employees and members are customarily posted.

(f) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES AND MEMBERS
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT repudiate the collective-bargaining agreement between our company and Southern California District Council of Laborers, Laborers' International Union of North America, AFL–CIO during the term of that agreement.

WE WILL NOT make unilateral changes in the terms and conditions of the collective-bargaining agreement between our company and the Union, until the June 15, 1983 expiration date, by: (1) failing and refusing to make accurate reports and required contributions to certain pension, health and welfare, and other trust funds as required by the collective-bargaining agreement; (2) failing to comply with the contractual hiring hall provisions; and (3) failing to adhere to the union-security provisions of the collective-bargaining agreement.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL make whole, with interest, the unit employees who have incurred losses of wages and benefits because of our failure to abide by the terms and conditions of the collective-bargaining agreement between our company and the Union, until the agreement's expiration on June 15, 1983, and WE WILL pay the contractually agreed-upon trust funds in the amounts of the contributions which were not made on behalf of the unit employees during the term of the contract.

WE WILL honor and apply the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement executed by us and the Union until the agreement's expiration on June 15, 1983.

[8] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

Joel B. Martinez, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Julius Reich, Esq. (Reich, Adell & Crost), of Los Angeles, California, for the Charging Party.
Richard Reincke (Mike Sullivan and Associates), of Covina, California, for the Respondent.

Roger B. Holmes, Administrative Law Judge. The original unfair labor practice charge in this case was filed on June 25, 1982, by Southern California District Council of Laborers, Laborers' International Union of North America, AFL-CIO. The first amended charge was filed on November 1, 1982, by the Union.

The General Counsel's original complaint in this case was issued on November 10, 1982, against W. E. Colglazier. The General Counsel's amended complaint was issued on February 7, 1983, against the Respondent. The General Counsel alleges that the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. In answers filed both to the original complaint and the amended complaint, the Respondent denied that it had engaged in the alleged unfair labor practices.

The trial in this proceeding was held on March 1 and 2, 1983, at Los Angeles, California. The time for the filing of posttrial briefs was set for April 6, 1983.

Findings of Fact

I. JURISDICTION AND LABOR ORGANIZATION

The jurisdiction of the Board over the business operations of the employer is not an issue in this proceeding. The employer is engaged in the business of construction and remodeling, and the employer has a facility located at Cathedral City, California. The employer's business operations meet the Board's indirect inflow jurisdictional standard, as well as the standard for retail business enterprises.

The status of the Charging Party as a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act also is not in issue in this proceeding. Such status was admitted in the pleadings.

II. THE WITNESSES AND CREDIBILITY RESOLUTIONS

Eight persons were called as witnesses to testify at the trial in this proceeding. In alphabetical order by their last names, they are: Louis Bravo, the president and a field representative of the Charging Party; Alfred R. Brune, an estimator for the Respondent; Walter E. Colglazier, the president of the Respondent; Cacimiro Gradilla, an employee of the Respondent and a member of the Charging Party; James Edward Muca, an employee of the Respondent and a member of the Charging Party; Wendy L. Sherwood, a secretary, bookkeeper, and office clerical of the Respondent: Jessie Stinson, a field representative of Laborers Local 1184, which is affiliated with the Charging Party; and Ray Wilson, the business manager of the Charging Party.

In addition to the foregoing persons who gave testimony about the substantive issues in the case, one other person testified briefly. He is Raul G. Cavazos, who is an interpreter, and his testimony only pertained to his own qualifications to render that service.

The findings of fact to be set forth here will be based on portions of the testimony from each one of the eight witnesses who testified about substantive matters at the trail. In determining which portions of the testimony should be a basis for the findings of fact, I have given consideration to the demeanor of the witnesses on the stand. I have also considered the occupations of the various witnesses in the sense that a witness was identified with the interests of one of the parties to the proceeding, and, therefore, may have an interest in the outcome of the litigation. I have also considered whether the record shows a basis for a witness' knowledge concerning the facts about which he testified. For example, Muca several times indicated that he was guessing in attempting to respond to certain questions being put to him. The foregoing observation is not made in the sense of being critical, but rather to indicate that Muca was being candid in replying, at times, that he did not have specific knowledge of the particular subject about which he was being questioned. His testimony shows that he did have knowledge of other matters.

Several questions, which were in the nature of what a hypothetical person would have thought, were asked and what conclusion that person would have reached if that person was to pass by one of the jobsites of the Respondent, and that the person was to observe the employees of the Respondent performing work at the jobsite. I conclude that those questions, in effect, were seeking to ascertain the opinion of the witness based on what work the witness and other employees of the Respondent were performing at that time, and based on how the witness thought those activities would be perceived by a passing observer. (Fed.R.Evid. 701, "Opinion Testimony By Lay Witnesses.") However, after considering the matter, I conclude that other testimony by the witnesses and documentary evidence provides a more reliable basis for the findings of fact instead of the responses to the types of questions described above.

In addition, some of the findings of fact will be based on documentary evidence, stipulations by the parties, and certain facts not in dispute.

III. THE COLLECTIVE-BARGAINING AGREEMENTS

Since 1955 the Respondent has been engaged in business as a general building contractor. Colglazier stated (Tr. 220), "We are general building contractors who do anything in the way of small commercials, small engineering projects, new houses, we will do new commercial buildings, we will remodel commercial banks, and so forth."

Since 1955 the Respondent has had various collective-bargaining agreements with the Laborers Union, and the Respondent has employed members of the Laborers Union since that time (Tr. 215). The Respondent has routinely signed and submitted on a monthly basis such forms as General Counsel's Exhibit 13(a) to the construction laborers trusts. Introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibits 24(a) through (l) were copies of such reports filed by the Respondent during the period from January 1979 through December 1979. Introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibits 14(a) through (l) were copies of such reports filed by the Respondent during the period January 1980 through December 1980. Introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibits 15(a) through (l) were copies of such reports filed by the Respondent during the period from January 1981 through December 1981. Introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibits 16(a) through (l) were copies of such reports filed by the Respondent for the period from January 1982 through December 1982.

The report forms provide for contributions by an employer on behalf of his employees for the following funds: vacation/dues, pension, training and retraining, health and welfare, and industry. Through June 1982, the Respondent made contributions in each of those categories of trust funds. (See G.C. Exh. 16(f) for June 1982.) Thereafter, the Respondent made contributions on behalf of his employees, who were members of the Charging Party Union, to the pension trust only (G.C. Exhs. 16 (g) through (l). According to Colglazier, he placed health and welfare coverage for his employees with a private company, and all of his employees were placed under the same plan.

Since 1955 the Respondent also has been signatory to collective-bargaining agreements with the Carpenters Union, and the Respondent has been making contributions on behalf of his employees, who are members of the Carpenters Union, to the Carpenters' trust funds.

Introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibit 2 was a copy of a collective-bargaining agreement, which indicates that it was signed on February 3, 1964, by the Charging Party Union and the Respondent. The effective dates provided for in the agreement were May 1, 1962 to May 1, 1967, with annual renewals thereafter unless notice was given by a party as provided for in the contract.

Introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibit 3 was a copy of a collective-bargaining agreement entitled "Laborers' Short-Form Agreement," which indicates that it was signed on October 1, 1971, by the Charging Party and the Respondent. The effective dates provided for in the agreement were from May 1, 1970 to June 15, 1974, with annual renewals thereafter unless notice was given by a party as provided for in the contract.

Introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibit 4 was a copy of a collective-bargaining agreement entitled "Southern California Master Labor Agreement," which indicates that the agreement was between the Charging Party and four employer associations on behalf of the employer members of those associations. The names of the employer associations are: The Associated General Contractors of California, Inc.; the Building Industry Association of California, Inc.; the Engineering Contractors' Association, Inc.; and the Southern California Contractors' Association. The effective dates provided for in the agreement were from July 1, 1977 to June 15, 1980, with annual renewals thereafter unless notice was given by a party as provided for in the contract.

Introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibit 6 was a copy of a letter dated February 13, 1979, from the Associated General Contractors of California, Inc. AGC, addressed to "Holders of Regular and Specialty List of Members." The document lists the names of the members of that employer association who were covered by the terms of the Southern California master labor agreement with certain craft unions—one of which was the Laborers. The Respondent's name is one of the employers listed on the attachment to the AGC letter. At the trial, Colglazier acknowledged that the Respondent had been at one time a member of the AGC and had authorized it to bargain with labor organizations on behalf of the Respondent.

Introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibit 7 was a copy of a letter dated January 22, 1980, from the AGC to "Holders of Regular and Specialty List of Members." The document lists certain changes in the information contained in General Counsel's Exhibit 6. Among the changes is the deletion of the Respondent as a member.

Introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibit 5 was a copy of a collective-bargaining agreement entitled "Laborers' Short-Form Agreement," which indicates that it was signed on December 30, 1980, by the Charging Party and the Respondent. At the trial, Colglazier did not recall the exact date in December 1980 on which he signed the collective-bargaining agreement with the Union. He recalled that he received the document in the mail, signed it, mailed it back to the Charging Party, and subsequently received a signed copy from the Union. The effective dates provided for in the agreement were from July 1, 1980 to June 15, 1983, with annual renewals thereafter unless notice was given by a party as provided for in the contract.

The parties stipulated at the trial that the same language that appears in article IX on page 128 of General Counsel's Exhibit 4 also appears in the 1980–1983 master labor agreement (142–145). Article IX stated:

> Existing and Other Agreements
> A. No contractor, party hereto, shall be required to pay higher wages or be subject to less favorable working conditions than those applicable to other Contractors employing workmen covered by the terms of this Agreement, performing similar work in the area covered by this agreement, with the exception as set forth in Paragraph B below.
> B. It is understood by the contractors and the Union that there may be other Agreements pertaining to the rental and use of construction equipment and that the contractors signatory to this Agreement may also be signatory to agreements between other organizations with the Union.
> C. This Agreement shall be deemed to be executed when the parties signing shall have affixed their signatures hereto. Before accepting as an affiliate or issuing a charter to a local Union in the area herein defined, the Union shall require as a condition of such affiliation that said local Union be bound by the terms hereof.

During the examination of Union Business Manager Wilson by the representative of the Respondent at the trial, the following took place (Tr. 141 and 142):

> Q. How many different types of contracts are there in the construction industry for the Laborers?
> A. The type that Mr. Colglazier signed, there are only two. There is a Master Labor Agreement, and there is a so-called Short-Form Agreement which he signed.
> Q. Is it possible for a contractor to negotiate directly with the Southern california District Council of Laborers and come up with any agreement other than the Short-Form Agreement or the Master Labor Agreement?
> A. If he is willing to negotiate with the intent and purpose of concluding an agreement, yes.
> Q. Has that ever happened, to your knowledge?
> A. Sometimes.
> Q. Can you give us any specific examples?
> A. I cannot. I don't recollect any names. Sometimes there are contractors that are willing to even pay more than the economic package in the Master Labor Agreement and the so-called Short-Form. And on [that] basis we certainly are willing to accept their generous offers.

IV. THE EMPLOYEES OF THE RESPONDENT

The parties entered into stipulations regarding the names of Respondent's employees employed as of March 1, 1983. None of these employees had any break in service during his employment. The parties stipulated concerning the date of hire of the employee, the rate of pay of the employee at that time, and the union affiliation of the employee (Tr. 9–12, 154). Those employees are:

Name	Date of Hire	Rate of Pay	Affiliation
1. H. H. Tuchfarber	1955	$21.79	Carpenter
2. Richard Krings	Dec. 1976	19.79	Carpenter
3. Jack Acord	Mar. 1980	18.29	Carpenter
4. Oclate Brownlee	June 1977	18.29	Carpenter
5. W. J. Mulvihill	June 1977	18.29	Carpenter
6. Kenny Trask	June 1980	18.29	Carpenter
7. Cacimiro Gradilla	July 1979	14.52	Laborer
8. James Muca	Aug. 1979	14.52	Laborer
9. Al Brune	Oct. 1973	14.52	Laborer

Two other persons are retired employees. They are Douglas Roberts, who had worked for the Respondent for about 5 or 6 years, and who retired on October 1, 1980, and Nelson Nickerson, who had worked for the Respondent for several years, and who retired on July 1, 1982. Roberts' affiliation was with the Laborers union, and Nickerson's affiliation was with the Carpenters union.

Introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibits 12(a) through (d) were copies of computer printouts of the Union's membership records regarding Roberts, Brune, Gradilla, and Muca. General Counsel's Exhibit 12(a) reveals Roberts' union initiation date was April 30, 1970, and that his union membership dues were paid through May 19, 1982. General Counsel's Exhibit 12(b) reveals that Brune's union initiation date was November 29, 1979, and that his union membership dues were paid through July 12, 1982. General Counsel's Exhibit 12(c) reveals that Gradilla's union initiation date was March 30, 1979, and that his union membership dues were paid through May 20, 1982. General Counsel's Exhibit 12(d) reveals that Muca's union initiation date was August 30, 1979, and that his union membership dues were paid throught May 14, 1982.

The parties stipulated that Brune is primarily a managerial employee of the Respondent who does estimating work for the employer. On occasion, Brune works at jobsites (Tr. 225). Concerning Brune's being a member of the Charging Party Union, Colglazier explained (Tr. 221), "At the time that I personally enrolled him in the Union to maintain benefits, I was not able to get anything for one or two people. And also for his retirement benefit." At the same time, Colglazier also enrolled Nancy Larson as a member of the Laborers Union. Larson works as a secretary in the Respondent's office. The parties stipulated that Larson is an office clerical employee (Tr.225).

Union Field Representative Stinson said that he and Representative Don Sanders were the ones who were responsible for servicing the employees of the Respondent. Stinson said he had visited the Respondent's jobsites "probably three or four times" over the last 4 or 5 years (Tr. 102). He said that no employees of the Respondent had come to him with any grievances against the Respondent. He acknowledged that he had not told Muca, Gradilla, Roberts, Brune, or any other employee of the Respondent what their duties were as a laborer. In Stinson's view, it was the employer's responsibility to see to it that his employees who were Laborers Union members performed laborers' work. Stinson also acknowledged that it was possible for someone to be a member of the Laborers' union and not perform laborers' work. Stinson said that the Charging Party held meetings on a monthly basis. Muca said at the trial that he had never been to a union meeting, that he did not know who his union representatives were, and that no one had ever explained to him what a laborers' duties were under the collective-bargaining agreement. Gradilla said that he had not seen a union business representative at a jobsite of the Respondent while he was working on that jobsite.

When he began working for the Respondent in July 1979, Gradilla worked with Douglas Roberts. At that time, Roberts and Gradilla were the only two laborers employed by the Respondent. According to Gradilla, the employer also had two carpenters and two forklift drivers when he began his employment.

Muca began working for the Respondent in August 1979. Thus, at that time, the Respondent had three laborers. Muca, who had not been a union member prior to his employment by the Respondent, explained the circumstances of his hiring by the Respondent (Tr. 156). "I called Walt Colglazier and asked him if he could use anyone. I specified laborer. He told me he wasn't hiring unless I was in the union, and he directed me to the union hall to get a card." Muca then went to the union hall, paid an initiation fee and union dues, and received a union card. Muca took his union card on a Thursday or Friday to Harry Tuchfarber. The following Monday Muca went to work for the Respondent, and since that time has remained a member of the Union.

According to both Gradilla and Muca, Tuchfarber is the one who tells them what work is to be done each day. Gradilla and Muca go to the jobsite in a company truck driven by Muca, because Gradilla does not have a license to drive the truck. The carpenters employed by the Respondent use their own automobiles to drive to the jobsite.

According to Gradilla, he and Muca work together as a team. He stated (Tr. 125), "Most of the time we work together, Jim Muca and I. He fills out the card because we do most of the things." Another reason for Muca's filling out Gradilla's timecard, as well as his own, is that Muca is able to write the English language. As Gradilla explained (Tr. 133), "It is easier to me because he knows how to write English." Muca estimated that he and Gradilla work alongside each other 90 percent of the time, while Gradilla placed his estimate at "ninety-seven percent of all the time" (Tr.135). Muca also stated (Tr. 126), "Most of the time we have to go . . . do cleaning work." concerning what they did when Gradilla and Muca reached the jobsite in the company truck, Gradilla said (Tr. 127), "If it is going to be cleaned, then we clean it. If you are going to pull down the wall, then to start pulling down the wall." The debris is put on a 1-ton dumptruck, and it is driven by Muca to the dump. On one or two occasions, Gradilla has accompanied Muca to the dump.

On the Company's truck, the following tools are kept: shovels, brooms, rake, water hose, a few stakes, hammers, and sledgehammers. All of those tools belong to the Respondent, except that Muca and Gradilla each owns a shovel. Sometimes they used power tools. Muca described these power tools as a cement saw, a wet-and-dry vacuum, drills to drill holes in cement, chipping hammers, large jackhammers, and air compressors. In the course of his employment with the Respondent, Muca also has used a square and a level. Muca also recalled one occasion when he attempted to take apart a compressor and take it in for repairs, and he recalled one occasion when he drove a skip loader. Gradilla recalled using a trowel to level cement and a hammer to remove nails when he was taking forms apart at a jobsite.

On some occasions, Muca and Gradilla have been the only employees of the Respondent at a jobsite that day, but on the average, there are two or three carpenters at the jobsite. Muca acknowledged that he had received no special training for the performance of the work that he did for the Respondent. He estimated that 50 percent of the work involved cleanup duties, and that 40 percent of the work involved demolition such as tearing down brick walls and wood walls. When demolition work was being performed, Muca said that many times he worked alongside carpenters who were doing the same type of work. Regarding the carpenters performing demolition work, Muca said (Tr. 170), "If we are at a point on a particular job where a carpenter, rather than just to stand around doing nothing, he will join us and help us tear down a wall."

Sometimes carpenters have asked Muca to hold drywall in place while the carpenters nailed it. Muca said that he had never refused to do so. Gradilla also recalled that he helped carpenters put up a wall. Muca said that he had helped repair roofs, and that normally a carpenter worked with him when that was done. A few times, Muca helped the carpenters hang doors. He has unloaded lumber from the truck for the carpenters, and if necessary, the carpenters have helped with the unloading of the lumber. On more than one occasion, Muca has helped the carpenters to put up a fence. On one occasion, Muca put up forms for concrete and the carpenters helped him. He also recalled putting in a skylight, and that he worked with carpenters in doing so. He further recalled sanding with a power sander, which job he said carpenters had done, and he removed acoustical ceilings, which carpenters had done. According to Muca, it was not unusual for the carpenters to grind concrete, which is a job Muca has done. He has also observed carpenters picking things up and sweeping up with a broom.

According to office employee Sherwood, the Respondent's employees in some cases have performed a small amount of plaster, concrete, and roof patching. She said that the Respondent subcontracts the following types of work: electrical, plumbing, large concrete pouring, roofing, air conditioning, sheet metal, structural steel, and glazing.

Introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibits 20(a) through (j) were copies of the timecards for employees of the Respondent for the week ending November 28, 1981. Those employees are: Trask, Tuchfarber, Krings, Law, Acord, Brownley, Gradilla, Nickerson, Muca, and Mulvihill. Among other things, the timecards contain notations regarding the work performed by those employees during that particular time period.

Introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibits 17 and 18 were copies of the timecards for the week ending May 1, 1982, for Muca and Gradilla, respectively. According to Muca, the notations regarding the types of work shown on the timecards are typical of the work done by both Muca and Gradilla (Tr. 202). The notations on their timecards are similar. The notation "clean up" appears several times. Other notations include "clean up roof," "grading," "remove lumber, take to shop," "Worked with carpenters on sky light," "remove forms," "grading as needed," "remove material not being used, and "trip to dump."

Introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibits 19(a) through (g) were copies of the timecards for the other employees of the Respondent for the time period ending May 1, 1982. Those employees are: Brune, Trask, Mulvihill, Brownlee, Acord, Tuchfarber, and Krings.

Introduced into evidence as Respondent's Exhibit 1 were photostatic copies of certain "lien waiver" forms maintained in the business records of the respondent. Sherwood is the person who selected the documents that she described as " a random sample of jobs that our company has performed." (Tr. 302). She considered a $10,000 or $15,000 job to be "a big job," and she made her selection from that category in an effort she believed would comply with a pretrial subpoena.

Brune, who has been in charge of the billing of customers for the Respondent's for approximately 9 years, indicated that it was the Company's practice to include such "lien waiver" forms with the customer's bills. The "lien waiver" forms show the name of the customer, the date, printed items of "supervision" and "carpentry," the number of hours billed, the hourly rate of pay, the amount paid, the name of the person, and the total amount billed. Sometimes there are notations written in; example, "11-24 Remove walls & cleanup 7-1/2 hours." (See the first page of R. Exh. 1 for the Security Bank at Palm Desert for Nov. 28, 1981, opposite Acord's name.)

According to Brune, the "lien waiver" forms are prepared on a weekly basis based on information contained on the employees' timecards. That does not necessarily mean that the information on the timecard is copied verbatim on the "lien waiver" form. For example, on one timecard there was a notation of "removed walls," whereas the "lien waiver" form stated "demolition" (Tr. 276-279). Also, the "lien waiver" forms show the hours billed to the customer on a standard hourly basis, rather than an overtime basis. For example, 5 hours of overtime work shown on an employee's timecard would be recomputed to show 7-1/2 hours at a standard hourly rate on the "lien waiver" form (Tr. 280). The "lien waiver" forms are signed by the Respondent's employees underneath their printed names at the time the employees receive their paychecks from the Company.

V. THE EVENTS IN APRIL, JUNE, AND JULY 1982

Introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibits 8(a) and (b) were copies of two mailgrams addressed to the Charging Party and dated April 14, 1982. General Counsel's Exhibit 8(a) indicates that it is from W. E. Colglazier, and General Counsel's Exhibit 8(b) indicates that it is from W. E. Colglazier and W. E. Colglazier, Inc. The text of General Counsel's Exhibit 8(a) is: "This is to notify you that we hereby terminate and/or repudiate any agreement that may exist between your union and W. E. Colglazier." General Counsel's Exhibit 8(b) is similarly worded except that "W. E. Colglazier, Incorporated appears in place of "W. E. Colglazier." The documents were received in the Charging Party union's office (Tr. 46-49).

Introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibit 9 was a copy of a letter dated June 17, 1982, and addressed to the Charging Party from Richard Reincke of Mike Sullivan & Associates, Inc., on behalf of the Respondent. The text of the letter states:

> Be advised that Mike Sullivan & Associates, Inc. is the exclusive collective-bargaining representative for W. E. Colglazier, Inc. in all labor-related matters including contract enforcement and negotiations. Please direct all future correspondence regarding that company to our office in Covina. An authorization letter naming Mike Sullivan & Associates, Inc. as the exclusive collective-bargaining agent for W. E. Colglazier is enclosed for your convenience.
> After reviewing the conditions under which your contract was signed and the actual scope of work of the employees of Colglazier, we feel that the short-form agreement which Colglazier signed is an 8(f) agreement under the National Labor Relations Act.
> In accordance with the Ninth Circuit Court's interpretation of Section 8(f) Todd v. McNeff (Feb. 8, 1982), we hereby serve notice that W. E. Colglazier, Inc. will make unilateral changes in the collective bargaining agreement from this date forward as circumstances dictate. At this time, Colglazier intends to continue to pay into the Laborers Trust Funds for some of its employees. However, Colglazier will not abide by the union hiring hall provisions or the mandatory union membership requirements.
> If it is your position that the 8(f) agreement has matured into a full and complete collective bargaining relationship under either Section 9(a) or 9(c) of the Act, please provide all documentation which would substantiate that claim, including copies of all contracts, interim agreements, authorization cards, and the names of all employees of Colglazier whom you claim to represent.
> If it is determined that you are the authorized representative of some of our employees, it would be prudent for us to meet for the purpose of clarifying the unit of employees which you claim to represent. At this time, most of our employees do a wide variety of tasks which cannot be clearly delineated under the usual AFL-CIO jurisdictional agreements.
> Further, after we have mutually agreed upon the appropriate collective bargaining unit (or after this has been clarified by the National Labor Relations Board) we would expect to negotiate with you on all mandatory areas of collective bargaining. We would negotiate regarding the terms and conditions of employment of our employees only, and would expect that you would be free to negotiate for those employees and those employees only. We would expect to negotiate a contract dealing with the particular work duties and demands of our employees; we do not expect to negotiate amendments to an existing multi-employer/multi-employee contract negotiated by other parties.
> Thank you for anticipated co-operation in these matters. Please respond immediately so that we may make arrangements to inspect documentation, negotiate terms and conditions of employment, or clarify the appropriate unit of employees and the status of any collective bargaining agreement which your union may have with W. E. Colglazier, Inc.

Introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibit 10 was copy of a letter dated July 2, 1982, and addressed to the Charging Party from Reincke. The text of that letter states:

Please be advised that Mike Sullivan & Associates is the exclusive collective bargaining representative for W. E. Colglazier, Inc. in all labor-related matters, including contract negotiations and enforcement.

Recently, the Associated General Contractors received notice from the various building and construction trades unions that those Unions desired, as per the terms and conditions of Article V, Section 506 of the Master Labor Agreement, to renegotiate that Article and Sections thereof commonly known in toto as the "restrictive subcontracting language."

On or about December 30, 1980, Mr. Ray Wilson signed the Laborers Short-Form Agreement with W. E. Colglazier, Inc.; you allege that said Agreement bound Colglazier, by reference, to substitute provisions reached between the parties to the master Labor Agreement should those parties renegotiate the restrictive subcontracting provisions.

While it is still our position that any contract which Colglazier signed with your union falls under Section 8(f) of the National Labor Relations Act and that any such contract is currently unenforceable (having been repudiated), it is prudent for us to take all appropriate actions to protect the interests of Colglazier, as it is possible that the National Labor Relations Board or the courts could find, at some future date, that a valid and enforceable contract exists.

We have been advised that the Associated General Contractors intends to enter into renegotiations of the subcontracting provisions. However, as Colglazier is not a member of any employer association, but is rather an independent party to the Master Labor Agreement if he is a party to said Master Labor Agreement at all, Colglazier intends to renegotiate said provisions independently of the AGC or any other employer association. We shall act as Colglazier's agent in the renegotiations.

Should you desire to renegotiate the provisions in question, this letter will constitute the fifteen (15) days' notice of our desire to renegotiate. If you take the position that the parties signatory to the Master Labor Agreement will renegotiate those provisions and the renegotiated provisions will then be substituted and incorporated into the Short-Form Agreement, then this letter will serve as a formal request for a written copy of the Master Labor Agreement, as parts of that Agreement are included in the Short-Form Agreement which you allege is a valid Agreement Between Colglazier and your union.

Further, by copy of this letter to the Associated General Contractors, we hereby notify all involved and/or interested parties that Colglazier will not be bound by the renegotiations of any contractor association or other third party, but will renegotiate independently any and all contract modifications,. additions or deletions.

We also request a copy of the notification letter sent by the building trades unions to the Associated General Contractors, as said letter and its ramifications may have a tremendous impact upon any contract which may exist between Colglazier and any labor organization, including but not limited to the Laborers Union and all affiliated locals.

Should you have any questions regarding the above, please don't hesitate to contact me at our offices in Covina.

Thank you for your anticipated co-operation in this matter.

Introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibit 11 was a copy of a letter dated July 13, 1982, and addressed to Reincke from Attorney Julius Reich of Reich, Adell & Crost, who represent the Charging Party in this proceeding. The letter was received by Reincke (Tr. 27). The text of that letter states:

> Your letter of July 2, 1982 concerning the subcontractor clause of the collective bargaining agreement between W. E. Colglazier, Inc. and the Southern California District Counsel of Laborers has been referred to this firm for reply.
> At such time as you acknowledge that Colglazier is obligated to recognize the District Council and is party to an agreement with the District Council, we shall respond to your letter.

VI. CONCLUSIONS

In paragraphs 12(a) and 13(a), (b), and (c) of his complaint, The General Counsel sets forth certain allegation, which the General Counsel alleges to be refusals to bargain by the Respondent in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. The factual allegations of paragraph 12(a) of the General Counsel's complaint were admitted in the pleadings, whereas the allegations of paragraphs 13(a), (b), and (c) were denied. The allegations in question are:

> 12. (a) By letter dated June 17, 1982, Respondent gave written notice to the Union of its repudiation of the Short-Form Agreement, of its intent to implement unilateral changes, to include Respondent's making trust fund contributions for some of its employees, and its discontinuing to abide by the hiring hall and union security provisions.
> . . . .
> 13. Commencing in or about June, 1982, and continuing to date, Respondent, without prior notification to or bargaining with the Union, changed the terms and conditions of employment of the employees in the unit described in paragraph 6 above, by:
> (a) Failing and refusing to make accurate reports and required contributions to certain pension, health and welfare, and other trust funds established pursuant to Section 302 of the Act, as required by the provisions of the 1980 MLA [Master Labor Agreement];
> (b) Failing to comply with the Union's hiring hall provisions; and
> (c) Failing to adhere to the union security provisions.

A crucial issue in the case is whether the contract between the Respondent and the Charging Party union was a prehire collective-bargaining agreement of the type that is permissible under Section 8(f) of the Act. To resolve that issue, it is necessary to ascertain whether the Charging Party Union ever achieved majority status among the Respondent's employees in an appropriate, permanent, and stable unit. In Giordano Contruction Co., 256 NLRB 47 (1981), the Board held:

> It is well established that a union, originally recognized under Section 8(f), can achieve Section 9(a) status in one of two ways. The first means is for the union to demonstrate that it has achieved majority status "among employees who make up a permanent and stable work force of the employer." Precision Stripping, Inc., 245 NLRB 169 (1979). Where a permanent and stable work force is not employed by the employer, however, the union can attain Section 9(a) status only by demonstrating majority status of the employees employed at a particular jobsite. Davis Industries, Inc.; Stag Construction, Inc.; and Add Miles, Inc., 232 NLRB 946 (1977); see, generally, Hageman Underground Construction, et al., 253 NLRB 60 (1980).

Without repeating here all of the findings of fact set forth above in section IV, I conclude from those facts that the Respondent has employed a permanent and stable work force. The findings show that the employees of the Respondent at the time of the trial had worked for various numbers of years for the employer. Thus, the situation presented here is unlike the situation where employees are employed to work, for example, just at one jobsite and are then laid off. In its decision in Construction Erectors, Inc., 265 NLRB 786, 787 (1982), the Board held that:

> At the outset, we believe it is important to emphasize that the determination of whether a work force is "permanent and stable" is more than a mechanical exercise in tabulating the makeup, longevity, and fluctuation of a group of employees. For in making the determination, the Board ultimately is deciding whether the work force is of such a nature that a showing of majority support made at a particular point in time reasonably can be said to have significance at a subsequent time. In this regard, we do not require a showing that the work force is a static group of employees who work for a long period of time with no fluctuation in the overall unit. Indeed, in view of the special nature of the construction industry [fn. omitted], such a requirement would virtually eliminate the possibility of finding a construction industry work force that is "permanent and stable." In fact, a literal reading of "permanent and stable" would not even be workable in traditional Section 9(a) relationships where unit fluctuation and employee turnover are recognized as industrial facts of life. In short, our analysis in cases of this nature must go beyond the calculation of numbers and dates and focus upon the issue of whether the employee complement possesses sufficient continuity as to merit continued reliance on showing of majority support for the union made at any point during the relevant period [fn. omitted].

With the Board's holding in mind, I conclude, as indicated above, that there was a sufficient continuity in the employer's work force so that there has existed a permanent and stable work force of the Respondent's employees during the times relevant.

Like an employer unit, a plant unit or subdivision a craft unit is one of the types of bargaining units specifically mentioned in Section 9(b) of the Act. The Board has held that a unit of laborers employed by a construction company constituted an appropriate bargaining unit. In R. B. Butler, Inc., 160 NLRB 1595, 1598 (1966), the Board stated: "In the construction industry, the Board has found separate units of craft employees to be appropriate." (fn. omitted.) The Board also stated (at 1599):

> While an overall unit is presumptively appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining, the Act does not compel labor organizations to seek representation in the most comprehensive grouping of employees, but only in an appropriate unit. [11] In the circumstances of this case, the question of the appropriateness of some unit other than the single unit of requested construction laborers is not before us. [12] All we need decide here is whether a separate unit of laborers in the building and construction industry is an appropriate unit for collective bargaining under the Act.

In a representation case where a Laborers local union and Operating engineers local unions had petitioned for two separate units, the Board found the two units to be appropriate notwithstanding the fact that the operators sometimes performed laborers' work. In Dick Kelchner Excavating Co., 236 NLRB 1414 (1978), the Board stated: "The Employer basically contends that because operators spend a substantial amount of time performing as laborers the petitioned-for units are inappropriate and the only appropriate unit would be one including all of the petitioned-for employees in a single unit. We do not agree."

As set forth in the findings of fact in section III, above, there has existed a longtime collective-bargaining relationship between the Respondent and the Charging party Union going all the way back to the year 1955. Such a long history of collective bargaining in a separate unit of the laborers employed by the Respondent is a factor to be considered. Also to be considered is the fact that the Respondent has had a separate collective-bargaining relationship with the Carpenters Union, which covers the carpenters employed by the Respondent, and which collective-bargaining history also goes back to the year 1955. While both Gradilla and Muca have performed a variety of tasks for the employer, the substantial majority of their work falls into the two categories of demolition work and clean-up duties. (See the findings of fact in section IV, above.) They work together as a team, and they work alongside one another between 90 and 97 percent of their working time. As indicated above, the Board has found that a unit of laborers is an appropriate unit of employees in the construction industry, and I reach the same conclusion based on the findings of fact presented here.

Based on the findings of fact set forth in section IV, above, I conclude that at least since July 1979 and thereafter, the Charging Party Union has been the majority representative of the employees who have performed laborers work for the Respondent. At the time that Gradilla commenced his employment with the Respondent in July 1979, there was only one other person performing laborers work for the employer. That person was Roberts. Both Roberts and Gradilla were members of the Charging Party Union, and, thus, the Charging Party Union represented both of the employees in the two-person bargaining unit. In August 1979, Muca commenced his employment with the Respondent as a laborer. Muca also was a member of the Charging Party Union, and, thus, the Charging Party Union represented all three of the employees in the laborers unit. After Roberts retired on October 1, 1980, Gradilla and Muca continued their work as laborers for the Respondent in what has been a two-person unit since that time.

In concluding that the Charging Party Union has enjoyed majority status in the laborers unit since July 1979, I have excluded Brune, who is primarily a managerial employee of the Respondent, and who does estimating work, and I have excluded Larson who is an office clerical employee. Notwithstanding their union membership, their type of work performed for the employer is different from the work performed by Gradilla and Muca.

I also conclude that such facts as Muca's failure to attend monthly union meetings and the infrequent visits of union representatives to the jobsites of the Respondent do not negate the fact that both Gradilla and Muca have been members of the Charging Party Union during the entire time of their employment with the Respondent, and that based on such union membership, the Charging Party Union has enjoyed majority status in the laborers unit.

Having concluded that the Charging Party Union achieved majority status in an appropriate, permanent, and stable unit of laborers employed by the Respondent, I further conclude that the bargaining relationship between the Respondent and the Charging Party Union ripened in July 1979 from a prehire relationship into a 9(a) bargaining relationship, which has continued at all times material. Under those circumstances, the Respondent was not free to repudiate the collective-bargaining agreement between the Respondent and the Union, and it was not free to make unilateral changes in wages, hours and working conditions of employees in that unit. In Hageman Underground Construction, 253 NLRB 60, 63 (1980), the Board held:

> Under the Board law discussed above, from that time forward Respondent was under a statutory duty to recognize the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of the unit employees working at all existing and future jobsites. And, in view of the collective-bargaining agreement in existence, the Union was entitled to an irrebuttable presumption of majority status for the duration of the contract. Accordingly, Respondent was not free to withdraw recognition from the Union or to repudiate the collective-bargaining agreement in midterm. By doing so, we conclude that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

As indicated previously, the allegations of paragraph 12(a) of the General Counsel's complaint were admitted to be true on a factual basis, but denied as being unfair labor practices. I conclude that the factual allegations of paragraph 13 of the General Counsel's complaint are established by the findings of fact. (See sec. V, above, and G.C. Exh. 9. See also sec. III, above, and G.C. Exhs. 13 through 16.) Furthermore, I conclude that a preponderance of the evidence, when considered with the Board decisions noted above, establish that the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) as, alleged in the General Counsel's complaint.

Finally, I have given consideration to the Respondent's contention that the Charging Party Union is unable to bargain in good faith with the Respondent. The Respondent urges, in summary, at page 1 of his posttrial brief: "As a separate affirmative defense, Respondent will prove that the Union cannot negotiate with Respondent in good faith because the Union is bound by a 'Most Favored Nations Clause' in the Master Labor Agreement which restricts its ability to bargain." (See pp. 11–16 of the Respondent's posttrial brief for a fuller expression of Repondent's Position.) In examining article IX of the master labor agreement, which is set forth in section III, above, I conclude that a literal reading of that article does not preclude the Charging Party Union from negotiating contracts containing different terms and conditions wiht other employers. However, the contractors, who are party to the master labor agreement, would not be required "to pay higher wages or be subject to less favorable working conditions" than those to which the Union agreed with other contractors. Nevertheless, even if the above interpretation is found by others to be an untenable interpretation of the contract language, Wilson's testimony shows that the Charging Party Union is willing to negotiate with an employer for a contract that contains different terms than the master labor agreement or the short-form agreement. As Wilson testified, "If he is willing to negotiate with the intent and purpose of concluding an agreement, yes." (See sec. III, above.) In these circumstances, I conclude that the affirmative defense urged by the Respondent does not have merit.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent has been an employer engaged in commerce, at all times material, within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Charging Party Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. At the times material, and more particularly since July 1979, the Charging party Union has been the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All laborer employees including craft foremen, employed by the Respondent within the work jurisdiction of the Charging Party union, in the area known as Southern California, and more particularly decribed as the counties of Los Angeles, Inyo, Mono, Orange, Riverside, San Bernardino, Imperial, Ventura, Santa Barbara, San Luis Obispo and Kern, and the offshore islands of Richardson Rock, Santa Cruz Island, Arch Rock, San Nicholas Island, Santa Catalina Island, San Clemente Island, San Miguel Island, Santa Rosa Island, Anacapa Island, Santa Barbara Island, and all offshore man-made islands and drilling platforms in the aforementioned counties and offshore waters, excluding all non-laborer employees, executives, civil engineers, superintendents, assistant superintendents, master mechanics, timekeepers, messenger boys, office workers, or any other employees above the rank of craft foremen.

4. The Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act in the following manner:

a. Failing and refusing to bargain in good faith with the Charging Party Union by on or about June 17, 1982, repudiating the short-form agreement between the Respondent and the Charging Party Union, and by stating its intent to implement unilateral changes, which included the Respondent's making trust fund contributions for some of its employees, and the Respondent's discontinuing to abide by the hiring hall and union-security provisions of the collective-bargaining agreement.

b. Failing and refusing to bargin in good faith with the Charging Party Union commencing in June 1982, and continuing thereafter, by making unilateral changes in the terms and conditions of the collective-bargaining agreement between the Respondent and the Charging Party Union by: (1) failing and refusing to make accurate reports and required contributions to certain pension, health and welfare, and other trust funds established pursuant to Section 302 of the Act, as required by the provisions of the 1980 master labor agreement; (2) failing to comply with the Charging Party Union's hiring hall provision; and (3) failing to adhere to the union security provisions of sthe collective-bargaining agreement.

5. The unfair labor practices described above affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Because I have found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act, I shall recommend to the Board that the Respondent be ordered to cease and desist from engaging in such unfair labor practices. I shall also recommend to the Board that the Respondent be ordered to take certain affirmative action in order to effectuate the policies of the Act. Such recommendations will be set forth in the recommended Order.

As described in General Counsel's Exhibit 5 in section III of this decision, the effective dates of that short-form agreement were from July 1, 1980 to June 15, 1983, with annual renewals of the agreement thereafter unless notice was given by a party as provided for in the contract. The time specified in the contract was " sixty (60) days prior to June 15, 1983." (See art. IX, on p. 7, of G.C. Exh. 5.) The trial in this proceeding was held on March 1 and 2, 1983, and thus, the trial took place before the 60-day time period. If such notice was given subsequent to the trial, that is a matter which could be more appropriately explored during the compliance stage of this proceeding. At this point, I shall recommend to the Board the usual remedial order in these circumstances, and I shall leave the foregoing question to be explored in the compliance stage.

Pursuant to the Board's decision in Hickmott Foods, 242 NLRB 1357 (1979), I shall recommend to the Board that a narrow worded cease and desist order, as distinguished from a broadly worded one, be imposed in this case.

Printing Methods, Inc. and Graphic Communications International Union 503M. Case 3–CA–13801

July 27, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

By Chairman Stephens and Members Johansen and Babson

Upon a charge filed by the Union May 15, 1987, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint June 25, 1987, against the Company, the Respondent, alleging that it has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act. Although properly served copies of the charge and complaint, the Respondent has failed to file a timely answer.

On October 21, 1987, the General Counsel filed a Motion for Summary Judgment, with exhibits attached. On October 26, 1987, the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice to Show Cause why the motion should not be granted. On October 28, 1987, the Board received a copy of an answer to the complaint, which the Respondent indicates was filed with the Region on October 26, 1987. On November 23, 1987, the Respondent filed a Reply in Opposition to the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Ruling on Motion for Summary Judgment

Section 102.20 of the Board's Rules and Regulations provides that the allegations in the complaint shall be deemed admitted if an answer is not filed within 14 days from the service of the complaint, unless good cause is shown. The complaint states that unless an answer is filed within 14 days of service, "all of the allegations in the complaint shall be deemed to be admitted to be true and shall be so found by the Board." Further, the undisputed allegations in the Motion for Summary Judgment disclose that on July 17, 1987,[1] the Respondent, by its owner, represented to the Region that it had not been served with a copy of the complaint that had issued on June 25. Based on this assertion, the Regional Office served an additional copy of the complaint by certified mail on July 20 on the Respondent. Subsequently, on September 11, counsel for the General Counsel served a third copy of the complaint in person on the Respondent's owner. At that time, the Respondent's owner was told that he had to file an answer and that the 14-day period for such filing had already expired. On September 24, counsel for the General Counsel sent the Respondent's owner a letter, by certified mail, advising him of the necessity for filing an answer and the consequences of failing to do so. On September 29, the Respondent's owner spoke to counsel for the General Counsel by telephone and requested samples of answers to Board complaints. Counsel for the General Counsel then sent, by regular mail, copies of two answers, one of which had been filed by an individual who was not a labor practitioner. As noted, the Respondent did not file an answer until about October 26.

In its reply to the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment, the Respondent contends that its failure to file a timely answer was due to ignorance and excusable neglect, and that it has a meritorious defense to the complaint. Regarding its failure to file a timely answer, the Respondent asserts that its owner, who was not born in this country and who has lived here for many years but speaks with an accent, is unfamiliar with Board proceedings and has never been involved in an unfair labor practice case before; that on several occasions after the complaint issued, the Respondent presented the Board with both a meritorious defense to the complaint and oral statements of its position and, in light of ongoing discussions to resolve this case, thought the oral statements were sufficient; that the Respondent was not represented by an attorney in this matter and, as soon as it retained an attorney, it filed an answer; and, finally, that it believed the Board had no jurisdiction to intercede in a dispute over who would be selected and appointed as a supervisor.[2] As indicated above, however, it is undisputed that the General Counsel repeatedly served copies of the complaint on the Respondent, including one that counsel for the General Counsel personally served on its owner. The complaint indicated the need to file an answer and that all allegations in the complaint were to be deemed to be admitted to be true unless an answer was filed. Further, the General Counsel, in its September 24 letter to the Respondent, expressly noted that "[n]ot withstanding the fact that we have entered into settlement discussions, you are still required to file" an answer and the General Counsel set September 30 as the last date to file an answer. The Respondent has not offered a sufficient explanation for its failure to act until about 4 weeks after the extended deadline for filing a timely answer.[3]

[2] The Respondent claims that the alleged discriminatee is a statutory supervisor.

[3] See Lee & Sons Tree Service, 282 NLRB 905 (1987); and Urban Laboratories, 249 NLRB 867 (1980).

289 NLRB No. 151

Under these circumstances, we find that the Respondent has not shown good cause for its failure to file a timely answer, and we, therefore, decline to accept the answer that the Respondent untimely filed with the Region on October 26.[4]

In the absence of good cause being shown for the failure to file a timely answer, we grant the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment.

On the entire record, the Board makes the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Respondent, a New York corporation, maintains its principal office and place of business in Rochester, New York, where it is engaged in the processing, sale, and distribution of commercial printing and related products. During the year preceding the issuance of the complaint, the Respondent, in the course and conduct of its business operations, sold and shipped from its Rochester facility products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly to other enterprises located within the State of New York, including Kodak and Xerox, which enterprises are directly engaged in interstate commerce. We find that the Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

About May 11 the Respondent, by its owner, interrogated employees regarding their own or other employees' union activities, sympathies, or desires. About May 18 the Respondent, by its plant manager, threatened to discharge an employee because of his union activities, sympathies, or desires. We find that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by this conduct.

About May 11 the Respondent terminated John Van Niel. About May 18 the Respondent reemployed Van Niel in a different position at lower pay. Since about May 18, the Respondent has imposed more difficult and onerous working conditions on Van Niel. The Respondent engaged in such discrimination against Van Niel because he joined, supported, or assisted the Union and engaged in concerted activity for the purposes of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, and in order to discourage employees from engaging in such activities or other concerted activities for the purposes of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection. We find that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by this treatment of Van Niel.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. By interrogating employees regarding their own or other employees' union activities, sympathies, or desires, and by threatening to discharge employees because of their union activities, sympathies, or desires, the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. By terminating John Van Niel, by reemploying him in a different position at lower pay, and by imposing more difficult and onerous working conditions on him because he joined, supported, or assisted the Union and engaged in concerted activity for the purposes of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, we shall order it to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that the Respondent unlawfully discharged employee John Van Niel and then reemployed him in a different position at lower pay, we shall order it to offer him immediate and full reinstatement to his former position or, if this position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and to make him whole for any loss of earnings he may have suffered as a result of the Respondent's unlawful conduct. Backpay shall be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest thereon to be computed in the manner prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987).[5]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Printing Methods, Inc., Rochester, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

---

[4] We therefore do not reach the Respondent's contention that it has a meritorious defense.

[5] The General Counsel requests that, as part of the remedy, the Order include a provision for a visitatorial clause. Under the circumstances of this case, we find it unnecessary to include such a clause. See Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Interrogating employees regarding their own or other employees' union activities, sympathies, or desires.

(b) Threatening to discharge employees because of their union activities, sympathies, or desires.

(c) Imposing more difficult and onerous working conditions on employees because they join, support, or assist Graphic Communications International Union 503M, or any other labor organization, and engage in concerted activity for the purposes of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

(d) Discharging employees and then reemploying them in a different position at lower pay because they engage in union or concerted activities.

(e) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer John Van Niel immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make him whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against him, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the decision.

(b) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful discrimination against John Van Niel and notify him in writing that this has been done and that this unlawful action will not be used against him in any way.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its facility in Rochester, New York, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[6] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 3, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT interrogate employees regarding their own or other employees' union activities, sympathies, or desires.

WE WILL NOT threaten to discharge employees because of their union activities, sympathies, or desires.

WE WILL NOT impose more difficult and onerous working conditions on employees because they join, support, or assist Graphic Communications International Union 503M, or any other labor organization, and engage in concerted activity for the purposes of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

WE WILL NOT discharge employees and then reemploy them in a different position at lower pay because they engage in union or concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer John Van Niel immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed and WE WILL make him whole for any loss of earnings he may have suffered as a result of our discrimination against him, with interest.

WE WILL remove from our files any references to the unlawful discrimination against John Van Niel and notify him in writing that this has been done and that our unlawful action will not be used against him in any way.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On December 29, 1986, Administrative Law Judge Irwin Kaplan issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed limited cross-exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs[1] and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions as modified, but not to adopt the recommended Order.[3]

1. We agree with the judge's finding that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by departing from existing policies and erroneously telling employees that it could not consider them for merit wage increases during the pendency of the union campaign. We disagree, however, with his failure to find that the Respondent actually withheld merit wage increases in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (5) of the Act.

The record shows the Respondent's practice was to give its employees a 25-cent-per-hour wage increase at the end of a 90-day probationary period. Additionally, employees were eligible for merit wage increases of 25 cents to 50 cents per hour approximately every 90 days after the initial increase. The Respondent explained this wage policy to new employees at the hiring interview.

Employee Rose Miller began working for the Respondent March 11, 1985,[4] and received her first wage increase about July 1. In October, Miller inquired about a merit raise and was told by Plant Manager James Mazzoni that the Respondent's attorney had advised against giving any raises not promised prior to the union campaign. In addition, the Respondent's president, Lakshmi Gupta, also told employee Harold Morgan that Gupta would think about Morgan's request for a merit increase, but would discuss it further with him only "after all this Union business was over with."

We agree with the judge's finding that, while the Respondent had discretion in the implementation of merit wage increases, it violated Section 8(a)(1) by its statements predicating the suspension of that policy on the advent of the Union.[5] We disagree, however, with the judge's conclusion that the General Counsel did not establish that the Respondent actually withheld merit raises in violation of Section 8(a)(3). By announcing a freeze on merit increases because of the Union's presence, the Respondent precluded Miller and Morgan from being reviewed for such increases when they were due

[1] The Respondent filed a brief in response to the General Counsel's limited cross-exceptions and answering brief. The General Counsel filed a motion to strike the Respondent's reply to counsel for the General Counsel's answering brief, alleging that pp. 7 through 9 of that document were not limited to questions raised in the cross-exceptions, and thus violated Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations. In light of our ultimate decision on the issues addressed in this portion of the Respondent's reply, we find it unnecessary to rule on the General Counsel's motion to strike.

[2] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

The Respondent has requested oral argument. The request is denied as the record, exceptions, and briefs adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties.

We find it unnecessary to pass on the judge's finding in sec. II,B,2(g) of his decision that Greg Ohler was a statutory supervisor and the Respondent's agent, and that his conduct violated Sec. 8(a)(1), as those violations would be cumulative. For the same reason, we also find it unnecessary to pass on the judge's finding in sec. II,B,2(h), that the Respondent's campaign sign did not constitute a threat in violation of Sec. 8(a)(1).

We further note that even were Greg Ohler to be included in the bargaining unit, that would bring the total number of employees in the unit to only 43. Thus the issue of Ohler's employee status does not affect our finding that the Union achieved majority status when it obtained 23 authorization cards as of October 8, 1985.

In Hoschton Garment Co., 279 NLRB 565 (1986), the Board reaffirmed the principle that "an employer's mere observation of open, public union activity on or near its property does not constitute unlawful surveillance." In agreeing with the judge that on November 13, 1985, at its Monroeville facility the Respondent unlawfully created the impression of surveillance of its employees' union activities, we emphasize the judge's finding that the Respondent was simultaneously and unlawfully interfering with the distribution of union literature on public property. Thus, the Respondent's conduct went beyond the "mere observation" permitted by Hoschton. See Gainesville Mfg. Co., 271 NLRB 1186 (1984), which the judge and the Board cited in Hoschton. Indeed, in Hoschton itself, the Board found that the respondent engaged in unlawful surveillance when its plant manager did not "merely observe union activity," but rather attempted to prohibit the distribution of union handbills on public property and stood very close to a union representative for the duration of the handbilling. In sum, Hoschton is fully consistent with the judge's findings here.

[3] The General Counsel has excepted to the judge's failure to order the Respondent to offer to restore employee Edward Ross to his former position. We find merit in the General Counsel's exception. As the judge found, and we agree, that Ross' transfer was in violation of Sec. 8(a)(3), we see no reason to depart from the Board's traditional remedy regarding discriminatory transfers. Accordingly, we shall substitute a new Order for the one recommended by the judge to provide that the Respondent offer to restore employee Edward Ross to his former position in the storeroom. We also shall modify the judge's recommended Order to reflect our findings that the Respondent unlawfully failed to consider employees for merit wage increases after October 8, 1985, in violation of Sec. 8(a)(3) and (5) of the Act.

[5] Stumpf Motor Co., 208 NLRB 431, 433–434 (1974); Centre Engineering, 253 NLRB 419, 420–421 (1980); Atlantic Forest Products, 282 NLRB 855 (1987).

under the Respondent's previously existing policy of reviewing employees for merit increases every 90 days, and thereby violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.[6]

When a company implements a merit wage system based on reward for good work, employees reasonably expect that such a program will continue. Here, the reasonable message derived by the employees was that their reviews and attendant raises had been delayed because of the union activity. Clearly, such an effect discourages union activity. See Interstate Transport Security.[7] As the Board stated in Smith & Smith Aircraft Co. (at fn. 2):[8]

> When an employer, prior to a union campaign, has an established wage increase policy, the suspension of that policy during the union campaign will normally be found to violate Sec. 8(a)(3) unless the employer postpones the increases only for the duration of the campaign and informs the employees at the time of the postponement that the sole reason for its action is to avoid the appearance that it seeks to intervene in the election, and the Board finds that this in fact was its reason.

More recently, in Times Wire & Cable Co.,[9] the Board upheld a finding that the company had violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) by failing to grant a normal and expected wage increase to employees and attributing the loss of the increase to the union.

Accordingly, we find that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) by withholding merit increases because of its employees' union activities. In addition, because we agree with the judge that the Respondent incurred a bargaining obligation as of the October 8, 1985 demand for recognition, we find that on and after that date, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by unilaterally suspending its merit increase policy.[10]

2. The Respondent has excepted to the judge's finding that the revocations of authorization cards by employees Denning, Lukehart, and Smutek were triggered by the unlawful discharges of employees Zang and Diskevich. The Respondent alleges that these three employees did not sign their authorization cards until after the September 27 discharges and that they signed the cards despite the discharges. The record indicates that these events occurred contemporaneously over a single weekend. The discharges occurred on Friday, September 27, and the three employees' authorization cards were dated September 27, 29, and 30. The Respondent has offered no evidence that these employees knew of the discharges prior to signing. Moreover, as the judge found, these early October revocations occurred in an atmosphere of continuing coercion. On September 23 and 26 the Respondent convened its employees and urged them to retrieve their authorization cards and repudiate the Union. At the September 23 meeting, Plant Manager James Mazzoni advised the employees to send their revocation letters by certified mail, noted that he had posted the Union's address on the bulletin board, and offered to help any employee needing assistance in writing a revocation letter. The Respondent's unrequested advice regarding the method of revocation was combined with instructions that employees tear up their cards and throw them away. The Respondent called an employee meeting on September 26 at which President Lakshmi Gupta instructed the employees not to attend a union meeting that evening. On September 27 the Respondent unlawfully interrogated a number of the employees who had attended the union meeting and discriminatorily discharged Diskevich and Zang.

Given this background, we agree with the judge that when employees Denning, Smutek, and Lukehart approached Mazzoni for help in writing revocation letters in early October, they did so in an atmosphere tainted by the Respondent's numerous and repeated unfair labor practices. Both Denning and Smutek credibly testified that they were concerned about losing their jobs and had discussed the discharges and the Union's inability to get Diskevich and Zang reinstated. Similarly, Lukehart acknowledged that when she tried to revoke her card she was aware of the terminations and the fact that unfair labor practice charges had been filed. In addition, Denning and Smutek had advised Lukehart of their reasons for trying to retrieve their cards before Lukehart wrote to the Union asking that hers be returned. Further, Mazzoni assisted the employees by supplying the revocation language, providing the stationery and the Union's address, and reminding the employees that the letter had to be certified. The continuing nature of the coercion is further emphasized by the fact that a few days after assisting employees Denning, Lukehart, and Smutek, Mazzoni began to pressure employee Gerald Deer about revoking his card. Thereafter, the Respondent continued to violate the Act by withholding merit increases, promising benefits if the Union was defeated, and interfering with union representatives passing out literature.

Because we find that the Respondent engaged in unfair labor practices almost from the time it learned of the organizational campaign to the final days of the election, we conclude the revocations were coerced and were, therefore, ineffective.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Gupta Permold Corporation, Monroeville, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Coercively interrogating employees about their union activities and sympathies.

(b) Creating the impression among its employees that their union activities are under surveillance.

(c) Discriminatorily promulgating, maintaining, and enforcing a no-access rule and interfering with the distribution of union literature at its Monroeville facility.

(d) Soliciting employee grievances and indicating a willingness to rectify them to undermine the Union.

(e) Soliciting employees to repudiate the Union and to revoke union authorization cards and assisting employees in revoking union authorization cards and instructing employees not to attend a union meeting.

(f) Promising to provide improved benefits if the employees repudiated the Union.

(g) Recruiting, encouraging, and authorizing employees to tell other employees that the Respondent will provide certain improved benefits if the Union is eliminated.

(h) Departing from existing policies and erroneously telling employees that it cannot consider merit increases during the pendency of the union campaign.

(i) Threatening to close the plant before accepting the Union and threatening employees with various other unspecified reprisals for their support of the Union.

(j) Conveying to employees that unionization will result in the loss of a major customer and loss of jobs.

(k) Discharging, transferring, or otherwise discriminating against employees because of their union activities and sympathies.

(l) Refusing to recognize and, on request, bargain with United Steelworkers of America, AFL-CIO-CLC as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of its employees in the following unit:

> All production and maintenance employees employed by Respondent at its foundry located at 1375 Frey Road, Penn Hills, Pennsylvania, and its production facility located at 530 Seco Road, Monroeville, Pennsylvania; excluding office clerical employees, technical employees and guards, and professional employees and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(m) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer David Diskevich and Robert Zang immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against them, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the judge's decision.

(b) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful discharges of David Diskevich and Robert Zang and notify the employees in writing that this has been done and that the discharges will not be used against them in any way.

(c) Offer Edward Ross the option of transferring back to his former job in the storeroom without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges.

(d) Immediately reinstate and implement the merit evaluation and wage increase system and, after notice and an opportunity to bargain with the above-named labor organization regarding the amount of each increase, grant retroactive increases to each employee found eligible with interest.

(e) Recognize and, on request, bargain with the above-named labor organization as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of its employees in the bargaining unit set forth above with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody the understanding in a signed agreement.

(f) Post at its Penn Hills and Monroeville, Pennsylvania facilities copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[11] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 6, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

[11] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

(g) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the election in Case 6–RC–9627 is set aside and that the petition in that matter is dismissed.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT coercively interrogate our employees about their activities and sympathies for United Steelworkers of America, AFL–CIO–CLC or any other labor organization.

WE WILL NOT create the impression that the union activities of our employees are under surveillance.

WE WILL NOT discriminatorily promulgate, maintain, and enforce a no-access rule and interfere with the distribution of union literature at our Monroeville facility.

WE WILL NOT solicit our employees' grievances and indicate a willingness to rectify them in order to undermine the above-named Union.

WE WILL NOT solicit our employees to repudiate the above-named Union, to revoke their union authorization cards and assist our employees in revoking union authorization cards, and instruct our employees not to attend a union meeting.

WE WILL NOT promise to provide our employees improved benefits if they repudiate the Union.

WE WILL NOT recruit, encourage, and authorize any employees to tell other employees that we will provide certain improved benefits if the Union is eliminated.

WE WILL NOT depart from our existing policies by erroneously informing our employees that we cannot consider merit increases during the pendency of the union campaign.

WE WILL NOT threaten to close the plant before accepting the Union and threaten employees with various other unspecified reprisals for their support of the Union.

WE WILL NOT convey to our employees that unionization will result in the loss of a major customer and loss of jobs.

WE WILL NOT discharge, transfer, or otherwise discriminate against our employees because of their union activities and sympathies.

WE WILL NOT refuse to recognize and, on request, bargain with the above-named Union as the exclusive representative of our employees in the appropriate unit with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody the understanding in a signed agreement. The appropriate unit is:

> All production and maintenance employees employed by Gupta Permold Corporation at our foundry located at 1375 Frey Road, Penn Hills, Pennsylvania, and our production facility located at 530 Seco Road, Monroeville, Pennsylvania; excluding office clerical employees, technical employees and guards, and professional employees and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WE WILL NOT in any other manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer David Diskevich and Robert Zang immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed and WE WILL make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from their discharge, less any net interim earnings, plus interest.

WE WILL remove from our records any reference to the discharges of David Diskevich and Robert Zang and notify them in writing that this has been done and that these discharges will not be used against them in any way.

WE WILL offer Edward Ross the option of transferring back to his former job in the storeroom without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges.

WE WILL immediately reinstate and implement our merit evaluation and wage increase system and grant retroactive increases to each employee found eligible with interest.

WE WILL recognize and, on request, bargain with the above-named Union as the exclusive representative of our employees in the appropriate unit with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody the understanding in a signed agreement.

GUPTA PERMOLD CORPORATION

Michael Poprik, Esq., for the General Counsel.
W. Timothy Barry, Esq. (Barry, Dattilo & Fasulo, P.C.), of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, and David J. Eckle, Esq., of Monroeville, Pennsylvania, for the Respondent.
George Radulovich, of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, for the Charging Party.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

IRWIN KAPLAN, Administrative Law Judge. These consolidated cases were heard in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, on 24, 25, 26, 27, and 28 February 1985. The underlying charges in Cases 6-CA-18542 and 6-CA-18655 were filed by the United Steelworkers of America, AFL-CIO-CLC (the Charging Party) on 30 September 1985 and 18 November 1985 and gave rise to a complaint and notice of hearing on 14 November 1985 and 26 December 1985 (amended 7 February 1986), respectively. These cases were consolidated by order consolidating cases on 26 December 1985 and consolidated further with Case 6-RC-9627 by order further consolidating cases on that same date.

The Charging Party in the unfair labor practice cases is also the Petitioner in Case 6-RC-9627. That petition gave rise to a Stipulation upon Consent Election Agreement on 31 October 1985 and an election on 15 November 1985. The Petitioner, having lost the election, filed timely objections thereto. The investigation to these objections, inter alia, disclosed evidence of other alleged misconduct, and as these matters are largely coextensive with the complaint allegations, they were subsequently (as noted above) consolidated therewith.

In essence, it is alleged that Gupta Permold Corporation (Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by terminating David Diskevich and Robert Zang, by transferring Edward Ross, and by withholding merit increases from employees because of the pendency of the union petition. Further, it is alleged that Respondent engaged in numerous other acts of misconduct independently violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by, inter alia, interrogation, surveillance, creating the impression of surveillance, discriminatorily enacting and enforcing a no-access rule regarding the distribution of union literature, soliciting complaints and grievances, and promising benefits in order to discourage union activities, informing employees that merit increases were being withheld because of union activities, and threatening employees with various reprisals including loss of job and plant shutdown to dissuade them from engaging in union activities. Still further, the General Counsel, relying largely on NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575 (1969), contends that Respondent, by its "commission of widespread and flagrant violations," violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. As such, the General Counsel contends that the record justifies a bargaining order.

The Respondent filed an answer and amended answer, conceding, inter alia, jurisdictional facts and the supervisory and agency status of certain individuals, but denying the status of Foreman Greg Ohler and also denying that it committed any unfair labor practices. Further, Respondent disputed "majority status" and, relying on Gourmet Foods, 270 NLRB 578 (1984), noted that under "no circumstances" will the Board grant a nonmajority bargaining order.

Based on the entire record[1] including my observations of the demeanor of the witnesses as they testified, and after careful consideration of the posttrial briefs, I find as follows

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is a Pennsylvania corporation with its principal office and place of business in Monroeville, Pennsylvania, and is engaged in the manufacture and nonretail sale and distribution of dynamic breaking systems. Concerning the aforenoted business operations, Respondent, during a representative 12-month timeframe, purchased and received at its Monroeville facilities products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. It is admitted, the record supports, and I find that the Respondent is now, and has been at all times material, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

It is also admitted, and I find, that the Charging Party, United Steelworkers of America, AFL-CIO-CLC (Union), is now, and has been at all times material, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background and Sequence of Events

The Union was first contacted by Respondent's employees in September 1985.[2] On Friday, 13 September, George Radulovich, a union organizer and staff representative, spoke to employee Ed Ross on the telephone and a meeting was arranged to be held at the latter's home on 16 September to explore union representation. In attendance at the meeting were Radulovich and employee Ross, employees Brian Moree, Bob Zang, and Harold Morgan. The union organizational campaign began at that meeting as each of the employees in attendance signed authorization cards and turned them over to Radulovich.[3] The employees at the meeting agreed to serve as union "committeemen" and "official organizers."

On Friday, 20 September, minutes before the end of the 4 p.m. shift, Radulovich, accompanied by Jim

[3] According to the credited testimony of Radulovich and Moree, the latter's original card was lost by the Union and Radulovich asked him to submit another signed card. (G.C. Exh. 7, dated 25 October.)

Coates, another staff representative, appeared outside Respondent's Monroeville facility[4] and distributed union materials, including authorization cards, as the employees left work. (See G.C. Exh. 6.) The union representatives left the Monroeville location after a brief period but returned to catch the second-shift employees leaving the facility around 11 p.m.

Plant Manager James Mazzoni testified that he first learned of union activity after 4 p.m. on 20 September, when one of the second-shift employees told him that there were union organizers outside Respondent's facility. Respondent's owner, Lakshmi Gupta, testified that Mazzoni phoned him that evening around 6 p.m. to tell him, "Bad news. We had been invaded by United States Steel Workers."[5]

On Saturday, 21 September, Mazzoni asked Ross about the Union while they were bowling at the Monroe Bowl. As testified by Mazzoni, he told Ross, "[T]here's a rumor going around about you, that you are the one instigating the Union in there." Although Ross' testimony on this point is essentially the same, Ross added that when he (Ross) denied union involvement Mazzoni asked him for a favor, to tell that to Gupta.

On Monday, 23 September, Respondent assembled all its employees at the Monroeville facility and urged them to reject the Union. According to the testimony of the General Counsel's witnesses (largely undisputed), Gupta told the employees that he was aware of the Union's organizational activities and understood that some employees had signed union cards. Gupta asked those employees who had received union cards but had not signed them to discard those cards; those who had already submitted signed cards Gupta asked to get their cards back and offered assistance. He explained to the employees that the Company was too young and small to afford a union and noted that Westinghouse, the Company's only customer, did not like the idea of dealing with a union. Gupta also invited employees to discuss their problems and to feel free to ask questions. In response, employees raised concerns and questions dealing with, inter alia, hospitalization coverage, sick days, dental and eye care, establishing employees' savings accounts, a college tuition reimbursement program, and the installation of a microwave oven and refrigerator.

Gupta was receptive to some of these points and totally rejected other items. For example, employee Ed Ross suggested that Gupta institute employee savings accounts. To this, Gupta told Chief Inspector Frank Bruno to "Jot that down, its a good idea." Employee Bashir Masaoud suggested that Respondent acquire a microwave oven and refrigerator. Gupta again was receptive, directing Purchasing Agent Vince Visco to order these items. Gupta turned down Ross' suggestion that he deal with an employee committee over employees' problems. In doing so, Gupta told the assembled employees that he was always accessible to them on a one-to-one basis and therefore they did not need a union.

As noted above, for the most part, the accounts presented by the General Counsel's witnesses vis-a-vis the 23 September meeting are not disputed. A few points, however, are in conflict. For example, Gupta and Mazzoni contend that it was Mazzoni (not Gupta) who introduced the subject of union authorization cards and made an offer of assistance to get those cards back. The other point in dispute involved the microwave oven and refrigerator. According to Gupta and Mazzoni, Visco had been told to purchase the microwave and refrigerator long before the advent of the Unon, but failed to place the order. Gupta testified that he was "surprised" when one of the employees asked for these items. Thus, when the subject was raised at this meeting, Gupta assertedly told Visco, "Vince, I told you before, I'm telling you right now in front of all these people, go get it [the microwave and refrigerator]." According to the General Counsel's witness, Gupta merely asked Visco to look into acquiring these items. Ross testified that a few days later, he overheard Mazzoni tell other "people" in the office "that once we got the [employees] the refrigerator and microwave that they would knock this [union] shit off." The microwave oven and refrigerator were installed approximately 1 month later.

On 25 September, around lunchtime, Radulovich appeared just outside Respondent's Monroeville facility. There, Radulovich distributed a written notice to employees, as they broke for lunch, of a special union meeting at Denny's Restaurant to be held the following evening. The notice, in pertinent part, stated as follows:

> The purpose of this meeting will be to explain the procedure in filing a petition with the National Labor Relations Board, the organizing drive at your plant, cost-of-living, sick & accident plan, wages and job classification plan. [G.C. Exh. 8.]

One of the aforenoted notices found its way into the hands of Mazzoni. The union meeting at Denny's was scheduled for 26 September at 4:30 p.m. A short time earlier, on that same date, at approximately 3:30 p.m., Gupta assembled all Respondent's employees at the Monroeville facility and informed them that he knew of the upcoming union meeting and told them not to attend. As testified by Gupta, "I [Gupta] wanted to point out to our people that, by attending that meeting [Denny's], they're not going to benefit with any additional information . . . and would be subject to some of the high sales pitch things to join the Union."

The union meeting at Denny's was held as scheduled. Approximately 13 employees attended, including the three alleged discriminatees, Ross, Diskevich, and Zang. The next day (27 September), around 2:30 to 3 p.m., a number of these employees, including Rose Miller, Rich Sneddon, Brian Moree, and Bob Cable were paged one at a time on the intercom to go to Gupta's office. There they were questioned separately by Gupta and Mazzoni about the meeting at Denny's and asked whether they had signed union cards and why. Miller testified, without contradiction, that Gupta told her that he was "shocked" and "disappointed" that she had attended the union meeting. He asked her what she did with her union card. Gupta pointed out that he was not a rich man and suggested that she look at his house. During the course of that meeting, Gupta also asked Miller whether her husband was a union man and responsible for her union activities. Miller got upset at Gupta's reference to her husband and when she left Gupta's office she cried and went directly to the ladies' restroom.[6]

[4] Respondent then also employed approximately five employees at its nearby Penn Hills facility.

[5] According to Mazzoni and Gupta, earlier that day (and before knowledge of union activity), Mazzoni recommended terminating David Diskevich and Robert Zang, both probationary employees. Because Gupta was assertedly late for another business meeting, a final decision was deferred until 27 September when Diskevich and Zang were discharged. Their status as alleged discriminatees will be treated more fully below.

The account provided by Brian Moree was largely undisputed by Respondent's witnesses. Thus, as testified by Moree, Gupta asked him whether he attended the meeting at Denny's and whether he had signed a union card. Mazzoni pointed out to Moree that while employees move from job to job, the Company has left him on the same machine because he was happy on that job and he could be trusted.

Cable and Sneddon were questioned in much the same way. Later that same day (27 September), Respondent terminated probationary employees Diskevich and Zang (alleged discriminatees). Shortly before 4 p.m., Gupta questioned employee Barbara Potocnik at her work station regarding her attendance at the union meeting. Potocnik testified that Gupta asked her why she attended, noting that she had only been employed for 1 month. According to Gupta, he asked Potocnik whether she attended and was told by the latter that it was none of his business.

In late September, Gupta had a conversation with employee Frank Sabash concerning the reasons for the advent of the Union and the terminations of Diskevich and Zang. According to Sabash, on the occasion in question, Gupta stepped inside his welding booth and asked him why the employees thought they needed a union. Sabash testified that he explained to Gupta that the employees "thought they needed a little more voice in what was going on in the Company." Further, Sabash advised that employees wanted more money and other benefits. During the course of the conversation, Sabash asked about the firings of Diskevich and Zang and was told that they had not performed satisfactorily during their probationary period.

Gupta's version of that September meeting with Sabash is subsequently different, particularly regarding how the conversation arose. According to Gupta, after he and Sabash exchanged amenities, the latter asked to speak with him in private and they took a walk around the building. Gupta testified that Sabash opened the conversation by asking why Diskevich and Zang were fired. When Gupta told him, "They didn't make it their probation," Sabash responded, "Come on, level with me. There must be something else." It is undisputed that Gupta told Sabash that there were no other reasons. Assertedly, Sabash then represented that all the employees wanted was "a little more money," suggesting 25 cents an hour (as a good will gesture), and for Gupta to reinstate Diskevich and Zang. Gupta asserted that he merely listened to Sabash and did not negotiate or promise anything. Finally, according to Gupta, Sabash told him, "Don't worry there would be no union."

It is undisputed that Gupta and Sabash had a second private meeting, this time, admittedly, called by Gupta, to discuss employee benefits and the union situation. According to Gupta, this second meeting occurred a few days after the earlier meeting and before he received the Union's demand for recognition and the representation petition.[7] Sabash testified that this meeting occurred around 1 November (during the critical period vis-a-vis the objections to the election). In virtually all other respects, Sabash's account of what transpired at this second meeting was uncontradicted and in large part confirmed by Gupta's testimony.

On this occasion, Gupta called Sabash away from his work station and took him for a ride in his car from parking lot to parking lot inside that industrial complex. Inside the car, Gupta spoke privately to Sabash about providing certain employee benefits if the Union were discarded. Gupta promised, inter alia, to provide 25-cent across-the-board wage increases, with an additional 25 cents for second-shift employees and improved family insurance coverage. As testified by Sabash, "Gupta assured me that these things . . . would all be implemented and reinforced into company policy, if I helped him talk people out of voting for the Union." In Gupta's words, "I expected [Sabash] to communicate [the promise of benefits] to others . . . [t]o make everyone be happy, and the Union will disappear."

While in Gupta's car, Sabash asked him whether Ross' transfer was related to his union activities.[8] Gupta did not respond directly, but held out the possibility of Ross' return to the storeroom if the Union failed in its organizational efforts.

Sabash testified (with substantial corroboration) that as soon as he got back inside the building he related the substance of his conversation with Gupta to other employees (about 12 employees were identified by name). Further, Sabash testified that another three or four employees had come to him for verification, stating that other employees told them of the Gupta-Sabash meeting.

In early October, employees Margaret Denning, Penny Lukehart, and Debbie Smutek wrote to the Union requesting "to withdraw" their signed union cards (G.C. Exhs. 33-35). Prior thereto, Denning and Smutek had discussed the terminations of Diskevich and Zang, along with the Union's inability to get them reinstated, and decided to seek Mazzoni's help in getting their union cards returned. Mazzoni referred them to Respondent's attorney, David Eckle, who advised them of the withdrawal language contained in their letters and about mailing those letters certified, return receipt requested. Lukehart's letter was sent under similar circumstances. Although Lukehart discussed withdrawing her union card with employees Denning and Smutek, she asserted that the subject of Diskevich's and Zang's discharges did not come up in their conversation.[9]

[6] Employee Edward Ross corroborated Miller to the extent that he observed her crying when she came out of Gupta's office. Ross also testified that Miller told him that Mazzoni knew all about the union meeting at Denny's. Earlier that day and before Miller was called into Gupta's office, Miller told Mazzoni that she was at the union meeting at Denny's and found it boring. Mazzoni made a comment about 13 employees at the meeting and that remark was passed on to other employees by Miller. Mazzoni admitted making the remark, but asserted that he guessed at the number. He denied that he actually knew the number of employees who attended the meeting at Denny's.

[7] The petition and demand for recognition are both dated 8 October (G.C. Exhs. 2 and 3). The parties stipulated that Respondent received these documents on 9 October.

[8] On 28 September, Ross had been transferred from the storeroom to the production area in the ILS department. As noted previously, it is alleged that the transfer was discriminatory, in violation of Sec. 8(a)(3).

Sometime in October, Mazzoni summoned employee Patricia Christian to Gupta's office, where he informed her that he heard that she had signed a union card, and proceeded to denigrate the Union. As testified by Christian, Mazzoni told her that other companies had gone bankrupt and had to lay off employees because of the Union.[10]

Other employees also testified to antiunion statements, conveying the impression of surveillance, interrogation, and threats made by Mazzoni around the same time. Thus, employee Gerald Deer testified that on or about 7 October, Mazzoni questioned him in Gupta's office regarding his reasons for signing a union card. According to Deer, Mazzoni told him that he knew that he had signed a union card; he (Mazzoni) wished he had not and asked Deer to reconsider. Mazzoni's account of this conversation is substantially different. According to Mazzoni, he told Deer that he had heard from Jim Sisteck that he, Deer, wanted to talk to him (Mazzoni), which Deer then assertedly confirmed. Mazzoni testified that Deer told him that he submitted a signed card to the Union and "think[s] [he] made a mistake." To this, Mazzoni assertedly responded, "well, why did you send it in?" Mazzoni denied saying anything else to Deer.

Employe Edward Ross testified that on or about 8 October Mazzoni, in the presence of Chief Inspector Frank Bruno, told him (Ross) "to put the union shit on hold, that [Gupta] didn't want [the Union] and the workers out in the shop didn't want it."[11] Employee Barbara Potocnik testified that sometime in October, Mazzoni told her, "There will be no Goddamn union here, and if a Goddamn union gets in, I'll close the Goddamn place myself." Although Mazzoni admitted having a conversation with Potocnik at the time in question, he denied saying anything to her about the Union.

It is also alleged that Gupta and Greg Ohler made coercive statements during the month of October. Employee Harold Morgan testified that sometime around the second week in October he met with Gupta in the latter's office to ask about a wage increase. According to Morgan, he raised that subject because, when he was hired, he was told that he could expect a raise every 90 days and that did not happen. Morgan asserted that Gupta told him, on the occasion in question, that he was entitled to a raise and would receive one, although he was uncertain about the amount. Gupta also assertedly told Morgan that he would put the matter on hold until after the union activity had stopped. Additionally, Morgan testified that Gupta told him that Westinghouse could "pull out" if the Company became unionized and urged him (Morgan) to dissuade younger employees from supporting the Union. Gupta testified that he told Morgan that he had been "advised by legal counsel not to discuss it (wage increases)" and denied that he promised to give Morgan a raise.[12]

According to employee Bruce Moree, in late September or early October, Working Foreman Ohler[13] told him and other employees at Respondent's Penn Hills facility, if the Union got in, their wages would revert to $3.35 per hour. This testimony was corroborated by employee Greg Schoch, who also asserted that Ohler told them that if the Union got in there was a chance of the Company's closing.[14] As testified by Ohler, at least 2 or 3 weeks before the November election, he told employees at Penn Hills that their wages and benefits were not guaranteed and if the Union got in, "[e]verything is going to have to be negotiated."

Employee Ross testified that in mid-October, Ohler asked him what he knew about the "union business." Further, Ohler complained that the Union was holding up everyone, including himself, from receiving their bonus and threatened to "make life rough" for the person responsible. Although Ohler admitted that he told Ross and other employees that wages and other benefits were on hold during the pendency of the election, he denied making any threats.

On 8 November, concerning the upcoming union election, Respondent displayed a campaign poster on the door leading to the Company's offices from the shop area stating, in essence, that Americans purchase goods made overseas because they are produced more cheaply in nonunion shops, which results in American plants closing and loss of jobs. The poster also contained the admonition, "Protect Your Jobs: VOTE NO." (G.C. Exh. 5.)

On 12 November, Respondent assembled its entire work force at its Monroeville facility, to hear speeches from Mazzoni, Ohler, and Inspector Frank Bruno urging them to vote against the Union. Mazzoni related his previous employment experience with another company at which the great majority of jobs were lost because of the union strike. There (as told by Mazzoni to Respondent's employees), the Company transferred machinery and jobs to facilities in other States and only approximately 25 employees were still employed, down from 1500 employees, and the Union was now facing a decertification petition.

Bruno told the employees of the Union's unwillingness or inability to help him when he was laid off from Westinghouse. Ohler noted, inter alia, that the Respondent does not have a history of layoffs and urged the employees to vote no in the upcoming union election.

[9] As the General Counsel is urging a Gissel bargaining order, the effectiveness of these withdrawal letters is material and will be discussed more fully below.

[10] It is noted that Christian's testimony was largely uncontradicted. Mazzoni described her as "probably one of the most honest people that I know." (Emphasis added.)

[11] Ross' testimony on this matter was uncontradicted. Bruno did not testify nor was any reason advanced by any party for the failure to call him as a witness.

[12] Rose Miller testified that in early October, she questioned Mazzoni about a merit raise, which she thought was due. She was told by Mazzoni that, on the advice of the Company's attorney, no raises could be given during the pendency of the election.

[14] Respondent's witness Daniel Grum when asked by the General Counsel whether Ohler told him that if the Union came in, the Company might close down, responded, "In a round about fashion, yeah."

The following day, 13 November, 2 days before the Board-conducted election, Respondent provided another of its periodic pizza lunches for all its employees. On this occasion, Gupta spoke of the need to operate a business in a nonunion setting noting, inter alia, that American companies face competition from foreign companies that are free of restraints imposed on American businesses. Employee Edward Ross recalled Gupta stating that "the world is one big trade market" and that companies lay off employees, transfer jobs, and relocate in order to reduce costs. As testified by Gupta, he told the assembled employees that the Union posed "a very real threat to the survival of this Company, and their job[s]." Further, he implored them to "Save your company. Save your jobs, vote no."

Later that same day (13 November), at approximately 3:15 p.m., Union Representatives Jack Coates and Thomas Antel arrived at Respondent's Monroeville facility to distribute union literature. Coates and Antel were met by Mazzoni, who told them that they could not distribute literature on company property and asked them to leave. Coates and Antel refused to leave, contending that they were not on company property. Mazzoni contacted Attorney David Eckle, who arrived at the site minutes later, and he too asked the union representatives to leave the company property. Coates disagreed that the area was company property and told Eckle that the area in question "looks like a thoroughfare to me."

According to union witnesses, employees from the area of the loading dock observed this union-company encounter, and these employees, in turn, told other employees. Coates and Antel asserted that employees were reluctant to accept union literature from them in the presence of company officials and, according to employee Edward Ross, he was physically blocked by Mazzoni and had to move around him in order to receive the union material. Eckle and Mazzoni testified that at the time they first spoke with the union representatives, the employees were not in the immediate area, but were still in the building and working. According to them, they went back into the building when the 4 o'clock bell rang, signifying the end of the day shift, because they were unable to get the union representatives to leave and because they did not want to interfere as employees departed. Eckle testified that after everyone left the building, he came out and spoke to Coates for a few minutes noting to the latter that they would see each other at the election in a few days. Eckle recalled that two employees had come out of the building while he was engaged in this second conversation with Coates, and one of them accepted union material while the other refused.

Still, on 13 November and around the same time Coates and Antel were at the Monroeville facility, Union Representative Radulovich attempted to distribute union literature at Respondent's Penn Hills facility. According to Radulovich, Gupta came out of the building and stayed close to Radulovich, thereby inhibiting and discouraging the Penn Hills employees who had just finished work from accepting any of his union material. According to Gupta, he did not come out of the building, but merely opened the door and looked out at Radulovich. It is undisputed that Gupta did not say anything to the employees or to Radulovich.

B. Discussion and Conclusions

1. Credibility

This case, in large part, turns on credibility. The documents or exhibits in evidence shed little light on motivation. It is noted, however, that Respondent does not contend that the discharges of Diskevich and Zang or the transfer of Ross was predicated, in whole or in part, on any downturn in business or economic conditions. Although Respondent advanced nondiscriminatory reasons for its disputed action, those reasons are largely subjective in nature, the plausibility of which must be assessed in light of the entire record. This, of course, includes the credibility resolutions pertaining to the various independent 8(a)(1) allegations. The General Counsel, in support of those allegations, paraded about 17 witnesses, the great majority of whom were still employed at the time they testified adversely to their Employer. As such, they faced considerable economic risk, a factor that tends to support their testimony. See Shop-Rite Supermarket, 231 NLRB 500, 505 fn. 22 (1977); DePaul Community Health Center, 221 NLRB 839, 844 (1975).

In addition, there are a number of other significant factors that persuade me that the essence of the testimony adduced from the General Counsel's witnesses should be credited. I find, for example, that these witnesses, in large part, not only mutually corroborated each other, but in certain material respects, their testimony was also confirmed and admitted by Respondent's witnesses.

Thus, Gupta and Mazzoni acknowledged that the accounts provided by the General Counsel's witnesses of the company-held employee meetings on 23 and 26 September were basically accurate. As such, it is undisputed that Gupta and/or Mazzoni told the employees, inter alia, to throw away their union cards and, if the Union already had their cards, they offered to help them get those cards back. Further, Gupta confirmed that he told all the employees on 26 September not to attend the union meeting scheduled to be held later that day at Denny's Restaurant.

Basically, the only factual conflict regarding the meeting of 23 September pertained to Gupta's response to an employee's request that Respondent install a refrigerator and microwave oven. According to Gupta and Mazzoni, Gupta expressed surprise that this had not been done earlier because he had long before directed Vince Visco, Respondent's purchasing agent, to purchase these items, and reminded Visco of that in a loud voice in front of all the employees. In assessing credibility in favor of the General Counsel's witnesses, it is noted, inter alia, that although virtually all Respondent's employees attended the meeting (approximately 40 in number), some of whom were clearly friendly to Respondent, not one corroborated Gupta or Mazzoni on this matter. Moreover, Visco might have been expected to provide some corroborative testimony, but he was not called to testify nor was any reason advanced for his failure to appear as a witness.[15]

I also find that the witnesses who testified in support of the allegations demonstrated a high degree of internal consistency. For example, Gupta and Mazzoni confirmed, inter alia, that they had called at least three employees into Gupta's office, one at a time, to question them about their attendance at a union meeting. Further, Mazzoni confirmed the testimony of Edward Ross and Patricia Christian to the extent that he admitted questioning them about their union activities. Regarding Ross, Mazzoni asked him whether it was true that he was the union instigator. Regarding employee Christian, Mazzoni admittedly called her into Gupta's office to ask her if she signed a union card as he had been told. Christian also testified that Mazzoni told her that companies go "bankrupt" and lay off employees because of the Union. In crediting Christian's account in its entirety, it is noted, inter alia, that even Mazzoni described her as "one of the most honest people I know."

Respondent's modus operandi, having been clearly established, I find it entirely consistent and likely that Gupta and Mazzoni similarly questioned other employees about their union activities and engaged in the related acts of interference as the General Counsel's witnesses had testified. Thus, I credit the testimony of employee Gerald Deer over Mazzoni's version regarding the substance of their meeting in Gupta's office. Deer credibly testified that Mazzoni told him that he knew that he had signed a union card and asked him to reconsider and get his card back because the Company did not need a union. According to Mazzoni, on the occasion in question, Deer volunteered that he thought he had made a mistake by sending the Union his authorization card, to which Mazzoni responded, "Gerry, the decision is up to you, I can't tell you if you've made a mistake or not." Mazzoni denied saying anything else on that occasion noting, however, that Mazzoni and Gupta admittedly had previously urged employees to get their union cards back or throw them away. I reject Mazzoni's sudden professed reluctance to assist Deer, as incredible.

Similarly, I reject Gupta's testimony as incredible when in conflict with employee Frank Sabash. It is undisputed that Gupta and Sabash met twice privately and discussed improved employee benefits in the context of eliminating the Union as a threat to Respondent. The first meeting occurred in late September. According to Sabash, Gupta initiated this meeting and questioned him about the reasons employees were engaging in union activities. Although Gupta denied that he initiated this meeting, he corroborated virtually all Sabash's testimony regarding the second meeing, including the fact that he, Gupta, summoned Sabash and that the two of them rode in Gupta's car, where the latter promised to provide certain improved employee benefits if they rejected the Union.

Basically, all that is in dispute regarding the second meeting is that when it occurred Sabash asserted that it took place around 1 November. Gupta testified that this second meeting occurred within a few days of the first (or early October) and before he received notice of the representation petition and demand for recognition.[16]

In crediting Sabash over Gupta, it is noted, inter alia, that virtually all the corroborative testimony tends to support the former rather then the later.[17] Sabash noted, as a frame of reference, that Gupta showed him some type of notification (presumably from the NLRB) precluding him (Gupta) from interfering with employees' union activities. Because these restrictions did not extend to Sabash, Gupta approached the former to serve as a conduit from him to the other employees. Sabash credibly testified that as soon as he left Gupta's car and returned to the facility, he began to transmit to other employees Gupta's promises of benefits, which were linked to the demise of the Union.

As indicated previously, the half dozen witnesses to testify on this subject all corroborated Sabash, including Patricia Christian "one of the most honest people" known to Mazzoni. Thus, the overwhelming weight of the credible testimony disclosed, and I find, that the critical second meeting between Gupta and Sabash occurred around 1 November, as testified by Sabash.

Although I was impressed with the overall testimony of the General Counsel's witnesses, I found the Respondent's principal witnesses largely unresponsive, evasive, inconsistent, implausible, lacking in candor, and unreliable. Gupta, for example, incredibly asserted that during his first meeting with Sabash in late September, he told Sabash that he did not want to talk about the Union. (Tr. 836–837.) In this connection, it is noted that Gupta displayed no such inhibition vis-a-vis the subject of the Union, when admittedly a short time before he had urged all his employees to reject the Union and to throw away their union cards. Further, Gupta urged all his employees not to attend a union meeting and summoned several employees into his office, one at a time, to question them regarding their attendance at that meeting. One of these employees, Rose Miller, testified credibly, without contradiction, that Gupta told her, inter alia, that he was "shocked" and "disappointed" in her for going to the union meeting and asked her what she did with her union card.

In these circumstances, noting particularly that Gupta maintained a high antiunion profile, I find it highly unlikely and rejected his assertion that he told Sabash that he did not want to talk to him about the Union. Similarly, I find it incongruous and reject Gupta's testimony that he "kept quiet" and merely listened to Sabash at that first meeting (Tr. 851–852).

[15] Although Visco is not alleged to be a statutory supervisor or agent, it is noted that, at all material times, he was also the manager in the storeroom, where, inter alia (as testified to by Mazzoni), Visco supervised Diskevich and Zang. It is not alleged nor contended that Visco engaged in any conduct violative of the Act.

[16] The date is critical if such conduct is to serve as a basis for setting aside the election. Moreover, in the circumstances of this case, as a predicate to any bargaining order, objections to the conduct of the election must be sustained and the election results must be set aside.

[17] It is also noted that Gupta perceived Sabash as a person who generated employee respect because he spoke in a "straightforward" manner. I found Sabash to be responsive, forthright, consistent, plausible, and credible as a witness.

Further, I found Gupta to be unresponsive, evasive, and lacking in candor regarding certain statements he made to employees on 13 November. For example, Gupta denied that he told employees on that occasion that he might close if the Union got in. When pressed further, however, Gupta admitted that he told employees, "There is a very real threat to the survival of the Company." Gupta belatedly admitted that he was referring to the Union when he made the remark.

I also found Mazzoni to be equivocal, unresponsive, inconsistent, implausible, and unreliable as a witness. Mazzoni's testimony regarding his transfer of employee Edward Ross is a case in point.

According to Mazzoni, employees are frequently transferred from one job to another and they are so informed at the time of hiring. Mazzoni testified that the decision to transfer Ross from the storeroom to the production area was made in early September with the change to take place whenever inventory was completed.

On 28 September, Mazzoni informed Ross that he was needed in production and reminded him that he was told when he was hired that he could expect such transfers. However, Mazzoni's testimony a moment later disclosed a far different reason for Ross' transfer, thereby raising serious questions as to his credibility and motivation. Thus, when Mazzoni was asked to clarify the matter of Ross' transfer, he explained that he "suspected" Ross of "shenanigans" in the storeroom and related one instance when he overheard Ross tell a truckdriver to take his time and not to return to the facility before 12 o'clock. Incredibly, Mazzoni testified that he did not take any action against Ross, "because I could never prove it," but he (assertedly) told the truckdriver, "You'd better be back before 12 o'clock." Mazzoni was then asked whether he at least spoke to Ross, to which Mazzoni provided a smorgasbord of responses. First, Mazzoni stated that he did not talk to Ross about the incident; however, when asked why, Mazzoni responded as follows:

> I might have—I don't know why, Your Honor. I might have talked to him. I'm—you know, I'm going by—trying to go by memory. I might have talked to him. I'm not saying that I—I could have talked to him. I don't know if I did or not.

Clearly, these responses do not inspire confidence that Mazzoni testified with conviction. In my view, based on my observations of Mazzoni as a witness and considering his entire testimony, I find it highly unlikely that Mazzoni merely experienced a lapse in memory or even that the incident occurred. Rather, I am persuaded that such equivocation, along with the shifting reasons for Ross' transfer,[18] indicates lack of candor and reflects adversely on Mazzoni's overall credibility.

Similarly, I reject as incredible Mazzoni's explanation for arriving at 13 when he spoke to employee Rose Miller about the number of employees at the union meeting at Denny's Restaurant. Although 13 employees attended that union meeting, Mazzoni denied that he knew how many attended. According to Mazzoni, it was "a pure guess." Mazzoni testified that he took a guess and figured that one-third of the employees would be interested in attending the union meeting, one-third would not be, and one-third would not care. Thus, of approximately 40 employees, 13 would attend. When asked why he made reference to any number, Mazzoni replied, "I have no reason."

As noted previously, also in dispute is whether Foreman Greg Ohler made certain coercive antiunion statements. I found Ohler not to be a credible witness and reject his denials. I find him to be generally vague, elusive, unsure, unresponsive, and implausible. For example, Ohler denied that he told employees "directly" that if the Union got in, the Company would close. When asked what he told the employees, Ohler responded, "Well, just like [there] might be rumors. I don't have any control over that myself whether the Company stays open or closes." A moment later Ohler displayed more confusion and uncertainty adding, "I don't know what I said. I don't think I said it would close."

It also appears, and I find, that Ohler took liberties with candor by testifying that Gupta merely asked him to make a speech to employees on behalf of Respondent without discussing the contents of such a speech. According to Ohler, Gupta's request that he make such a speech was "spur of the moment." Even Gupta acknowledged that "[Ohler] discussed with me what he thought he would speak." Clearly Gupta did not treat Ohler's speech on the basis of "spur of the moment." Thus Gupta testified that about 2 weeks before Ohler's speech, as part of Respondent's election campaign "strategy," the decision was made to have Ohler speak to all the employees on behalf of Respondent.

In sum, on the basis of the foregoing, the entire record, including demeanor factors, and except in those instances in which I specifically credit Respondent's witnesses, I credit the General Counsel's witnesses in all material respects when the testimony is in conflict.

2. The 8(a)(1) allegations

Having disposed of virtually all material credibility disputes in favor of the General Counsel, it then follows, and I find, for reasons noted more fully below, that Respondent, by its supervisors and/or agents, unlawfully interfered with employees within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) by, inter alia, coercively interrogating employees about their union activities; conveying the impression to employees that their union activities were under surveillance; threatening employees with certain reprisals, including a plant shutdown; and promising higher wages and other benefits if the employees abandoned their support for the Union.

a. Interrogation

In large part, the testimony adduced by the General Counsel regarding the questioning of employees about their union activities by Respondent's officials was uncontroverted or admitted. Respondent, however, relying largely on the Board's decision in Rossmore House, 269 NLRB 1176 (1984), contends that such questioning was noncoercive and directed against employees "who should be considered open and active Union supporters." Regarding those employees who were not open and active union supporters, Respondent contends that its questioning of them was merely "innocuous" and not accompanied by threats or promises. Respondent also contends that such noncoercive questioning is privileged free speech under Section 8(c) of the Act.[19] [18] Later, Mazzoni supplied still another reason for transferring Ross out of the storeroom. According to Mazzoni, he decided to experiment and consolidate the work in the storeroom so that Jerry Beduck, an inspector, could also do the paperwork in that department (Tr. 731).

In Rossmore House, the Board held that in the total circumstances of that case, the questioning of a known and active union adherent about his union sentiments, unaccompanied by threats or promises, was noncoercive and did not violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. In so finding, the Board signaled its disapproval of any per se approach in analyzing alleged unlawful interrogation. Above at 1177. The Board noted some of the factors that may be considered, such as (1) the background; (2) the nature of the information sought; (3) the identity of the questioner; and (4) the place and method of interrogation (above at 1178 fn. 20).

In Sunnyvale Medical Clinic, 277 NLRB 1217 (1985), the Board applied the totality-of-circumstances test to a questioned employee who, unlike Rossmore House, was not an open and active union supporter. There, as in Rossmore House, the Board found the questioning noncoercive and lawful. The Board noted, inter alia, an absence of any history of animus or discrimination against union supporters; that the disputed questioning was general and nonthreatening; and that the questioner and individual involved had a friendly relationship and their conversation was casual and amicable.

The instant case disclosed a number of significant factors clearly distinct from the circumstances found in Rossmore House or Sunnyvale Medical Clinic. For the most part, the inquiries in dispute were not isolated, casual, or conducted in a context free of union hostility or other serious unfair labor practices. The admitted interrogations by Gupta on 27 September, as described below, are cases in point.

Respondent does not dispute that on 27 September, in the afternoon, employees Rose Miller, Brian Moree, and Richard Sneddon were separately summoned into Gupta's office, where they were asked by Gupta whether they attended the union meeting held the previous evening and why, and if they had signed union cards. Mazzoni, Respondent's plant manager, was also present. In evaluating the total circumstances, it must also be noted that the previous day, Gupta has repeated his profoundly held opposition to the Union to all his employees at a company-called meeting; that he urged his employees on that occasion to get their union cards back and throw them away; and that he told them not to attend the union meeting that night. Against this backdrop, I find no discernible basis for treating disputed inquiries of employees, one at a time, by the highest company officials in the owner's office (the locus of final authority), as isolated, casual, or nonthreatening. In any event, the record disclosed much more reflecting on the coercive nature of the interrogation.

Contrary to Respondent's assertions, Gupta did not limit his conversation with these employees to the aforenoted inquiries. Thus, Miller testified credibly and without contradiction that Gupta told her that he was "shocked" and "disappointed" that she had attended the union meeting. Gupta also inquired of Miller whether her husband was "a union man" and whether he put her up to it. In these circumstances, such inquiries cannot be deemed to be "casual" or "innocuous." Rather, this kind of probing more closely resembles a confrontation, with the employee forced to take a defensive posture for no legitimate reason. In Miller's case, she defended herself by telling Gupta "I didn't do anything [wrong]. No my husband doesn't tell me what to do." Miller was "upset" and left Gupta's office in a state of tears. I also reject the notion that Miller was an open and active union supporter. Clearly, the fact that Miller volunteered to Mazzoni that she had attended the union meeting does not establish that she was a self-proclaimed union advocate. Cf. Premier Rubber Co., 272 NLRB 466 (1984) (questioned employees who wore union buttons).

As noted previously, Brian Moree and Richard Sneddon were interrogated separately much in the same manner as Miller. In the meeting with Moree, in addition to Gupta's inquiries, Mazzoni reminded him (Moree) of the Company's practice to frequently move employees around from job to job, but that this was not done to Moree because the Company knew that he enjoyed his job and that he could be trusted. Although Mazzoni's remarks contain an element of ambiguity, it is likely, and I am persuaded, that they were calculated to remind Moree, in a pressure setting (locus of final authority), that he (Moree) continued to work at a job he enjoyed at the pleasure of the Company and to get him to rethink his support for the Union. As such, I find that the questioning of Moree (as with Miller and Sneddon) in the manner and circumstances undertaken tends to restrain, interfere with, and coerce employees in violation of Section 8(a)(1), as alleged.

Later that same afternoon Gupta appeared at the work station of employee Barbara Potocnik and questioned her about her attendance at the union meeting. Gupta told Potocnik that he wanted to know why she went to the meeting because she had only been employed by the Company for 1 month. I find such questioning of Potocnik also coercive, noting, inter alia, that over the preceding few days, Gupta's distaste of unions was widely publicized; that Potocnik, as a relatively new employee, made her an easy and vulnerable target; that she was not an open and active union supporter within the meaning of Rossmore House; and, an hour or two earlier, Gupta coercively interrogated Miller, Sneddon, and Moree. Clearly, in such circumstances, Gupta's questioning of Potocnik cannot be deemed isolated, casual, or innocuous.

Respondent's officials coercively interrogated employees almost from the start of the union campaign and continued this course of conduct and related activities over the following weeks. Thus, on 21 September, only 1 day after union representatives first appeared outside Respondent's Monroeville facility, Mazzoni told Ross that he heard that the latter was the union instigator and questioned him (Ross) about that involvement. Although this conversation took place in a social setting at a bowling alley, the context was hardly casual. Ross did not regard the inquiry lightly; he denied any involvement, assertedly out of fear of losing his job. Similarly, Mazzoni treated Ross' possible involvement with deep concern as he asked the latter to do him a favor and repeat his denial to Gupta at work.[20]

[19] Sec. 8(c) in pertinent part provides:

> The expressing of any views, argument, or opinion . . . shall not constitute or be evidence of an unfair labor practice . . . if such expression contains no threat or reprisal or force or promise of benefit.

Over the following week, Gupta questioned all his employees collectively (meeting of 23 September) and some individually about their reasons for supporting the Union. At the 23 September meeting Gupta not only told his employees that he did not want a union, he also linked the Union with possible loss of jobs and promised to satisfy certain of their concerns such as obtaining a refrigerator and microwave oven. In these circumstances, Gupta's inquiries, when considered along with his total remarks, clearly tend to restrain, coerce, and interfere with statutory rights within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1).

The credited testimony disclosed that on or about 7 October, Mazzoni told employee Gerald Deer that he would like to talk to him and then escorted Deer into Gupta's office. There, Mazzoni asked Deer, "What did the company ever do to you?" Mazzoni also told Deer that he knew that he (Deer) had signed a union card and urged him to get it back adding that the Company did not need a union. Although Mazzoni also told Deer that the Company would not hold a grudge or fire him because he had signed a union card, Deer testified that he still feared for his job. Approximately 1 hour later Mazzoni again pressed Deer about retrieving his union card and still again, a few days later. Here too, I find that Mazzoni's inquiry of Deer to explain his support for the Union ("What did the Company ever do to you?"), when coupled with Mazzoni's other remarks and continued efforts to pressure Deer to get his union card back unduly placed Deer in a defensive posture in violation of Section 8(a)(1), as alleged.[21]

In late October, Mazzoni also summoned employee Patricia Christian to Gupta's office, where he coercively interrogated her about her union card. As testified by Mazzoni, he told Christian, "Pat, I heard that you sent in a union card. Is there something wrong, are we doing something wrong to you?" Mazzoni then reminded Christian of their good longstanding relationship and urged her to tell him if anything was wrong. However, Christian also noted that Mazzoni described the "downfalls" of a union such as forcing companies to go bankrupt and lay off employees.[22]

b. Surveillance and creating the impression of surveillance

It is alleged that on 26 September, Respondent, acting through Mazzoni, kept under surveillance a union meeting at Denny's Restaurant, attended by Respondent's employees. In support thereof, Robert Cable testified that on 27 September someone he believed to be Mazzoni, "mentioned that someone has spotted my car at the Denny's Restaurant." I find Cable's testimony ambiguous, vague, and uncertain, and without more, it falls far short of establishing actual surveillance. Moreover, as noted previously, I was otherwise unimpressed with Cable as a witness (see fn. 12 above) and do not credit his testimony in any material respect when not corroborated. Accordingly, I will recommend that this allegation be dismissed.

It is also alleged that Gupta and/or Mazzoni at various times conveyed the impression to employees that their union activities were under surveillance. These types of cases have long turned on whether the inference was warranted that employees would reasonably assume from the supervisor's statements that their union activities were under surveillance. See Schrementi Bros., Inc., 179 NLRB 853 (1969); 7-Eleven Food Store, 257 NLRB 108, 116 (1981); Aero Corp., 237 NLRB 455 fn. 2 (1978).

According to the General Counsel, Respondent's acts on 27 September of calling some employees into the office to interrogate them, inter alia, about their attendance at the union meeting held on 26 September "is clearly the type of conduct from which employees would reasonably assume that their union activities were placed under surveillance by Respondent." I find that the record does not warrant the aforenoted conclusion. It is noted, inter alia, that the union meeting at Denny's Restaurant was widely publicized. In fact, shortly before the union meeting, Gupta had convened all his employees and urged them not to attend that union meeting. Miller, one of the three employees called into Gupta's office and interrogated on 27 September, had advised Mazzoni a day earlier that she was going to attend the union meeting, and then again informed Mazzoni the following morning (without being asked) that she had in fact attended the union meeting.

[20] Although Mazzoni's inquiry of Ross 21 September was not specifically alleged as unlawful interrogation, the General Counsel contends, and I find, that it clearly relates to the subject matter in the consolidated complaint and was fully litigated. Thus, it is noted, inter alia, that Ross and Mazzoni both testified and were cross-examined regarding this matter. Further, the essence of Ross' testimony regarding the conversation in question was largely uncontradicted or admitted. In these circumstances, the record supports, and I find, that Mazzoni interrogated Ross on 21 September, as contended by the General Counsel. See, e.g., Caruso & Ciresi, Inc., 269 NLRB 265 (1984); Gogin Trucking, 229 NLRB 529 fn. 2 (1977), enfd. 575 F.2d 596 (7th Cir. 1978).

[21] I also find that Mazzoni by telling Deer that he knew that the latter had signed a union card conveyed the impression that Deer's union activities were under surveillance, as alleged.

[22] As noted previously, Mazzoni described Christian as "probably one of the most honest people that I know." I have accepted Christian's account of that meeting in its entirety. Thus, I find that Mazzoni, on that occasion, additionally violated Sec. 8(a)(1) by conveying the impression that union activities were under surveillance and threatening the loss of jobs. It is also alleged that Mazzoni coercively interrogated employee Robert Cable variously about union activities. Because I was unimpressed with Cable and Mazzoni as witnesses, and because the matters in conflict between them are essentially cumulative to previous findings, I deem it unnecessary to make any additional findings in this regard. Finally, it is alleged that on or about 19 October, Supervisor and/or Agent Greg Ohler, inter alia, coercively interrogated employee Edward Ross. I will treat this allegation below, together with other alleged unspecified reprisals made by Ohler on the occasion in question.

Moree and Sneddon, the other employees questioned by Gupta in his office on 27 September, were asked whether they had attended the union meeting; they were not told by either Gupta or Mazzoni that they had acquired knowledge of their attendance. In these circumstances, without more, I cannot infer that these employees reasonably assumed that their attendance at the union meeting or related union activities were under surveillance. For reasons noted below, I find that Mazzoni, on other occasions, created the impression to employees that their union activities were under surveillance, as alleged.

As noted above, Miller volunteered to Mazzoni that she had attended the union meeting at Denny's Restaurant. Miller also testified that Mazzoni, in turn, told her "that he knew that there were—I thought he [Mazzoni] said 13 people [were] at the Union meeting the previous day." Mazzoni confirmed that in responding to Miller, he told her that there were 13 employees at the meeting (the exact number). Mazzoni, however, asserted that his reference to the number of employees was a "pure guess" and denied that he knew the identity of the employees at the union meeting.

Although Miller subsequently downplayed the conversation by asserting that Mazzoni made reference to 13 employees in a joking manner, her own acts tend to betray this assessment. For example, Miller was unable to explain why she repeated Mazzoni's remarks to other employees.[23] Mazzoni himself did not assert that he was merely joking. It appears that Miller's defense of Mazzoni was predicated largely on their relationship, which Mazzoni acknowledged was "quite friendly." In circumstances in which, as here, a high-ranking company official makes reference to a specific number of employees at a union meeting for no apparent reason, which number corresponds or closely corresponds to the actual number in attendance, I find it reasonable for employees to assume that the company has that meeting under surveillance. See Link Mfg. Co., 281 NLRB 294 (1986); Sierra Hospital Foundation, 274 NLRB 427 (1985).

It is also undisputed that in late October, Mazzoni summoned employee Patricia Christian into Gupta's office and told her that he heard that she had signed a union card, and then proceeded to denigrate unions. In these circumstances, noting that Mazzoni did not identify his source and that Christian was not an open and active union supporter, I find Mazzoni's unsolicited reference to Christian's card signing reasonably implies a form of surveillance in violation of Section 8(a)(1).[24] See Pilgrim Life Insurance Co., 249 NLRB 1228, 1243 (1980); Richlands Textile, 220 NLRB 615, 625 (1975).

c. No-Access Rule and interfering with the distribution of union literature

In essence, it is alleged that Respondent, on 13 November, promulgated, maintained, and enforced a no-access rule vis-a-vis the distribution of union literature. The parties stipulated that since January 1985, Respondent's only written notice to nonemployees prohibiting access to its facilities in Monroeville and Penn Hills was a sign posted outside the front entrance of its Monroeville location stating "Salesmen by appointment only."

The General Counsel contends, the record supports, and I find that the no-access sign was aimed at keeping nonemployee salesmen or vendors who had not obtained prior company clearance from dealing with Respondent or reaching Respondent's work force inside Respondent's facilities. As testified by Mazzoni, the Company's policy was not to permit salesmen "or bring any vendor in there, unless it is cleared through us." (Emphasis added.) Mazzoni's use of the phrase "in there" is entirely consonant with the view that Respondent's policy related solely to access within (not outside) the walls of the building.

Mazzoni also testified that on three occasions during the summer of 1985, he had asked vendors to leave the premises. It appears, however, that the vendors had already entered the building without company clearance and were attempting to sell items to Respondent's employees. For example, employee Harold Morgan testified credibly that on the one occasion he observed Mazzoni ask a vendor to leave, that vendor was already inside the facility trying to sell items to Morgan at the latter's work station. The record is devoid of credible or corroborative testimony tending to establish that the rule was ever invoked outside the building structure. On the other hand, employee Ross testified credibly that Respondent's employees (with no apparent difficulty), have daily access at lunchtime to Munch's Lunches, a foodstuff vendor just outside Respondent's Monroeville facility.

Also militating against any finding that Respondent had a rule or policy dealing with nonemployee access outside the building structure prior to 13 November is the fact that the Union had twice before distributed union material in virtually the same disputed area and Respondent had not raised objections. Indeed, on the second such occasion (4 or 5 October), Mazzoni had come to the door of the facility to inquire whether the Company was being picketed, and when told by Union Representative Coates that it was not Mazzoni, went back inside the facility without making any attempt to curb Coates' activities.

It is undisputed that, on 13 November, Respondent's officials attempted to prevent Union Representatives Coates and Antel from distributing union literature immediately outside the Monroeville building facility. Respondent's building in Monroeville is located in an industrial park where it appears that there are a number of building complexes. It also appears that Respondent's premises is part of a larger building structure shared by three other companies (Miss Chic, Responics, and Kenny Korten) with separate access doors for those companies. (G.C. Exh. 32.)

[23] Miller conceded that she repeated Mazzoni's remarks to other employees. Employee Ross credibly testified that Miller told him that Mazzoni knew who had attended the union meeting in question.

[24] The General Counsel contends that Mazzoni further conveyed the impression of surveillance to employee Edward Ross on or about 8 October and employee Joe Shropshire sometime in November. I find it unnecessary to treat these additional counts noting, inter alia, that they were not specifically alleged; that these matters were not fully litigated; and that findings concerning these matters are merely cumulative and do not impact on the recommended remedy. But see fn. 20, above.

On the occasion in question, Coates and Antel arrived at the Monroeville location at approximately 3 p.m., where they remained for several minutes in the parking lot facing the rear of Respondent's facility. At approximately 3:15 p.m. Mazzoni appeared at the rear exit door and told Coates and Antel that "You have the right to pass out literature, but not on our property. I want you to get off. I want you to leave." Coates disputed Mazzoni's claim that they were on company property, contending that the disputed area was a public roadway. Mazzoni told Coates and Antel that he would contact his lawyer (Eckle) to remove them from the property and with that Mazzoni went back inside to phone Attorney Eckle. There were no employees in the immediate vicinity at the time of this encounter.

Sometime between 3:45 p.m. and just before the end of the 4 p.m. day shift, Eckle, accompanied by Mazzoni, introduced himself to Coates and Antel and (as testified by Eckle) told them that "we felt that they were on our property." Eckle asked the union representatives to move to another area in the parking lot pointing out that "we considered them trespassing." Coates and Antel debated Eckle's claim that the disputed area was private rather than public and they refused to leave. Eckle threatened to call the police, but when told by Coates to go ahead, the former elected not to take further action. This discussion took place approximately 15 feet from the rear of the exit door.

The credible testimony disclosed that while the aforenoted company-union encounter was in progress, other employees could observe them from the nearby open-loading area and word spread rapidly to other employees inside the facility. Employee Rose Miller testified that approximately 10 minutes before she signed out, she was told by another employee of the encounter at her work station which is near the front or opposite side of the facility. Miller also testified that she noticed that after she had signed out, at least 10 employees were standing around in the parking lot "to see if anything was going to happen." Employee Edward Ross testified that, around the same time, Mazzoni stepped in front of him making it more difficult for Ross to receive the union material from Coates.

First, I find, contrary to Respondent, that the record is devoid of any probative evidence tending to show that the disputed area is Respondent's private property. Thus, Respondent made no effort to proffer a deed, lease, or other written instrument in support of its private property contention. On the other hand, the credited testimony disclosed that the area between the building and parking lot, about 20 to 30 feet wide, is commonly traversed by cars, trucks, various vendors, and employees of other companies located in the same industrial park. In this regard, it is also noted that there are no signs prohibiting such travel. Even Attorney Eckle's words to Coates that he "felt" that Coates was on "our property" does not smack of unqualified conviction. In these circumstances, I am persuaded that Coates and Antel were not conducting union business on Respondent's private property and trespassing. As such, Respondent's efforts to curb them in the manner set forth above wrongfully and unlawfully interfered wirh employee rights to receive union material, as alleged. See Gainesville Mfg. Co., 271 NLRB 1186 (1984).[25] In any event, I find that Respondent's no-access rule, as it was applied to Coates and Antel on 13 November, was actually a new rule, discriminatorily promulgated, maintained, and enforced in violation of Section 8(a)(1). See Knogo Corp., 262 NLRB 1346, 1360–1362 (1982), enfd. in pertinent part 727 F.2d 55 (2d Cir. 1984); Chrysler Corp., 232 NLRB 466, 476–478 (1977).

According to the General Counsel, on that same day (13 November), Gupta similarly interfered with Union Representative Radulovich at Respondent's other location. Regarding Respondent's Penn Hills location, it is alleged that Gupta "Physically interfered with the distribution of union literature to employees." I find, for reasons noted below, that this allegation is not supported by credible evidence.

According to Radulovich, he attempted to distribute union material to employees about 4 p.m., as they left work, but that Gupta interfered by stepping outside Respondent's building, where he stationed himself a few feet away from Radulovich. Thus, Radulovich asserted that because of Gupta's presence, the employees refused to accept any of his union material and raced past him to the parking lot and their cars and departed.

It is undisputed that Gupta and Radulovich said nothing to each other and that Gupta did not make any physical gesture. Gupta denied that he came out of the building, asserting that he merely looked out from the office door facing Radulovich. Employees Daniel Grum and Lloyd Ohler fully corroborate Gupta. The only other employee to leave the premises during the time in question was Bruce Moree, and he testified that he did not notice Gupta's presence at all.[26] I credit the overwhelming weight of the testimony that tends to contradict Radulovich's assertion that Gupta has stationed himself outside the building at the time in question. Radulovich's affidavit to the Board also tends to confirm Gupta's version. There, in pertinent part, Radulovich stated, "I was standing about 10 feet from the doorway. Gupta had the door open in the building and was watching me. Gupta did not say anything to me."

In these circumstances, I find that the record is devoid of any probative evidence tending to show that Gupta physically, or otherwise, interfered with the distribution of union literature, as alleged. Accordingly, I shall recommend dismissal of this allegation.

[25] The General Counsel contends, the record supports, and I find that the Respondent's acts and conduct on this occasion, in the presence of other employees, reasonably conveyed the impression that union activities were under surveillance, particularly, as here, Respondent had no legitimate right to curb such activities outside its facility. See Gainsville Mfg., above; cf. ITT Automotive Electrical Products, 231 NLRB 878 fn. 1 (1977).

[26] The only other individual working that day was Greg Ohler, and he workerd overtime on that occasion.

d. Soliciting complaints and grievances and making promises in the context of the Union's organizational drive

It is undisputed that on 23 September, within days after the Union commenced its organizational drive, Respondent convened all its employees at its Monroeville facility to dissuade them from supporting the Union. Gupta told his employees that Respondent was a young company and could not afford a union and that the employees did not need a union. In the course of this speech, Gupta acknowledged that "maybe" he had not paid sufficient attention, but he was now prepared to listen. As testified by Gupta he asked the employees "to [tell] us what are the things that bother you. What are the things you want us to look into." Employee Frank Sabash pointed out that employees were afraid to talk to Gupta. Gupta replied that his door is always open and that employees could talk to him at any time.

The employees raised some 20 to 25 items of concern that were noted in writing by a Gupta official at Gupta's request. Although Gupta rejected some of these items, he was receptive to others and promised to provide a refrigerator and microwave oven, items requested by one of the employees.[27]

Gupta apparently perceived Sabash to be an employee-spokesman. Within days of the 23 September meeting, Gupta approached Sabash at the latter's work station to learn more about the employees' concerns and their attraction to the Union. Sabash told Gupta, inter alia, that employees wanted more money and broader, family-type hospitalization coverage. It is undisputed that, subsequently, Sabash was ushered into Gupta's office and from there to Gupta's car where Gupta spoke privately to Sabash about higher wages and certain improved benefits to keep the Union out. Sabash testified credibly without contradiction that Gupta promised to provide 25-cent across-the-board wage increases, with an additional 25 cents for the second shift and improved family insurance coverage "if I helped him talk people out of voting for the Union." As stated by Gupta, he told Sabash "if that's what it takes [to keep the union out], we'll go ahead." Admittedly, Gupta expected Sabash to bring these promises to the attention of other employees.

In these circumstances, it is unmistakable, and I find, that Gupta solicited employees' grievance and complaints; indicated that he would remedy some of them; and conditionally promised higher wages and improved benefits to induce employees to abandon the Union. Gupta, by so inextricably linking his actions to the defeat of the Union, interfered with, restrained, and coerced employees within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1). See Long-Airdox Co., 277 NLRB 1157 (1985); Sangamo Western 251 NLRB 1597, 1608-1610 (1980); Studio S. J. T., supra.

e. Soliciting employees to repudiate the Union, to revoke union authorization cards and offering assistance therewith, and instructing employees not to attend a union meeting

The record disclosed that at the 23 September meeting, Gupta convened all his employees for the principal purpose of urging them to repudiate the Union. As noted previously, he told his employees that the Company could not afford a union and that they did not need a union.

It is also undisputed that Gupta, on his own initiative, told his employees at that 23 September meeting to discard their union authorization cards. Further, Gupta instructed those employees who had already submitted signed cards to the Union to send letters to the Union asking for those cards to be returned. Mazzoni advised the employees to send the letters by certified mail and noted that he had posted the union address on the bulletin board. The credited testimony also disclosed that Mazzoni offered to help any employee needing assistance in writing the letter. I find, for reasons noted below, that Respondent by such statements, acts, and conduct unlawfully interfered with and restrained employees in violation of Section 8(a)(1).

Although under "[e]stablished Board principle," employers may bring to employees' attention their right to resign from the Union and revoke authorizations if done in a setting free of promises of benefit or threats and coercion, "employers may not solicit employees to withdraw from union membership." (Emphasis added.) See Ace Hardware Corp., 271 NLRB 1174 (1984). Here, inter alia, Respondent's unrequested advice regarding the mechanics of revocation was coupled with a command that employees tear up their union cards and throw them away.[28] Respondent's reliance on Aircraft Hydro-Forming, 221 NLRB 581 (1975), is factually distinguishable and misplaced. There, the employer made no attempt to elicit information whether employees availed themselves of its unrequested advice, nor did it assist or offer to assist employees in the process of revocation. It was noted, however, that "giving assistance where the idea originates with the employer is violative of the Act." Above at 583. In the instant case, aside from Respondent's offer of assistance on 23 September, the record disclosed that Respondent, by Mazzoni, in early October actually assisted employees Dinning, Lukehart, and Smutek in the revocation process. Thus, Respondent, inter alia, provided the stationery on which the letters were written, supplied the revocation language, reminded these employees that the letters had to be certified, and also provided the Union's address.

I reject Respondent's contention that these employees approached Mazzoni of their "own free will" and that therefore the revocations "were not [the product] of any impermissible conduct" on its part. Respondent fails to address its earlier unrequested efforts on 23 and 26 September to get employees to repudiate the Union and retrieve their union cards. Denning, for example, recalled Mazzoni stating at one of their meetings that he would help employees write the revocation letters. It is also noted that alleged discriminatees Diskevich and Zang were discharged before these employees approached Mazzoni for help in retrieving their union cards. On this subject, Respondent's witness, Smutek, provided the following explanation for withdrawing her card: "[T]he Union didn't show me anything. Bob Zang and Dave Diskevich didn't get their jobs back. Also . . . there's a lot other people that are unemployed because the Union." Dinning testified in a similar fashion.[29]

[27] The record disclosed that the refrigerator and microwave oven were installed about 1 month later. As previously indicated, I have rejected the testimony of Gupta and Mazzoni regarding the timing of the decision to purchase these items as not credible. Clearly Gupta's promise o provide these benefits was calculated solely to stall and defeat the Union's organizational effects. As employee Ross overheard Mazzoni say few days later that once the Company gets the refrigerator and microwave, "they [the employees] would knock this shit off." Compare Studio J. T., 277 NLRB 1189 (1985), in which it was noted that the new benefits "may well have been under some sort of consideration prior [to the ate offered], but they were inchoate until Tasse got wind of the [union] rganizing."

[28] At the same meeting Respondent, for reasons noted previously, unlawfully solicited grievances and complaints sufficient for employees to draw an inference that at least some of them would be rectified.

The credited testimony also disclosed that a few days after Mazzoni assisted employees Dinning, Lukehart, and Smutek in retrieving their union cards, he began to pressure employee Deer about his intentions to write the Union for the return of his union card.

Under all the circumstances, the conclusion is inescapable, and I find, that Respondent unlawfully interfered with, restrained, and coerced its employees in its effort to get them to retrieve their union authorization cards and repudiate the Union.[30] Accordingly, I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1), as alleged. See also Studio S. J. T., above; cf. Aircraft Hydro-Forming, above.

f. Withholding merit increases and bonus payments during pendency of petition

A composite of the credited testimony disclosed that employees generally receive a 25-cent-per-hour wage increase after a 90-day probationary period and are eligible to receive merit wage increases of 25 to 50 cents per hour approximately every 90 days thereafter for good work performance. This policy is explained to new employees by Respondent at the hiring interviews.

Employee Rose Miller commenced her employment for Respondent on 11 March 1985 and received her first wage increase on or about 1 July 1985. Sometime in October, Miller asked Mazzoni about a merit raise, which she thought was due. Mazzoni told her that the company attorney had advised against giving anyone a raise who had not been promised one before the union campaign. I find, in the circumstances of this case, that Mazzoni's statement as conveyed to Miller is erroneous and does not comport with the clear weight of Board authority.

Although Respondent undoubtedly had discretion in the implementation of merit wage increases regarding particular employees it could not predicate the suspension of that policy on the advent of the Union. Stumpf Motor Co., 208 NLRB 431, 433–434 (1974); Gossen Co., 254 NLRB 339, 353–355 (1981); General Motors Acceptance Corp., 196 NLRB 137 (1972). As noted by the Board in Duo-Fast Corp., 278 NLRB 52 (1986): "It is well settled that an employer must continue to provide benefits as if an election was not pending." Here Mazzoni's statement, amounting to a freeze and linking such action to the pendency of the union campaign, contravenes established Board principle and interferes with employees' Section 7 rights. See, e.g., PJR Enterprises, 240 NLRB 274, 277 (1979); Gates Rubber Co., 182 NLRB 95 (1970); Stumpf Motor Co., above. Accordingly, I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) as alleged.[31]

The record also disclosed that Respondent provides a production bonus to its employees on a quarterly basis. The size of the bonus is based on the amount of units built and shipped. Employee Edward Ross credibly testified that on 19 October, Foreman Greg Ohler complained to him that no one, including Ohler, would be getting the bonus "because all this union shit is going on." Ohler, for his part, admitted telling Ross, "Everything is on hold." Because the bonus was an existing benefit, Ohler's statement is governed by the same principles noted above regarding merit raises. Accordingly, I find that Ohler's statement is impermissible and violative of Section 8(a)(1).[32]

g. Greg Ohler's supervisory and/or agency status and alleged misconduct

(1) Supervisory and/or agency status

The record disclosed that Ohler is paid hourly, receives overtime pay, and spends a large portion of his time doing production work in the production area. Although these factors tend to militate against a finding of supervisory status, the record also disclosed that Ohler possessed significant responsibilities tending to support such a finding.

Thus, the record disclosed that Ohler is responsible for meeting deadlines as called for on customer purchase orders and for filling these orders. As testified by Ohler: "I make arrangements to have the job completed by [the order] date so [the customer] receives it on time." To accomplish this, Ohler is directly responsible for assigning all the production work and compiles and maintains the appropriate production records. Ohler performs these recordkeeping functions in Gupta's office, where he spends approximately 2 hours each day. Ohler is also responsible for keeping and maintaining employees attendance records. In this connection, it is noted, that Ohler is expected to be advised if employees are out sick, and Ohler will talk to employees about excessive tardiness. It is also noted that Ohler's hourly rate of $7 is substantially more than the average hourly rate of about $4.50 earned by the other casting division employees.

[29] This testimony will be treated further, below, regarding majority status and recommended remedy. It should be noted, for reasons discussed below, that Zang and Diskevich were found to have been discriminatorily terminated in violation of Sec. 8(a)(3), as alleged.

[30] Given the contemporaneous unlawful conduct engaged in by Respondent on 23 September, I also find that Respondent unlawfully directed its employees to refrain from attending the union meeting on 26 September.

[31] I find that Gupta also violated Sec. 8(a)(1) by telling employee Harold Morgan that he would think about Morgan's request for a merit raise, but that he would talk further with him on the subject only "after all this union business was over with." In crediting Morgan's testimony I have noted, inter alia, Gupta's antiunion hostility and that Morgan's testimony is internally consistent with that of Miller. Morgan's testimony and the record otherwise were too imprecise to support the 8(a)(3) allegations on the merit raises in question. Morgan exhibited poor recall and his testimony on this subject was disjointed, somewhat inconsistent, unclear, and otherwise unsupported by credible or probative evidence. Because the General Counsel has not established by a preponderance of credible or probative evidence that Respondent has actually withheld merit raises in violation of Section 8(a)(3), I will recommend that these allegations be dismissed.

[32] I find, for reasons discussed separately below, that Ohler is a statutory superior. As such, I will treat more fully the conversation in question as well as other alleged misconduct by Ohler.

Although the foregoing factors are not inconsequential, I find even more significance in the fact that Ohler is in complete charge of the casting division in Gupta's absences. As Gupta splits his time between the Penn Hills and Monroeville facilities, there are substantial periods, including Gupta's vacations, when Ohler is the highest-ranking company official at Penn Hills. On all occasions, Ohler reports only to Gupta, as does Mazzoni, the plant manager at Monroeville.

Still further, it appears that Respondent also perceived Ohler to be supervisory or managerial as it did not include his home on the election eligibility list. In this regard, it is also noted that Ohler was admittedly scheduled by Respondent to deliver a campaign speech on its behalf at the Monroeville facility and was introduced on that occasion as a "boss" (as credibly testified by employee Ross).[33]

Under all the circumstances, noting particularly that Ohler, on numerous occasions, was the highest-ranking company official at Penn Hills, in charge of the casting division employees, and exercised some independent judgment in this regard, I find that at all material times Ohler performed as a statutory supervisor and agent, as alleged.

(2) Ohler's alleged misconduct

For reasons discussed previously, I found Ohler's statement to Ross on 19 October blaming the Union for Respondent's withholding of bonus payments, to be violative of Section 8(a)(1). Ohler conceded, inter alia, that on the same occasion he told Ross that he had heard Ross' name concerning the Union; that he asked Ross "what he heard about the Union"; and that he asked Ross "who was organizing [the Union]." Ross testified credibly that Ohler also told him that "if he [Ohler] got his hands on the guy who started this, he would make life rough for him." Although Ohler denied that he threatened any reprisals, he admitted telling Ross that "[he] would like to get [his] hands on the person doing this union stuff."

Having found Ohler to be a statutory supervisor, I further find that Respondent, by Ohler's remarks, unlawfully interrogated Ross and threatened unspecified reprisals in violation of Section 8(a)(1), as alleged.

The General Counsel also contends, the credited testimony supports, the matter has been fully litigated, and I find that Ohler threatened employees in violation of Section 8(a)(1) with a reduction in wages to the minimum hourly rate[34] and a possible plant closedown if the Union got in.[35]

h. References to Westinghouse, threatening loss of jobs, plant shutdown, and other unspecified reprisals

Respondent's Monroeville facility produces resistors. It is undisputed that Respondent's sole customer for resistors is Westinghouse. The record disclosed that after the Union initiated its organizing campaign and both before and after the union representation petition was filed, Gupta made reference to Westinghouse in antiunion speeches. The first such occurrence was on 23 September, 3 days after the Union first appeared at Respondent's Monroeville facility to distribute the union material. On that occasion, Gupta convened all his employees and told them that they did not need a union noting, inter alia, that Westinghouse would probably not like the idea of Respondent's employees being unionized either.

Although for reasons discussed previously, I found that Gupta, on the occasion in question, inter alia, unlawfully solicited employee grievances, I am not persuaded and reject the General Counsel's contention that Gupta also threatened employees at that time with the specter of Westinghouse pulling its contract and dealing with another supplier. In this connection, it is noted that although the General Counsel paraded a host of witnesses, only former employee Joe Shropshire testified in support thereof and only after being led somewhat by the General Counsel. Shrosphire may have confused this meeting with the meeting on 13 November in which Gupta admittedly referred to Westinghouse in an antiunion speech dealing with the potential loss of jobs to competitors overseas.

Gupta admittedly told his assembled employees in a speech on 13 November (2 days before the election), that Westinghouse was merely a customer and noted that "competition is tough" with "ten different manufacturers for [our] product worldwide." He explained that "international competitions" are free of union restrictions and to make his point, Gupta gave an exaggerated illustration of a football game restricted by union rules. In essence, Gupta told his employees of a quarterback who is denied the option of throwing to a running back because under union rules, the runner's job description precludes him from catching a pass. Employee Edward Ross testified credibly that on the same occasion, Gupta told the employees that if payroll costs are not kept down, companies relocate overseas and jobs are lost and employees are laid off.[36] Gupta, in advising the employees to vote against the Union and to protect their jobs, admittedly warned that "[the union represented] a very real threat to the survival of this company, and their job[s]."

[33] As noted previously, I found Ohler to be, inter alia, generally vague, elusive, unsure, and lacking candor as a witness. Ohler, when asked whether he was introduced as the boss of the casting division, responded, "I don't think so, no." I found Ohler's equivocal denial reflective of his testimony generally and reject it as unreliable.

[34] Compare Coach & Equipment Sales Corp., 228 NLRB 440, 441 (1977), in which the foreman "remarked on the Company's 'legal right' to lower wages to the minimum if the Union came in."

[35] As noted previously, I did not find Ohler to be a credible witness. Regarding the aforenoted threats ascribed to Ohler by employees Bruce Moree and Greg Schoch, Ohler was ambiguous, elusive, evasive, inconsistent, and implausible. For example, when asked whether he told employees that Respondent would be forced to close down if the Union got in Ohler responded, "Not directly, No." Ohler's effort to clarify was hardly a satisfactory explanation. Thus, Ohler explained, "I don't have any control over that myself whether the Company stays open or closes." In crediting the General Counsel's witnesses, it is also noted that Respondent's witness, employee Daniel Grum testified on recross-examination that Ohler told the employees "in a round-about fashion that if the Union got in, the Company might close."

In assessing Gupta's remarks in their entirety, I find the conclusion inescapable that he unlawfully threatened his employees that if they unionized, they faced the risk that Westinghouse, its sole customer for resistors, would find another supplier, forcing Respondent to close its plant with a concommitant loss of jobs. Gupta did not predicate his warning vis-a-vis, the Company's "survival" and loss of "job[s]," on objective facts. For example, the record is devoid of any evidence tending to show that Westinghouse maintained a policy against contracting with unionized companies. See National Micronetics, 277 NLRB 993 (1985); Crown Cork & Seal Co., 255 NLRB 14 (1981). Cf. Long Airdox Co., 277 NLRB 1157 (1985) (employer's statement had a "factual basis" and was squarely protected by 8(c)). Gupta's unsubstantiated assertion regarding the risks of unionization, coming as it did from Respondent's owner and president in such explicit terms, presented a distinct and imminent danger. Compare Tri-Cast, Inc., 274 NLRB 377 (1985) (in which the comments in dispute were "moderate in tone" and "couched in terms of what might happen 'if' certain events occur").

Respondent's heavy reliance on Daniel Construction Co., 264 NLRB 569 (1982), is misplaced and other cited cases are factually distinguishable. In Daniel Construction, a company vice president was asked by employees whether the general contractor would cancel its contract with the subcontractor if they unionized, and he responded, "[I]f we were no longer competitive, why they could cancel the contract." There, the Board found the vice president's remarks protected by Section 8(c) of the Act but noted, inter alia, that he "neither expressly nor impliedly predicted what impact unionization would have on Respondent." In the instant case, unlike Daniel Construction, Gupta stated directly that the Union posed "a very real threat" to Respondent's demise and loss of jobs, thereby focusing responsibility for such economic consequences squarely on the Union.[37] In the absence of objective facts showing that unionization impacts on Respondent's survival and loss of jobs, I find that Respondent, by Gupta's statements on 13 November, constituted a threat in violation of Section 8(a)(1), as alleged. See NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 618 (1969).

The General Counsel also contends that Respondent's posted campaign sign independently threatened employees with loss of jobs in violation of Section 8(a)(1). The parties stipulated, the record disclosed, and I find that the sign was conspicuously posted on the door leading to the office at the Monroeville facility on 8 November and observed at all material times by employees.

According to the sign, jobs are lost to overseas competitors because they are "non-union" and employees' "wages are far less." The wage gap is shown graphically by percentages. Further, the sign noted that Americans in ever-increasing percentages are buying products produced overseas because they "buy products for the best bargain." Immediately thereunder, the sign depicted, in miniature picture form, 12 industries that are losing their share of the American market to overseas competitors since 1978 and 1979 and the percentages. At one side on the bottom the sign concludes, "So plants close and jobs go overseas." At the other side, the sign concludes with the admonition, "Protect your jobs: Vote No."

I find, in agreement with Respondent, that the "[admonition] when viewed in the context of the entire sign becomes unobjectionable." The General Counsel does not contend, nor does the record disclose, that the charts, graphs, or percentages are inaccurate. I construe the sign in its entirety as representing Respondent's opinion on the basis of demonstrable facts that American jobs are being lost generally to nonunion competitors overseas and that Respondent is not immune from such economic consequences. As such, I find that the sign falls short of containing a threat within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1), and I will recommend that this allegation be dismissed.

Still further, it is alleged, the credited testimony supports, and I find that Mazzoni also made various threats to employees in violation of Section 8(a)(1). Thus, I find that on 27 September Mazzoni threatened employee Brian Moree with some unspecified reprisal, perhaps a job transfer, when Mazzoni reminded Moree of the ease in which employees are moved from job to job, but noted that Moree continued to work on the same machine because Respondent knew he was happy and could be trusted. Noting, inter alia, that Mazzoni's remarks were made in an antiunion context, it is highly likely, and I find that he intended to convey to Moree that he too could be moved or face some other reprisal if he continued to support the Union.

Other threats by Mazzoni in violation of Section 8(a)(1) were directed at employees Edward Ross and Barbara Potocnik. Employee Ross testified credibly that on or about 8 October, Mazzoni told him that he had heard that he, Ross, and Potocnik were talking about the Union on the job and that if such information came to him again, Mazzoni would take disciplinary action against both of them. In the absence of any evidence that such protected concerted activity conflicted with any valid nondiscriminatory company rule, I find that Mazzoni's remarks, inter alia, constituted a direct threat of reprisal in violation of Section 8(a)(1).

Regarding Potocnik, she testified credibly that about 2 weeks later, she met with Mazzoni and complained about her job assignments and told Mazzoni that she thought she was being punished for having attended the union meeting at Denny's. As described by Potocnik, Mazzoni got really upset. She testified credibly that Mazzoni responded as follows: "There will be no Goddamn union here; and if a Goddamn union gets in, I'll close the Goddamn place myself."

[36] It is noted that Ross' testimony is largely corroborated by Gupta and consistent with the information contained in Respondent's campaign sign posted on 8 November (G.C. Exh. 5). Although Gupta spoke of the need to keep payroll costs down, it is also noted that Respondent's existing policy provides for merit raises for good work and bonus payments every 90 days.

[37] Clearly, Gupta intended employees to perceive his remarks as a threat. As employee Harold Morgan credibly testified, a few weeks earlier, Gupta told Morgan, if the Union got in, Westinghouse would pull out, and the plant would close down. Further, Gupta urged Morgan, a more senior employee, to pass on Gupta's remarks to the younger employees. It is noted that Gupta's efforts to enlist Morgan were similar to his efforts to deputize Sabash around 1 November for much the same purpose, to wit, to dissuade employees on Gupta's behalf, from supporting the Union.

3. The 8(a)(3) allegations

a. The transfer of Edward Ross

A careful analysis of the total circumstances involving the transfer of Ross persuades me that it was done for discriminatory reasons. Ross was clearly the principal union protagonist at Respondent's facilities. The initial union organizing meeting was arranged between Union Representative Radulovich and Ross and then held on 16 September in Ross' apartment. Ross signed a union authorization card on that occasion, and a day or two later he became an "official organizer."

On 20 September, Union Representatives Radulovich and Coates appeared for the first time at Respondent's Monroeville facility to distribute union material. As testified by Gupta, Mazzoni phoned him at home to tell him "Bad news. We h[ave] been invaded by United States Steel Workers Union."

It is admitted that Mazzoni told Ross the following evening at a bowling alley that he had heard that Ross was "the one instigating the Union." Although Ross denied union involvement, and Mazzoni professed to have believed him, I am hardly persuaded that Mazzoni was satisfied with Ross' assurances, particularly, as Mazzoni acknowledged that he was told by a number of employees "[Ross] was behind the union cards." One week later, Mazzoni transferred Ross out of the storeroom, where his work had permitted him to travel about the facility, to production, where he was physically restricted to his work area. Ross' wages and benefits and work conditions otherwise remained the same.

The disputed transfer must be assessed against a backdrop of Respondent's antiunion hostility and contemporaneous unfair practices, much of which has been previously described in detail. Only 2 days before Ross was transferred, Gupta told all his employees that they did not need a union and directed them not to attend the union meeting that was held later that evening at Denny's Restaurant. Ross was one of 13 employees to ignore Gupta's wishes. I find it highly likely that Mazzoni had knowledge of Ross' attendance, noting, inter alia, that the following morning, he told his good friend, employee Rose Miller, that 13 employees were at the union meeting and that she and other employees were unlawfully interrogated about their attendance at the union meeting.

Of overriding significance, however, in terms of company knowledge, is the credited and uncontradicted testimony of employee Frank Sabash. Thus, Sabash testified credibly that in early November, Mazzoni told him that Ross was moved out of the storeroom where Ross could no longer be trusted because of his union activities.[38] Further, Sabash testified credibly and without contradiction that, around the same time, Gupta told him that there was a chance of Ross going back to his job in the storeroom if the Union did not get in. In the foregoing circumstances, noting particularly that Sabash, for reasons discussed previously, was an impressive and credible witness otherwise, and that his key testimony regarding statements made by Mazzoni and Gupta about Ross was uncontradicted, I find that such testimony clearly establishes a nexus between Ross' union activities and Respondent's disputed action. Thus, by crediting Sabash and having considered the highly suspicious timing of Ross' transfer, as well as Respondent's antiunion animus and contemporaneous unfair labor practices, I find, applying the Board's Wright Line[39] principles, that the General Counsel has demonstrated that Respondent's disputed action, at least in part, was predicated on union or unlawful considerations.

Under Wright Line principles, once having found unlawful motivation, the burden then shifts to Respondent to establish that it would have taken the disputed action, apart from any unlawful considerations.[40] I find that Respondent failed to satisfy this burden noting, inter alia, its shifting positions, conclusionary and implausible testimony, and the manner and circumstances of the disputed transfer itself.

Mazzoni testified that in early September, he and Gupta made a decision to transfer Ross out of the storeroom but not until inventory was to be completed, on or about 23 September. According to Mazzoni's unsubstantiated testimony, on 28 September Respondent needed someone in production and decided to move Ross at that time.[41] Although at first Mazzoni did not indicate that there was anything wrong with Ross' work performance, when questioned further, he later explained that in early September he had decided to move Ross out of the storeroom because he had overheard Ross tell one of his truckdrivers to take his time in returning to the storeroom with his pickup. As testified by Mazzoni, "I wasn't completely happy with the job Mr. Ross was doing . . . there [were] a lot of shenanigans." Incredibly, Mazzoni did not take any action, stating, "I could never prove it." Mazzoni could not recall whether he ever complained to Ross about his work. (Later Mazzoni volunteered, "I probably didn't talk to him," but asserted without corroboration that he had complained to Storeroom Manager Visco. In fact, when Mazzoni informed Ross on 28 September, he merely reminded him that he was told at the time of hiring that he would expect to move from place to place.[42]

[38] It is noted that Mazzoni made this admission against interest around e same time Gupta had deputized Sabash, to work on Respondent's half against the Union. This may explain why Mazzoni took liberties in vulging such information to Sabash.

[41] It is noted this action came on the heels of Respondent's open expressions of union hostility and followed by 1 day the discriminatory discharges of Diskevich and Zang (for reasons discussed separately below).

[42] Although it is not highly unusual for employees to move around, Respondent has not demonstrated by credible evidence the frequency or circumstances for such moves. In this regard, I find, Respondent's exhibit (R. Exh. 3), of little probative value. The information is based solely on Mazzoni's recollection, a witness found to be unreliable otherwise, and admittedly, the document may contain errors. Moreover, the document contains an unspecified number of moves occurring after Ross was transferred and, therefore, is not limited to any relevant or material timeframe.

According to Mazzoni, he thought it necessary to so remind Ross because he did not want the latter to take it "as an insult." Admittedly, Mazzoni said nothing to Ross at that time about any shortcomings, but could not offer any explanation why he had not. Mazzoni's professed concerns for Ross' feelings have a hollow ring, and I reject his testimony as unsubstantiated, implausible, incredible, and unreliable. On the other hand, Ross testified credibly and without contradiction that he received his first wage increase in September and was told by Mazzoni and Gupta that he was doing an "outstanding job." At that time, Ross had been working exclusively in the storeroom for about 2 months.

Mazzoni advanced still another reason for moving Ross out of the storeroom on 28 September. According to Mazzoni's unsubstantiated testimony, the "ratio of direct to indirect labor was getting high." To meet this exigency, Respondent decided "to experiment," by replacing Ross with Jerry Bedoch, an inspector, who could do the incoming inspection along with the paperwork in the storeroom and thus eliminate the use of an "indirect employee." I am unpersuaded that this so-called experiment had anything to do with Ross' transfer on 28 September. Not only was this reason belatedly advanced by Mazzoni, he was unable to assign any weight to its importance in the decision to transfer Ross. In the circumstances of this case, I am persuaded that Mazzoni merely seized on this reason as a mere pretext to cover his discriminatory purpose, to wit, to curb Ross' union activities by restricting his acccess to other employees at the facility.[43] Because the Board has observed, "A pretextual reason, of course, supports an inference of an unlawful one." Keller Mfg. Co., 237 NLRB 712, 717 (1978).

On the total state of this record, noting particularly Sabash's credited testimony that Mazzoni told him that he had moved Ross out of the storeroom because of his union activities, and that such action admission against interest is consistent with the surrounding circumstances, I am persuaded, and I find, that Respondent transferred Ross on 28 September in violation of Section 8(a)(3), as alleged.

b. The discharges of Diskevich and Zang, the probationary employees

David Diskevich and Robert Zang, probationary employees, were both terminated on 27 September, allegedly for discriminatory reasons in violation of Section 8(a)(3). The Respondent contends that Diskevich and Zang were terminated "as a result of their inability to work unsupervised and other [nondiscriminatory] secondary reasons." The Respondent also denied any knowledge of their union activities before they were terminated.

Zang commenced working for Respondent on 26 August; Diskevich on 3 September. From on or about 3 September to on or about 20 September Diskevich and Zang worked largely as a team in the storeroom under the routine direction of Edward Ross and supervision of Visco, the storeroom manager. From on or about 20 September until the time Diskevich and Zang were terminated, they worked in the assembly area under Ron Smith, a leadman.

According to Mazzoni and Gupta, on 20 September, Mazzoni told Gupta that he wanted to terminate Diskevich and Zang because "they were unable to work unsupervised." Mazzoni also pointed out that Zang has been late twice and reminded Gupta that he (Gupta) had observed Diskevich in two "safety" incidents. On one such occasion, Diskevich climbed racks to reach the inventory without the use of a ladder; the other, Diskevich, while walking, held his head between the rungs of the extension ladder. Mazzoni, admittedly, had never observed Diskevich working in an unsafe manner. According to Mazzoni and Gupta, the latter told Mazzoni that he was then unable to discuss the subject further because he was late for a meeting. The final decision to terminate Diskevich and Zang was not made until a week later.

Mazzoni testified that on 27 September, after lunch, he once again went over the reasons with Gupta for terminating Diskevich and Zang, and the decision was made to let them go at the end of the day. According to Mazzoni, he had not taken final action sooner because they had a "hectic week" and they "were in a state of shock." More particularly, Respondent was "shocked" that "the union was passing out cards and . . . [t]rying to organize the place." In the total circumstances of this case, I am persuaded, and I find, that Respondent took all measures it believed necessary to eliminate the Union, including the discriminatory transfer to Ross (previously discussed) and the terminations of Diskevich and Zang. In arriving at this conclusion, I find that all the essential elements establishing discriminatory motivation are clearly supported by the record: animus, activity, timing, and company knowledge inferred from the surrounding circumstances.

The record is replete with illustrations of Respondent's deep antiunion hostility, as previously detailed. A few illustrations bear repeating, particularly those expressions of animus during the week of 23 September leading up to the disputed terminations. Thus, Respondent told all its employees during the week of 23 September that it did not want a union and they did not need a union; he urged his employees to throw away their union cards or to get them back and offered company assistance in retrieving those cards; and told his employees not to go to the union meeting at Denny's Restaurant. In all, 13 employees, including Ross, Diskevich, and Zang attended the meeting at Denny's despite Gupta's efforts earlier in the day to discourage such attendance. The next day Diskevich and Zang were terminated, 1 day before Ross was discriminatorily moved out of the storeroom. A few hours before Diskevich and Zang were terminated, Gupta and Mazzoni coercively interrogated employees about their attendance at the union meeting and their union sentiment more generally. Also earlier that same day Mazzoni admittedly told his good friend, employee Rose Miller, inter alia, that he would bet that there were

[43] The fact that Ross was later permitted to operate a machine that he requested, does not militate against the finding that he was moved out of the storeroom to restrict his union activities. Ross continued to be restricted to an area around his machine and the request was made about 1 month after the disputed transfer. Mazzoni was apparently aware of Ross' preference for the storeroom because he took some care not to "insult" Ross when he moved him to production.

13 employees (the precise number) at the union meeting at Denny's, and Miller in turn told employees that Mazzoni knew all about the union meeting (e.g., Ross' credited testimony). Miller testified, without contradiction, that Gupta told her that he was "shocked and disappointed" that she attended the union meeting at Denny's.

Although the evidence may fall short of establishing directly that Respondent had knowledge of Diskevich's and Zang's attendance at the union meeting, I find that an inference of such knowledge is clearly warranted.[44] As the Board has recently noted, "[I]t has not hesitated to infer a Respondent's knowledge of employees' protected activity where the circumstances reasonably warrant such a finding." Dr. Frederick Davidowitz, D.D.S., 277 NLRB 1046 (1985); see also Metai (U.S.A.) Inc., 281 NLRB 327 (1986).

It is undisputed that at no time during the probationary period were either Diskevich or Zang told that they were not performing satisfactorily. In fact, they testified, without contradiction, that Visco, the storeroom manager, offered to provide them employment references and praised the work they performed under his supervision. Under all the circumstances, I find that the General Counsel has clearly demonstrated that Respondent was unlawfully motivated in terminating Diskevich and Zang, as required under Wright Line.[45]

Having found that the General Counsel established a prima facie case of unlawful motivation, I further find, for reasons noted below, that Respondent failed to show by credible evidence that it would have taken the disputed action even in the absence of union considerations.

According to Respondent, the principal reason for the terminations of Diskevich and Zang was "their inability to work unsupervised." The weight of the credited and uncontroverted testimony tends to belie this defense. Thus, Diskevich and Zang credibly testified without contradiction that Visco, the storeroom manager, told them that they were good workers and that he hated to see them leave his department to work in the production area. Ross testified credibly and without contradiction that he heard Visco make virtually the same comments. In fact, the credited and uncontroverted testimony disclosed that after Diskevich and Zang were terminated, Visco volunteered to provide both of them job references.[46] Although Mazzoni admittedly did not solicit or obtain Visco's opinion of Diskevich and Zang, he checked with Ron Smith, their leadman in the production area, for his assessment and was told that both were okay (Smith's testimony).[47]

I give little or no weight to the testimony of Respondent's witness, employee Laurel Leigh (now a group leader.) Leigh testified that on one occasion, about 1 week before the disputed discharges, she had requested some parts from the storeroom and observed Diskevich and Zang sitting around instead of getting her parts. According to Leigh, Ed Ross was their supervisor but she did not complain to Ross because she could not find him. She also never complained to either Mazzoni or Gupta. In fact, not until November or December (long after the discharges) did Leigh tell anyone about her observations, when she spoke to Respondent's attorney. Moreover, Respondent conceded that Leigh's observations were not a factor in the decision to terminate Diskevich and Zang. In these cirumstances, I tend to view Leigh's testimony as reflecting on the weakness of Respondent's position.

Repondent also provided some "secondary reasons." For example, Mazzoni referred to two "safety" incidents involving Diskevich. The first such incident occurred on Diskevich's first day at work for climbing a storage rack without a ladder. Mazzoni told him on that occasion to get down and use a ladder in pulling merchandise from the higher shelves.[48] Diskevich testified credibly that thereafter he always used a ladder except on one occasion when Jim Sisteck (a group leader or supervisor) had him climb up and pull some boxes off a shelf without the use of a ladder because one was not available. The record disclosed that on occasion, others, including Mazzoni, have pulled supplies from shelves without using a ladder. As for Diskevich walking with his head between the rungs of a ladder, Mazzoni knew of only one such occasion, and he did not observe it himself. Further, it happened in the early days of Diskevich's employment. Diskevich testified, without contradiction, that at the time he was hired, he was not informed of safety rules or regulations. Moreover, it is noted that the decision to fire Diskevich was made by Mazzoni who admittedly had never observed Diskevich work in an unsafe manner. In these circumstances, I am unpersuaded and reject Mazzoni's assertions that he relied on these so-called safety incidents in deciding to terminate Diskevich on 27 September.

Regarding Zang, Mazzoni noted lateness and that he had also misstamped some terminal tags. As for the tardiness during Zang's period of employment, Mazzoni asserted that this factor was considered "quite a bit" in the decision to terminate him. The record disclosed that

[44] The record disclosed that Diskevich and Zang did not confine their union activities to the meeting at Denny's. Zang for example, on 16 September attended the first union meeting, which was held in Ross' apartment. There, Zang agreed to serve on the Union's in-house organizing committee and was designated an "official" volunteer organizer. He also signed a union authorization card, as did Diskevich on the following day. Regarding Diskevich, it is also noted that when Gupta told his employees that he did not want a union, Diskevich was one of the employees to voice certain complaints, i.e., why employees had to use leave time if out sick. Still further, it is noted that Diskevich and Zang had worked in the storeroom under Ross, the principal union activist, and that Zang rode to and from work with Ross, a fact admittedly known to Mazzoni. Mazzoni also admitted that he was told by a number of employees that Ross was having employees sign union cards. I find it likely that Mazzoni calculated that Diskevich and Zang also supported the Union.

[45] Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980).

[46] Although Visco, was not alleged to be a statutory supervisor and/or agent, Mazzoni at times referred to Visco as manager or supervisor and in complete charge of the storeroom. As such, he was directly over Diskevich and Zang and directed their work on a day-to-day basis. It is also noted that Respondent omitted Visco's name from the list of unit employees (G.C. Exh. 4). He was also Respondent's purchasing agent. Visco did not testify and no explanation was offered to explain the failure to call him as a witness to rebut such critical testimony.

[47] According to Mazzoni, in assessing the performance of probationary employees, he relies on his own observations and does not rely on the input of others. He offered no explanation why he appeared to depart from his self-proclaimed practice in his inquiry of Smith.

[48] According to Mazzoni, it was Gupta who observed and spoke to Diskevich about climbing shelves without a ladder. In these circumstances of this case I do not deem the conflict critical.

Zang was barely tardy on three occasions over the 30-day period of his employment, in the range of 2 to 5 minutes late (G.C. Exh. 37). Admittedly, Mazzoni never spoke to Zang about lateness. In these circumstances, I fail to discern how Mazzoni treated Zang's lateness as a problem, particularly as Mazzoni also acknowledged that employees are permitted a 10-minute grace period and are not docked any pay for punching in within 10 minutes of the scheduled reporting time. On the state of this record, noting, inter alia, that Zang's attendance record was perfect otherwise, I am persuaded and reject the notion that the few instances of lateness (never more than 5 minutes), served as a consideration in the decision to discharge Zang.

Similarly, I reject Respondent's professed reliance on the misstamped terminal tags. The only testimony linking Zang to the terminal tags in question is Mazzoni's uncorroborated testimony. Noting that I have found Mazzoni to be an incredible and unreliable witness otherwise, I find, in the absence of any corroborative, documentary, or other probative evidence no basis to credit his testimony on this subject, particularly where, as here, Mazzoni did not see Zang work on these tags, nor could he "guarantee" that Zang was responsible for the misstamped tags. In any event, Mazzoni acknowledged that the decision to terminate Zang was made before Mazzoni learned about the tags, and this was only an "afterthought." I am unpersuaded and reject Mazzoni's bootstrap testimony and, accordingly, I find that the misstamped tags were not considered in the decision to terminate him.

The record disclosed still other factors that tend to support the unlawful motivation finding and militate against Respondent's defenses. According to Mazzoni, he terminated Diskevich and Zang on the same day because he wanted to remove them from the payroll before they had accumulated 30 days of employment necessary to qualify for Respondent's hospitalization plan benefits. Clearly, regarding Zang, qualifying for coverage under the hospitalization plan could not have been a factor at all. Zang had already worked more than 30 days and was already enrolled in the plan (G.C. Exh. 38(a) and (b); G.C. Exh. 39(a) and (b)). As for Diskevich, Mazzoni could have waited another week, particularly as Mazzoni also testified that he needed employees in the production area. The inescapable conclusion is that given the unsettled union situation, he did not want Diskevich and Zang to become permanent employees. Mazzoni admitted as much stating, "I didn't want to hire anybody on a permanent basis until, you know, we found out what was going on with the Union." Thus, on the basis of union considerations, Mazzoni admittedly contacted the Kelly services to hire temporary employees. Mazzoni acknowledged that by doing so, "the employer would not have to be concerned about any [union] organizing campaign being conducted for those employees."

In sum, on the basis of the foregoing, and on the total state of this record,[49] I find that Respondent was discriminatorily motivated in discharging Diskevich and Zang and that Respondent would not have taken this action, absent unlawful considerations. Accordingly, I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) by discharging David Diskevich and Robert Zang.

4. Objections to election

The Union's objections are largely coextensive with certain of the unfair labor practice allegations.

I have found, for reasons set forth above, that Respondent engaged in serious unfair labor practices almost from the time it learned of the Union's organizational efforts to the final days of the election itself. However, I have considered only those objections and misconduct alleged to have occurred after the Union filed its representation petition on 8 October 1985 in determining whether to recommend setting aside the election. The Board has long determined that the critical period for considering objectionable conduct begins with the filing of the petition and ends with the election. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 138 NLRB 453, 455 (1962); Red's Novelty Co., 222 NLRB 899 (1976). Because I have found merit to most of the unfair labor practice allegations related to Respondent's conduct after the filing of the petition, a fortiori, I further find those objections meritorious that mirror the unfair labor practices. See Dal-Tex Optical Co., 137 NLRB 1782, 1786 (1962).

The first three objections listed by the Regional Director for purposes of hearing are closely related and are treated together. They allege that the Employer and its agents engaged in conduct as follows:

> 1. Told Gupta employees "Westinghouse Company would not want a Union here at this plant. We do all our work for Westinghouse."
> 2. Made threats to close the plant if employees voted for a Union.
> 3. Held pizza party at noon two days before election; and, at a captive audience meeting, Company President L. P. Gupta told employees, "Two protect your job, vote 'no' on Friday." (G.C. Exh. 1(s).)

I find that the aforenoted objections are meritorious, noting, inter alia, that they are largely encompassed by my previous discussion and findings that Gupta's speech to employees on 13 November contained threats within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1). Gupta, on that occasion, spoke of the impact of unionization and the loss of Westinghouse (its major customer), to the "survival" of the Company and loss of jobs and finished, admittedly, with this admonition: "Save your company. Save your job. Vote No."

Objection 4 is as follows:

[49] The record also disclosed that only on the rarest of occasions has a probationary employee been discharged. Thus, the record disclosed that employee David Ross did not complete his probationary period. However, his attendance record disclosed, inter alia, that he was absent on five occasions and was treated as a "quit." (G.C. Exh. 36.) It also appears that J. McAllister was terminated after working briefly for Respondent. The record however, disclosed that McAllister was insubordinate and also broke a number of resistor rings during his brief employment.

> Company Lawyer and Plant Manager interfered with Staff Representatives Jack Coates and Tom Antel in their attempt to pass literature after employees were leaving the plant. They stayed to intimidate employees who scattered in all directions. Plant Manager moved between the employees and the two staff representatives from the Union.

The aforenoted incident occurred on 13 November and during the critical period for considering objections. Because this same objection is independently alleged and found to be violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, a fortiori, I find merit to this objection.

The aforenoted objection related to Respondent's misconduct at its Monroeville facility. The next objection ascribed essentially the same misconduct to Gupta on the same day, at Respondent's Penn Hills facility. Thus, Objection 5 states as follows:

> Mr. L. P. Gupta, President, did the same at Penn Hills plant. Organizer George Radulovich could not give one piece of important literature to employees.

The aforenoted objection is virtually identical to a separate allegation in the complaint. In recommending dismissal, I found "that the record is devoid of any probative evidence tending to show that Gupta physically, or otherwise interfered with the distribution of Union literature." Because I found no credible record support for this objection, I shall recommend that Objection 5 be dismissed.

I find merit to Objection 6, the last of the Union's specific objections, which states, "Threats were made that bonuses could not be be paid because of Union activities at the plant."

The aforenoted objection was also an independent allegation in the complaint. In finding previously that the threats violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, I noted, inter alia, that the bonus was an existing benefit and that Supervisor Ohler admittedly told employee Edward Ross, on 19 October (during the "critical period"), that because of the Union, "everything is on hold."

In addition to the specific objections set forth above, the Regional Director noted other alleged misconduct that occurred during the critical period that had come to his attention during the investigation of the objections. In this regard, the Regional Director noted as follows:

> This conduct includes allegations that the Employer informed its employees that merit increases were being withheld because of their union activities, that employees were threatened with a loss of jobs if they selected the Union as their bargaining representative that their activities on behalf of the Union were under surveillance, that the employees were interrogated regarding their union activities, and that employees were promised benefits and improved terms and conditions of employment in order to dissuade them from supporting the Union.

The Board has a "longstanding policy" that permits an election to be set aside on the basis of conduct uncovered by a Regional Director during his investigation, "even though that particular conduct has not been the subject of a specific objection." American Safety Equipment Corp., 234 NLRB 501 (1978); see also Carter-Lee Lumber Co., 119 NLRB 1374, 1376 (1958), ("It is well established that the Regional Director in making post-election investigations is not limited to the specific issues raised by the parties.")

In the instant case, such misconduct not specifically raised as objections but uncovered during the postelection investigation has also been included in the instant consolidated complaint. Because I have found merit to virtually all these allegations, a fortiori, I also find that such misconduct, which occurred during the critical period, serves as an additional basis for setting aside the election. Thus, for reasons noted previously, I have found, inter alia, that about 1 November, about 2 weeks before the election and well within the "critical period," Gupta made certain promises to employee Sabash of improved benefits, but only if the Union was defeated. Of particular significance, in terms of impacting on the election, is that Gupta admittedly expected Sabash to publicize Gupta's promises to the other employees and that Sabash, in fact, transmitted Gupta's promises to many of them.

Additionally, I have found, for reasons discussed previously, that during the "critical period," Gupta and Mazzoni had wrongfully and in violation of Section 8(a)(1) informed employees that Respondent was unable to provide merit raises during the pendency of the union campaign (a departure from Respondent's existing policy of providing such raises for outstanding work),[50] and that Mazzoni and Foreman Ohler threatened employees with plant shutdown, loss of jobs, and other unspecified reprisals to dissuade them from supporting the Union. In short, I find that Respondent's serious misconduct during the critical period clearly warrants setting aside the election. See generally B. E. & K. Inc., 252 NLRB 256 (1980).

5. The 8(a)(5) allegations

Having found that the objections are meritorious and that Respondent's misconduct during the critical period warrants setting aside the election, the case now turns on the 8(a)(5) allegations. Bernel Foam Products Co., 146 NLRB 1277 (1964); Irving Air Chute Co., 149 NLRB 627 (1964), enfd. 350 F.2d 176 (2d Cir. 1965).

a. Demand for recognition and appropriate unit

Certain of the critical elements necessary to support 8(a)(5) allegations are admitted by the pleadings and/or stipulated at the hearing.

The parties stipulated, the record disclosed, and I find, that the Union, by letter dated 8 October, demanded recognition as the majority collective-bargaining representative on the basis of authorization cards covering a unit, which I find is identical in material respects to the unit set forth in the complaint (G.C. Exh. 1(o)) and admitted in the corresponding answer (G.C. Exh. 1(u)). I find the appropriate unit is set forth in the complaint as follows:

[50] In the circumstances of this case, it is not a defense that Respondent's officials had raised their position on legal advice. See Otis Hospital, 222 NLRB 402, 404 (1976), enfd. 545 F.2d 252 (1st Cir. 1976). Compare National Micronetics, 277 NLRB 993 (1985). (Respondent statement constituted an unlawful threat by effectively but erroneously informing employees that unfair practice strikers could be permanently replaced.)

> All production and maintenance employees employed by Respondent at its foundry located at 1375 Frey Road, Penn Hills, Pennsylvania, and at its production facility located at 530 Seco Road, Monroeville, Pennsylvania; excluding office clerical employees, technical employees and guards, professional employees and supervisors as defined in the Act.[51]

b. Majority status

As noted previously, the General Counsel contends that an 8(a)(5) Gissel bargaining order is warranted. It is now clear, that in the absence of any union majority at some relevant time, the Board will not issue a bargaining order. Gourmet Foods, 270 NLRB 578, 580 (1984). Thus, the Union's majority status has to be determined as a critical threshhold matter before a bargaining order under Gissel is to be assessed.

The General Counsel contends that the critical relevant date is 8 October, by which time the Union had assertedly acquired its majority and had demanded recognition in writing. (G.C. Exh. 3.) As noted above, the "demand" and "appropriateness of the unit" are not in dispute. However, the Respondent denies that the Union had obtained majority status at any relevant time. The Respondent relies largely on its positions being sustained regarding the discharges of David Diskevich and Robert Zang, the supervisory status of Greg Ohler, and the validity of the authorization card revocations by employees Peggy Dinning, Penny Lukehart, and Debby Smutek.

In evidence is a document containing the names of 40 employees the Respondent contends comprised the entire unit on 8 October, the date of the Union's demand. This document does not contain the names of Diskevich and Zang, both of whom were found to have been discriminatorily discharged on 27 September and, as such, their names are to be added. In addition, the name of employee Robert Cable was omitted and is to be added. Regarding Cable, the record disclosed that he was actively employed until 16 October, when he was suspended until further notice. On the other hand, the name of Greg Ohler is to be deleted from the list because I have previously found that he was, at all material times, a statutory supervisor. Thus, by adding the names of Diskevich, Zang, and Cable and deleting Ohler, I find that Respondent, on 8 October, employed 42 employees. Of this group, 23 employees had signed union authorization cards before that date,[52] a required majority (G.C. Exh. 7, 10–31).

In finding that the Union had obtained a valid majority, I have rejected the revocation of employees Dinning, Lukehart, and Smutek because Respondent provided unlawful assistance and these employees were otherwise coerced by Respondent's contemporaneous unfair labor practices. These revocations, inter alia, were clearly triggered by Respondent's discharge of employees Diskevich and Zang. This was largely confirmed by Respondent's witness, Dinning, who acknowledged that she and Smutek were concerned about losing their jobs and had talked to each other about Diskevich and Zang being terminated and that the Union had not been able to get them their jobs back. Smutek testified in a similar fashion. See section II,B,2,(e), above. As for Lukehart, she acknowledged that when she attempted to revoke her union card, she already knew that Diskevich and Zang had been terminated and had filed unfair labor practice charges over their discharges. Further, Dinning and Smutek told Lukehart their reasons for attempting to get their union cards back before Lukehart wrote to the Union asking for her card to be withdrawn. In the circumstances of this case, I cannot deem the revocation in question to be voluntary and effective to invalidate cards signed earlier by these three employees. See World Wide Press, 242 NLRB 346, 365–366 (1979); L'Eggs Products, 236 NLRB 354 (1978), enfd. in pertinent part 619 F.2d 1337 (9th Cir. 1980).

Having found that the Union made a demand for recognition at a time when it had obtained valid union authorization cards from a majority of Respondent's employees in an appropriate unit, I further find, for reasons discussed below, that an 8(a)(5) bargaining order under Gissel principles is warranted.

6. A Gissel bargaining order

In NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575 (1969), the Supreme Court, inter alia, delineated certain categories of unfair labor practices in terms of their severity and lingering effects on employees when assessing the appropriateness of a remedial bargaining order (613–615). The first such category involved "exceptional cases" marked by "outrageous and pervasive" unfair labor practices that destroyed the possibility of a fair election (Gissel I at 613–614). The second major category dealt with "less extraordinary cases" marked by "less pervasive practices" (Gissel II). Regarding Gissel II-type cases, the Court stated as follows:

> If the Board finds that the possibility of erasing the effects of past practices and of ensuring a fair election (or a fair rerun) by the use of traditional remedies, though present, is slight and that employee sentiment once expressed through cards would,

[51] At the hearing it was disclosed that Respondent relocated its Penn Hills foundry to its Monroeville facility. Although all of Respondent's employees are now housed within the same complex, Respondent still maintains two separate divisions, but one overall unit, in the same manner as it had prior to the relocation.

[52] The record disclosed that employee Brian Moree signed two cards, one on 16 September, which was lost by the Union, and, a second, signed by Moree on 25 October (G.C. Exh. 7). Although the card itself is the best evidence, the Board has held that testimony of the card signer itself is "probative of a union's majority status in circumstances where the card has been misplaced." Hedstrom Co., 223 NLRB 1409, 1411 (1976), enfd. in pertinent part 558 F.2d 1137 (3d Cir. 1977). In the circumstances of this case, noting, inter alia, that Moree's testimony was corroborated by Radulovich, I have counted the earlier card for majority purposes. See fn. 3, above.

> on balance be better protected by a bargaining order, such an order should issue. [614–615.]

I find that the circumstances present such a case thereby warranting a remedial bargaining order. In arriving at this finding, it is noted, inter alia, that Respondent unlawfully discharged two employees, discriminatorily transferred another employee (the leading union supporter), spoke, without justification, of losing its major customer, and threatened a plant shutdown and loss of jobs, which conduct has long been "recognized" as "hallmark violations." See, e.g., Long-Airdox Co., 277 NLRB 1157 (1985). In addition, Respondent engaged in a wide range of other misconduct including coercive interrogations,[53] conveying the impression to employees that union activities are under surveillance, promising and granting of benefits (e.g., microwave oven and refrigerator) and threatening unspecified reprisals.

Of particular significance is that the great majority of the violations were committed by Gupta, the president and owner of Respondent and Plant Manager Mazzoni,[54] and touched all unit employees, albeit in varying degrees. As the Board has noted, "The effect of unfair labor practices is heightened when they are committed by top management officials who are readily perceived as representing company policy and as possessing the ability to implement unlawful threats." Long-Airdox Co., above.

Regarding the dissemination of Respondent's threats and promises, much of this was done directly by Gupta and Mazzoni in speeches to the entire assembled work force, the last of which was made by Gupta on 13 November, 2 days before the election. The record, however, also disclosed that Gupta relied on senior trusted employees to transmit his promise of benefits and threats to dissuade employees from supporting the Union. Thus, Gupta promised employee Sabash that he would provide 25 cents across-the-board wage increases, with an additional 25 cents for the second shift and improved family insurance coverage if that is what it would take to defeat the Union and persuade Sabash to transmit this message to the rest of the unit employees. Over the next 3 or 4 days, Sabash spoke with nearly 50 percent of the unit employees about Gupta's conditional package of benefits, if the Union were kept out. Some of these employees had approached Sabash having already heard about Gupta's promises to Sabash from other employees and they were asking Sabash to confirm what they had heard. Sabash testified credibly with substantial corroboration that Gupta's package of benefits was virtually the only topic of conversation at work. Clearly, such widespread dissemination is likely to impede the election process, and it was so intended. Gupta acknowledged as much by admitting that he selected Sabash to deliver his message because of his high standing among his fellow employees, and Gupta "wanted to make sure the Union would stay away."

On still another occasion, Gupta urged employee Morgan to tell other employees that Westinghouse would pull out if Respondent became unionized and that the plant would have to close down. Other threats of reprisals have previously been described. The impact of such conduct to frighten employees from otherwise supporting the Union is clearly heightened when, as here, employees are discriminatorily discharged. This perhaps is best illustrated by employee Smutek (Respondent's witness), who, in explaining why she decided to withdraw her union card, stated as follows:

> Like I said before, the Union didn't show me anything. Bob Zang and Dave Diskevich didn't get their jobs back. Plus, also, there's a lot of other people that are unemployed because of the Union.

In the total circumstances of this case, noting that the size of the unit is relatively small (42 employees); that virtually every unit employee was touched directly by Respondent's misconduct; that the misconduct was serious and pervasive and included the discriminatory discharge of two employees and a discriminatory transfer of the leading union advocate as well as threats and promises of benefits, I am persuaded that it is highly unlikely the lingering impact of such collective activity can be fully dissipated by traditional remedies. As such, I find it highly unlikely that a fair rerun election can be conducted. I therefore conclude that a union's majority based on valid authorization cards is a more reliable indicator than an election reflecting the employees' representation desires. Accordingly, in the total circumstances of this case, I find that a bargaining order based on the union card majority is appropriate.[55] See, e.g., Quality Aluminum Products, 278 NLRB 338 (1986); Kona 60 Minute Photo, 277 NLRB 867 (1985); Studio S. J. T., 277 NLRB 1189 (1985); Long-Airdox Co., above.

III. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES ON COMMERCE

The activities of the Respondent set forth in section II, above, occurring in connection with the Respondent's operations described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing the free flow of commerce.

Conclusions of Law

1. The Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

---

[53] In all, approximately 20 percent of the unit employees was coercively interrogated individually, including employees Miller, Moree, Sneddon, Cable, and Potocnik on 27 September, and employees Ross, Deer, and Christian on other occasions.

[54] Foreman Ohler was the only other supervisor to have engaged in violation conduct. Ohler's misconduct was largely confined to Penn Hills, where 4 of the 42 unit employees were employed.

[55] It is noted that the record is devoid of any mitigating factors relative to the issuance of such a bargaining order. Thus, management remained unchanged and the few new employees were hired as temporaries.

3. The Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by

(a) Coercively interrogating employees about their union activities and sympathies.

(b) Creating the impression that it was engaging in the surveillance of the union activities of its employees.

(c) Discriminatorily promulating, maintaining, and enforcing a no-access rule and interfering with the distribution of union literature at its Monroeville facility.

(d) Soliciting employee grievances and indicating a willingness to rectify them in order to undermine the Union.

(e) Soliciting employees to repudiate the Union revoke union authorization cards, and provide assistance and instruct employees not to attend a union meeting.

(f) Promising to provide improved benefits if the employees repudiate the Union.

(g) Recruiting, encouraging, and authorizing employees to tell other employees that Respondent will provide certain improved benefits if the Union is eliminated.

(h) Departing from existing policies and erroneously telling employees that it cannot consider merit increases and bonus payments during the pendency of the union campaign.

(i) Threatening to close the plant before accepting the Union and threatening employees with various other unspecified reprisals for their support of the Union.

(j) Conveying to employees that unionization will result in the loss of a major customer and loss of jobs.

4. The Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discharging David Diskevich and Robert Zang because they engaged in union activities and transferred Edward Ross from the storeroom to the production area because of his union activities.

5. The following unit is appropriate for purposes of collective-bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

> All production and maintenance employees employed by Respondent at its foundry located at 1375 Frey Road, Penn Hills, Pennsylvania, and its production facility located at 530 Seco Road, Monroeville, Pennsylvania; excluding office clerical employees, technical employees and guards, and professional employees and supervisors as defined in the Act.

6. On or about 8 October 1985, and at all times material thereafter, the Union represented a majority of the employees in the above-described appropriate unit and has been the exclusive representative of the employees for purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

7. By refusing to recognize and bargain with the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of its employees in the above-described unit since on or about 8 October 1985, the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the mearning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

8. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

9. The Respondent's unlawful conduct interfered with the representation election held on 15 November 1985.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it be required to cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

As I have found that Respondent unlawfully discharged David Diskevich and Robert Zang because they engaged in union activities, I shall recommend that the Respondent be ordered to offer them immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions or, if those positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent jobs, without prejudice to their seniority and other rights and privileges, and to make them whole for any loss of earnings suffered as a result of the discrimination by payment of a sum equal to that which they would have earned absent the discrimination, with the backpay and interest computed in accordance with F. W. Woolworth, 90 NLRB 289 (1950) and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977); see generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962). In addition, I shall also recommend that any reference to their terminations be removed from the employees' employment records.

Although I have found that Edward Ross was discriminatorily moved from the storeroom to the production area, it is noted that his terms and conditions of employment remained substantially the same with no loss of earnings. Because the record also disclosed that it is not uncommon for Respondent to move employees from job to job, and because Ross was last assigned to work on a machine he had requested, I shall only recommend that Respondent cease and desist from discriminatory transfers regarding Ross.

Having also found, for reasons set forth above, that Respondent embarked on a course of misconduct in violation of Section 8(a)(5), I shall recommend that the Respondent be ordered to recognize and, on request, bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the above-described unit. However, noting that at the time the Union demanded recognition, on 8 October, the Respondent has already engaged in serious misconduct I recommend that the date of recognition revert back to the date of the demand. See Kona 60 Minute Photo, above.

Having recommended a remedial bargaining order, it would be consistent that the election in Case 6-RC-9627 be vacated and that the petition in that matter be dismissed.[56]

---

[56] Given the gravity of the unfair labor practices committed by the Respondent, including discriminatory discharges, I shall recommend it cease and desist therefrom and any other manner from interfering with the rights of employees guaranteed under Section 7 of the Act. See Hickmott Foods, 242 NLRB 1357 (1979). In the absence of any evidence of previous noncompliance on the part of the Respondent, however, I find it unnecessary to recommend a visitorial clause for discovery purposes, as requested by the General Counsel.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On April 30, 1987, the National Labor Relations Board issued a Decision and Order in this proceeding in which it, inter alia, ordered the Respondent to make whole certain of its employees for any loss of pay and other benefits resulting from the Respondent's unlawful layoff of these employees because they filed grievances and engaged in other protected concerted activities.[1] On November 5, 1987, the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit entered a judgment enforcing in full the backpay provisions of the Board's Order. A controversy having arisen over the amount of backpay owed the discriminatees, the Regional Director for Region 9, on January 15, 1988, issued a backpay specification (specification) and notice of hearing that was served by certified mail on the Respondent on January 15, 1988, and on the Respondent's representative on January 19, 1988. The Respondent has failed to file an answer to the specification, and its allegations, therefore, stand uncontroverted.

On March 4, 1988, counsel for the General Counsel filed directly with the Board a "Motion to Transfer Proceedings to the Board and Motion for Summary Judgment" and memorandum in support thereof, with exhibits attached.

Subsequently, on March 9, 1988, the Board issued an order transferring proceeding to the Board and Notice to Show Cause why the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment should not be granted. The Respondent has failed to file a response to the Notice to Show Cause.[2]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Ruling on Motion for Summary Judgment

Section 102.54 of the Board's Rules and Regulations provides in pertinent part:

> (a) . . . The respondent shall, within 21 days from the service of the specification, if any, file an answer thereto. . . .
> . . . .

The specification issued and served on the Respondent and its representative about January 15, 1988, specifically states that the Respondent shall, within 21 days from the date of the specification, file an answer with the Regional Director for Region 9, and to the extent that the answer fails to deny the allegations of the specification in the manner required under the Board's Rules and Regulations and the failure to do so is not adequately explained, such allegations shall be deemed to be admitted to be true and the Respondent shall be precluded from introducing any evidence controverting them. According to the uncontroverted allegations of the Motion for Summary Judgment, counsel for the General Counsel had a telephone conversation with the Respondent's representative shortly before the due date for an answer, during which "the relative merits of Respondent filing an answer" were discussed, and the due date for the answer noted. The Respondent claimed that it is defunct and asserted a financial inability to meet any backpay claims resulting from the Board Order in this case.[3]

The Respondent has not filed an answer to the specification and the only apparent explanation offered is the claim that the Respondent is defunct

[2] The affidavit of service of the Motion for Summary Judgment was neither signed nor dated and the record contains no return receipt cards that would establish service of the motion. We note, however, that the Notice to Show Cause, which specifically referred to the General Counsel's filing of the Motion for Summary Judgment, was sent to the Respondent by certified mail as there is a return receipt card for that document. Because the Respondent has made no response to the Notice to Show Cause, including no contention that the Motion for Summary Judgment had not been served, we find that the Motion for Summary Judgment is properly before us.

[3] In a similar vein, the Board's files contain a letter from the Respondent's representative directed to the Board's Division of Enforcement Litigation. The letter states that Ersel Prince requested that the Board be informed of "the current economic status of the Prince Trucking Company." After indicating awareness of the Board's application with the Fourth Circuit for Summary Entry of Judgment Enforcing the Board's Order in this case, the letter states:

> [W]hile Prince Trucking exists in a technical sense on paper, even without a dissolution, it does not practically exist. It's [sic] assets have been dissolved by virtue of creditor's demands both secured and unsecured as this office is informed. This Respondent lies dormant as an entity without its assets, as its business was transportation.
> Due to this circumstance, it would appear that pursuit of this action on the Appellate level is not only fruitless and moot, but also a monumental waste of Government resources.

The letter ends with an appeal to the Board to "end pursuit of this action."

and financially unable to meet any backpay claims resulting from the Board Order in this case. In Star Grocery Co.,[4] in which the respondents made a similar claim, the Board held:

> Respondents' bare assertion that they are unable to satisfy the backpay order because their business is defunct and without assets is an invalid defense in a backpay proceeding where the issue is the amount due and not whether Respondents are able to pay. Neither is it an adequate explanation of their failure to file a timely answer to the backpay specification, and we so find.

We find here that the bare assertion that the Respondent is defunct and financially unable to comply with the Board's backpay order does not provide an adequate explanation for the Respondent's failure to file an answer to the specification.[5]

Accordingly, as the Respondent has not answered the specification, nor adequately explained its failure to do so, the Board grants the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment and deems the allegations of the specification to be admitted as true pursuant to Section 102.54(c).

ORDER

It is ordered that the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment is granted.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the Respondent, Ersel Prince d/b/a Prince Trucking Company, Logan, West Virginia, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall make whole the discriminatees listed below by paying them the amount opposite each discriminatee's name, with interest accrued to the date of payment and computed in the manner prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded.[6] The Respondent shall make the appropriate deduction from said amount of any tax withholdings required by state and Federal laws, and shall submit the withholdings to the appropriate authorities:

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On June 22, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Robert W. Leiner issued the attached decision. The Charging Party, the General Counsel, and the Respondent filed exceptions and supporting briefs and the Respondent filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions[1] and to adopt the recommended Order.[2]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Southwestern Portland Cement Company, Fairborn, Ohio, its officers, agents, succcessors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

CHAIRMAN STEPHENS, concurring.

In adopting the judge's dismissal of the 8(a)(5) allegation with respect to the Respondent's refusal to meet with a union grievance committee of the size indicated in the Union's request for meetings, I find it unnecessary to decide whether, in all cases, the question of how many individuals are to serve as representatives of a union or an employer is a mandatory subject of bargaining. It is entirely conceivable that in some cases a restriction on the number might, in practical effect, be a restriction on the identity of a party's representative; and the identity of a party's representative is a permissive subject in which the other party may not interfere unless "the presence of the chosen representative would make good-faith bargaining virtually impossible." Missouri Portland Cement Co., 284 NLRB 432, 434 at fn. 13 (1987).

The Respondent's refusal to meet with the Union's committee in this case, however, does not involve insistence on a permissive subject of bargaining. Under article 6 of the parties' expired 1981-1984 collective-bargaining agreement, which created a condition of employment that would remain in effect unless the parties agreed to change it or bargained to impasse (Indiana & Michigan Electric Co., 284 NLRB 53 (1987)), the Respondent was required to compensate an employee—according to his or her regular classified hourly rate—when the employee attends grievance meetings scheduled either within the normal workday or beyond the employee's normal quitting time. Compliance with the Union's demand would therefore have potentially subjected the Respondent to greater financial liability than was provided for in the contractually established procedure. Paid time for grievance processing is plainly a mandatory subject of bargaining. See BASF Wyandotte Corp., 274 NLRB 978 (1985), enfd. 798 F.2d 849 (5th Cir. 1986); Axelson, Inc., 234 NLRB 414 (1978), enfd. 599 F.2d 91 (5th Cir. 1979).

I also note that the Union's September 11, 1985 letter to the Respondent described its newly designated grievance committee as consisting of five named individuals and, in addition, "all members of the bargaining unit." I know of no authority suggesting that a union's right to choose its own bargaining or grievance adjustment representative includes the right to require the employer to meet with the entire bargaining unit to resolve grievances.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

ROBERT W. LEINER, Administrative Law Judge. This consolidated matter was heard in Dayton and Cincinnati, Ohio, on 28-30 January 1986 and 16-18 March 1987 on issues raised by the General Counsel's amended complaints alleging, in substance, that the Respondent (the Company) in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the

---

[1] In adopting the judge's dismissal of the 8(a)(5) allegation with respect to the Respondent's refusal to meet with the Union's grievance committee of more than four members, we rely on the fact that the contractual grievance procedure establishing a union grievance committee of four members survived the expiration of the contract. Accordingly, the Respondent was privileged to refuse to meet with the Union's grievance committee consisting of more than four members.

We note certain typographical errors in the judge's decision and the occasional use of "Respondent" for "Union" and "Weaver" for "O'Malley." The appropriate reference is clear from the context of the decision. These inadvertent errors do not affect the result.

[2] The General Counsel excepts that the judge's recommended Order does not include a visitatorial clause. We find that in the circumstances of this case it is unnecessary to include such a clause. See Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

National Labor Relations Act (the Act) (a) on 1 September 1985, unilaterally implemented changes in the terms and conditions of employment of its employees without affording their statutory representative, United Cement, Lime, Gypsum & Allied Workers Division, International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Shipbuilders, Blacksmiths, Forgers and Helpers, Local Lodge D-357, AFL–CIO (the Union) an opportunity to negotiate and bargain on the changes; (b) since 1 September 1985, refused to meet with the Union to discuss grievances if the Union's grievance committee had more than four members; and (c) since 6 November 1985 insisted that bargaining for a new contract be limited solely to counterproposals based on Respondent's proposals implemented on 1 September 1985.[1]

At the hearing, all parties were represented by counsel and were given full opportunity to call and examine witnesses, to submit relevant oral and written evidence, and to argue orally on the record. At the close of the hearing, counsel waived final argument and elected to file posthearing briefs, which had been received and carefully considered. Counsel are to be commended for the thoroughness and quality of the briefs.

On the entire record, including the briefs, and from my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses as they testified, I make the following

I. RESPONDENT AS STATUTORY EMPLOYER

Based on the allegations of the complaints, Respondent and all parties concede that at all material times Respondent, Southwestern Portland Cement Company, a Delaware corporation with a cement plant in Fairborn, Ohio, has been and is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE UNION AS A STATUTORY LABOR ORGANIZATION

The complaints allege, Respondent admits, and I find that at all material times the Union was and is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

Southwestern Portland Cement Company, the Respondent, is engaged in the production and manufacture of cement at its plant and quarries in and about Fairborn, Ohio, the sole site of the alleged unfair labor practices.

For more than 20 years, the Union and its predecessor have represented the production and maintenance employees at the Fairborn facility. Other locals of the Cement Workers Union (since April 1984, merged into the International Boilermakers Union) represent units of Respondent's production and maintenance employees at Victorville, California (Local 49), and at Odessa, Texas (Local 476).

In the spring of 1981, the three local unions at Fairborn, Odessa, and Victorville entered into separate, 3-year collective-bargaining agreements with Respondent at the above three locations, the expiration dates being 30 April 1984 at Victorville, California; 30 April 1984 at Fairborn, Ohio; and 31 May 1984 at Odessa, Texas. Respondent, at all material times, has steadfastly refused to engage in joint bargaining with respect to the three production and maintenance units.

In fact, the collective-bargaining arrangements between the local unions and Respondent, in the three production and maintenance units, were not reduced to a single document; rather, each of the three had a separate "labor agreement," governing the wages, hours, and working conditions at the particular plant; a separate agreement dealing with health and life insurance for the employees in each unit; and agreements relating to supplemental unemployment benefits (SUB) and pensions that applied collectively to employees at all three plants. These separate contract elements, however, had a common termination date in each unit. During collective bargaining, at the three plants, both immediately prior to and following the 1984 expiration of the three agreements, local union representatives of two of the three plants were often present at the collective-bargaining sessions at the plants other than their own. Indeed, all three of the local unions were and are part of a multilocal union bargaining organization (Southwestern Cement Joint Locals Conference), a coordinated bargaining group established by the Union. This "Joint Conference" consists of 12 boilermaker (actually "cement") local lodges representing units of employees at 12 different cement plants employed by 6 different employers including Respondent.

As noted above, the Fairborn collective-bargaining agreement (all four elements) expired on 30 April 1984. The chief Fairborn negotiator and bargainer for the Charging Party, commencing 1984, was Boilermakers International Representative Kent Weaver. He was also the chief bargainer and negotiator for the local unions at Respondent's Victorville and Odessa units. The chief negotiator and bargainer for Respondent at all three plants was Ronald O'Malley, Respondent's director of labor relations. The local union bargainers were responsible for accepting or rejecting Respondent's offers. Actually, they recommended their decision to the joint conference whose majority vote accepted or rejected all local contracts.

With the collective-bargaining agreement relating to the Fairborn unit expiring at the end of April 1984, Respondent served timely statutory notice to terminate the existing agreeement and, by February 1984, sent the Union its proposals incorporating proposed changes. The

[1] The underlying docket entries relating to the filing of charges and amendments of the complaints are as follows:

The charge in Case 9–CA–22509 was filed on 17 October 1985 with complaint issuing on or about 27 November 1985 to which Respondent filed a timely answer on or about 2 December 1985. As above noted, the hearing was first held in Case 9–CA–22509 on 28–30 January 1986 and adjourned until 17 March 1986. Prior to resumption however, the Charging Party filed a charge in Case 9–CA–22942 on 10 March 1986 and the Region issued complaint thereon on 9 July 1986, amended on 19 December 1986. Thereafter the above complaints were consolidated by my Order of 12 January 1987. The hearing resumed, as above noted, on 16 March 1987 and was closed on 18 March 1987.

Company's proposals were forwarded not only to Chief Negotiator Kent Weaver but also to Kenneth Pack, also an International representative of the Boilermakers Union. Pack, who had earlier appeared at the 1981 Fairborn contract bargaining sessions, served principally, with regard to the Fairborn plant, as the International representative concerned with the initiation and processing of Local D-357 grievances.[2]

In 1984, the parties had four sets of Fairborn contract negotiations, each of 2 days: the first, 2 and 3 April (prior to expiration of the collective-bargaining agreement) and thereafter on 17 and 18 May, 6 and 7 August, and 25 and 26 September 1984. During these negotiations, the parties, at Respondent's insistence, followed the procedure of discussing each of the Company's proposals in numerical order with the Company explaining its proposals. By 26 September 1984, the last session of collective bargaining in 1984, Respondent explained only 18 of approximately 100 proposals. None of the union proposals had been discussed. In the parties' respective 1984 proposals, Respondent requested substantial economic and other concessions in the labor agreement and the other areas; and the Union requested substantial increases. Following the 2 and 3 April negotiations, O'Malley protested Weaver's unavailability to meet until May 1984 (after the contract would expire) but Weaver rejected O'Malley's suggestion of a 5-day strike extension and told O'Malley that he did not give a "damn" about his unavailability. Weaver was vehement and obdurate in his resistance to wage and other concessions that Respondent demanded. As O'Malley recalled, Weaver, at the 6 August 1984 negotiations, remarked that he hoped the plant would burn down before the Union would accede to any "give-backs." Weaver told O'Malley that he would certainly resist "give backs" or "take aways" at least in the absence of convincing justifying proof for the economic necessity for such action. My observation of Weaver and the record indicate that Weaver's flexibility was theoretical.

Of the eight Fairborn collective-bargaining sessions, commissioners of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service (FMCS) were present at three. In total, there were 32 collective-bargaining sessions at the 3 unit locations from April 1984 through June 1985, some of which were attended by FMCS commissioners. After January 1985, O'Malley insisted that Weaver schedule collective-bargaining sessions through the FMCS.

Collective bargaining in 1984 at the Fairborn plant ended on 25 September 1984, when the Union filed an unfair labor practice charge alleging that Respondent, in violation of past practice and its collective-bargaining responsibility, refused to provide meeting accommodations at Respondent's Fairborn plant that, the Union alleged, Respondent was obliged to do. The Union apparently had occupied all seats at the plant conference room and Respondent refused to provide other plant meeting space. The Union refused to meet with Respondent in collective bargaining while the charge was pending. The charge was dismissed by the Regional Director on 1 November 1984 and the Union did not appeal the dismissal. After the dismissal, the parties did not contact each other until Weaver wrote to O'Malley on 11 January 1985 requesting meeting dates. O'Malley explained the failure of the Company to secure immediate further bargaining with the Union, on the 1 November 1984 dismissal of the Union's unfair labor practice charge, by testifying that he had promptly sought, through the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service (FMCS), dates prior to the year's end but was informed that Weaver had accrued vacation time prior to the New Year and was unavailable for collective bargaining in that period. Although Weaver denied both that he had a great deal of accrued vacation time and that he took a great deal of vacation in the period of November through December 1984, I nevertheless conclude, in the absence of documentary or other persuasive contrary evidence, that O'Malley was so told by FMCS and that it explains O'Malley's inaction in that period.

When Weaver, thereafter, on 11 January 1985, wrote to O'Malley requesting meeting dates, O'Malley responded on 23 January 1985 (1) that FMCS had been involved in the past in the parties' relations and should continue being involved; suggested (2) that Weaver contact FMCS and have a mediator at the negotiations; and told Weaver (3) that Respondent would meet to negotiate at times and places "as scheduled by the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Services."

For whatever reason, however, there was, on this record, not only no collective bargaining between the parties in the following 5 to 6 months, but there was no contact between them, oral or written, until O'Malley dispatched a letter, dated 27 June 1985, to Weaver (Jt. Exh. 6(a); Tr. 1284).[3] The letter enclosed and accompa-

[2] It is material to find and observe that Kent Weaver and Ronald O'Malley, the respective principal negotiators, reside in and around Los Angeles, California. The West Coast is where Respondent's and the Union's principal business was located. International Representative Pack resides in Kentucky, not far from Fairborn.

[3] The letter states:

Re: Negotiations, Local Lodge D-357
Fairborn, Ohio

Dear Mr. Weaver:

Southwestern Portland Cement Company negotiatiors have met with your committee approximately forty times at Victorville, Fairborn and Odessa in an attempt to reach and conclude successful Collective Bargaining Agreements for each facility. These forty meetings began fifteen long months ago and have failed to produce any satisfactory results.

We have reviewed all proposals. While all proposals at each location are not identical, there is sufficient similarity among them, to allow complete understanding of the issues. Once again, we have looked at your proposals and have looked at ours. Upon reviewing your proposals, again we must reject them as completely unacceptable.

Due to the economic and business changes that have taken place over the past fifteen months, we have put together a whole new complete proposal (enclosed). This proposal is substantially the same as the previous proposal with some changes in various areas; some resulting in minor deviations, others have slightly different positions caused by the abnormal fifteen-month delay by the Union.

The Company is most anxious to sit down with you and resolve this dilemma one way or the other.

We desire to have some meetings at Fairborn within the next thirty days to discuss this proposal, or in the absence of any meetings in the next thirty days, we will be at impasse. Further, if, upon your reviewing this proposal you feel there is no basis to resolving our differences, we will also be at impasse.

nied a completely new and detailed proposal concerning all four contractual elements relating to the Fairborn facility. Again, these four elements were the labor agreement, the SUB agreement, the pension agreement, and the health insurance agreement.

O'Malley's 27 June 1985 letter to Weaver notes, inter alia, that the parties had been meeting, by that time, for 15 months without agreement; that the Company had reviewed and was again rejecting the Union's proposals, that because of economic and business changes following expiration of the contract, the Company was attaching to this cover letter "a whole new complete proposal"; and that the Company requested meetings at Fairborn within 30 days or would consider the parties to be at impasse. O'Malley also observed that if the Union, after reviewing this new proposal, believed that there was no basis for resolving differences, the parties would similarly be at impasse. O'Malley sent a copy of the letter to FMCS.

The four sections of the proposed collective-bargaining agreement, including the labor agreement, are approximately 100 pages in length with accompanying tables. At the hearing, the parties stipulated that this Respondent 27 June 1985 proposal was more beneficial to the Union than the Company's 1984 proposal but it was also less beneficial to the Union than the terms of the expired contract (Tr. 1310). It is in this new offer that Respondent both withdrew its request that unit employees take a $3-per-hour, across-the-board wage cut and, in fact, gave certain unit employees a modest wage increase (Tr. 1313). On the basis of the 30-day timetable, specified by O'Malley in his 27 June letter, Respondent would implement the terms of this offer no earlier than 27 July 1985.

In response to O'Malley's 27 June letter, Weaver, on or about 2 July 1985, telephoned O'Malley and told him that although he was willing to meet with him, he could not meet with him within the 30-day deadline. When O'Malley then accused Weaver of stalling, Weaver told him that he would give O'Malley a choice of meeting with him after the deadline or, if O'Malley insisted on meeting within 30 days, he would have O'Malley meet with Union International Representative Kenneth Pack. O'Malley said that they would not get anything accomplished in meeting with Pack and that they would just be "spinning their wheels" (Tr. 1448). O'Malley then asked Weaver when Weaver would be actually available. Weaver told him that the earliest he could be available was the week commencing Monday, 5 August 1985, but that he was not actually sure he could make it at that time because he might be tied up in that week as well. The parties agreed to get back to each other with regard to firming up the dates concerning when in the week commencing 5 August they might get together. The record of such firming up is not entirely clear but I find that, in the interim, O'Malley and Weaver agreed to meet at least on 6–8 August and continue on 9–10 August if necessary.[4]

On 2 August 1985, Weaver telephoned O'Malley and told him that he might be tied up in the Los Angeles area because FMCS had scheduled a meeting for 6 August between the Union (and other unions) and Kaiser Cement Corporation in San Jose, California. Weaver told O'Malley that he had to attend that meeting because he was the chief spokesman on behalf of 10 International unions and because there had been a strike at Kaiser for a month without a negotiation session. In view of this situation, Weaver said it was unlikely that he would be available on 6 August for the Fairborn meeting but would be there thereafter. When O'Malley answered that he would not accept Weaver's failure to be there and stated that the date of 6 August for negotiations had been "locked in" since early July (Tr. 1325–1326), Weaver told him that if he were not there, Pack would be there; and that he was trying to reach Pack to notify him of the eventuality but had not yet contacted him. O'Malley finally told Weaver that he would prefer to start the meeting with Pack and that he did not want to delay the meeting until the next week when Weaver said his calendar would permit his presence.

When O'Malley arrived at the Fairborn plant from California on 5 August, his local management people at the Fairborn plant told him that there would be no meeting on 6 August and in fact there was no such meeting held.[5]

A. Collective-Bargaining Sessions of 7 and 8 August 1985

There was a meeting on the morning of 7 August 1985 at a hotel in nearby Dayton, Ohio. O'Malley walked into the room and found Kenneth Pack acting as the Union's chief negotiator. Also representing and bargaining for the Union were Local D-357 President Jim Cantrell; Local D-357 Recording Secretary Franklyn Deaton, and Local D-357 committeemen Gullett and Lykins. Present on behalf of Respondent were O'Malley, Plant Manager

[4] Although the precise date is unknown, there was another phone conversation between 2 July and the phone conversation of 2 August, see the above text, infra, in which the parties agreed that they would actually meet on 6, 7, and 8 August and that they would keep the balance of the week open if necessary (Tr. 1322–1323). To the extent O'Malley repeatedly testified that in the 2 August telephone conversation, Weaver did not mention the reasons it would be unlikely for Weaver to make the 6 August 1985 session, I do not credit O'Malley's repeated denial (Tr. 1451–1453) over Weaver's assertion (Tr. 140) that, in the 2 August telephone conversation, Weaver told O'Malley the reason for his inability to be there on the 6 August date: the Kaiser Cement strike and the negotiations relating thereto. I make this resolution against O'Malley in light of O'Malley's admission and contrary testimony (Tr. 1325) that, in the 2 August conversation, Weaver excused his inability to be present on 6 August because it was "something pertaining to the Kaiser strike situation." In addition, O'Malley did not on 2 August, remonstrate with Weaver concerning Weaver's failure to have Weaver's cochairman replace Weaver at the Kaiser negotiations thus leaving Weaver free to attend the Fairborn sessions. O'Malley mentioned this only later, on 7 and 8 August, to local union bargainers. O'Malley's attempt to show Weaver as secretive and arbitrary failed with such testimony.

[5] Respondent offered only hearsay to explain the failure to have a meeting and, on the Union's objection, I excluded the explanation (Tr. 1331–1332).

Ted Stute, and Fairborn Industrial Relations Director Ken Herr. There was a Federal mediator present.

Sometime between 2 and 6 August 1985, Weaver telephoned Pack and told him of the existence of the Respondent's 27 June 1985 offer. He admittedly did not go into specifics; only that there were four parts to the Respondent's offer: labor agreement, SUB, pension, and insurance (Tr. 621). Weaver did not tell any of the Local Union's personnel of the new offer nor did Pack.

When O'Malley walked into the meeting and saw Pack, he asked where Weaver was. Pack told him that Weaver was unable to attend due to his commitments in California and that Pack was there to act as the chief negotiator in Weaver's stead. Cantrell told O'Malley that Weaver had telephoned Cantrell on the prior evening (6 August) and told him that he probably could not get to Fairborn, if at all, until late in the session on 7 August (Tr. 616-617). When O'Malley told Pack that he had no authority to bind the Union and that he did not want to deal with him and had agreed to deal only with Weaver, Pack angrily told him that Pack, as Weaver, was an International representative and had full authority to negotiate with the Respondent.

At this point, O'Malley asked the union bargainers if they had a response to Respondent's 27 June offer. The union representatives, in chorus, asked: "What offer?" (Tr. 503). O'Malley answered: "Well I sent Mr. Weaver a complete new proposal about 6 weeks ago." None of the union agents had known of the existence the new proposal and only Pack had heard of it. After the Federal mediator asked Respondent if it had copies, the Company supplied the union committee members with the new proposal that, as above noted, exceeded 100 pages in its 4 sections. On inspecting Respondent's offer, Pack told O'Malley that the Union needed time to evaluate the documents before they could make a response. The mediator suggested that the parties break off to give the union bargainers time to study the documents (Tr. 560). Thus, the meeting started about 10 a.m., and broke up about 10:15 a.m. (Tr. 558, 561).

At the opening of this collective-bargaining session, the union negotiators not only did not have a copy of the expired (1981-1984) contract (they had printed copies in booklet form that they found to be untrustworthy compared to the actual signed agreement) but they also did not have a copy of the Respondent's 1984 original offer (Tr. 563). When the FMCS mediator told them that he would adjourn the meeting that day until 10 a.m. the following day (8 August 1985), Gullett and Cantrell left to get copies of the old contract and the 1984 offer while the remaining union bargainers remained at the bargaining situs.

At the time of the 10:15 a.m. adjournment, Pack told the union committee that each of them should take one of the four documents to study for differences between the Company's 1984 proposal and the 27 June proposal. After about 1 hour of study Pack told the union committee to concentrate only on the labor agreement section (Tr. 566) because they were "getting nowhere" in analyzing the four titles (Tr. 563).

Between about 11:15 and 5 p.m., the union bargainers analyzed the labor agreement (Tr. 567). Because they did not have the expired contract at hand until 12:30, between 11 and 12:30 they were just reading the new labor agreement proposal. As the General Counsel observes, due to the length of the proposals, the committee was unable to complete review of the documents that day (G.C. Br. 7; Tr. 505-506, 536-537, 543, 567). Moreover, the union committee did not continue its review of the proposal that evening (R. Br. 11; Tr. 540-541).

On the next day, 8 August at 10 a.m., with the same persons present for bargaining, the Respondent's bargainers entered about 10 a.m. and O'Malley again addressed the union bargainers: "where was Weaver?" O'Malley stated that Weaver had promised that he would be there and wanted to know if the union bargainers had a counterproposal (Tr. 570). Pack told him that the Union was not ready to submit a counterproposal because they had not had enough time to evaluate the Company's proposal. O'Malley accused the Union of stalling and said that the Union had plenty of time to give a counterproposal (Tr. 570). O'Malley then proceeded to amend the Company's offer by granting further benefits in the insurance program (Tr. 570-571) but there was no union discussion of these proposed changes. When O'Malley asked the union representatives if there was a counterproposal to any of the Company's proposals, Pack told him that there was no counterproposal. O'Malley again accused the Union of stalling (Tr. 574), and said that because there was no counterproposal and in view of the fact that Weaver had been engaged in stalling and dilatory conduct for 16 months, and particularly because of Weaver's failure to appear at the scheduled negotiation sessions, he was declaring an impasse. Pack told O'Malley that the union representatives had been working on the documents since they had received them the day before; that the Union wanted to reach agreement; that he hoped O'Malley would give the Union more time; and that Weaver would be arriving later that day and would be available for the next 2 days for negotiations. When Local Union President Cantrell then told O'Malley that O'Malley had agreed to meet with Pack in Weaver's absence, O'Malley answered that Weaver said he would be present but was absent, and that the Company would not be available in the next few days. O'Malley said he was heading back to the West Coast. At that point, the meeting ended when the Respondent's representatives left the bargaining table. O'Malley, however, went to the Fairborn plant, dictated a letter (see, infra), and remained overnight in Dayton at the hotel where the negotiating sessions were held and where he and Weaver usually slept.

Weaver flew from California and arrived at Dayton, Ohio, around midnight of 8 August. He did not stay at the hotel where the negotiations were in progress (the Holiday Inn in Dayton) because of the lateness of his arrival. Apparently at the time of his arrival, he telephoned Cantrell and Cantrell told him there would be no collective-bargaining session the next day because O'Malley had left town.

When O'Malley, the next morning (9 August), was in the process of leaving the hotel, he checked the register to discover whether Weaver had arrived at the hotel and discovered that Weaver had not checked in. O'Malley then left for California.

Weaver testified that, on the next morning (9 August), he did not telephone or attempt to contact any of the Company's representatives nor did he attempt to contact them at any other time in order to reestablish Fairborn negotiations. In fact, Weaver did not explain why he did not attempt to contact the Company's representatives either while he was in Dayton or thereafter. (Tr. 143.)

There then followed an exchange of sometimes self-serving and self-justifying letters between O'Malley and Weaver:

(a) Before O'Malley left the Fairborn plant on 8 August, he dictated a letter to Weaver (certified mail), dated 8 August 1985:

> Dear Mr. Weaver:
>
> I can't tell you how disappointed Southwestern Portland Cement Company negotiators are in your failure to appear in negotiations this week at Fairborn, as agreed upon. As you will recall the Company delayed the meetings one week to accommodate your schedule and this series of meetings was locked in the first week of July. Also Commissioner Addison of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service changed his schedule going so far as to postpone his vacation to insure the parties of his availability this week. Moreover, the Company's proposals were sent to you on 27 June 1985, approximately 6 weeks ago; yet your negotiating committee continued their stalling tactics stating that they had not reviewed them.
> This is further evidence of the dilatory tactics the Union has engaged in for the past 16 months. Your conduct this week continues to frustrate the bargaining process. As a result of the Union committee's failure to bargain in good faith, as opposed to stalling, the parties are at impasse.
> Sincerely,
> R. O'Malley
> Director of Labor Relations

(b) Weaver testified that he did not see O'Malley's 8 August letter until around 12 or 13 August. In any event, by letter dated 14 August 1985, he responded:

> Dear Mr. O'Malley:
> Your 8 August 1985 letter relative to the above matter was received in this office on 12 August and brought to my attention on 13 August 1985. When I arrived in Dayton, Ohio on 8 August 1985 and learned that you had terminated the meeting I was upset and disappointed in your conduct. It is obvious to me that you have some (ulterior) motive behind [your] action rather than good faith bargaining.
> You stated that the parties have reached impasse. However, the record will disclose otherwise. We have not reached impasse and the Union is ready to reach an agreement. Please contact this office when you are available to continue the negotiations.
> Sincerely,
> Kent Weaver

(c) Having received no reply to his 8 August 1985 letter, and Kent Weaver's 14 August letter not having been received, O'Malley wrote (Jt. Exh. 9) on 13 August 1985 to Weaver:

> Dear Mr. Weaver:
>
> In light of the bargaining record and the history of our recent negotiations, we conclude that we are at impasse on all issues which we bargained at Fairborn, Ohio.
> Therefore, we intend to implement certain changes and working conditions, wages and benefits. These changes will be effective at 7:30 A.M., 25 August 1985. The changes we intend to make on 25 August 1985 are the complete proposals forwarded to your office on 27 June 1985, over which we are at impasse. Should you have any questions, please contact me. [Emphasis added.]
> Sincerely,
> Ron O'Malley
> Director of Labor Relations

(d) On 15 August 1985 Weaver responded (Jt. Exh. 10) to O'Malley's 13 August 1985 letter:

> Dear Mr. O'Malley:
> I received your 13 August 1985 letter today when you advised that you intend to implement changes in our contract on 25 August 1985.
> As I mentioned to you in my 14 August 1985 letter, we have not reached impasse on the issues. If you implement changes in the wages, hours, or working conditions we will file unfair labor practice charges against you.
> More important however is good employee-employer relations. Good relations evolve from actions or inactions by the parties, meaning of course, "do unto others as you would have others do unto you." The Union's conduct, actions and proposals to you have occurred in the interest of continually improving our relations.
> If the Company has problems relating to the efficient operations of the plant we propose to meet and see if we can find a way, which will not ill-effect the employees' rights, benefits and earnings, to alleviate the problem and benefit the Company. Cooperation between the parties always produces better results than an adversary approach does.
> As I also mentioned in my 14 August 1985 letter, we are interested in resuming negotiations at the Fairborn plant as soon as you are ready. [Emphasis added.]
> Sincerely,
> Kent Weaver
> International Representative

(e) O'Malley responded on 16 August 1985:

> Dear Mr. Weaver:
> We are in receipt of your letter dated 14 August 1985 in reference to negotiations for our Fairborn, Ohio plant. You state in your communication that the parties are not at impasse. While we do not agree with your position, the company is agreeable to postponing its implementation of its last proposal, for one week to 1 September 1985 on the basis that the parties meet and bargain in good faith towards an agreement.
> The Company's representatives will be available on any date between 19 August, 1985 and 31 August 1985. [Emphasis added.] Please advise us of your availability and we will make the necessary arrangements for meeting facilities in the Dayton, Ohio area.
> Sincerely,
> Ron O'Malley
> Director of Labor Relations

(f) Weaver testified that he was on vacation on 22 and 23 August and did not receive O'Malley's 16 August letter until 24 August (Tr. 149).

(g) Weaver, having received O'Malley's 16 August letter on 24 August, telephoned O'Malley on the next working day, Monday, 26 August, and told him that he could not meet with him that week because he was in negotiations with Kaiser in San Antonio, Texas (Tr. 149–150). Weaver also told O'Malley that he understood that O'Malley's boss and Weaver's boss had a meeting scheduled for 5 or 6 September and that they did not want Weaver and O'Malley to hold any more negotiations (Tr. 150) until that meeting. O'Malley said that that was not his understanding but that he would check back with Weaver. When O'Malley did not immediately check back with Weaver, Weaver telephoned O'Malley on 27 August and asked him what he had found out. O'Malley told him that there was no such agreement between the bosses and that if Weaver's boss told him not to meet with Respondent, that was Weaver's business (Tr. 150–151). Weaver told O'Malley that his boss had not instructed him not to meet but preferred that they not meet (Tr. 151).[6] O'Malley told Weaver that he wanted to meet with him on 28 and 29 August but Weaver told O'Malley that he could not meet because of his negotiations in Texas. Weaver added that if O'Malley insisted on meeting, he would meet him on the weekend, Saturday and Sunday, 31 August and 1 September, but that he would have to be back in California for Labor Day, Monday, 2 September. Weaver said that if those dates were okay with O'Malley, O'Malley should get hold of the FMCS commissioner, confirm the dates with the commissioner, and get back to Weaver.

(h) In response to these telephone calls of 26 and 27 August 1985, O'Malley, by certified mail, wrote (Jt. Exh. 12) to Weaver on 27 August:

> Dear Mr. Weaver:
> It should not come as any surprise to you that we certainly are very puzzled by your behavior of late. As you stated in both your 14 and 15 August 1985 letters, "we are interested in resuming the negotiations at the Fairborn plant as soon as you are ready." However, yesterday, when the company offered you 28 and 29 August, you stated you were unavailable. Again, yesterday, after you allowed that you might be available on Saturday and Sunday, 31 August and 1 September, the Company agreed to meet on those dates and then all of a sudden you insisted on a commissioner from the FMCS be present. This latest wrinkle comes as quite a shock inasmuch as in the past you never cared one way or the other about the presence of a commissioner from the FMCS. Nontheless, in the interest of cooperation, the Company contacted Regional Director O'Keefe and District Director Evans of the Central Region of the FMCS, and they have assured us that no meeting need be cancelled on 31 August and 1 September due to the unavailability of a commissioner from their office. [Emphasis added.]
> We look forward to seeing you at the Dayton Hilton at 10 A.M. on Saturday, 31 August 1985.
> Sincerely,
> Ron O'Malley
> Director of Labor Relations

(i) Either on 27 or 29 August while he was in San Antonio at the Kaiser negotiations, Weaver was contacted by FMCS. When the FMCS told Weaver that there was no FMCS commissioner available for the negotiations on 31 August and 1 September (Saturday and Sunday), Weaver said that if there was no mediator available, Weaver did not want to meet with Respondent no matter what the date was (Tr. 156). The FMCS commissioner told Weaver that O'Malley had told him that he was going ahead with the meeting anyway. Weaver told the commissioner to telephone O'Malley and tell him that Weaver would not be there without a commissioner. Weaver testified that he insisted on the presence of an FMCS commissioner because he was convinced that the parties would, at that time, be engaged in very serious bargaining and that the presence of the mediator is necessary "in case you get in trouble" (Tr. 164). By "getting in trouble," Weaver explained (Tr. 165) that the commissioner would keep the parties talking and working when negotiations became difficult.

At this point, 29 August 1985, Weaver flew from San Antonio, Texas, to San Jose, California, for a meeting on the next day Friday, 30 August, regarding the Kaiser Cement strike (Tr. 158). He did not thereafter contact O'Malley.

(j) By letter (Jt. Exh. 13) of 29 August 1985 to Weaver, O'Malley confirmed the meeting of 31 August and said that, unless the parties came to agreement, Respondent was implementing its last offer due to the fact that the parties were at impasse.

[6] I was not favorably impressed with this switch in Weaver's testimony. It not only adversely affected Weaver's overall credibility but also led me to infer that Weaver was using his "boss" as a strawman excuse not to meet. In a similar vein, there is O'Malley's credited testimony, infra, that the Union's hierarchy (Henry Bechtoldt) forbade Weaver and Cantrell from bargaining in the absence of a FMCS commissioner, which condition, I believe, was another strawman pretext.

Around noon on Friday, 30 August 1984, O'Malley was at the Fairborn plant and there had a conversation with Local Union President Cantrell. O'Malley, who had tried without success to obtain a mediator for the bargaining sessions, was told by Cantrell that there would be no negotiation on the next day, 31 August. Cantrell told O'Malley that he and Weaver had been told by the Union's district director (Henry Bechtholdt) not to meet with the Company and that Weaver was not coming (Tr. 1560–1561). Cantrell also told O'Malley that because of the holiday weekend, at least some of the union bargaining committee were not available. O'Malley told Cantrell that the Company was proceeding with the meeting as scheduled and that the union committee should be assembled for purposes of collective bargaining.

The next day, the company bargainers appeared for bargaining and remained in the area available for collective bargaining through 1 September. Neither Weaver nor any of the negotiating committee appeared or contacted O'Malley or the Company by phone.

(k) On 30 August 1985, after speaking with Cantrell, O'Malley wrote to Cantrell, copy to Weaver (Jt. Exh. 14), in which, inter alia, he summarized the relationships of the parties through their communications ending with the Company's declaration of impasse and its threat to implement (Jt. Exh. 9 and 10) on 25 August 1985. The letter continues:

> Subsequently Mr. Weaver wrote on 14 August and again on 15 August stating he would meet any time the Company was available (emphasis added). The Company responded that they would be available any [sic] day between 19 August and 31 August and Mr. Weaver was to pick a day and we would be there. The Company offered Mr. Weaver possible meeting dates on Wednesday, 29 August and Thursday 30 August to which he stated he was unavailable again. In one last final desperate attempt, the Company, in the spirit of cooperation, offered Mr. Weaver the dates of 31 August and 1 September inasmuch as we were up against a deadline of 1 September 1985. At first Mr. Weaver stated he was free on those dates but he would have to be back in California on September 3 1985[7] for another appointment. But on second thought he then felt he needed a commissioner from the FMCS. This latest wrinkle comes as a real surprise since he never cared one way or the other about the presence of the FMCS prior to this weekend. Now, today you notify me that you think he stated his boss instructed him not to come.
> It now becomes mind-boggling how the parties will ever resolve their differences when the Union continues to refuse to meet and continues stalling, dilatory tactics and flaunts the labor laws designed to protect the working man. . . .

> Sincerely,
> Ron O'Malley
> Director of Labor Relations

(l) On 1 September, the Respondent notified its employees of the implementation of its collective-bargaining proposals, to be effective at 7:30 a.m., on 1 September 1985 (Jt. Exh. 16(A)). The notice to employees was also sent to Weaver and the Local Union's recording secretary (Franklyn Deaton). The summary of the benefits in the implemented company proposals was separately posted (Jt. Exh. 16(B)).[8]

(m) Weaver's testimony: Weaver testified, with regard to the proposed meetings on 6, 7, and 8 August, and particularly about his failure to send the Company's 27 June proposal (during the 6-week period after receipt), to either Pack or Cantrell and his failure to be present himself, that he was not present on 7 or 8 August because he regarded the Kaiser strike in California to be a more important problem than whether Respondent implemented proposals at Fairborn (Tr. 184). Although Weaver denied that he failed to send Pack or Cantrell (or any of the other union bargainers) a copy of Respondent's 27 June 1985 proposals and failed to tell them about the proposal in detail in order to frustrate collective bargaining, he admitted that the ignorance of the union bargaining committee, concerning the Company's outstanding offer, would limit its bargaining function to getting a copy of the proposals from the Company (because it did not have a copy), reading them over and then adjourning (Tr. 186). Weaver further testified that Pack, an International representative like himself, had full authority to bargain and negotiate with the Company. As above noted, however, neither Pack nor Weaver had the authority to execute the collective-bargaining agreement. Rather, that authority was vested in the officers of the Local Union who could recommend the agreement to the Southwestern Joint Conference that acted as a committee to accept or reject all local collective-bargaining agreements. (Tr. 188.)

Lastly, Weaver admitted that the Kaiser strike negotiations in San Jose, California, in which he participated as cochairman, had another cochairman who was an International representative of the International Association of Machinists (Tr. 191). Although Weaver testified that it was not "practical" or "responsible" to have the IAM cochairman become responsible for the Kaiser strike negotiations in San Jose and for Weaver to attend the collective-bargaining sessions in Fairborn on 6, 7, and 8 August, he never explained why it was not "practical" or "responsible" (Tr. 192).

With regard to why he did not send copies of the Respondent's bargaining proposals to any of the Union's bargainers in Fairborn, Weaver testified that he wanted to instruct or explain the Respondent's offer in person and did not want to send the Company's proposals out to the bargaining committee (Tr. 192):

> [I] did not want to . . . send [the Company's 27 June offer] out to the committee without my pres-

[7] O'Malley testified that Weaver said he would have to return to California by 2 September (Tr. 1462).

[8] Respondent has not implemented its offers at the Victorville or Odessa facilities.

> ence. And that's why I didn't send it to them in the mail. For some kind of guidance on the matter. The local has at times indicated some interest in going on strike and various other things that we have advised against. And I didn't want something to spark some competition that we didn't think was wise. So I purposely withheld this, with that intent, to begin with anyway.
> Q. But you've already testified that Mr. Pack had the same authority as you, is that right?
> A. That's correct.
> Q. You could have given the document to Pack and said, hey, Pack, here it is, this is what I want you to do with it. You go meet with the people because I can't make it and these are the positions we ought to take and go forward and meet with the company; you could have done that?
> A. But I thought the way I was handling it was in our best interest. Knowing and feeling that we had plenty of time to deal with it even after they received it from the company. [Emphasis added; Tr. 193.]

The above was Weaver's intention notwithstanding in the 27 June letter (Jt. Exh. 6(A)), covering Respondent's new contract proposals (Jt. Exh. 6(B)), Respondent had threatened implementation if there were not bargaining within 1 month from that date and thereafter extended the threat of implementation to occur after the 6, 7, and 8 August bargaining if the parties did not reach agreement at that time.

Although the preponderant evidence shows, and I conclude, that the Union, at all material times, was unequivocally opposed to Respondent's demands for "take aways" (regardless of its willingness to accede thereto on "proof" of necessity) and was itself insisting on wage and other concessions from Respondent, I further conclude that the Union, during bargaining in 1984 and 1985, was mindful of, and content with, the wages, hours, and conditions of employment in the expired 1981-1984 collective-bargaining agreement that remained in full force and effect (R. Exh. 2).

B. Discussion and Conclusions

1. No impasse in 1985

Contrary to Respondent's repeated arguments at the hearing and in its brief, I conclude, as I often observed during the hearing, that regardless of the force, if any, of its argument that there was impasse at the end of the September 1984 Fairborn bargaining sessions (after which the Union filed unfair labor practice charges that were thereafter dismissed), the issue of impasse, at that time, is irrelevant. Respondent's 27 June 1985 contract offer, as stipulated to by the parties and as Respondent admitted, was a brand new offer containing substantial wage and other valuable concessions to the Union (in the form of reducing the "give-backs" in large measure) and, in fact, for the first time, granting certain relatively small wage increases to a large number of unit employees. In view of this new offer, as I continually reminded Respondent (Tr. 1276-1277; see Tr. 1290-1310 for particularization; Tr. 1317-1318) whatever "impasse" existed in 1984 was surely broken by Respondent's new offer of 27 June 1985 of more beneficial terms and conditions of employment to the Union. See PRC Recording Co., 280 NLRB 615 (1986); NLRB v. Gulf States Mfrs., 704 F.2d 1390 (5th Cir. 1983), citing, inter alia, Pillowtex Corp., 241 NLRB 40 (1979), enfd. 615 F.2d 917 (5th Cir. 1980); Builders Institute of Worchester County, 142 NLRB 126 (1963). Thus, I conclude, in accordance with the General Counsel's and the Union's arguments, that Respondent's new and beneficial offer, ipso facto, broke whatever impasse existed during the previous 1984 negotiations. The existence of impasse prior to Respondent's 27 June offer need not be decided.[9]

2. The Union's dilatory conduct

The remaining issue, with respect to the conduct of the parties commencing with the Respondent's 27 June 1985 offer, is whether the Respondent was privileged to implement that offer in view of the Union's alleged failure to agree to bargain or to bargain at reasonable times, thus permitting unilateral implementation by Respondent.

Neither an employer nor a labor organization is permitted to engage in bargaining behavior that inhibits the actual process of discussion, the cornerstone of good-faith bargaining, NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736 (1962). Although the parties, in good faith, must bargain over proposed changes in established terms and conditions of employment following expiration of a collective-bargaining agreement, Sacramento Union, 258 NLRB 1074 (1981), bargaining must be something more than a ritual or pro forma approach; rather, it must be a rational exchange of facts and arguments to increase mutual understanding that then often results in agreement. Dilene Answering Service, 257 NLRB 284 (1981), citing Winn-Dixie Stores, 243 NLRB 972 (1979). The Board oversees and referees the process of collective bargaining, leaving the results of the contest to the bargaining strengths of the parties, neither party being obliged to surrender a position if entertained in good faith, NLRB v. H. K. Porter Co., 379 U.S. 99 (1970). The Supreme Court ruled that collective bargaining is not simply an occasion for purely formal meetings between management and labor where each maintains an attitude of take it or leave it. Although the parties need not contract on specific terms, they are bound to deal with each other in a serious attempt to resolve differences and reach a common ground. NLRB v. Insurance Agents, 361 U.S. 477, 485 (1960). Anything that inhibits this process may be seen as an obstruction that violates the mutual obligations of the parties, NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736, 747 (1962); NLRB v. General Electric Co., 418 F.2d 736, 762 (2d Cir. 1969), cert. denied 397 U.S. 965 (1970); H. K. Porter v. NLRB, supra.

[9] I nevertheless conclude, in order to avoid the possibility of remand on the point, that there was never any impasse. The 1984 negotiations, on the uncontradicted evidence, ended with discussion of 18 of the 100 company proposals and no discussion of the union proposals whatsoever. These circumstances, notwithstanding the Union's subsequent refusal to bargain because of its filing of unfair labor practice charges against Respondent, fail to support the finding of an impasse. "Impasse" means that the parties have in good faith reached the end of their bargaining rope and that neither will budge. The parties in the instant case openly looked forward to further bargaining after the resolution of the Union's unfair labor practice charges and had not mentioned impasse. This conclusion is also consistent with the parties' subsequent exchange of correspondence in January 1985, after the General Counsel had refused to issue a complaint on the Union's unfair labor practice charge of September 1984. The parties' correspondence demonstrates that they both desired to resume bargaining for a contract. Such a state of mind is wholly incompatible with impasse, which is a hiatus in the obligation to bargain, because the parties reached the end of their bargaining rope. See Pillowtex Corp., 241 NLRB 40, 46 (1979); Cal-Specific Furniture Mfg., 228 NLRB 1337 (1977); Builders Institute of Weschester, 142 NLRB 126 (1963). Although it is clear that, in order to find impasse, both parties must believe that they are at the end of their bargaining rope, Huck Mfg. Co. v. NLRB, 693 F. 2d 1176, 1177 (5th Cir. 1982), the instant case is not an "impasse case" but a "dilatory bargaining" case. Both "impasse" and "dilatory bargaining" cases often involve the lawfulness of unilateral implementation. As noted below, in a "dilatory bargaining" case, however, a single party's perception of the other party's tactics is a relevant consideration in determining whether unilateral implementation is a lawful act.

In Roman Ironworks, 275 NLRB 449, 452 (1985), the Board did not unfavorably comment on the statement of Administrative Law Judge Green that:

> It therefore is not necessarily unlawful for the stronger side to make demands or take positions consistent with its strength. Quite obviously, the respective strength of a union verses a company in bargaining is largely dependent on the support of the employees it represents, their willingness to strike and the vulnerability of the company to a strike . . . . Furthermore, collective bargaining is basically a two-way street. Thus while the union may lawfully make demands designed to improve existing employee wages and benefits, there is nothing in the Act which denies an employer the right, for its part, to demand givebacks. Where the parties are negotiating to replace a prior contract, neither side is precluded from seeking modifications to its own advantage. The Act simply does not preclude an employer from demanding that various provisions of the old contract be modified, altered, or even eliminated.

Thus, there is no question that the parties ordinarily may, if the bargaining is in good faith, bargain to impasse and the employer is thereafter free to lawfully implement his last offer made to the union. Huck Mfg. Co. v. NLRB, supra; Cal-Pacific Furniture Mfg. Co., 228 NLRB 1337 fn. 1 (1977); Winn-Dixie Stores, 243 NLRB 972, 974 (1979).

On the other hand, there is a corollary to the rule requiring bargaining to good-faith impasse. As the court noted in NLRB v. Auto Fast Freight, 793 F.2d 1126, 1129 (1986):

> There exists a narrow exception to the bargain to impasse rule: where, upon expiration of a collective-bargaining agreement, the union has avoided or delayed bargaining, and the employer has given notice to the Union of the specific proposals the employer intends to implement, the employer may unilaterally implement the proposals without first bargaining to impasse. Stone Boatyard v. NLRB, 715 F.2d 441, 444 (9th Cir. 1983), cert denied, 466 U.S. 937 . . . . (1984). Accord, M & M Building & Electrical Contractors, Inc., 262 NLRB 1472, 1476–77 (1982).

Consistent with this exception is the obligation of the parties not to seek to stretch out negotiations by whatever strategy, Eastern Maine Medical Center, 253 NLRB 224, 247 (1980); and the parties are required, for instance, to avoid the strategy of appointing an agent to bargain who is without authority. An agent, though he may not have plenary authority to negotiate, must nevertheless have sufficient authority to engage in meaningful negotiations, Hyatt Regency New Orleans, 281 NLRB 279 (1986). Just as an employer is forbidden to deal with a union agent that it knows is not authorized to represent the union for a particular purpose, Raskin Packing Co., 246 NLRB 78, 79 (1979), it would appear that the union is obliged not to send a "spear carrier," regardless of title, when in fact the union agent does not have actual authority—as opposed to titular authority—to represent the union in collective-bargaining negotiations.

The record shows, and I find, that the Respondent was anxious to achieve "give backs" or "take backs" in its collective-bargaining relations with the Union, which "take backs" would substantially modify the terms and conditions of employment of the expired 1981–1984 agreement. The Union was just as anxious to avoid those takebacks and, indeed, was anxious to gain concessions in terms of wages, hours, and terms and conditions of employment. Basic to an understanding of union conduct herein, I also find that failing to achieve its end, the Union was content to sail along with unit employees operating under the terms and conditions of employment of the expired contract. This they were entitled to do unless the Employer bargained to impasse and thereafter lawfully implemented; unless the Union, by its bargaining tactics, would be deemed to have been engaged in stalling tactics that would invoke the narrow employer privilege to lawfully implement without impasse, under M & M Contractors, supra, and NLRB v. Auto Fast Freight, supra.

A. By the early autumn of 1984, the collective-bargaining negotiations that had begun in April 1984 were not proceeding in an entirely hopeful vein. At the negotiation of 25 September 1984 at Fairborn, Weaver told O'Malley: "You'll have to kiss my ass, O'Malley. You're not telling me what to do or what rules to follow. I'll follow my own rules" (Tr. 368). And on the same day, the Union had allegedly occupied all the chairs in the conference room (situs of bargaining) at Respondent's plant so that neither the Respondent's bargainers nor the Federal mediator had a place to sit. Thereafter, Weaver became loud and profane to O'Malley on Respondent's premises (Tr. 369, et seq.). O'Malley believed that Weaver's obscene and heated language was overheard by its vendors, employees, and customers (Tr. 370). Respondent refused to continue to provide a room for collective bargaining and agreed to bargain only at the nearby Federal building in Dayton, Ohio, or at another place where the charges for the room would be split between the Union and Respondent. On the next day, 26 September 1984, Weaver told O'Malley that he had filed an unfair labor practice charge against the Employer for refusing to bargain in good faith by failing to provide, according to past practice, the bargaining facilities at the plant.

Weaver refused thereafter to bargain with O'Malley until the National Labor Relations Board had resolved the charges. The Union's unfair labor practice charge was dismissed on 1 November 1984. O'Malley thereafter contacted FMCS agents for the purpose of engaging in further collective bargaining but was told that Weaver's schedule, through the end of the year, was occupied in large part by unused vacation time that Weaver was going to take.

Although it is true that the next contact between the parties was the Union's 11 January 1985 letter to O'Malley requesting negotiations, and while this does not speak of union intransigence and delay, that letter was nevertheless met by O'Malley's responsive letter of 23 January 1985 in which he requested negotiations and offered to meet at reasonable times and places (R. Exh. 65; Tr. 1468). I find, from the above, that the Union's unfair labor practice charge (with regard to the Employer's failure to provide a place to meet) was frivolous and was based on no reasonable premise. I further conclude that this was a tactic of intentional delay in bargaining, flowing from the Union's otherwise lawful refusal to accept Respondent's "give-back" offer, and manufactured by the Union in order to continue the parties in the status quo of the existing collective-bargaining agreements' terms and conditions of employment. I find, moreover, that O'Malley reasonably believed, in the period following 1 November 1984 through January 1985, that Weaver was on vacation and the Union, therefore, not available for bargaining.

B. Whatever elements of delay on the part of the Union existed theretofore, there was no contact between the parties for Fairborn bargaining (whatever the intermediate bargaining at Odessa and Victorville) from the time of the Company's 23 January 1985 letter to the Union, supra, until it again wrote to the Union on or about 27 June 1985 asking for collective-bargaining negotiations and enclosing the new offer. This does not speak of delay on the part of the Union and it hardly supports Respondent's argument that the period between January and June 1985 must be laid at the feet of the Union as a source of further delay. I find that there was no such responsibility on the part of the Union in that period. On the contrary, I find that both parties were delaying bargaining. If anybody, in that period, had the initiative or reason to seek further Fairborn bargaining, it might well have been Respondent who nevertheless appeared to be satisfied, as was the Union, with the status quo of the working conditions at Fairborn. There is, indeed, no explanation on the record why Respondent did not take the initiative in further bargaining. For whatever reason, in its 27 June letter to the Union (R. Exh. 6(a)), it not only enclosed the terms of the new and improved offer (R. Exh. 6(b)), but also suddenly threatened to unilaterally implement if there were no negotiations in 30 days. Thus, although I reject Respondent's argument (Br. 42) that it was solely the Union's "unresponsiveness" to the Respondent's letter of 23 January 1985 that led to the failure to have further negotiations between late January and the Company's letter of 27 June, and while both parties appear responsible for the January through June bargaining hiatus, I do find that the Company's letter of 27 June, with its explicit threat to unilaterally implement, was designed primarily to get Weaver's attention, to promote immediate bargaining, and to underline the seriousness of Respondent's offer. This is not unlawful conduct, nor is it claimed to be.

After Weaver told O'Malley, at the beginning of July 1985, that he was unable to meet him within that 30-day period, O'Malley and Weaver tentatively agreed to the week of 5 August for the resumption of negotiations based on the new and improved offer. I find that in July, the parties agreed that Weaver would actually be present beginning on 6 August. I find, in addition, that by 2 August O'Malley believed that Weaver would probably not be present on 6 August and would be present on 7 and 8 August, and O'Malley had agreed to the presence of Kenneth Pack as the union negotiator on 6 August to start the negotiations on Respondent's new and improved contract offer. I further find that the parties agreed that negotiations might continue on the 9, 10, and 11 August. In fact, there was no bargaining on 6 August.

When on 7 August O'Malley walked into the hotel room (for collective bargaining) and asked "where's Weaver," I credit O'Malley insofar as he believed that Weaver would be present at the collective-bargaining session. I further find that he was surprised in seeing Kenneth Pack because Weaver told him only that he would probably have Pack represent the Union on the first day of bargaining, 6 August. I further find, as inconsistent with the Union's claim of not stalling and subsequent bargaining in good faith, the following elements:

1. I find that Weaver, no later than 2 August, intentionally prevented collective bargaining of any sort on 6–8 August by failing to send the terms of Respondent's offer to Pack (or to any of the other union bargainers) when he had reason to believe that he was not going to be present. Short of sending the agreement to Pack and the others, he could have, at a minimum, sufficiently discussed the terms with Pack (and the other unior bargainers) to permit informed union bargaining on the Company's offer and, indeed, make a counteroffer to some items at least. Thus, I conclude that Weaver's intentional failure to acquaint the union bargainers with the Company's offer, even as late as 2 August, when Weaver almost definitely knew that he would not be present on 6 August and thereafter, ensured that no meaningful bargaining could occur in his absence because there were no terms to bargain about. In this regard, I was particularly unimpressed with Weaver's testimony concerning why he did not send the copies to Fairborn for the bargainers or why he did not even acquaint them with the terms (Tr. 193 et seq.):

> Q. Why didn't you send it out there in between time?
> A. Why didn't I?
> Q. Yes
> A. Because I wanted to be with it when I sent it out. And in fact I brought all the copies with me when I did fly out on the 8th [of August]. I didn't want them to have it. Not knowing for sure whether or not I wouldn't be the one coming out. If I was going to come out on the 5th or 6th if our negotia> tions in San Jose cancelled, I would have been out there. So I wanted to come with these proposals to sit down with the committee and review them with them in my presence.

> . . . .
> Q. And again, why did you want to be with them? To avoid a strike or avoid a misunderstanding?
> A. Yes, to avoid them getting—you know, if the company had sent a cover letter saying, hey, this is our proposal and we plan on implementing. And after eliminating the arbitration clause and the payroll deduction of union dues and things of that nature, I wasn't for sure what kind of action that the local union might take. So I wanted to sit with them and make sure that we had ample opportunity to discuss it with the Company and see whether or not we could overcome those things before they took some action.

And even when Weaver telephoned Cantrell in early July, about a week after he received the Company's offer, he failed to tell Cantrell of the details of the offer even though Cantrell wanted to know the details (Tr. 196); rather, he insisted that he wanted to speak to Cantrell in person and discuss those things. What Weaver's tactic meant was that the Union could not bargain without him. Fear of the Local Union's suddenly striking, precipitated by Respondent's new offer, in the absence of the clearest corroboration, is wholly a testimonial invention and unbelievable.

Furthermore, when Pack, Cantrell, and the other union represenatives sat down to bargain, it was not only a question of Weaver being the only agent who could actually represent the Union. For, even assuming, arguendo, that Pack and the others were union agents in the sense that they could actually bargain for the Union, regardless of their titles, there is no question that they arrived there with nothing to bargain about. Indeed, Weaver admitted not only that they could bargain only if they got copies of Respondent's offer from Respondent (because they did not have any idea of what the offer contained), but that they would merely receive the copies from the Respondent and then adjourn. On the basis of this uncontradicted Weaver testimony, I conclude that Weaver's failure to timely send the offer or to timely acquaint the Union's bargainers with the offer could only result in a waste of time and not in anything resembling meaningful collective bargaining. This is obstructionist bargaining within NLRB v. Katz, supra, and cannot describe a serious attempt to resolve differences within NLRB v. Insurance Agents, supra.[10]

2. A further basic problem is the status of Kenneth Pack. I conclude that although Kenneth Pack had the same title as Weaver and was theoretically entitled to bargain collectively for the terms of the new contract, he was not an actual union agent for that purpose. I conclude that Weaver's dispatch of Pack was not for the purpose of having Pack engage in collective bargaining. Rather, Pack, who had principally engaged in bargaining at Fairborn by dealing with the Local Union's grievances, had never been chief spokesman or indeed prominent spokesman with regard to the 1981 bargaining or any other contract collective bargaining. He was not sent to the Fairborn bargaining in August 1985 in good faith.

3. Furthermore, there seems to be little excuse for Weaver's failure to fulfill his July agreement to attend the meetings on 7 and 8 August 1985. There was no reason advanced, other than the Kaiser strike, why he could not have attended the Fairborn sessions and permitted the IAM cochairman to control the Kaiser strike negotiations. Although Weaver's preferring to remain at the Kaiser negotiations, even in the face of O'Malley's threat to implement, might not be an unreasonable position for Weaver to ordinarily take in terms of making a considered choice, it loses much of its force in the face of his prior agreement to attend the negotiations and in the availability of the I.A.M. cochairman.

4. I further find significant the fact that when Weaver arrived around midnight on 8 August, he did not thereafter immediately attempt to contact Weaver or any other company agent in order to continue collective-bargaining negotiations. Weaver's return flight to California did not excuse the Union, which had precipitated the failure to engage in collective bargaining after having chosen 5 August as the suitable week, from immediately seeking to rectify its omission and failure.

5. After the 8 August meeting with Pack and the other union representatives, O'Malley declared impasse and on the morning of 9 August left for California. Thereafter came the several self-serving letters between the parties resulting in O'Malley's agreeing not to implement, as he had threatened, if the parties could thereafter meet and bargain. There is no question, on this record, that the Union, commencing mid-August 1985, offered to meet at any reasonable time chosen by the Employer. When the Employer then offered 28 and 29 August, Weaver could not attend, again because of a Kaiser Cement problem. I conclude that under these circumstances, Weaver's failure to attend a collective-bargaining session on 28 and 29 August was further evidence that he was not seriously desirous of engaging in collective bargaining especially if that collective bargaining might result in an impasse, which O'Malley by now foresaw and which Weaver feared. Further, I find that he was under an obligation to substitute, suspend, or eliminate other business in order to facilitate bargaining with the Respondent on those dates in light of his own offer to meet and of his past failures to meet.

6. On and after 26 August 1985, Weaver and O'Malley agreed that bargaining would take place on 31 August and 1 September. I credit O'Malley in that Weaver then insisted that the meeting take place in the presence of a Federal mediator. I do not have to reach the question, briefed by Respondent, whether Weaver's insistence on a Federal mediator, as a condition for bargaining, was insistence on the presence of a nonmandatory subject of bargaining and therefore was unlawful. For I find that, on the facts, his insistence on a Federal mediator was pretex-

[10] In response to the Company's request for a counterproposal to its proposal that had been in union hands for 6 weeks, all the union bargaining agents asked: "What proposal?"

tual and advanced for the purpose of impeding collective bargaining. I make this finding on three grounds:

(a) I conclude that the presence of a Federal mediator had never been a condition of the parties' engaging in collective bargaining. Rather, the most that this record shows was that O'Malley insisted on the use of the FMCS to schedule the meetings. The evidence discloses that FMCS commissioners were not present at many of the meetings whether at Odessa, Victorville, or Fairborn. Moreover, contrary to Weaver's original testimony (Tr. 201)—that there was an agreement between the parties that a mediator was required at all negotiations at Fairborn—Weaver admitted that there was no such agreement (Tr. 205) and that the only practice regarding FMCS was that the mediation service set up the meetings.

(b) In addition, the evidence is undisputed that FMCS itself told Weaver, on and after 26 August, that the presence or absence of a Federal mediator should not deter the parties from engaging in collective bargaining.

(c) I was impressed that Weaver rejected the 28 and 29 August meeting dates but agreed to 31 August and 1 September. When he then added the condition that a Federal mediator be present, and added this condition on and after 26 August, it ensured that the condition could not be fulfilled. For, as it turned out, there was no reasonable expectation of getting a Federal mediator for the Labor Day weekend when the requirement and request were first set during the same week.

For these reasons, I conclude that Weaver's failure to meet on any date between 28 August and 1 September was a further stalling device, a failure to bargain in good faith after he had agreed to bargain in that period, and was based on a pretext.

7. Although it is true that the instant case does not, and need not, contain an allegation of the Union's violation of Section 8(b)(3) of the Act, NLRB v. Katz, supra, in deciding whether Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) by implementing its last offer, I nevertheless find that Respondent, on the above evidence, certainly as early as 26 September 1984, was guilty of systematically evasive and dilatory bargaining that permitted the Respondent to lawfully implement its last offer on 1 September 1985.[11]

The General Counsel and the Union argue that Respondent was itself setting up the entire situation so that it could unilaterally implement. See, for instance, Member Jenkins dissenting in R. A. Hatch Co., 263 NLRB 1221, 1223 (1982). Whatever Respondent's predisposition was in 1984, by its 1985 offer, it showed none of the characteristics of a hidden motive of staged bargaining. In addition, the Board's rule is that when an employer implements on its decision that further bargaining would be fruitless, especially stemming from alleged dilatory union conduct, it is permissible to view the facts from the employer's point of view or perspective, M & M Contractors, 262 NLRB 1472, 1476 (1982); R. A. Hatch Co., supra. Viewed from that perspective, it is clear what Respondent saw in September 1984. It saw the Union file a baseless unfair labor practice charge that, I have already found, was part of the process of the Union's delaying tactics. Notwithstanding that the delay between the 1 November dismissal of the charge and Respondent's 27 June 1985 letter demanding further bargaining was not solely the responsibility of the Union, I nevertheless have concluded that with the 27 June offer to the Union, Respondent was seriously interested in bargaining, threatening impasse as the alternative. From Respondent's point of view, taking into account past union procrastination in the September 1984 baseless unfair labor practice charge and then the unavailability of the vacationing Weaver for bargaining between the period of 1 November and 31 December 1985, the Employer saw Weaver's post-27 June 1985 conduct as even clearer procrastination and delay.

Following its 27 June 1985 offer, what did Respondent see? It saw Weaver, claiming unavailability, avoiding bargaining in the 30-day period 27 June through 27 July. It saw Weaver electing to remain in California rather than to arrive on 6 August because, as Weaver explained, and as O'Malley knew, Weaver attached greater importance to settlement of the Kaiser Cement strike than to bargaining with Respondent even with the threat of implementation. It saw, regardless of O'Malley's formal acquiescence, the use of Pack as the Union's bargainer without his having actual authority to engage in contract collective bargaining. It saw Pack and the union representatives totally unacquainted with the Respondent's 27 June plenary offer and, moreover, totally unequipped to bargain in good faith even if they had the authority to do so. They did not have the new offer; in addition, they not only did not have the expired collective-bargaining agreement with them, but they did not even have the ability to compare Respondent's new offer with its old offer (April 1984), because they did not have the old offer either. Respondent then further saw a 2-day long series of fumbling attempts by wholly unequipped bargainers, reading a complex offer, meanwhile stalling around for Weaver, notwithstanding that Weaver might never show as he had promised to do.

On the Union's request, following the 6–8 August failure, that Respondent delay implementation until further bargaining, Respondent acquiesced. Weaver offered to meet at Respondent's convenience in late August. Respondent then attempted to arrange bargaining on 28 and 29 August and, again, Weaver was again unavailable because of his commitments in San Antonio to bargain with the Kaiser Cement Co. Thereafter, Weaver agreed to bargain on 31 August and 1 September but added the proviso that a Federal mediator be present. As I have noted, that proviso was a matter of pretext and the imposition of a condition, the timing of which, in any event, would prevent bargaining. Under all these circumstances, I conclude that the Respondent was not merely engaging in an exercise of pro forma bargaining to set the stage for unilateral implementation. See R. A. Hatch Co., supra at 1221, 1223; further O'Malley, on 8 August, could reasonably conclude that further delay in implementation was not warranted because attempted negotiations had been systematically frustrated by the Union. M & M Contractors, supra at 1476.

[11] Whether Weaver could have implemented as early as 8 August at which time he had erroneously declared "impasse" is a matter on which I need not pass.

To the extent the Union argues that Respondent's demand (that the Union bargain on Respondent's proposal and present counterproposals) was a deviation from past practice (of going through Respondent's proposals one item at a time),[12] that argument loses sight of the fact that the Union was not equipped to bargain at all (1) by sending Pack, (2) by Weaver never appearing, and (3) by having bargainers wholly without knowledge or preparation. It also loses sight of the fact that such a process may have been in order when the parties merely exchanged proposals at the outset of negotiations. Such a proposition has no place where there is a lapse of almost a year in bargaining, and Respondent sends a full proposal with concessions and reasonably allows 6 weeks for the Union to become acquainted with the terms thereof. Moreover, the record shows that when O'Malley demanded a counterproposal, Pack did not refuse on the ground that he expected the Respondent to go through its proposals, one at a time, as it had done in previous bargaining; rather, Pack stated that the union bargainers had not enough time to evaluate Respondent's proposal; that the Respondent had not bargained on the Union's prior proposals, and that the Union had not been able to address Respondent on its own proposals. This was Pack's position both on 7 August (Tr. 560) when the attempt at bargaining opened and on 8 August (Tr. 570) when the attempt at bargaining continued. The dispositive facts are that the Union, content with the status quo of working under the terms of the expired contract, because of Weaver's absence, his failure to educate the committee on Respondent's offer, the resulting bargaining illiteracy of the union committee, and its function of merely obtaining a copy of the proposal and adjourning, was engaged only in a pro forma ritual. The union bargaining committee was simply not designed or prepared to bargain at all, much less to offer the "rational exchange of facts and argument" that the Board has repeatedly interpreted as the good-faith bargaining mandated by NLRB v. Katz, supra. See Dilene Answering Service, 257 NLRB 284, 285 (1981); Winn-Dixie Stores, 243 NLRB 972, 974–975 (1979). Stalling avoided "givebacks."

The General Counsel's argument that O'Malley's virtual disregard of Pack, and his insistence on Weaver as a bargaining partner, demonstrates that he was unlawfully attempting to dictate to the Union who should be its negotiator, in my judgment, misses the point. It was not that Weaver had more authority to bargain than Pack; it was that Pack, regardless of his titular equivalence to Weaver, had no authority to actually bargain.[13] He was there to stall until Weaver came. Pack, in any case, had nothing to bargain about.

Where the General Counsel and the Union argue that Weaver's failure to provide the union bargaining committee with copies of the Respondent's proposal did not significantly disrupt the 7 and 8 August negotiations, I disagree. As above noted, I conclude that it is evidence not only of Weaver's sole authority to bargain but demonstrates that Weaver intentionally permitted the union committee to engage in pro forma bargaining with the admitted aim of its merely acquiring a copy of the Company's proposal and then adjourning. I conclude that such a bargaining device was not good-faith bargaining. The General Counsel admits only that this union strategem was "perhaps not good form" (Br. 24), i.e., for Weaver not to have supplied a copy of the proposal to the union committee prior to the 7 August 1985 negotiation session. I specifically disagree with his assertion that it does not constitute "intransigence or a delay or avoidance of negotiations." I conclude that, as noted, it was a deliberate demonstration of Weaver's unwillingness to permit anything other than ritualistic pro forma bargaining in his absence.

Weaver's explanation for not sending a copy to the 6–8 August union bargainers at any time, or even explaining it by telephone (even on and after 2 August when he knew he was not going to be there), was his fear that the employees might do something precipitous, such as engaging in a strike. As above noted, this alleged fear was totally unsupported by any corroborating evidence. I regard Weaver's explanation as a fabrication, explaining away his failure to educate the union committee. Such an unfounded explanation only further exposes who was going to engage in effective bargaining on behalf of the Union: only Weaver himself.

Again, I conclude that Respondent, in spite of its 27 June threat to implement at the end of 30 days (if Respondent and the Union did not bargain), thereafter consistently refrained, at the Union's request, from unilaterally implementing even after the 7 and 8 August frustrated bargaining. It was Respondent that thereafter attempted to create further bargaining opportunities on 28 and 29 August; and on union rejection of those dates, on 31 August and 1 September. This Respondent's conduct does not demonstrate stage setting for unilateral implementation. On the contrary, its repeated delay in implementation demonstrates a fear of unilateral implementation and a desire to get union agreement or good-faith impasse. Having given the Union its detailed offer 8 weeks before implementation and the Union having intentionally and systematically delayed and avoided bargaining thereon, and there being prior evidence of union stalling, Respondent did not unlawfully implement its offer on 1 September 1985. M & M Contractors, 262 NLRB 1472 (1982), enfd. sub nom. Carpenters Local 266 v. NLRB, 707 F.2d 516 (9th Cir. 1983). Cf. NLRB v. Auto Fast Freight, 793 F.2d 1126 (9th Cir. 1986).

[12] As I understand this argument, the Union is not suggesting that this practice had hardened into a mandatory subject of bargaining; rather, that the Union was merely reasonably led to expect a continuation of this format.

[13] This issue is actually academic because even if Pack had such actual authority and even if O'Malley agreed to bargain with him as chief negotiator, any such agreement was destroyed by Weaver's failure to equip Pack and the union bargainers with any substance to bargain with or against.

C. Further Alleged Violation of Section 8(a)(5)

By paragraph 7(A) of the amended Case 9-CA-22942 complaint, the General Counsel alleges as a further violation of Section 8(a)(5) that:

> Since on or about 1 September 1985, Respondent has refused to meet with the Union to discuss grievances if the union's grievance committee had more than four members.

With regard to paragraph 7(A), the parties agreed (Tr. 1563) that a stipulation entered on the record, together with certain jointly sponsored documentary evidence, would constitute the entire proof of the alleged violation together with Respondent's defense. The stipulation appears as follows (Tr. 1563-1564):

> The expired collective-bargaining agreement provides that the Union can have a total of four second step grievance representatives, consisting of three members and recording secretary.
> From May 1, 1984 to September 1, 1985, the Union and the Company have met in excess of 10 times to discuss grievances. During that period of time the Union did not have in excess of four grievance representatives (three members and the recording secretary), unless by mutual agreement.
> Since implementation of changes of terms and conditions of employment by the Employer, on September 1, 1985, the Employer has refused to meet with the grievance committee, other than the committee provided for in the expired collective bargaining agreement, in spite of the Union's request to do so.
> Between May 1, 1984 and September 1, 1985, there were no negotiations on the number of grievance representatives the Union could have.
> Since 1 September 1985, the Union has offered to negotiate on the number of grievance representatives, but there has been no agreement.

The joint exhibits (Jt. Exhs. 18-25) offered by the parties demonstrate as follows:

(1) Joint Exhibit 18, a letter of 11 September 1985, from the Union to Respondent lists the composition of four union committees: the negotiating committee, the grievance committee, the safety committee, and the training committee. The grievance committee lists it as its members: chairman, Cantrell; recording secretary, Deaton; and "spokesmen," Gullett, Lykins, and Grace. In addition to these five named members, the letter adds: "Other [grievance] committee members shall be all members of the bargaining unit."

(2) Joint Exhibit 19, a letter of 18 September 1985 from the Union to Respondent, notes that in a 2-week period, the Union repeatedly asked Respondent to meet with the "designated [grievance]" committee but that the Respondent refused to meet. The letter ends with a request from the Respondent to reconsider its refusal to meet with the designated committee before the Union considers "legal action."

(3) Joint Exhibit 20, a letter from Respondent to the Union, dated 20 September 1985, expresses Respondent's desire to meet with the committee on a regular basis to resolve day-to-day problems. Respondent, however, states that it reviewed its legal position concerning the expanded committee and states that it continues to refuse to meet with it. Respondent offers to meet with the union committee "as long as the meeting is orderly and we are able to get something accomplished."

(4) Joint Exhibit 21, the Union's 15 November 1985 letter to Respondent, requests that Respondent schedule meetings to discuss outstanding grievances and resolve them. The Union notes its willingness to meet after normal working hours and again requests Respondent to notify the Union promptly of a schedule of meetings to resolve the large number of outstanding grievances awaiting action.

(5) Joint Exhibit 22, Respondent's 18 November 1985 reply to Joint Exhibit 21, states that that Respondent is available for a grievance meeting on 20 November, but "reminds" the Union of Respondent's refusal to meet with a union grievance committee beyond the three employees and a recording secretary, based on the authority of article 5, section (a) of the implemented terms and conditions of employment. Respondent states that if "the Union continues to insist on more members than allowed, it will be assumed that the Union does not want to meet, which will affect the status of grievances relative to time limits."

(6) Joint Exhibit 23, a union letter of 19 November 1985, in apparent response to Joint Exhibit 22, requests Respondent to schedule a meeting to plan for a schedule of meetings to resolve the large number of outstanding grievances.

(7) Joint Exhibit 24, the Union's letter to Respondent of 6 February 1986, notes that no grievances, filed after 1 September 1985, have been taken to second-step grievance meetings and that the Union has received no response to its request for a plan for future second-step grievance meetings. The Union notes that this refusal to discuss grievances resulted from Respondent's contention that the Union must abide by Respondent's interpretation of what is a proper number of members for the union committee. The Union then states that it considers the grievances, in view of the time limits concerning second-step grievances, to have been forfeited in favor of the Union and requests Respondent to make all grievants whole as requested in the grievances.

(8) Joint Exhibit 25, Respondent's 7 February 1985 response to Joint Exhibit 24, asserts that the Union's 6 February letter (Jt. Exh. 24) was correct insofar as it asserted that management had exercised its legal right to limit the size of the grievance committee to three employees and a recording secretary as stated in article 5(a) of the implemented terms and conditions; but that the Union is incorrect in asserting that Respondent has refused to discuss grievances. Respondent states that it has repeatedly informed the Union of its desire to meet and discuss grievances with the "recognized grievance committee," but that the union committee, despite Respondent's condition, chose to arrive at the grievance meetings with more than the allowed number that resulted in no meetings being held. The letter further states that it is Respondent's position that any violations of grievance time limits were caused by the Union and that those grievances have been denied by Respondent. The letter concludes with the stated willingness of the Employer to meet with the recognized grievance committee.

The expired 1981–1984 collective-bargaining agreement (Jt. Exh. 1) in its article 6, "union activity," limits the union grievance committee to four employees ("not more than three employees and a recording secretary"). The implemented 27 June 1985 offer (implemented 1 September 1985) in its article 5, "union activity," contains the same limitation.

The expired collective-bargaining agreement, article 26, "Grievance and Arbitration" contains a 3-step grievance procedure with the fourth step being a referral to binding arbitration. In article 25 of the implemented Respondent offer, entitled "Grievance and Arbitration," there is no provision for arbitration but merely the three-step grievance procedure and the other limitations contained in the expired agreement's article 26.

IV. DISCUSSION AND CONCLUSIONS

It appears from the above that under the terms of the expired (1981–1984) collective-bargaining agreement and under the terms of the implemented Respondent offer, the provisions relating to the number of the Union's grievance committee are the same and the grievance procedure in both instruments remains the same although the provision for arbitration was eliminated in the implemented provision. Because we are not here dealing with any problem relating to arbitration, I conclude that the provisions concerning both grievance procedure and committee composition of the expired collective-bargaining agreement and the newly implemented agreement remained the same.

It also appears, under the stipulation, that since 1 September 1985 the Union has offered to negotiate on the "number" issue, but there has been no agreement on the number of union grievance committee representatives. Such a stipulated statement does not demonstrate, nor is there any proof, that Respondent at any time refused to offer to negotiate on the issue. Merely, as far as the stipulation goes, there has been "no agreement on the number of union grievance representatives" (Tr. 1563–1565). The stipulated supporting evidence, it seems to me, the above joint exhibits, in evidence, are quite to the contrary. They show no desire on the part of either party to negotiate: merely the Union's notification to Respondent of changes in committee composition in terms of number of the grievance committee, and Respondent's repeated refusal to meet with the expanded committee. Thus, in the Union's first notification to the Employer, its 11 September 1985 letter (Jt. Exh. 18), it did not offer to bargain with respect to the increase (above four) in the number of members, but merely notified Respondent that the union grievance committee would consist of at least the five named persons (Cantrell, Deaton, Gullett, Lykins, and Crace) and might also include "other members who shall be bargaining unit employees. Thus, (a) in view of the unspecific nature of the stipulation with regard to the Respondent's response to an offer to bargain; (b) the failure of both the stipulation and the joint exhibits to indicate that the Respondent refused to bargain on any such offer; and (c) in view of the stipulation reciting merely that there has been no agreement, I do not infer that the Respondent necessarily refused to bargain on any union offer to increase the number of grievance committee members. I find, to the contrary, based on the lack of specificity in the stipulation and the specificity in the joint exhibits, that both parties remained adamant in there announced positions at all material times: the Union insisted on five or more members for the grievance committee; the Company insisted on maintaining a limit of four members as specified in article 5(a) of the implemented offer of 27 June 1985.

In NLRB v. Haberman Construction Co., 618 F.2d 288, 302–303 (5th Cir. 1980), enfg. 236 NLRB 79 (1978). See NLRB v. Haberman Construction Co., 641 F.2d 351 (5th Cir. 1981), the court made two observations that are pertinent to this case:

(a) The Court notes (618 F.2d at 297):

> Under section 8(d) of the Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 158(d) . . . a party to a contract who unilaterally modifies a contractual term that is a mandatory subject of bargaining commits an unfair labor practice. See Chemical Workers Local 1 v. Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co., Chemical Division, 404 U.S. 157 . . . (1971).

(b) The Court also notes (618 F.2d at 302):

> At contract expiration, an employer may not unilaterally alter, without bargaining to impasse, a contractual term that is a mandatory subject of bargaining. This result obtains because such a term "by operation of statute continues even after the contract embodying it has terminated."[14]

The court observes that contractual terms (that are mandatory subjects of bargaining) that survive contract expiration include "grievance procedures," citing Shipbuilders v. NLRB, 320 F.2d 615, 619–620 (3d Cir. 1963), cert. denied 375 U.S. 984 (1964).

Following NLRB v. Haberman Construction Co., supra, I conclude, contrary to the arguments of the General Counsel and the Union, that the number on the committee is part of the grievance procedure machinery established in both the expired collective-bargaining agreement and the lawfully implemented Respondent offer of 27 June 1985, and is therefore a mandatory subject of bargaining. I further conclude that whether the collective-bargaining agreement is deemed to be an effect because Respondent's implementation of 1 September was unlawful or whether the terms of the implementation are deemed lawful and, in effect, the composition, in so far as number is concerned, of the grievance committee remains in full force and effect and limits the parties until this provision is changed by bargaining impasse, agreement, or other legal device.

[14] The court notes, however, that certain exceptional mandatory subjects of bargaining do not survive the expiration of the contract and those terms include arbitration provisions and union-security provisions. See fn. 16, NLRB v. Haberman Construction Co., supra at 302.

It seems to me unpersuasive for the General Counsel and the Union to cite cases purportedly demonstrating that the expired contractual, or newly implemented, limitation on the number of union members on the grievance committee is a mere nonmandatory or "permissive" subject of bargaining on which the parties may not bargain to impasse. Those cases, including Bethlehem Steel Co., 136 NLRB 1500 (1962), enf. denied on other grounds sub nom. Shipbuilders v. NLRB, 320 F.2d 615 (3d Cir. 1963), cert. denied 375 U.S. 984 (1964), relate only to the question of who can be on the union grievance committee. That issue, it is true, is a permissive subject of bargaining about which an employer may not negotiate to impasse.

The Union correctly notes that, in the above Bethlehem Steel Co. case, the Board and Third Circuit both found, however, that a grievance procedure is a mandatory subject of bargaining that the employer is privileged to bargain to impasse on. The Union then mistakenly, in my judgment, equates the question of whether the Employer may bargain to impasse concerning who may constitute the members of a union grievance committee with whether it may do so as to number. But who is not the same as how many. The fundamental difference between who and how many is apparent because the employer, as in the instant case, has a vital economic interest in establishing how many unit employees will be on the union grievance committee because grievance committee membership and activity may, for instance, remove unit employees from their assigned work. This functional, routine economic interest exists without regard to the further question of whether a union's unilateral imposition of number would demonstrate bad-faith bargaining, per se, if it insisted on an extraordinarily large number on its grievance committee. Thus unlike the narrow question of who can be on the union committee, where, as the General Counsel notes, the employer's bargaining interest might relate only to the identity of a member who might interfere with the process of collective bargaining (by a showing that a particular union bargainer would create such ill will as to make good-faith bargaining impossible), KDEN Broadcasting Co., 225 NLRB 25, 35 (1976). Cf. Stevens Food, 272 NLRB 907 (1984), there is ordinarily no employer economic or bargaining interest in resolving who shall be the Union's bargaining representatives.[15] Furthermore, as the Union notes, in citing the Third Circuit's decision in Shipbuilders v. NLRB, supra at 615, 618–619, under Section 9(a) of the Act, the union is the exclusive representative of unit employees. Bargaining to impasse on a limitation that restricts who is on the union committee would restrict the Union's statutory role in the prosecution of grievances. Cf. Postal Service, 280 NLRB 685 (1986). Thus, not only is there an explicit statutory command under Section 9(a) demonstrating that the Union has the predominent and almost exclusive right to determine who shall be its committeemen, but there is no such statutory command that relates to the number of employees who will be on the grievance committee. I conclude that "number," unlike "who, is a mandatory subject of bargaining."

In short, therefore, the present facts demonstrates that the Union, regardless of its offer to bargain with regard to "number" without bargaining to impasse, agreement, or other lawful excuse, presented to Respondent the fait accompli of a unilaterally changed number of union bargainers. In these circumstances, the Union, itself, regardless of any motive of harassment, created a unilateral change in a mandatory subject which was to be bargained to lawful impasse or made the subject of agreement.[16] I shall recommend to the Board that the allegation of Respondent's violation of Section 8(a)(5), in refusing to accede to the Union's fait accompli regarding the number of its bargainers, in refusing to meet with the unlawfully argumented union grievance committee, and in insisting on maintaining the status quo ante (through the lawfully implemented terms and conditions of employment) be dismissed.

V. PARAGRAPH 7(B) OF THE AMENDED COMPLAINT

A. Respondent's Alleged Restriction on the Scope of Bargaining

The General Counsel alleges in paragraph 7(b) of the amended complaint:

> Since on or about 6 November 1985, Respondent has insisted that bargaining for a new contract be limited solely to counterproposals based on its proposals implemented on 1 September 1985 for the Unit.

After Respondent implemented its 27 June 1985 proposals on 1 September 1985, the parties, together with an FMCS commissioner, next met at Fairborn on 5 and 6 November 1985. When O'Malley said that he was ready to receive the Union's proposals, Weaver told him that the Union had some questions about the implemented Respondent proposal. They discussed the implemented subcontracting provision. When Weaver then asked O'Malley to give the reasons for the wage implementations, O'Malley told him that the Union knew the Respondent's position based on "industry problems" and further stated, correctly (Tr. 1599), that he had given the Union all the information that the Union had asked for regarding the new wage disposition in the implemented agreement. At this point, the Union, through Weaver and Gullett, read its proposals regarding all contract elements (labor agreement, pension agreement, insurance, and SUB)[17] and the Company requested a recess until the next day, 6 November. They met again on 6 November and O'Malley told the Union that he was disappointed in the Union's proposals and desired to discuss nothing except the Company's implemented proposals (Tr. 1578). He told the Union that unless it agreed to confine its discussions to the Company's implemented proposals, the Company would not negotiate further. Weaver told O'Malley (Tr. 1578) that he was prepared to negotiate on any and all terms and conditions and to ultimately reach a settlement on the contract, but the Union would not agree to the condition that it would only discuss the implemented proposals. In fact, it was the Union's position that it was free to bargain on any and all terms in the implemented elements and to change them, particularly upward (Tr. 1576).

[15] In this case, particularly, the Union has gone out of its way to demonstrate in writing that it considers itself not bound to even five members but might include, and reserves its right to include, "other committee members" who shall be all members of the bargaining unit. Thus, the Union has not only unilaterally enlarged the committee to five members, but it specifies that any further argumentation in number will come from members of the bargaining unit and therefore capable of being withdrawn from jobs, vacations, or other situations in which the Employer has an economic interest.

When Weaver told O'Malley that the Union would not agree to limit bargaining to the implemented proposals, O'Malley answered that the Company had nothing further to say. O'Malley then picked up his records and the company committee marched out of the room (Tr. 1579). As O'Malley was leaving the room, Weaver told him that he thought that the Employer would return because the Union was going to file an unfair labor practice charge over the Employer's conduct (Tr. 1585).

After O'Malley and the Company's bargaining committee left the room, the Union remained with the FMCS commissioner and asked him to have O'Malley return because the Union had a proposal that it would like to submit. The FMCS commissioner then left to contact the Company, still in the hotel. He returned shortly thereafter and told the Union that O'Malley had asked him if the Union's proposal related to the implemented proposals and the FMCS commissioner told him that he did not know but would find out from the Union. Weaver told him that it did not. The FMCS commissioner then revisited the Company, returned a short time thereafter (Tr. 1587–1588), and told the Union that O'Malley said that Respondent would not return to the bargaining table unless the Union agreed to discuss and negotiate only Respondent's implemented proposals. When Weaver told the FMCS commissioner that he would not agree to that limitation, the FMCS commissioner recessed the meeting.

The union proposal, which was never presented to the Company in view of the bargaining situation, related to the grievance and arbitration procedure. It should again be noted that the Company's implemented proposal had struck out the arbitration provision from the grievance procedure in the expired 1981–1984 collective-bargaining agreement.

By a letter dated 12 November 1985, Weaver wrote to O'Malley (Jt. Exh. 26):

> Dear Mr. O'Malley:
> At our meeting in Dayton, Ohio, on November 6, 1985 you informed the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service Commissioner Anderson that you would not meet in negotiations any more with the Union unless there was an understanding before the meeting that we would only work from the Company's implemented proposals. I advised you at that meeting that we would not agree to your conditions. We told you that we did not [sic][18] want to present additional proposals for your considerations [sic]. You refused to meet with us since we would not agree to premeeting conditions. You are herein again advised that we do not agree to limit our proposals and discussion to the Company's implemented proposals. However we do have meaningful proposals to present to the Company and therefore, request a negotiating meeting with you for that purpose, at our mutual earliest available date.
> In disrespect to you and Southwestern Portland Cement Company for the way you are treating the Fairborn workers.
> Sincerely,
> Kent Weaver

By its letter dated 25 November 1985, the Respondent answered the Union (Jt. Exh. 27):

> Dear Mr. Weaver:
> We are in receipt of your November 12, 1985 letter, in which you state that you will not agree to the Company's pre-meeting conditions for further negotiations.
>
> The Union must recognize that the Company does not have implemented proposals, but rather they are implemented terms and conditions of employment which replaced the terminated agreement that expired May 1, 1984.
> As the Company stated, we are only interested in working from the existing terms and conditions of employment; however, since you stated you are going to make meaningful proposals, we will, of course, meet with the Union.
> Inasmuch as the last meeting was recessed by Commissioner Anderson, it is suggested that you work through his office in arranging future meetings.
> Sincerely,
> Ron O'Malley
> Director of Labor Relations

The parties then next met on 20 February 1986 where Weaver insisted on Respondent either engaging in multiplant bargaining or agreeing on the applicability of bargaining at one plant affecting the other plants. Respondent refused either position and insisted only on single-plant bargaining. The FMCS commissioner canceled a further meeting and there have been no subsequent meetings.

---

[17] These 5 November union proposals included changing the newly implemented 85-day probationary period to 45 days; adding three yearly 25-cent-an-hour wage increases; and increasing company contributions to SUB, pension, and insurance plans.

[18] Weaver credibly testified that the inclusion of the word "not" was erroneous (Tr. 1589).

B. Discussion and Conclusions

Based on Weaver's credited and uncontradicted testimony, as supported by the correspondence of the parties on 12 and 25 November 1985 (Jt. Exhs. 26 and 27), there is no question that in negotiations on 5 November 1985, O'Malley told the Union that Respondent would not negotiate unless there was an understanding before the meeting that the negotiations would be limited to the Company's implemented proposals. The Respondent, in its 25 November 1985 reply to the Union not only did not deny the establishment of this "pre-meeting" condition, but also offered a rationalization for taking this position. The rationalization for Respondent's position is noted in the second paragraph of its 25 November 1985 letter (Jt. Exh. 27): "The Union must recognize that the Company does not have implemented proposals, but rather they are implemented terms and conditions of employment which replaced the terminated agreement that expired 1 May 1984."

The Respondent then goes on to say: "As the Company stated, we are only interested in working from the existing terms and conditions of employment; however, since you stated you are going to make meaningful proposals, we will of course, meet with the Union."

The most that can be said of the Company's position, it seems to me, is that it not only notifies the Union that the implemented terms constitute the terms and conditions of employment that replaced the expired collective-bargaining agreement, but also delineates limits on further bargaining: working from the existing terms and conditions of employment. Having said this, the Company then states that because the Union said that it was going to make "meaningful proposals" Respondent was willing to "meet with" the Union.

If Respondent's position is read as imposing the condition that bargaining will still be limited to the implemented terms and conditions of employment, it seems clear to me that the General Counsel's allegation of a violation of Section 8(a)(5) is made out. This flows from the fact that, although I concluded that Respondent could lawfully implement its last offer to the Union on 1 September 1985 because of the Union's prior dilatory conduct, M & M Contractors, 262 NLRB 1472 (1982), I specifically found, however, that any alleged 1984 or 1985 impasse was broken by Respondent's 27 June 1985 offer to the Union. There was no impasse after 27 June 1985. Respondent's 1 September implementation was lawful not because of "impasse" but because of the Union's dilatory conduct. The most that can be said of Respondent's 5 November 1985 bargaining position is that Respondent was sitting at the bargaining table in possession of lawfully implemented terms and conditions of employment but sitting with nothing else. By this I mean that at the time of and after the 1 September 1985 implementation of its offer, there was no impasse on any subject of bargaining much less on the entire spectrum of the implemented terms and conditions of employment. Therefore, Respondent was obligated to bargain on all mandatory subjects of bargaining, whether in the implemented terms or otherwise, at the Union's reasonable and lawful request therefor.

If, however, Respondent's 25 November letter is also interpreted to mean that, if the Union presents what Respondent believes to be "meaningful proposals," Respondent would agree to "meet with" the Union, it might be argued that Respondent is departing, at least in some degree, from its written admonition and restriction that the Company was "only interested in working from the existing terms and conditions of employment." I am not entirely clear what degree of departure Respondent intends by the last sentence in the paragraph, especially its willingness to merely "meet with" the Union rather than to execute its statutory obligation: to bargain in good faith concerning all terms and conditions of employment, whether in the implemented conditions or otherwise. Certainly on the basis of Weaver's credited testimony concerning what was said at the 5 and 6 November bargaining sessions, Respondent was quite insistent on bargaining only with respect to its implemented terms. Whatever was the scope of O'Malley's subjective intent, as Weaver testified, and as I find, Weaver reasonably interpreted O'Malley's position as meaning that the Company would bargain with the Union only insofar as the "take-back" provisions of its implemented offer were discussed and would not bargain on the Union's proposals concerning wage increases and similar further employer contributions in favor of the Union's position.

Respondent apparently was insisting on bargaining from what it believed was a position protected by lawful implementation stemming from a lawful prior impasse in bargaining; and that because it had lawfully implemented after impasse, it was free to bargain only from those lawfully implemented terms and conditions of employment unless the Respondent, through counteroffers, would break the impasse.[19] Because I have specifically held that on and after 27 June 1985 there was no impasse, I find it necessary to conclude, and to recommend to the Board, that even if Respondent's position concerning its bargaining obligation be deemed, at best, treacherously ambiguous, the parties, and Respondent in particular, should be left in no doubt with regard to Respondent's obligations regarding the scope of bargaining in the future.

I therefore recommend to the Board that Respondent be ordered to bargain on all mandatory subjects of bargaining within the scope of Section 8(d) of the Act whether such subjects have been encompassed within the implemented terms and conditions of employment of the Company's 27 June 1985 offer (Jt. Exh. 6(b)). Respondent may not take the position that it is in any way protected under Section 8(d) of the Act from bargaining on these terms and conditions of employment by virtue of a prior lawful implementation, treating the lawful implementation as if the terms and conditions of employment therein were embodied in a collective-bargaining agreement. NLRB v. Jacobs Mfg. Co., 196 F.2d 680 (2d Cir. 1952), Respondent must bargain on all subjects under Section 8(d) of the Act whether encompassed within the framework of the implemented terms of 27 June 1985.

[19] It is, perhaps, for this reason that counsel for Respondent persisted in his impasse argument even in the face of formidable contrary evidence.

Although Respondent acknowledges that the conduct of the Union and the conduct of Respondent are both covered in NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736 (1962), in that behavior that constitutes a refusal to negotiate or constitutes an obstruction or inhibition to the process of bargaining violates Section 8(a)(5) and (3), respectively, it argues that in the further bargaining of 20 February 1986, the Company fulfilled its obligation to bargain; and that the Union, itself, raised an unlawful bargaining obstruction by bargaining to impasse on the Union's insistence that bargaining take place in a unit different from the certified unit (i.e., the Union's insistence that the Employer bargain with respect to all three plants rather than the Fairborn plant only). Respondent further argues that the parties thereafter actually bargained to impasse on 20 February when the Employer entertained and rejected the Union's counterproposals of wage increases (and other terms and conditions of employment that would increase Respondent's economic responsibilities) and rejected the Union's insistence on bargaining on a nonmandatory subject of bargaining, the unit question.

Assuming, arguendo, that Respondent is correct in that the parties reached impasse thereafter, inter alia, on a nonmandatory subject of bargaining introduced by the Union and that there was impasse as well on the Union's counterproposals of increased wages and other beneficial terms and conditions of employment, I nevertheless am not persuaded that a finding of a violation based on Respondent's conduct and a concomitant order is not necessary. This is because the most that can be said of Respondent's position, especially in the absence of any outstanding complaint alleging the Union's violation of Section 8(b)(3) of the Act, is that the parties are at impasse.

It is uncertain what course the bargaining might have taken had not Respondent introduced its original, unlawful condition to the bargaining. Certainly, Respondent, even now, has failed to repudiate or disavow specifically, openly, and unambiguously its prior illegal conduct as required by Board rule. Passavant Memorial Hospital, 237 NLRB 138 (1978). On the basis of Respondent's ambiguous position of 25 November with regard to the scope of bargaining, I cannot and do not conclude that the subsequent bargaining of 20 February even to impasse was a good-faith impasse within the meaning of the Board's rules once taking into account Respondent's unrepudiated prior unlawful conduct. See Huck Mfg. Co. v. NLRB, 693 F.2d 1176 (5th Cir. 1982); Pillowtex Corp., 241 NLRB 40 (1979), enfd. 615 F.2d 917 (1980). Cf. PRC Recording Co., 280 NLRB 615 fn. 1 (1986) (Chairman Dotson dissenting in part). In the presence of such an "impasse," the parties must look forward to further bargaining. In order to clarify for all parties the nature of their obligation, and especially in view of Respondent's patently unlawful original position, I believe it necessary to find not only the violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, as alleged in the amended complaint (Respondent's refusal to bargain except on its implemented terms), but also to recommend to the Board that it issue an order stating that Respondent's bargaining obligation includes bargaining on all mandatory subjects even on the implemented terms and conditions of employment.

Respondent's Further Defenses

To the extent Respondent argues that the complaint in Case 9-CA-22509 be dismissed, or the case reopened for further hearing, because of the General Counsel's failure to lawfully investigate the initial charge, allegedly thereby violating Section 101.7 of the Board's Rules and Regulations and Section 554(c) of the Administrative Procedure Act (as well as Sec. 10054.1 of the Board's Casehandling Manual) and thus the complaint in Case 9-CA-22509 being issued contrary to law and resulting in a denial of due process of law (R. Br. 29), I reiterate the position I took at the hearing. My function is to hear the case on the General Counsel's complaint issued pursuant to Section 10(b) of the Act. I am without authority to dismiss the complaint based on the General Counsel's conduct in investigating the charge or in issuing the complaint;[20] and were I to exercise any such alleged authority, I would be acting in contravention of the express terms of Section 3(d) of the National Labor Relations Act. That part of the statute gives to the General Counsel not only the right to exercise supervision of all attorneys employed by the Board (other than administrative law judges and legal assistants to the Board members), but also "final authority, on behalf of the Board, in respect of the investigation of charges and issuance of complaints under Section 10, and in respect of the prosecution of such complaints before the Board." Should Respondent have further objection to the General Counsel's conduct in the investigation of the charge or issuance of complaint, matter must be taken up with the General Counsel, the Board, and the court of appeals rather than with me.

To the extent Respondent has continued to argue that it was denied due process or a fair hearing by virtue of my exclusion (or, more properly, my attempted exclusion, for the exclusion was not successful in all respects) of evidence regarding Respondent's bargaining at Victorville and Odessa locations, I note that not only did evidence of such bargaining creep into the record notwithstanding my ruling, but also that with such evidence, Respondent was attempting to show 1984 and 1985 impasses at those places. In view of my finding that Respondent's 27 June 1985 offer at Fairborn broke any prior impasse at Fairborn, I reached the conclusion that the bargaining at units other than at Fairborn would take us into immaterial proceedings beyond the scope of the complaint. In short, I find that proof of even a 1985 impasse or any other element of bargaining directed toward the Odessa or Victorville units and not directly related to Fairborn to be immaterial to this case.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Southwestern Portland Cement Company, the Respondent, has been, and is, at all material times, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

[20] We are not dealing with any of the General Counsel's misconduct, for instance, in his securing evidence. Hoosier-Cardinal Corp., 67 NLRB 49 (1946).

2. United Cement, Lime, Gypsum & Allied Workers Division, International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, Blacksmiths, Forgers and Helpers, Local Lodge D-357, AFL-CIO (the Union) is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. A unit of Respondent's empoyees employed at Fairborn, Ohio, appropriate for collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act is:

> All production and maintenance employees employed by Southwestern Portland Cement Co. at its plant and quarries located at Fairborn, Ohio, but excluding all office clerical employees and all professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

4. At all material times, the Union was, and is, the certified exclusive collective-bargaining represenative of the unit as defined in paragraph 3, above, and has been and is the exclusive collective-bargaining representative within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act in the unit.

5. Respondent, by its 1 September 1985 implementation of the terms and conditions of employment of employees in the above-noted unit contained in its 27 June 1985 offer, as modified on 8 August 1985, did not violate Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

6. Respondent, since on or about 1 September 1985, in refusing to meet with the Union to discuss grievances if the Union's grievance committee had more than four members, did not violate Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

7. Respondent, since on or about 6 November 1985, by insisting that bargaining for a new contract be limited solely to union counterproposals based on its proposals implemented on 1 September 1985, with regard to the above-cited unit, violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

8. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent is engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the purposes of the Act including the posting of a notice.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[21]

ORDER

The Respondent, Southwestern Portland Cement Co., Fairborn, Ohio, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain in good faith with United Cement, Lime, Gypsum & Allied Workers Division, International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Shipbuilders, Blacksmiths, Forgers and Helpers, Local Lodge D-357, AFL-CIO as the exclusive bargaining representative of all employees in the following appropriate bargaining unit:

> All production and maintenance employees employed by Southwestern Portland Cement Co. at its plant and quarries located at Fairborn, Ohio, but excluding all office clerical employees and all professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) Requiring or imposing, as a condition of collective bargaining with the Union, in the above-described unit, the condition that bargaining be limited to union counterproposals to Respondent's implemented proposals of 1 September 1985.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request, bargain collectively in good faith with the Union, as the exclusive representative of all employees in the above-described bargaining unit, respecting rates of pay, wages, hours, or other terms or conditions of employment and, should any understanding be reached, embody the understanding in a signed agreement.

(b) Post at its Fairborn, Ohio plant and quarries, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[22] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 9, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

IT IS FURTHER RECOMMENDED that the complaint is dismissed insofar as it alleges violations of the Act not found here.

[21] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[22] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain in good faith collectively with United Cement, Lime, Gypsum & Allied Workers Division, International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Shipbuilding, Blacksmiths, Forgers and Helpers, Local No. D-357, AFL-CIO as the exclusive bargaining representative of all the employees in the following appropriate bargaining unit:

> All production and maintenance employees employed by Southwestern Portland Cement Co. at its plant and quarries located at Fairborn, Ohio, but excluding all office clerical employees and all professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WE WILL NOT require or impose, as a condition of collective bargaining with the Union, the condition that bargaining be limited to union counterproposals to our implemented proposals of 1 September 1985.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, on request of the Union, bargain collectively in good faith with it as the exclusive representative of all employees employed in the above-described appropriate bargaining unit, respecting rates of pay, wages, hours, or other terms and conditions of employment and, should any understanding be reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

SOUTHWESTERN PORTLAND CEMENT COMPANY

International Association of Machinists & Aerospace Workers, District Lodge No. 87, Local Lodge No. 1309 (O'Brien's Brake Service, Inc.) and Tracy Andreas. Case 32-CB-1864

July 27, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

By Chairman Stephens and Members Johansen and Babson

Upon charges filed by Tracy Andreas (Charging Party), the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint on October 17, 1984, against the International Association of Machinists & Aerospace Workers, District Lodge No. 87, Local Lodge No. 1309 (the Respondent) alleging that it violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the National Labor Relations Act. On October 25, 1984, the Respondent filed an answer admitting in part and denying in part the allegations in the complaint.

On July 9, 1985, the parties filed with the Board a motion to transfer this proceeding to the Board and a stipulation of facts. The parties stipulated to the contents of the record and agreed that no oral testimony was necessary or desired. The parties further stipulated that they waived a hearing before an administrative law judge, the making of findings of fact and conclusions of law by a judge, and the issuance of a judge's decision, and desired to submit this case directly to the Board for findings of fact, conclusions of law, and an order.

On September 18, 1985, the Board issued its order approving the stipulation and transferring the proceeding to the Board. Thereafter, counsel for the General Counsel filed a brief in support of her position.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

On the entire record in the case, the Board makes the following findings.

I. JURISDICTION

O'Brien's Brake Service, Inc. (the Employer) is a California corporation with an office and place of business in Fresno, California, where it is engaged in the retail maintenance and service of automobiles. During the 12-month period preceding the filing of the complaint, the Employer derived gross revenues in excess of $500,000 and purchased and received goods and services valued in excess of $5000 which originated outside the State of California. The parties stipulated and we find that the Employer is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act. The parties further stipulated and we find that the Respondent is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE

The issue presented is whether the Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) by bringing postresignation internal charges against Tracy Andreas and by recommending that a fine be assessed against Andreas because he crossed a picket line and returned to work for the Employer.

On July 9, 1984,[1] certain employees of the Employer, who at that time were members of and represented by the Respondent, concertedly ceased work and commenced an economic strike against the Employer. In furtherance of the strike, the Respondent established and maintained a picket line at the Employer's Fresno, California facility.

On July 17, Tracy Andreas, an employee of the Employer who had been a member of the Respondent since about August 1983, submitted to the Respondent, in person, a written resignation of his membership to be effective at noon on July 18. The Respondent received the resignation the day it was submitted. On July 18, Andreas ceased his participation in the strike, crossed the picket line, and returned to work.

The constitution of the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers provides in article L, section 3:

> Improper Conduct of a Member:
> Section 3. The following actions or omissions shall constitute misconduct by a member which shall warrant a reprimand, fine, suspension and/or exclusion from membership . . . :
> . . . Accepting employment in any capacity in an establishment where a strike or lockout exists as recognized under this Constitution, without permission. Resignation shall not relieve a member of his obligation to refrain from accepting employment at the establishment for the duration of the strike or lockout if the resignation occurs during the period of the strike or lockout or within 14 days preceding its commencement. Where observance of a primary picket line is required, any resignation tendered during the period that the picket line is maintained, or within 14 days preceding its establishment, shall not become effective as a resignation during the period the picket line is maintained, nor shall it relieve a member of his > or her obligation to observe the primary picket line for its duration. . . .

On August 16, Tom Rotella, the Respondent's trial committee chairman, sent Andreas a letter stating that charges had been brought against him for violating article L, section 3, of the constitution of the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers. The letter further stated that Andreas would be tried on the charges on September 8 and that the trial would proceed, regardless of Andreas' attendance at the trial. On September 8 the Respondent's trial committee tried Andreas on the charges stated in the letter, found him guilty, and recommended that a fine be assessed against him.

It is now well settled that a union violates Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act by bringing internal charges and assessing a fine against an employee because of his postresignation conduct in crossing a picket line and returning to work. Pattern Makers League v. NLRB, 473 U.S. 95 (1985);[2] Neufeld Porsche-Audi, 270 NLRB 1330 (1984).

Accordingly, we find that the Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) by bringing internal charges against Andreas and by recommending that a fine be assessed against Andreas because of his postresignation conduct in crossing the picket line and returning to work for the Employer.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. O'Brien's Brake Service, Inc., Fresno, California, is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Respondent is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By bringing internal charges against Tracy Andreas and by recommending that a fine be assessed against him for his postresignation conduct in crossing a picket line and returning to work with O'Brien's Brake Service, Inc., the Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

4. The foregoing unfair labor practice is an unfair labor practice affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act, we shall order that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action in order to effectuate the policies of the Act.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, District Lodge No. 87, Local Lodge No. 1309, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Maintaining and enforcing article L, section 3, of the constitution of the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers to the extent that it provides:

> Improper Conduct of a Member:
> Section 3. The following actions or omissions shall constitute misconduct by a member which shall warrant a reprimand, fine, suspension and/or exclusion from membership . . . :
> . . . Accepting employment in any capacity in an establishment where a strike or lockout exists as recognized under this Constitution, without permission. Resignation shall not relieve a member of his obligation to refrain from accepting employment at the establishment for the duration of the strike or lockout if the resignation occurs during the period of the strike or lockout or within 14 days preceding its commencement. Where observance of a primary picket line is required, any resignation tendered during the period that the picket line is maintained, or within 14 days preceding its establishment, shall not become effective as a resignation during the period the picket line is maintained, nor shall it relieve a member of his or her obligation to observe the primary picket line for its duration. . . .

(b) Restraining or coercing employees who have resigned from and are no longer members of the Respondent in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act by bringing internal charges against such employees and by recommending that fines be assessed against them because of their postresignation conduct in working at O'Brien's Brake Service, Inc. during the strike that began on July 9, 1984, or by failing to honor their resignations from membership.

(c) In any like or related manner restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Remove from its governing documents the portion of article L, section 3, of the constitution of the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers set forth above.

[2] While the Respondent contends that its conduct in assessing the fine against Andreas conforms with the Ninth Circuit's decision in Machinists Local 1327 (Dalmo Victor II) v. NLRB, 725 F.2d 1212 (1984), that case has been vacated and remanded to the circuit court for further consideration in light of the Supreme Court's decision in Pattern Makers.

(b) Rescind the recommendation that a fine be assessed against Tracy Andreas for his postresignation activity of crossing a picket line and returning to work at O'Brien's Brake Service and notify him that this has been done and refund to him any money that may have been paid as a result of the fine, with interest.

(c) Remove from its records any reference to the charges and disciplinary action taken against Tracy Andreas for his postresignation conduct, and notify him in writing that this has been done.

(d) Notify Tracy Andreas in writing that his resignation is effective.

(e) Post at its business offices and meeting halls copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[3] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 32, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(f) Sign and return to the Regional Director sufficient copies of the notice for posting by O'Brien's Brake Service, Inc., if willing, at all places where notices to employees are customarily posted.

(g) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO MEMBERS
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

WE WILL NOT maintain and enforce article L, section 3, of the constitution of the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers to the extent that it provides:

> Improper Conduct of a Member:

WE WILL NOT restrain or coerce employees who have resigned from, and are no longer members of, our labor organization in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act by bringing internal charges against such employees and by recommending that fines be assessed against them because of their postresignation conduct in working at O'Brien's Brake Service, Inc. during the strike that began on July 9, 1984, or by failing to honor their resignations from membership.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner restrain or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL remove from our governing documents the portion of article L, section 3, of the constitution of the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers set forth above.

WE WILL rescind the recommendation that a fine be assessed against Tracy Andreas for his postresignation activity of crossing a picket line and returning to work at O'Brien's Brake Service and notify him that this has been done and refund to him any money that may have been paid as a result of the fine, with interest.

WE WILL remove from our records any reference to the charges and disciplinary action taken against Tracy Andreas for his postresignation conduct, and notify him in writing that this has been done.

WE WILL notify Tracy Andreas, in writing, that his resignation is effective.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On August 11, 1986, the Board issued a Decision and Order in this case,[2] finding that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing to bargain with the Union that had been certified on July 30, 1985, as the exclusive bargaining representative of the Respondent's production and maintenance employees.[3] On November 2, 1987, the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit vacated the Board's order, holding that the Board erred in overruling the Respondent's objections to the election in the underlying representation case.[4]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

In its objections the Respondent contended, among other things, that the Union had offered to waive or reduce its initiation fee contingent on employees' demonstrating their support for the Union before the election. After a hearing on objections, the Board found that the waiver objection lacked merit. It was the court's view, which we have accepted as the law of the case, that there was not substantial evidence to support the Board's decision overruling the objection. Under this view, the Union should not have been certified on the basis of the election results, and no bargaining order should have issued.

Accordingly, we will dismiss the complaint in this case, reopen the representation case, revoke the certification, and remand that case to the Regional Director for Region 7 for appropriate action consistent with this decision, including the direction of a new election if the Union wishes to proceed to a new election.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the original decision in this case (281 NLRB 39) is vacated and the complaint is dismissed.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that Case 7-RC-17444 is reopened, the certification issued in that case is revoked, and the case is remanded to the Regional Director for Region 7 for appropriate action consistent with this decision, including the direction of a new election if desired by the Union.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On December 27, 1983, Administrative Law Judge Timothy D. Nelson issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.[2] The General Counsel filed a brief in support of the judge's decision and in answer to the Respondent's exceptions and brief. The General Counsel also filed limited cross-exceptions pertaining to the judge's failure to consider the complaint allegations involving the Charging Party's request for information submitted on September 13, 1982. The Charging Party, The East Bay Automotive Council and Its Affiliated Local Unions (the Unions), filed cross-exceptions[3] and a supporting brief. After the briefs were submitted, the Respondent filed a document entitled "Motion for Reopening of the Record and for Receipt of New Evidence." Thereafter, the General Counsel and the Unions filed memoranda in opposition to the Respondent's motion.[4]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[5] and conclusions, as modified, to modify his remedy, and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.

The judge found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act in connection with its 1982 takeover of a Ford dealership. As described below, we agree with the judge that the Respondent was a legal successor to its predecessor; that it was obligated to bargain with the Unions; that it unlawfully bypassed the Unions and unilaterally changed the terms and conditions of employment for its unit employees in several respects; that the Respondent's refusal on May 17 to employ the predecessor's employees was unlawful; and that its interviewing and hiring practices were unlawful.[6] We also adopt the other violations of Section 8(a)(1) found by the judge.[7] For the reasons below, however, we disagree with the judge to the extent he found that the Respondent was obligated to honor the last union contract between its predecessor and the Unions. We, finally, find that

[1] On November 2, 1987, the Teamsters International Union was readmitted to the AFL–CIO. Accordingly, the caption has been amended to reflect that change.

[2] The Respondent has requested oral argument. This request is denied as the record, the exceptions, and briefs adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties.

[3] The Unions' cross-exceptions are identical to the General Counsel's limited exceptions.

[4] The Respondent's motion to reopen the record to receive certain documentary evidence is denied. Our examination of the record reveals that these proffered documents are irrelevant to the events of 1982 in question.

[5] The Respondent asserts, in essence, that the judge's resolution of credibility, findings of facts, and conclusions of law are the result of bias. After a careful examination of the entire record, we are satisfied that this claim is without merit. The Respondent's request for a rehearing before a different administrative law judge is denied. There is no basis for finding that bias and partiality existed merely because the judge refused to grant the Respondent's request for a continuance during the trial and resolved important factual conflicts in favor of the General Counsel's witnesses. As the Supreme Court stated in NLRB v. Pittsburgh Steamship Co., 337 U.S. 656, 659 (1949), "[T]otal rejection of an opposed view cannot of itself impugn the integrity or competence of a trier of fact." Furthermore, the Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[6] We also agree with the judge's findings that the Respondent's inquiry about the applicants' intentions with respect to possible picketing by the Unions violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act. In Mosher Steel Co., 220 NLRB 336 (1975), enfd. 532 F.2d 1374 (5th Cir. 1976), the Board held that "where the record shows that at the time the questions about picketing were asked the Employer had a reasonable basis to fear an imminent strike and merely sought to ascertain the chances for keeping his business open, such inquiries are lawful [footnote omitted]." 220 NLRB at 336. Accord: Certainteed Corp., 282 NLRB 1101, 1107 (1987). The Respondent here, however, did not have a lawful purpose in asking the applicants if they intended to honor a picket line established by the Unions. In this respect, the judge found important Supervisor Smith's testimony that job offers were not extended to individuals who initially expressed or indicated a reluctance to cross the Unions' picket line unless, at a later time, they indicated that they would be willing to cross the picket line. Smith's testimony shows that the inquiry about an applicant's picketing intentions was used by the Respondent in making its hiring selections and was not used to ascertain whether the Respondent could keep its operations going during the picketing. The inquiry was also accompanied by a requirement that future employees express a willingness to work "nonunion" as a condition of their retention. Cf. Hedaya Bros., 277 NLRB 943 (1985) (questioning employees about their strike intentions constituted a violation of Sec. 8(a)(1)).

[7] The judge found that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1) when it gave false and misleading information to the Unions regarding the details of the dealership takeover. Because we find that the Respondent's bargaining obligation arose after these events occurred, we do not adopt the judge's findings that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(5). He also found that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) in the following two respects. First, on May 17 the Respondent refused to employ nonunit employees and required them to apply for work as part of an unlawful plan to defeat the Unions' status as the exclusive representative of the unit employees. Second, the Respondent told employees that its previously represented shop and service departments would be nonunion and that any employee wishing to work in those departments must sign an individual employment contract and cross the Unions' picket lines as a condition of hire.

the Respondent also violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) when it failed and refused to comply with the Union's September 13, 1982 information request.[8]

Briefly stated, the relevant facts are as follows. Fremont Ford, Inc. (Fremont),[9] a California corporation, operated a Ford car and truck dealership in Fremont, California, from 1978 until May 17, 1982.[10] On May 17, after months of financial difficulties, Fremont sold the dealership to the Respondent and terminated its entire work force, including 22 unit employees working in its service, parts, and body shop departments who had been represented by the Unions. The Unions' last collective-bargaining agreement covering these employees was effective from August 20, 1980, through August 20, 1983.

The Respondent was specifically created under the Ford Motor Co.'s dealer development program to purchase and operate the Fremont dealership with Donald Barnes as the dealer operator/minority shareholder and Ford as the majority shareholder.[11] Steps to accomplish the dealership transfer to the Respondent began in mid-January. Barnes, then serving in several capacities for Fremont,[12] applied to participate in Ford's dealer development program. In March, after Barnes' application had been reviewed by various Ford personnel, the negotiations with a Ford representative occurred. These negotiations, covering the necessary financing, leasing, and takeover arrangements for the dealership sale, culminated in the granting of certain options on March 19. These options gave the Ford representative the right to enter into a buy-sell agreement with Fremont to purchase the dealership and the right to sublease certain property from Fremont's principal owners, Paul Brinkman and Leon Pettitt. The Ford representative also retained the right to assign these options to the corporation to be created under the dealer development program, viz, the Respondent. All these March arrangements were contingent on Ford's subsequent approval.

On April 22, Ford gave its approval to the deal struck by Fremont and the Respondent in March. The Respondent was then incorporated as a Delaware corporation on April 23. Between April 23 and May 17, corporate bylaws were adopted; corporate officers and directors were elected; and various licenses, permits, bank accounts, insurance, and other items necessary to do business as a Ford dealership in California were obtained by the Respondent. On May 7 Ford accepted Fremont's resignation from the dealership operation, but Fremont continued its sales and service at the dealership through May 17. On May 7, a Ford sales and service agreement was executed on behalf of the Respondent, but there is no evidence that such agreement was utilized prior to May 19. On May 14, an inventory of the dealership's assets was taken by an outside company in final preparation of the dealership sale to the Respondent which took place the following week.

The following week was a busy period for the Respondent. On May 17, the Respondent entered into a dealer development program agreement with Ford; issued preferred stock to Ford and common stock to Barnes; accepted a secured loan from Ford; and appointed Barnes to serve as the dealership's general manager and operator. On the same date, money among the interested parties to the dealership sale exchanged hands. On May 19, the Ford representative assigned the March 19 options to the Respondent. The Respondent then exercised these options by executing the buy-sell and lease agreements on May 20. During this period, Fremont's property subject to the sale was transferred to the Respondent. On May 19, using Fremont's trade name, the Respondent opened for business, providing sales and services comparable to those which had been provided by Fremont.

Several months in advance of the dealership transfer, Barnes had made plans to operate the dealership on a nonunion basis. Except for his remarks in January at a grievance meeting,[13] Barnes kept his plans secret from the Fremont unit employees. He even went so far as to instruct his parts and service director, Larry Smith, to conceal or make false or misleading statements to the Fremont unit employees who inquired about the working conditions to be expected under the Respondent's control of the dealership. Not until after the hiring process had begun, when personal interviews were conducted on May 17 and after the required written job applications had already been submitted early in May, did the Respondent first inform the Fremont unit employees that there would be significantly different employment conditions.

[8] The judge inadvertently failed to pass on this complaint allegation even though it was fully litigated.

[9] Fremont is not a named party to these proceedings.

[10] All dates are in 1982 unless otherwise indicated.

[11] Under this program, the dealer operator/minority shareholder could use future profits of the dealership to buy Ford's corporate interest.

[12] Barnes was corporate president, director, 20-percent owner, general manager, and operator of Fremont.

[13] Based on credited testimony, the judge found that after the announcement of an adverse grievance ruling against Fremont in January, Barnes said to the Unions' representatives in attendance:

> You guys are not going to be around here. There's no union going to run my store. . . . I'll take care of that when I become the sole owner.

The judge further found that Supervisor Smith later mentioned the above remarks made by Barnes to employee Darrell Cooper by explaining that Barnes was "mad enough to blow the whole union out of the water."

On May 17, former Fremont unit employees were interviewed for possible employment with the Respondent. The next day, in accord with its recent newspaper advertisements, the Respondent interviewed job applicants who were not recently associated with Fremont. A total of more than 100 applicants were screened by the Respondent's supervisory staff, all of whom were formerly Fremont supervisors.

During the interviews, the Respondent asked questions concerning whether the applicants would work in a nonunion setting under employment conditions that differed in several ways from the terms established by its predecessor's last union contract. These new terms included a flat-rate pay scale instead of the hourly pay scale. The applicants were told that they would be required to sign a document showing their willingness to work under the new employment conditions. Having learned of probable picketing by the Unions, the Respondent also asked the job applicants if they were willing to cross a picket line. The Respondent further guaranteed the applicants a 40-hour weekly pay while any picketing occurred.

The Respondent eventually hired 10 employees, all former Fremont unit employees, to begin work on May 19. Those hired were expected to cross a picket line, work a flat-rate pay scale, and were subject to several employment conditions which differed from the terms of the last union contract between Fremont and the Unions.

After May 19, the Respondent continued to hire employees as its needs increased. On September 15, after the Respondent had received the Unions' September 13 written demand for recognition, discussed, infra, 11 of the 26 employees in the Respondent's service, parts, and body shop departments were former Fremont unit employees. On September 27, the date when the Respondent claims that it attained a full employee complement, 28 employees were in those departments, a majority of whom had not been formerly associated with Fremont.

Despite Barnes' plans to operate the dealership without the Unions, the Unions met with the Respondent on two occasions, on May 6 and 17. By letter dated May 3, Barnes had offered to discuss with the Unions the effect of the sale on those dealership employees then represented by the Unions.[14] In response to this letter, Union Business Representative Bobo met with Barnes on May 6. In that meeting, Bobo asked what it would take to keep the dealership a "union store." Bobo and Barnes then discussed three subjects raised by Barnes. The subjects were employee seniority for vacation purposes, retention of unit employees, and a flat-rate pay system for unit employees.[15] No agreements on these subjects were reached. Regarding the retention of unit employees, Barnes suggested that there were "three or four" employees, without giving any names, that he might not want to retain. Barnes then agreed to contact Bobo when the transfer of the dealership assets to the Respondent took place.

On May 17, accompanied by Union Representative Day, Bobo again visited Barnes at the dealership. Day told Barnes that he and Bobo were there to get a union contract signed. Barnes replied that he had no evidence that the Unions represented any of the Respondent's employees and it would be a couple of days before the Respondent would be in operation. The union representatives then left the dealership.

The Unions' next contact with the Respondent came 2 days later. After the Respondent opened for business on May 19, the Unions commenced picketing at the dealership and picketed for approximately 2 months.[16]

After the picketing ceased, the Unions sent a letter dated September 13 and received by the Respondent on September 15. In this letter, the Unions demanded that the Respondent honor its predecessor's contract or, alternatively, recognize and bargain with them on the basis that the Respondent was a legal successor to Fremont. The Unions also requested that they be immediately supplied with the following information:

> 1. The names, addresses, job classifications, wages and benefits, dates of employment, and hours worked per week for all employees

[14] Barnes' letter designated May 20 as the date expected for the Respondent's ownership of the dealership to commence. Contrary to the judge, we do not find it critical that all dates for the transfer given the Unions and the employees by the Respondent and its predecessor were not always the same. These different predictions can be expected in view of the complexities involved in such a dealership transfer. We do not view these dates as inconsistent but merely approximations when the transfer could be expected to occur. In any event, we find the Unions had sufficient notice that this changeover was to take place. This, however, does not detract from our general agreement with the judge's finding that the Respondent otherwise gave false and misleading information to the Unions regarding the details of the dealership takeover.

[15] According to the credited witness testimony, the latter topic in some circles is synonymous with a nonunion operation since several unions in this industry do not want a flat-rate pay system for the employees they represent.

[16] The record gives very little description of this picketing activity. What actually appeared on the picket signs is not altogether clear. There is some evidence that the signs displayed something to the effect that the Respondent was unfair to the Unions. The Unions' letter of September 13 asserts that the Unions engaged in the picketing to protest the Respondent's nonunion status and the failure to pay area wage and benefits standards. The Unions' stated purpose for the picketing was not disputed by the Respondent.

within the bargaining unit who had worked for the Company since May 15.

2. The names of the then-current owners and officers of the Company and the percentage of ownership of the owners.

3. A copy of the purchase agreement, the May "sale of assets" agreement, the terms of the sale, and the incorporation papers of the Company.

4. A description of all benefits (holidays, vacations, sick leave, jury leave, health and welfare, retirement, etc.) to which employees were entitled, the dates when these benefits were implemented, and a copy of any and all benefit plan descriptions.

5. The status of all current owners and officers of the Company from June 15, 1981 to May 20, 1982.

By letter dated September 20 the Respondent refused all the Unions' demands. The Respondent took the position, inter alia, that it was not a successor to Fremont and that there was no existing relationship between it and Fremont requiring the submission of the requested information to the Unions.

With respect to his 8(a)(5) findings, the judge found that the Respondent was a successor to Fremont under four different theories. His first theory, which is the basis of his recommended remedy, used the principles of East Belden Corp.[17] and its progeny[18] to conclude that successorship attached in January, or on March 19 at the latest, based on Barnes' control of the dealership, even though the transfer of assets actually occurred much later, in May. The judge's first alternative theory for successorship was grounded on a finding that the Respondent voluntarily recognized the Unions in May as shown by its correspondence with the Unions and the subsequent May 6 meeting with Union Representative Bobo. Then, in line with his East Belden and voluntary recognition theories, the judge found that the Respondent had "assumed" the union contract of its predecessor because the Respondent had honored and applied this contract prior to May 17. The judge thus found that the Respondent had an obligation to apply the union contract to its employees after May 17 and was not permitted to make the unilateral changes in working conditions and engage in the direct dealing with the unit employees on May 17.

The judge's second alternative theory for successorship can be stated as follows: "but for" an unlawful hiring process the Respondent would have had almost a full employee complement with a majority composed of its predecessor's employees on May 19. In support of this theory, the judge cited Potters Chalet Drug, 233 NLRB 15 (1977), enfd. mem. 584 F.2d 980 (9th Cir. 1978), in conjunction with his findings that the Respondent illegally refused to employ all 22 unit employees on May 17 and discriminatorily refused to hire 12 of them when the dealership reopened on May 19. The third alternative theory of the judge found successorship because the Respondent had a "representative complement" of employees (a majority of whom were former Fremont employees) on May 19, when the Respondent opened for business to the public, even if a "full complement" was not attained until 4 months later as claimed by the Respondent. Under the judge's second and third alternative theories, the Respondent would not be obligated to honor the contract between Fremont and the Unions, but would be required to bargain with the Unions as the exclusive representative of the unit employees.

Having set forth the judge's four theories of successorship, we shall consider them in the order designated by the judge's decision.

Regarding his first theory, the judge misconstrued the criteria necessary for the East Belden principles to apply. In East Belden, the prospective buyer was in existence and executed a written purchase agreement to buy the restaurant. Then, the buyer entered the property and took control of the restaurant during an approximate 2-month escrow period until the permanent transfer of the restaurant occurred. During escrow, the buyer retained a majority of the seller's unit employees who had been represented by the union in East Belden. Evidence of the buyer's control was reflected in the change in the restaurant's operating records to show that the buyer was the named operator during the escrow period. The buyer also paid various operating expenses of the restaurant, including the manager salaries and employee wages, during the escrow period. The buyer was the party to reap the profits or losses of the restaurant during the escrow period. Under these circumstances, the buyer was deemed to have acquired the obligations of a successor employer during escrow.

In Sorrento Hotel, supra, the new lessees executed a written interim management agreement to operate the hostelry while they awaited a long-term lease with the owner to begin. During this interim period, the lessees entered the property, took control of managing the property, obtained and utilized the necessary licensing and permits to manage the property, promised to indemnify the owner for any mismanagement, and utilized the owner's employees. The lessees incurred the business' operating expenses, including the compensation of the manager, who was designated by the lessees and who reported directly to the lessees. As with the buyer in East Belden, the Board marked successorship when the transitional period began, which meant that the lessees' successorship began with their interim management instead of when their long-term lease began.

[17] 239 NLRB 776 (1978), enfd. mem. 634 F.2d 635 (9th Cir. 1980). The concept developed by this case permits successorship to attach before actual complete takeover by the purchaser if the purchaser enters the property during an escrow period and utilizes a majority of the seller's employees during this escrow period.

[18] See, e.g., Sorrento Hotel, 266 NLRB 350 (1983).

The salient facts in East Belden and Sorrento Hotel triggering successorship status before the purchase was final or the lease commenced are that there were written agreements to purchase or lease and an escrow or interim management period officially established for the prospective buyer or lessee to take control. Here there was no written agreement to purchase or lease the dealership in existence in January or on March 19 and no escrow or transitional period. The execution of the buy-sell and lease agreements by the Respondent and the transfer of the dealership property occurred almost simultaneously and there was no interim agreement for the Respondent to operate the dealership.

The judge mischaracterized the import of the events in January and on March 19. The judge misconstrued the January plans to "apply" to buy the dealership and the March 19 "option" agreements when he found them to be equivalent to, and having the same legal effect, as written purchase and lease agreements. In January, the parties were in the exploratory and tentative planning stages, no matter how confident they may have been of dealership transfer in the future. No written agreements existed; only an application was on file. The Respondent did not exist prior to April 23, and it was not open for business until May 19. In January, the sales and services of the dealership were handled by the Respondent's predecessor, and the Respondent did not even have a Ford sales and service agreement at the time to be considered a Ford dealership. The dealership's operating records, licenses, permits, and operating expenses were those of the Respondent's predecessor. In January, the Respondent was not funded.[19] The supervisory staff, including General Manager Barnes, still reported to the Respondent's predecessor. Barnes' scope of authority remained basically the same as his authority prior to January. If anything, some restrictions on financial spending were placed on Barnes after he submitted his application to the Ford's dealer development program. In March, the situation did not change when negotiations occurred and the March 19 options were given the Ford representative, which the judge treated as fiction, disregarding basic contract-law principles.

To summarize, the facts underlying the Respondent's activity in January and on March 19 are distinguishable from the facts presented by the East Belden and Sorrento Hotel-type of case. For this reason, we do not adopt the judge's finding of successorship premised on the East Belden theory.

Turning to the judge's next theory of successorship, the one premised on voluntary recognition, we find that the judge wrongly concluded that an invitation to discuss the sale with the Unions coupled with a subsequent discussion on May 6 with Union Representative Bobo rose to the level of extending recognition to the Unions. Rather, the more reasonable interpretation of Barnes' conduct reflects just the opposite conclusion. Even though Barnes expressed a general willingness to discuss three subjects in terms of the Unions' desires to keep the dealership a "union store," the May 6 meeting was called on behalf of Fremont in an effort to fulfill its bargaining obligation to the Unions. During the meeting, Barnes never stated that the Respondent actually recognized the Unions as the bargaining representative of its prospective employees. At most, Barnes indicated that the Unions should check back with him at a later date. This latter statement is equivocal at best, especially when viewed in the context of Barnes' earlier remarks in January at a grievance meeting to the effect that he desired to operate the dealership in the future on a nonunion basis.

To support his second alternative, "but-for" theory, the judge found that the Respondent illegally, inter alia, refused to employ all 22 unit employees on May 17 and discriminatorily refused to rehire 12 of them when the dealership reopened on May 19. The judge found a prima facie case of discrimination based on Barnes' declared intention to have the dealership operate nonunion under the Respondent's ownership, and his requirements that employees express a willingness to cross a picket line and work "nonunion" as a condition of their retention as well as his insistence that prospective employees sign individual employment contracts. We agree and find the record does support a prima facie case of a tainted hiring process, and that the Respondent failed to meet its burden under Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), enfd. 662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981). We, therefore, adopt the judge's 8(a)(3) findings, as described above.

[19] A bank account for the Respondent was not established until May. The record shows that no funds were drawn on the account prior to May 19 to operate the dealership.

In Love's Barbeque Restaurant No. 62, 245 NLRB 78 (1979), enfd. in pertinent part 640 F.2d 1094 (9th Cir. 1981), the successor did not hire the predecessor's employees based on unlawful considerations. In view of the successor's unlawful refusal to hire the former company's employees, which constituted a violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act, the Board determined that the successor further violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. "But for" the successor's unlawful conduct, the union's status as the exclusive bargaining representative would have survived the successor's takeover of the business. Love's Barbeque, supra at 82. Accord: State Distributing Co., 282 NLRB 1048 (1987).

Applying the principles of Love's Barbeque here, we arrive at the same result reached by the judge, that is, the Unions' presumption of majority status would have continued had the 12 discriminatees been hired to begin work on May 19. Since we agree with the judge's finding that all the other elements of successorship are present, more fully discussed, infra, we adopt, as described above, his second alternative, "but for" successorship theory.

With respect to the judge's representative complement theory, we begin our discussion with Fall River Dyeing Corp. v. NLRB.[20] In that case, the U.S. Supreme Court recently reaffirmed the Board's approach to determining whether a successorship relationship exists between two entities. In particular, the Court held that the Board's "substantial and representative complement" rule is reasonable in the successorship context.[21]

The Board's traditional test for determining if a purchaser has a duty to continue the bargaining relationship established by its predecessor is whether there is a substantial continuity in the employing enterprise.[22] A comparison of business operations, plant, work force, jobs, working conditions, supervisors, machinery, equipment, production methods, and product or service is made to ascertain if continuity exists.[23]

In comparing the Respondent to its predecessor, the judge found sufficient operational continuity. As seen from the record, after a 1-day hiatus, the Respondent opened for business to sell and service vehicles at the same location with the same supervisory staff and with the same nonsupervisory job classifications. Problematic for the judge was whether a sufficient continuity in the employee complement existed on which to premise majority status for the Unions. The judge found that a "substantial and representative complement" existed when the Respondent officially opened for business to the public with 10 former Fremont unit employees on hand. The judge relied, inter alia, on the principles set forth in Pre-Engineered Building Products, 228 NLRB 841 (1977), enfd. 603 F.2d 134, 136 (10th Cir. 1979), and Premium Foods, 260 NLRB 708 (1982), enfd. 709 F.2d 623, 628 (9th Cir. 1983), which were favorably cited by the Court in Fall River Dyeing Corp. v. NLRB, supra.

To find a concomitant bargaining duty on the part of the Respondent under this successorship theory, there must be an outstanding bargaining demand made by the Unions. In the instant case, the Unions arguably demanded recognition on three occasions—on May 6 when Union Representative Bobo met with General Manager Barnes, on May 17 when Union Representatives Bobo and Day approached Barnes to sign a contract on behalf of the Respondent, and on September 15 when the Respondent received a written demand for recognition from the Unions. On the first occasion, the Respondent was neither legally nor functionally operational and had no unit employees on its payroll. See Spruce Up Corp., 209 NLRB 194 (1974). The dealership was still under the control of the Respondent's predecessor; the employees were the predecessor's. The fact that Barnes, who intended to be the new operator, was on the scene still performing his job as the predecessor's general manager did not divest the predecessor's control. On the third occasion, the Respondent had been in control for some 4 months; however, a majority of its employees were not then former unit employees of the predecessor unless the 12 discriminatees who were not hired are considered. On the second occasion, however, the actual takeover of the dealership had begun. As previously discussed, on May 17, the Respondent had entered into a dealer development program agreement with Ford; had issued preferred stock to Ford and common stock to Barnes, and had accepted a secured loan from Ford; had appointed Barnes to serve as the dealership's general manager; had exchanged money with the other interested parties to the dealership sale; and had interviewed former Fremont unit employees and hired its supervisory staff. Thus, there was a viable demand for recognition from the Unions on 17 May.[24] The Union's demand of May 17 constituted a "continuing demand" under Fall River Dyeing Corp. v. NLRB, supra at 54, which triggered a bargaining obligation on May 19 when the Respondent opened for business. See Bachrodt

[24] Here, the Unions made clear after May 17, as shown by the picketing activity, that in their view the Respondent had a bargaining obligation.

Chevrolet Co., 205 NLRB 784 (1973), enfd. 515 F.2d 512 (7th Cir. 1975), cert. denied 423 U.S. 927 (1975).

Having analyzed the judge's four successorship theories, we now treat the 8(a)(5) allegation relating to the Respondent's implementation of new terms and conditions of employment for unit employees. Since the judge found the Respondent had assumed the union contract, he did not have to squarely resolve whether the Respondent was otherwise free to set initial employment terms under the teachings of NLRB v. Burns Security Services, 406 U.S. 272 (1972). Because we have rejected the judge's finding that the Respondent assumed the union contract, we must decide this issue.

In Burns the Supreme Court stated:

> Although a successor employer is ordinarily free to set initial terms on which it will hire the employees of a predecessor, there will be instances in which it is perfectly clear that the new employer plans to retain all of the employees in the unit and in which it will be appropriate to have him initially consult with the employees' bargaining representative before he fixes terms. In other situations, however, it may not be clear until the successor employer has hired his full complement of employees that he has a duty to bargain with a union, since it will not be evident until then that the bargaining representative represents a majority of the employees in the unit as required by § 9(a) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 159(a). [406 U.S. at 294–295 (emphasis added).]

The pivotal language of Burns is "perfectly clear." Several Board decisions have interpreted that language and their interpretations provide us with some guidance here. In Spitzer Akron, Inc., 219 NLRB 20, 22 (1975), enfd. 540 F.2d 841 (6th Cir. 1976), cert. denied 429 U.S. 1040 (1977), the Board interpreted that language not to require that all employees had to be hired. The Board was influenced by the fact that, prior to assuming control, the successor had indicated an intention to retain the predecessor's employees and then hired enough to make it evident that the union's majority status would continue. In that case, as well as in Howard Johnson Co., 198 NLRB 763 (1972), enfd. 496 F.2d 532 (9th Cir. 1974), and Bachrodt Chevrolet Co., 205 NLRB 784 (1973), enfd. 515 F.2d 512 (7th Cir. 1975), cert. denied 423 U.S. 927 (1975), the predecessor's employees had been hired by the successor employer prior to the announcement of the changes in employment terms that had not been a part of the initial terms of rehiring. In Bachrodt, for example, the successor employer did not make the predecessor employees aware of the proposed changes when it invited them to apply for work and submit written job applications or when they were interviewed. In all three cases the Board found an 8(a)(5) violation applying Burns.

On the other hand, in Spruce Up Corp., 209 NLRB 194 (1974), enfd. per curiam 529 F.2d 516 (4th Cir. 1975), the Board did not find a violation of Section 8(a)(5) because it found that the facts did not fall within the parameters of the "perfectly clear" exception enunciated in Burns. In Spruce Up the successor employer expressed a general willingness to hire the former employer's employees, but at the same time indicated that such employment was conditioned on their willingness to accept the terms of employment set by him. In particular, the successor employer distributed job applications which set forth the new rates of commission he intended to pay and requested that all those predecessor employees who desired to work on that basis submit the application. The Board stated:

> When an employer who has not yet commenced operations announces new terms prior to or simultaneously with his invitation to the previous work force to accept employment under those terms, we do not think it can fairly be said that the new employer "plans to retain all of the employees in the unit," as that phrase was intended by the Supreme Court. . . .
> We believe that the caveat in Burns, therefore, should be restricted to circumstances in which the new employer has either actively or, by tacit inference, misled employees into believing they would all be retained without change in their wages, hours, or conditions of employment, or at least to circumstances where the new employer, unlike the Respondent here, has failed to clearly announce its intent to establish a new set of conditions prior to inviting former employees to accept employment. [Fn. omitted. 209 NLRB at 195.]

Since Spruce Up the Board has adhered to this distinction based on when the successor employer announces its offer of different terms of employment in relation to its expression of intent to retain the predecessor's employees unless the successor has misled them. See Starco Farmers Market, 237 NLRB 373 (1978) (and cases cited therein).

In our view, the facts of the instant case fall within the Court's caveat in Burns, and we conclude that the Respondent forfeited the right to set initial terms. The judge found that when Barnes met with Union Representative Bobo on May 6 and indicated that he had doubts about the retention of only a few of the current employees it was "perfectly clear" under Burns that Barnes planned to retain a majority of Fremont employees. The record shows that employee William Deetz and Marvin Wiggins were even told by Supervisor Smith prior to May 17 that they would be retained when the Respondent took over the dealership operations. Smith's promise of employment was given before the Respondent later announced, in the individual employee interviews, its new employment terms and conditions. The record further shows that when Darrell Cooper received his job application, Smith assured him that nothing was going to change, including having union representation, when the Respondent took over the dealership. The judge credited all of his testimony and further found that here Barnes embarked on a misinformation campaign. Barnes instructed his supervisors to conceal or make false or misleading statements to the Fremont employees who inquired about the working conditions to be expected under the Respondent's control. Barnes gave the Unions false or misleading information about his true intentions to change more than just the three subjects discussed at the May 6 meeting. Nor does the Respondent's May 16 want ad, soliciting outside employment applications and announcing that the Respondent would operate a flat-rate shop, negate the earlier misinformation given directly to the predecessor's employees. In this regard, there is no indication that the predecessor's employees saw the ads. Indeed, it is unlikely they would have been looking at employment ads after being reassured by the Respondent that nothing would change once it took over the operation. It was not until after the hiring process had begun that the Respondent first informed the Fremont employees that there would be significantly different employment conditions. In addition, the Respondent's interviews were tainted by conditioning the hire of Fremont employees on their willingness to abandon union representation and cross the Unions' picket lines. Finally, the Respondent's refusal to employ the Fremont work force and its subsequent requirement that all apply for work was simply part of an unlawful plan to defeat the Unions' status as the exclusive representative of the unit employees.

Under these circumstances, we find, unlike the situation presented in Spruce Up, that the Respondent failed to clearly announce its intent to establish a new set of conditions prior to inviting former employees to accept employment. Moreover, "any uncertainty as to what Respondent would have done absent its unlawful purpose must be resolved against Respondent, since it cannot be permitted to benefit from its unlawful conduct." Love's Barbeque Restaurant, 245 NLRB 78, 82 (1979). Therefore, the Respondent was not free to unilaterally set initial terms of employment. Accord: State Distributing Co., 282 NLRB 1048 (1987).

We finally consider the 8(a)(5) allegation relating to the Unions' information request submitted September 13. As previously noted, the Respondent's refusal to honor the Unions' request was premised on the position that the Respondent was not a successor to Fremont Ford, a position that we have rejected for the reasons discussed, supra. Generally, the Unions requested data concerning the identity and status of the unit employees, owners, and officers of the Company, a description of the wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment of unit employees, and certain key documents relating to the dealership transfer and takeover by the Respondent. There is no contention that the requested data is irrelevant to the Unions' functions as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative if this status existed.

It is well established that an employer has an obligation to supply requested information which is reasonably necessary to the exclusive collective-bargaining representative's responsibilities. NLRB v. Acme Industrial Co., 385 U.S. 432 (1967); NLRB v. Truitt Mfg. Co., 351 U.S. 149 (1956). The information requested by the Unions as it relates to unit employees is presumptively relevant to collective bargaining. Harco Laboratories, 271 NLRB 1397 (1984); Equitable Life Assurance Society, 266 NLRB 732 (1983); Georgetown Holiday Inn, 235 NLRB 485 (1978); Leonard B. Hebert Jr. & Co., 259 NLRB 881 (1981), enfd. 696 F.2d 1120 (5th Cir. 1983); and Barnard Engineering Co., 282 NLRB 617 (1987). The Respondent has not rebutted this presumption. Nor did the Respondent raise issues of relevance or lack of necessity in denying the Unions' information request. For these reasons, we find that the Unions are entitled to the information requested.

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, we shall order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative actions designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

We shall order the Respondent to recognize and, on request, to bargain with the Unions as the exclusive representative of all its employees in the unit, including furnishing the information requested by the Unions in their letter of September 13, 1982. We shall also order the Respondent to rescind, on the Union's request, the unilateral changes in unit employees' wages, hours, and terms and conditions of employment implemented on May 17, 1982; and to make all affected unit employees whole for losses they incurred by virtue of its unilateral changes to their wages, fringe benefits, and other terms and conditions of employment in accordance with Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 682 (1970), with interest as prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded.[25] The Respondent shall remit all payments it owes to the employee benefit funds and reimburse its employees in the manner set forth in Kraft Plumbing & Heating, 252 NLRB 891 fn. 2 (1980), enfd. 661 F.2d 940 (9th Cir. 1981), for any expenses resulting from the Respondent's failure to make these payments. Any amounts that the Respondent must pay into the benefit funds shall be determined in the manner set forth in Merryweather Optical Co., 240 NLRB 1213, 1216 fn. 7 (1970).[26] We shall also order the Respondent to offer the 22 unit employees, in writing, immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority and other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, dismissing if necessary persons hired on or after May 17, 1982, and to make them whole for any loss of earnings and benefits in accordance with F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and New Horizons, supra. We shall also order the Respondent to give written notice to the 22 unit employees that it will recognize and bargain with the Unions as the exclusive representative and that it will no longer condition their hire on their willingness to abandon union representation, to cross the Unions' picket lines, and to sign individual employment contracts. We shall also order that the Respondent remove from its records all references to its refusal to employ the 22 unit employees and notify the employees involved that this has been done. We shall also order the Respondent to rescind the individual employment contracts executed on or after May 17, 1982.

AMENDED CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Delete paragraphs 4, 5, and 6(b) and renumber the remaining paragraphs.

2. Substitute the following for relettered paragraph 4(b).

"(c) Failing and refusing to provide the Unions the information requested on September 13, 1982, which was reasonably necessary to the Unions' responsibilities as exclusive bargaining representative of the Respondent's unit employees."

3. Substitute the following for relettered paragraph 5(e).

"(e) Applying the terms set forth in those contracts rather than the existing terms and conditions of employment to all employees hired on and after May 19."

4. Substitute the following for relettered paragraph 6(b).

"(b) Telling bargaining unit employees that the Respondent's operation after May 17 would be nonunion and that they must be willing to sign individual employment contracts and cross a picket line to keep or get a bargaining unit job and giving them false and misleading information regarding the details of the dealership transfer."

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Fremont Ford Sales, Inc., d/b/a Fremont Ford, Fremont, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to recognize and bargain in good faith with The East Bay Automotive Council and Its Affiliated Local Unions (the Unions) as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the bargaining unit described below by

(i) Failing and refusing to supply the Unions, on their request, relevant information reasonably necessary for the proper performance of their duties as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the bargaining unit.

(ii) Failing to notify the Unions sufficiently in advance of implementing changes affecting the wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment of the bargaining unit employees to permit a reasonable opportunity for good-faith collective bargaining about such changes with the Unions;

(iii) Unilaterally changing wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment for bargaining unit employees.

(iv) Bypassing the Unions and dealing directly with bargaining unit employees regarding their wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment by implementing individual employment contracts.

[25] 283 NLRB 1173 (1987). Interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

[26] Because the provisions of employee benefit fund agreements are variable and complex, the Board does not provide at the adjudicatory stage of the proceeding for the addition of interest at a fixed rate on unlawfully withheld fund payments. It is, therefore, left to the compliance stage the question of whether the Respondent must pay any additional amounts into the benefit funds in order to satisfy the "make-whole" remedy. These additional amounts may be determined, depending on the circumstances of each case, by reference to provisions in the documents governing the funds at issue and, where there are no governing provisions, to evidence of any loss directly attributable to the unlawful withholding action, which might include the loss of return on investment of the portion of funds withheld, additional administrative costs, etc., but not collateral losses.

(b) Discriminating against its unit employees by

(i) Refusing to employ them to defeat the Unions' exclusive representative status.

(ii) Conditioning their hire on their willingness to abandon union representation, to cross the Unions' picket lines, and to sign individual employment contracts.

(iii) Any other manner with respect to their hire, tenure, or other terms and conditions of employment in order to discourage support for union representation.

(c) Refusing to employ nonbargaining unit employees and requiring them to apply for work as part of an unlawful plan to defeat the Unions' status as the exclusive representative of the bargaining unit employees.

(d) Telling employees that its previously represented shop and service departments will be nonunion and that any employee wishing to work in those departments must sign an individual employment contract and cross the Unions' picket lines as a condition of hire and giving them false and misleading information regarding the details of the dealership transfer.

(e) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request, bargain with the Unions as the exclusive representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit concerning terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody the understanding in a signed agreement:

> All full-time and regular part-time employees employed by [the Respondent], excluding office clerical employees, salesmen, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) Furnish to the Unions, on request and in a timely fashion, the information requested by their letter of September 13, 1982.

(c) On request of the Unions, rescind the unilateral changes in the unit employees' wages, hours, and terms and conditions of employment that were implemented on May 17, 1982, and make affected employees whole for losses they incurred by virtue of its unilateral changes to their wages, fringe benefits, and other terms and conditions of employment from May 17, 1982, until it negotiates in good faith with the Unions to agreement or to impasse, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the Decision.

(d) Offer, in writing, to the extent it has not already done so, immediate and full reinstatement to all 22 employees named below to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, while working for its predecessor, and make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against them, discharging if necessary the persons hired into bargaining unit positions on and after May 17, 1982, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the decision. With the reinstatement offers, the Respondent shall notify the employees that it will recognize and bargain with the Unions as their exclusive representative and that it will no longer condition their hire on their willingness to abandon union representation, to cross the Unions' picket lines, and to sign individual employment contracts.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT refuse to recognize and bargain in good faith with The East Bay Automotive Council and Its Affiliated Local Unions as the exclusive bargaining representative of employees in the bargaining unit described below.

WE WILL NOT fail and refuse to supply the Unions, on their request, relevant information reasonably necessary for the proper performance of their duties as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the bargaining unit.

WE WILL NOT fail to notify the Unions sufficiently in advance of implementing changes affecting the wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment of our bargaining unit employees to permit a reasonable opportunity for good-faith collective bargaining about such changes with the Unions.

WE WILL NOT unilaterally change wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment for bargaining unit employees.

WE WILL NOT bypass the Unions and deal directly with our bargaining unit employees regarding their wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment by implementing individual employment contracts.

WE WILL NOT discriminate against our unit employees by refusing to employ them to defeat the Unions' exclusive representative status; by conditioning their hire on their willingness to abandon union representation, to cross the Unions' picket lines, and to sign individual employment contracts; or by any other manner with respect to our employees' hire, tenure, or other terms and conditions of employment in order to discourage support for union representation.

WE WILL NOT refuse to employ nonbargaining unit employees and then require them to reapply for work as part of an unlawful plan to defeat the Unions' status as the exclusive representative of our bargaining unit employees.

WE WILL NOT tell our employees that our previously represented shop and service departments will be nonunion and that any employee wishing to work in those departments must sign an individual employment contract and cross the Unions' picket lines as a condition of hire and WE WILL NOT give our employees false and misleading information regarding the details of the dealership transfer.

WE WILL NOT in any other manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, on request, bargain with the Unions and put in writing and sign any agreement reached on terms and conditions of employment for our employees in the bargaining unit:

> All full-time and regular part-time employees employed by us, excluding office clerical employees, salesmen, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WE WILL furnish to the Unions, on request and in a timely fashion, the information requested by their letter of September 13, 1982.

WE WILL, on request of the Unions, rescind the unilateral changes in our unit employees' wages, hours, and terms and conditions of employment that were implemented on May 17, 1982, and WE WILL make affected employees whole for losses they incurred by virtue of our unilateral changes to their wages, fringe benefits, and other terms and conditions of employment.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

TIMOTHY D. NELSON, Administrative Law Judge. I heard this case in 7 days of trial proceedings[1] in Oakland, California, between May 3 and 11, 1983. It arose when unfair labor practice charges were filed on September 15, 1982 against Fremont Ford Sales, Inc. d/b/a Fremont Ford (Respondent) by East Bay Automotive Council (Council) and its Affiliated Local Unions (generally the Unions; or by local name and number, e.g., Machinists 1546). On December 7, 1982, after investigating those charges, the Regional Director for Region 32 of the National Labor Relations Board (Board) issued an order consolidating cases, consolidated complaint and notice of hearing.[2]

The complaint alleges in alternative ways that Respondent, a legal successor in the operation of a union-represented auto dealership, committed unfair labor practices by ignoring or refusing to perform certain obligations imposed on it by Section 8(d) of the National Labor Relations Act (Act) to recognize and bargain in good faith with the Unions as the exclusive joint representatives of certain employees of the dealership, thus violating Section 8(a)(5) of the Act; by discriminating for union-hostile reasons in discharging and hiring the dealership's employees, thus violating Section 8(a)(3) of the Act; and by certain statements and acts of agents tending to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of rights protected by the Act, thus violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

Respondent duly answered, denying all wrongdoing. By refinements of position in the form of amendments, stipulations, and admissions, Respondent has finally put into issue only ultimate questions of its legal liability in a mostly undisputed factual setting.

Issues

The most important questions are:

1. Did Respondent ever acquire the status of legal successor for collective-bargaining purposes? If not, the complaint is severely crippled; but if so:

2. When did that status attach? The answer here will influence the resolutions of subordinate questions:

> a. Did Respondent become bound to the labor agreement that bound its predecessor? Alternatively, > b. What, if any, changes in employees' wages and working conditions was Respondent free to make unilaterally?

3. Did Respondent unlawfully discriminate—either systematically or in specific cases—in its termination/hiring processes?

[1] The 1600 page trial transcript contains many errors. The General Counsel has moved to correct the transcript in a large number of particulars; Respondent opposes this in only a few cases. I grant the unopposed portions of the motion to correct, but deny it with respect to proposed corrections at Tr. 368, L. 16; Tr. 374, L. 4; Tr. 1049, L. 22; and Tr. 1120, L. 7.

[2] The consolidated complaint also originally included allegations against Respondent's predecessor, Fremont Ford, Inc. The allegations against the predecessor derived from charges filed in Case 32-CA-4801 and they were withdrawn on motion of the General Counsel at the outset of the trial, effectively mooting Case 32-CA-4801 and terminating proceedings against that party. I have omitted reference to that case in the caption of this decision and, on the unopposed motion in the General Counsel's posttrial brief, I sever Case 32-CA-4801 from these proceedings and remand that case to the Regional Director for Region 32 for appropriate disposition.

4. Did Respondent's agents make unlawfully coercive statements during interviews and other discussions with employees relating to the terms and conditions under which they might be hired?

On the whole record and with the assistance of excellent posttrial briefs, I make these

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. INTRODUCTION AND OVERVIEW

At the center of this case are the activities and intentions of Donald M. (Dee) Barnes in a 10-month period during which he managed and eventually became the full owner of a car and pickup truck dealership in Fremont, California, a city located in the continuous urban belt on the east side of San Francisco Bay. The dealership has been commonly known as Fremont Ford during all times that concern us.[3]

Everyone agrees that Barnes had fully acquired ownership and control of Fremont Ford by no later than May 17, 1982,[4] doing so with the backing of Ford Motor Company (Ford) through a "Dealer Development Program," essentially a financing arrangement which is described more fully within. But the General Counsel and Charging Party jointly maintain[5] that the effective takeover and successorship by Barnes really took place much earlier, perhaps in 1981, but definitely by March 19, 1982. The General Counsel also points to certain documents and to the conduct and admissions of Respondent's agents assertedly showing that even the parties to the sale deemed the takeover to be effective by no later than May 7, 1982.

Respondent argues that Barnes did not take title to the assets of Fremont Ford until May 17, and did not begin running Fremont Ford for his own "benefit" until it reopened on May 19. At this point, Respondent says, its status as a labor relations successor was still in doubt; a doubt that was not resolved until an asserted "full complement" was eventually hired more than 4 months later, which proved to contain less than a majority from the pre-May 17 complement.

The General Counsel also contends that Respondent owed—and violated—a duty to bargain with the Unions even if legal succession did not happen until May 17 (or 19), 1982. But the questions whether Respondent, through Barnes, took over effective control of the dealership at some point before that date and, if so, when this occurred, will have significance to remaining issues and to Respondent's potential remedial liability, and they were more closely litigated and briefed than any other matters.

These questions necessarily require attention to the details attending Barnes' managership and eventual ownership of Fremont Ford's assets. A close review of the extensive documentary and testimonial evidence on these points persuades me that the facts are not so much in dispute as are questions of their proper characterization and legal import. Indeed, my findings below relating to the management and eventual sale of the dealership derive, except where noted, from records and from credible portions of the testimony of Barnes and other agents of Respondent[6] and that of the former principals in the dealership. To avoid extensive factual recapitulations in the eventual analysis, I join my findings with some running observations and interpretations relevant to my ultimate disposition of the main issues.

Before Barnes came on the scene and until May 17, 1982, the Unions were recognized as the joint bargaining representatives of Fremont Ford's nonsupervisory service mechanics (or technicians), service writers, parts department and body shop employees, and related helpers and utility people.[7] Those employees had been thus represented since before 1978, when the dealership was acquired by Respondent's corporate predecessor, Fremont Ford, Inc. (FFI).

On takeover, FFI adopted and applied the labor agreement that then bound the Unions and the employer-members of United Employers, a multiemployer bargaining agency which FFI formally joined in August 1980. A more recent multiemployer contract, effective August 20, 1980, through August 20, 1983, was admittedly applied to unit employees at Fremont Ford through May 17, 1982.

Since the point of its admitted takeover, Respondent has admittedly refused to recognize or bargain with the Unions or to apply the labor agreement, concededly making many unilateral changes after that date in the wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment of employees in the bargaining unit.

A. Barnes Arrives at Fremont Ford, Advertises Himself as its "New Owners" and Begins to Make Changes

In July 1981 Barnes accepted the invitations of Fremont Ford's then principal owners, Paul Brinkman and Leon Pettitt, to buy a 20-percent share of FFI, to become its corporate president, and to take over as the general manager of the dealership. These arrangements had followed a series of efforts by Brinkman and Pettitt in the preceding months to rid themselves of Fremont Ford, which they viewed as an unprofitable investment; indeed, they saw it as a significant cash drain.

[3] This includes periods when Fremont Ford, Inc., the owner of the predecessor operation, also sold and serviced Fiats and Lancias, apparently a sideline to its Ford business. It was then doing business alternately as Fremont Ford or Fremont Fiat-Lancia.

[4] Respondent amended its answer at trial to admit that its projected gross income would exceed $500,000 in the 12-month period ending on May 17, 1983, and that it would purchase and receive directly from outside California during that period goods worth more than $5000. Respondent also admitted the conclusion that it is and has been at material times an "employer engaged in commerce" within the jurisdictional reach of the Act.

[5] References below to the General Counsel's position shall refer as well to that taken by the Charging Party, there appearing to be harmony between them on all factual and legal questions.

[6] Respondent has stipulated that certain persons with managerial or supervisory titles referred to below were, after May 17, 1982, its supervisors within the meaning of Sec. 2(11) of the Act and its agents. The record incidentally contains ample evidence to support the conclusion that those persons were also statutory supervisors throughout their employment at Fremont Ford during all periods described below.II. LABOR RELATIONS HISTORY

[7] These terms are merely descriptive of the unit generally. The precise scope of the historical unit requires attention to certain general recognition language in the multiemployer-multiunion labor agreement referred to below, as well as to the practices among the parties to that relationship.

Brinkman-Pettitt had tried first to sell the dealership to Joseph Tigue, then the general manager and a 20-percent shareholder in FFI; but while Tigue was still trying to put together a financing plan, a better buyout offer was made by another party, Valente. The Tigue deal was then put aside and Valente's proposal was pursued. That plan did not work out, however, when Ford headquarters in Detroit (Ford-Detroit) balked at transferring the franchise, acting out of dissatisfaction with Valente's arrangements for the general managership. In the meantime Tigue had lost interest, leaving Brinkman-Pettitt where they had started, in search of a buyer.

Brinkman saw the dealership as "terminal" by that time. Barnes was approached in late June 1981 in part because both Brinkman and Pettitt believed that he was an able manager. Barnes had previously worked for Brinkman as general manager in one of Brinkman's other Ford dealerships. Both Pettitt and Brinkman owned other Ford and Lincoln-Mercury dealerships in the greater San Francisco Bay area and, since 1981 at least, their principal day-to-day attentions had been directed to these other operations.

Brinkman also acknowledged, without conceding that this affected their decision to seek out Barnes, that he and Pettitt knew from their prior associations that Barnes had been interested for some time in becoming the owner-operator of a dealership. Barnes admittedly knew at the time of his arrival at Fremont Ford that Brinkman-Pettitt had been trying to sell the business.

The parties disagree whether there was an understanding from the start between Barnes and Brinkman-Pettitt that Barnes would eventually buy Fremont Ford. I find from the history just summarized, and from the fact that Barnes was a good candidate for Ford-Detroit approval under its Dealer Development Program,[8] that the July 1981 association of the three men was influenced by the prospect that Barnes would eventually buy out the business. Various denials by them that anything was said aloud among them about this were somewhat beside the point. All three men testified in a generally guarded way in any case, and their denials on this matter struck me as having been tailored to suit Respondent's litigation posture and as inconsistent with the probabilities.[9]

Setting aside the question of specific intentions in July 1981, when Barnes became a shareholder and president of FFI and took over the general management of Fremont Ford, it is at least clear that Barnes personally appeared in a series of Bay area television commercials in the period around September 1981 calling himself the "new owner" of Fremont Ford. Barnes explained that this was done to promote the business through an advertising campaign centered on the slogan "New dealer, new deal." It is therefore clear that Barnes then believed it would be helpful to portray himself to the public as having succeeded to the ownership of Fremont Ford. By contrast, Barnes admittedly did not conduct any "new owner" advertising campaign after May 19, 1982, when, Respondent now insists, the business officially reopened under "new ownership."

It is equally clear that before the end of 1981 Barnes had already begun to effect significant operational and management changes. These included reductions in the numbers of mechanics and bodyshop workers and the installation of a new service manager, Robert Radcliffe, a new bodyshop manager, Robert Bold, and a new general sales manager, Kenneth Barnes (Barnes' brother who was later replaced, ultimately by Pat Doyle).[10]

There is summary testimony by Barnes that he consulted in some manner with Pettitt about some or all of these choices. But Pettitt's description of his own role in these hirings shows that Pettitt relied entirely on Barnes' judgment (e.g., Pettitt's admitted response to Barnes' recommendation of Doyle: "Go ahead, if you think the guy's right. Do it").

By December, Barnes had decided to implement a physical and supervisory reorganization of the parts and service departments under the overall supervision of a "parts and service director" (or "coordinator")—a position that had not previously existed in the managerial hierarchy. To fill this new job, Barnes recruited and hired Larry Smith, a former associate at a Monterey dealership that Barnes had managed. To get Smith to accept the job, Barnes first flew to Idaho, where Smith was by then living, and agreed to pay approximately $2500 to cover Smith's moving expenses back to California. Barnes' Idaho trip and Smith's moving costs were paid for by FFI funds and, if these arrangements were "approved" at all, it was done after-the-fact, under unclear circumstances.[11]

After Smith's arrival in January, there were further managerial shifts implemented by Barnes (or by Smith, with Barnes' approval). Ken Collins was hired to run the bodyshop, replacing Bold. Collins was, in turn, discharged and Charles Edmonds was hired in his place in late April, following a hiatus during which Barnes thought about whether to continue a bodyshop operation. Robert Alderson had also been hired by then to replace the used-car sales manager. The parts manager was fired in April and was replaced by Lyle Fleming, another of Barnes' former associates from the period when Barnes had managed the Monterey dealership.

[8] Barnes said unqualifiedly in a pretrial affidavit that he had been approved in 1978 by Ford-Detroit as a potential Dealer Development Program operator in a deal that was never consummated. He hedged on the point during his trial testimony, but acknowledged that he believed in 1981 that he had a "good opportunity" to be approved as a Dealer Development Program operator at Fremont Ford.

[9] Respondent cites testimony by Brinkman that he had sought a $450,000 bank loan in the period August-September 1981 to provide necessary additional capitalization to the dealership as evidence that Brinkman-Pettitt had not planned initially for Barnes to buy out the business. I do not find such testimony, if true, to be necessarily supportive of Respondent's conclusion, and Brinkman's testimony on the point is confusing. Thus, Brinkman conceded that he actually obtained a loan commitment for the $450,000 amount but turned it down, claiming that he by then believed even more working capital was required and that the bank would lend no more than $450,000.

[10] Dee Barnes admittedly decided to replace the incumbent general sales manager when he took over management in July 1981, bringing Kenneth Barnes with him to take the sales job. Kenneth, in turn, resigned 2 months later and Dee again selected another individual, Dick Estes, for that position. Estes, in turn, quit after 1 month and Barnes finally located Pat Doyle for the position in September or October 1981.

[11] Brinkman was the only witness who testified that there was some unspecified "approval" process in Barnes' recruitment of Smith. Barnes and Pettitt seem to contradict this in their testimony.

All of these supervisory people were retained when Barnes admittedly became the "full" owner in May 1982. Thus, I find that Barnes had already assembled and installed his own management team in advance of the date of his acquisition of the dealership's assets.

The changes instituted by Barnes during the July 1981-May 1982 period may have been nominally subject to Brinkman's and Pettitt's approval, but the record suggests that such approval was readily forthcoming if it was sought. As noted above, Barnes did not always seek advance approval. With respect to the "new dealer-new deal" advertisements in September, for example, there is no dispute that Barnes did this without prior consultation with Brinkman-Pettitt (although they learned about and did not disavow those actions). The same is true of Barnes' reorganization of the storage system and general layout of the parts department.

It is not disputed that in his role as general manager of Fremont Ford, Barnes was in effective day-to-day control of the dealership from the outset, exercising at least the same degree of authority that Tigue, his predecessor in that position, had exercised, including over labor relations matters.[12] Respondent would insist, however, that there were "limits" placed on Barnes in his pre-May 17, 1982 management of Fremont Ford. The testimony of Brinkman and Pettitt contains many such general statements, but few specific examples. These were the matters of advertising budgets during certain periods and the alleged requirement that Barnes "consult" before spending above-existing levels for "nonproductive" personnel—a term used by Pettitt to refer to persons who create "overhead" costs (supervisors, for example) but do not directly draw customer dollars by their labor (as do, for example, mechanics).

The specific matters just noted may arguably be described as "limits" that Brinkman-Pettitt placed on Barnes, but on this record they must be seen as a function of the badly undercapitalized state of the business at the time, a state of affairs admittedly linked to the "limits" which Brinkman-Pettitt placed on themselves in their regular financial contributions to keep the operation going. As such, these limits did not reflect reservation of operational authority to Brinkman-Pettitt, nor second-guessing by them of Barnes' operational decisions; they amounted simply to investment limits. Moreover, the unilateral creation by Barnes of a wholly new supermanagerial position for Smith, and the related measures and expenditures associated with Smith's taking that job, tend to undermine Pettitt's claim that he placed any real limits on Barnes' authority to spend for "nonproductive" personnel.[13] In any case, Pettitt said that Barnes was free to augment or shrink the numbers of persons in "productive" classifications (including virtually all nonsupervisory employees) as he saw fit. Thus, the generalized "limits" on Barnes' authority were not shown to be more than vague understandings, never memorialized in writing, and applied, if at all, in an "informal" process (Brinkman's term) of review by Brinkman or Pettitt (mostly Pettitt) of monthly spending projections and periodic accountings. Finally, while there had been a written management agreement between FFI and Tigue as general manager, there was no such agreement with Barnes, after he took over from Tigue as general manager.

It clearly seems that the process of "approval" by Brinkman and Pettitt of Barnes' management was, at best, routine and perfunctory. Indeed, the specific instances in this record appear to have involved after-the-fact approval, if at all. I therefore find that Barnes was, immediately on his arrival at Fremont Ford, the effective day-to-day operator[14] of the business in all its normal activities; and, although he may have engaged in some occasional consultations with Brinkman-Pettitt, the restraints that this process imposed on his overall control were more theoretical than actual. This is most clearly revealed by the fact that he felt free to identify himself publicly as the "new owner" and by the fact that he was allowed to run the business as he thought best, including by resort to such "out of the ordinary" expenditures (Brinkman's expression) and arrangements as those required to recruit and relocate the new parts and service director, Larry Smith, and by other measures detailed above and elsewhere within.

B. January 1982: Formal Agreement is Reached to Sell Fremont Ford to Barnes Under Dealer Development Program

By early January 1982, coinciding roughly with Larry Smith's arrival and assumption of his new position within the dealership, Barnes and Brinkman-Pettitt admittedly reached agreement that Barnes would buy out the dealership. The mutual plan was for Barnes to get financial backing under Ford's Dealer Development Program (DD Program).

[12] Brinkman admitted, incidentally, that Tigue had formally enrolled FFI in United Employers in 1980, signing as vice president and general manager, and had done so without Brinkman's prior knowledge. Pettitt expressly acknowledged that Barnes had "responsibility" for labor relations matters affecting the "hourly" employees.

[13] Pettitt unconvincingly sought to rationalize Barnes' pre-"consultation" creation of an additional managerial position for Smith as not having truly created additional "overhead" costs, claiming that this would simply free the department managers to do "productive" work, without any net increase in operating expense. There was no showing, however, that those managers did, in fact, begin to perform "productive" (i.e., bargaining unit) work after Smith's arrival, and there seem to have been obstacles to such a practice while the labor agreement was in effect (see, e.g., art. II, sec. 5, and art. XVI, sec. 5 seeming to place limits on, or prohibiting, such practices, with special provision for the writing of service orders).

[14] The term "operator" may be one of art within the auto sales industry; if so, a precise definition cannot be obtained from this record. I infer from the context within which it was used by Respondent's managerial witnesses and from the Ford-generated documents received into evidence, that it refers to the person actually in charge of day-to-day operations in a dealership, as distinct from its equity owners. It was in this context that Pettitt, for example, had no difficulty in saying that Barnes, like Tigue before him, was the "operator" of Fremont Ford.

Functionally, Ford's DD Program is a system designed to aid would-be owner-operators otherwise acceptable to Ford as franchisees but who are without independent resources to buy and provide necessary working capital for a dealership. It is, essentially, a financing plan. The system contemplates the setting up by Ford of a "Dealer Development Corporation" (DD Corp.) into which Ford will infuse an 80-percent share of the funding necessary to buy and capitalize the dealership, using standard Ford criteria for determining capitalization minimums. The prospective operator will contribute the 20-percent balance to the DD Corp. and will become its president. In the lexicon of the DD Program, the "president-operator" is also termed a "partial equity owner" in the DD Corp.[15]

The system does not contemplate long-term involvement by Ford in a DD Corp. It is part of the program that the president-operator must apply all of his stock dividends and a minimum of 50 percent of his annual operator's bonus towards an eventual buyout of Ford's interest. For this reason, while mindful of the corporate arrangement, I have deemed it reasonable both for shorthand purposes and as a matter of substantive fact to refer above and below to the eventual sale of Fremont Ford as being, essentially, a sale to Barnes.

Procedurally, following preliminary approval by Ford-Detroit of the application filed by the prospective operator, a DD Program specialist from Ford-Detroit (an investment representative) takes over and directs the course of things thereafter. He first prepares scores of forms and documents that must be completed and executed before Ford-Detroit will authorize the creation and 80-percent funding of the new DD Corp. These include necessary corporate authorizations for the selling corporation to grant "options" to the Ford representative to buy the business and to sublease the premises (assuming, as here, a leasehold), as well as a buy-sell agreement and a sublease instrument setting forth the substantive arrangements between buyer and seller if and when the options are exercised.[16]

Having made these preparations, Ford's investment representative will travel to the dealership and will conduct there a detailed inventory and valuation of the various properties to be acquired. He will then arrange for completion and signing of the voluminous paperwork necessary to be in place for a quick conclusion of the transaction once it receives final authorization from Ford-Detroit.[17]

On final authorization from Ford-Detroit, the investment representative will order the filing of instruments of incorporation in Delaware and the filing of bulk sales notices and other qualifying papers in the State and locality of the dealership. He will also prepare in advance a large new package of formal corporate papers for the DD Corp., including waivers of notice of meeting and canned "minutes" in which directors are named and various resolutions are passed authorizing or (in many cases) ratifying all the minutiae of activity legally associated with the sale of an ongoing auto dealership by a corporation to a corporation.

C. January–May 1982: Steps to Conclusion of the Sale

1. Introduction

The bulky exhibit files in this case contain the detailed trail of formal, written dealings leading to what Respondent believes were the critical closing transactions between the DD Corp. and Brinkman—Pettitt on May 17, 1982. That paper trail does not always conform to the precise sequence of events found to have occurred; neither does it normally matter to record or discuss the discrepancy. It is also best to read these documents with the recognition that the transaction involved desperate, "absentee" sellers[18] and a buyer-in-place. And that same set of circumstances requires the preliminary caution that the paper trail does not always accurately reflect the realities of the underlying relationship between Barnes and Brinkman-Pettitt, nor the realities of actual control of the dealership.

I summarize below what seems to me to be the transitional highlights between early January, when the admitted deal was made to sell Fremont Ford to Barnes through a DD Program, and May 17, when money changed hands and the corporate "minutes" reflect that the deal was corporately authorized and consummated.

[15] Ford's security is ensured by its ownership of all preferred and voting stock (the partial equity owner having only common stock) and by its right to designate a majority of the directors (two of three in this case) who are normally management agents of Ford-Detroit and of a Ford regional office.

[17] It may be that it is not always as mechanically routine as the foregoing summary might suggest, but the record indicates that the process was virtually this routine in this case (the only exception being evidence that there were some substantive discussions about the duration of fixed rental fees for the sublease). Also, nothing in the testimony of D. M. Coleman (Ford's investment representative) about his 25 years of experience in "buying and selling dealerships" disturbs the impression that the process, while requiring professional energy, judgment, sophistication, and attention to detail, is one that Ford has gotten down to something of a routine. When, as here, the sellers are desperate (see fn. 18), Ford appears to be in a position at least to draw the overall form, if not to define the substance, of the transaction.

[18] In addition to findings above that Brinkman viewed Fremont Ford's condition as "terminal" as early as June-July 1981, I note here that there was a devastating yearend accounting report weighing on Brinkman-Pettitt. When the proposal was made in January 1982 to sell to Barnes through the DD Program, Pettitt admittedly responded, "Let's get out, the quicker the better, now." When money changed hands on May 17, Pettitt viewed this as "the end of the hemorrhage." See also findings below about Brinkman-Pettitt's agreement by early January 1982 to value Barnes' share in this "terminal" business at $160,000 even though he had paid only $132,500 for that share when he had bought into FFI 6 months earlier.

2. January to March 19: Preparation and preliminary approval of a DD Program package for Fremont Ford

By no later than January 11, Barnes and Brinkman-Pettitt had reached an agreement to buy Barnes' share in FFI for $160,000—an increase of roughly 21 percent over its cost to Barnes 6 months earlier. This is reflected in Barnes' application for materials for the DD Program that he completed on January 11 and then submitted to Ford's San Jose district sales office, the first stop on the application's progress toward eventual Ford-Detroit approval. Brinkman separately acknowledged the valuation of "approximately $160,000" in a letter to the same Ford district office the same day in which he "confirm[ed] previous conversations" with that office "regarding the intentions of Leon Pettitt and myself to divest our interests in [Fremont Ford]."

The principals substantially concede—and I find—that the $160,000 valuation was not so much influenced by some judgment about the market value of Barnes' share in this "terminal" business as it was by the fact—recognized by all parties—that this was the amount that Barnes would need under Ford's capitalization requirements for his 20-percent initial participation in the prospective DD Corp.[19] Respondent says as much on brief, observing that "it was worth that additional sum to be out from under the financial burden."

By February 10, Barnes' application had been processed regionally and was being forwarded to Ford-Detroit by L. E. Otto of Ford's "San Francisco Dealer Development Branch." Otto summarized the financial condition and sales prospects of the dealership in a covering memorandum of that date and Otto categorically "recommend[ed] this investment in Fremont, California, with Mr. Dee Barnes as the operator," confirming, incidentally, that "Mr. Dee Barnes' investment funds of $160,000 will come from the purchase of his interest in Fremont Ford by Messrs. Brinkman and Pettitt." Otto also summarized certain understandings that had been reached between Brinkman-Pettitt and Barnes regarding some transitional details and stated that "a monthly salary . . . has been agreed upon with Mr. Dee Barnes."[20] Otto also recommended, "To maintain continuity of operation and management, a name as close as possible to Fremont Ford is proposed, i.e., Fremont Ford Sales or Fremont Ford Motors, Inc."

After receipt by Ford-Detroit of Barnes' application and Otto's forwarding recommendations, the file received review and "tentative approval" by the required officials. These included D. M. Coleman, the Ford-Detroit investment representative who would take care of all matters after that and who, along with Otto, would be Ford's other designee on the board of the new DD Corp. Coleman then prepared the numerous documents and other forms and paperwork needed to be signed, completed, or filed by Brinkman-Pettitt and Barnes before Ford-Detroit would authorize the final step, the creation and funding of the DD Corp.

According to prearrangement, Coleman traveled to Fremont and spent the business week of March 15 in meetings with Barnes, Brinkman-Pettitt, and others, obtaining the necessary signatures on all the paperwork and conducting the extensive preliminary inventory and valuation of assets then on hand which would be subject to the prospective sale.[21] The paperwork details accomplished that week included the following:

1. Barnes' signature on a prepared document of resignation from his presidency and other corporate positions in FFI; this admittedly done at the beginning of the week to avoid the appearance of self-dealing between FFI and Barnes in the formal transactions that ensued.

2. The execution by FFI's newly constituted directors of a resolution authorizing the corporate purchase of Barnes' share in FFI for $160,000.

3. The execution by FFI's officers of resolutions authorizing the corporation to grant a buy-sell option to Coleman and the execution by Brinkman-Pettitt in their individual capacities of a sublease option and a sublease itself (the leasehold apparently being in their own names).

4. The submission by Brinkman for FFI of a formal "resignation" from the "Ford Sales and Service Agreement" (the essential franchise agreement with Ford) and from other, similar agreements with Ford, all conditioned on Ford's grant of the same to the prospective DD Corp.

The buy-sell agreement, attached to the buy-sell option and incorporated by reference therein, is itself a 25-page basic document containing essentially all terms and rights and obligations of the parties throughout the ensuing period until closing. It contains, inter alia, provisions for the taking of final inventories, formulas for the liquidation of a net purchase price, and a provision for the creation of a bill of sale as of the "Closing Date." This, incidentally, is a term of art to be distinguished from the "Takeover Date," which is contemplated by the agreement to occur before the "Closing Date." By its terms (emphasis added):

> SELLER . . . requests that BUYER take possession of the operating assets and premises on a date specified by BUYER (Takeover Date) approximately five (5) days before Closing Date to assist SELLER in the taking of inventories and preparation of schedules contemplated by this Agreement and to conduct the business until the Closing Date to the same extent as though the transactions . . . had been consummated effective with the Takeover Date. In operating the business from the Takeover Date to the Closing Date, all profits and/or losses incurred shall accrue to the BUYER.

[19] The necessary capitalization amounts may have been derivable from published Ford criteria. In any case, Barnes admitted that the amounts involved here had been specifically established by Ford for the Fremont dealership when Tigue had explored buyout possibilities in 1981.

[20] Presumably, Otto, who would become a director in the DD Corp. when it was formed, was the party who "agreed" with Barnes on the salary Barnes would receive under the proposed DD Corp.

[21] This did not include the inventory of Fiat and Lancia products and parts (see fn. 3), which was physically segregated and eventually removed from the premises.

The buy-sell and sublease options each ran to Coleman, but the DD Corp. was the acquiring party named in the attached buy-sell agreement as BUYER and was the sublessee named as TENANT in the sublease attached to the sublease option. Barnes was identified as the subscribing and initialing party, respectively, on those basic instruments, in his capacity as president of the DD Corp., which by then had been christened "Fremont Ford Sales, Inc." (FFSI), the Respondent. Also signing for FFSI on the sublease instrument was Frances Baker, as secretary-treasurer. Baker was then the office business manager at Fremont Ford and was Barnes' personal selection for the corporate position in FFSI. She would continue after May 17 also to function as the office business manager for the dealership.

I will return in my analysis to the significance of Barnes' formal stepover from president of FFI to president of FFSI in mid-March and of the formal provisions which seemingly bound him to take over and become responsible for the business before closing was perfected (and to treat the closing, nunc pro tunc, as having occurred simultaneous with the takeover). For now, I believe it fair simply to observe in summary that these formal dealings alone dictate a finding that Barnes was no longer being treated as a representative of FFI, but rather, was regarded as the authorized corporate agent of FFSI, the entity which it was contemplated, would take formal possession and control of the assets and operations of the dealership at some point before closing. Since it was also contemplated that FFSI would have the right to "specif[y]" the takeover date, and since FFSI (through Coleman's holding of the 80-percent funding) held the key to the timing of closing, this left very little discretion in the hands of FFI, the nominal owner, to control the timing and substance of key events at the dealership thereafter.

It may also be observed that while Brinkman-Pettitt, through FFI, retained some formal right to control the business after March 19, they were bound by many restraints set forth in the buy-sell agreement, inter alia, to "cause [the] dealership to function in the ordinary course . . . of business and in a good and efficient manner" and to "afford BUYER . . . at all reasonable times, access and facilities to use with respect to all properties of SELLER . . . books, files, records . . . for the purpose of audit, inspection and examination thereof" and to keep current properties free of "lien or other encumbrance" and not to "acquire or dispose . . . or in anywise obligate itself to do so" with respect to its current property.

There were thus numerous formal steps taken by which, as of the March 19 option grants, FFSI had already secured rights of supervision and control of the dealership. Since FFSI existed only in contemplation at that time, and since Barnes was its official representative and was in place as general manager, it is also fair to observe that FFSI, through Barnes, was already in the driver's seat for many important purposes as of March 19.

Although Respondent maintains that Barnes was still acting for FFI's "benefit" at that time and until May 17 in his capacity as general manager, there are many indications in findings above and below that Barnes and other FFI personnel and processes were used in ways more directly traceable to FFSI's interests. That aside, it is worth pausing to consider who would win as between Barnes and Brinkman-Pettitt in a contest of wills over the management of the business in the period between March 19 and closing. Clearly, with FFSI having broad rights of access and review, and exclusive control over the timing of takeover and closing, and with FFSI's recognized president, Barnes, already in place as the general manager, it was Barnes who held practical power. For to dispute with him over managerial matters was to risk at least a delay in concluding the deal that Brinkman-Pettitt yearned to close.

Ford's representative Coleman acknowledged that by March 19, with the signing of the necessary papers behind them, there were no apparent obstacles to the conclusion of the sale, even though he still needed to obtain authorization from various officials within the Ford-Detroit hierarchy. Thus, listing typical potential obstacles, Coleman acknowledged that with Barnes in place there would be no problems with last-minute "inventory-switches" by the seller, nor with Ford-Detroit approval of Barnes personally as the operator, nor would there be problems with Barnes' obtaining his share of the financing for the DD Corp. in the light of FFI's commitment, formally executed by March 19, to buy Barnes' share in FFI for the required $160,000. From there, the consummating details did fall into place, as I find next.

3. March 19–May 17: The package gets final approval and money changes hands

On his return to Detroit, Coleman prepared a "request" for authorization to create and fund the proposed DD Corp. By March 25, this was being routed through the required layers of Ford-Detroit management. It received what Coleman called "final approval" on April 22. Coleman called Barnes and Brinkman-Pettitt with the news on the same day.

There are strong indications that Coleman knew before April 22 that the investment would be approved. A 10-page certificate of FFSI's incorporation was filed in Delaware on April 23, on Coleman's telephoned authorization to go forward with the filing. Other corporate resolutions and bylaws were also ready for signing on that date. It is doubtful that so much paperwork would have been prepared in time for an April 23 filing if there had not been some prior assurance that authorization to create the DD Corp. would be forthcoming. The same is true regarding the signing by local counsel on April 23 of local notices of an intended bulk sale. Similarly, Coleman had made advance contact with a local firm, Pacific Coast Inventory Co. By letter of April 23, Coleman "confirm[ed]" that Pacific was to conclude an inventory no later than May 19 and that it would begin conducting the inventory in the "preceding week." Coleman also stated in the April 23 letter that Barnes should be contacted before the inventory process began. As Coleman explained from the witness stand, Barnes would act as FFSI's agent in supervising the process.

L. E. Otto, who would become an officer and director in the DD Corp., also clearly anticipated that Ford-Detroit would give final approval for its creation and funding. On April 16, Otto wrote to Barnes as "President and General Manager" of FFSI to discuss certain financing matters for which Barnes was already deemed responsible. The conclusion is therefore warranted, despite Respondent's contrary contention, that even before Ford-Detroit gave its final approval the key actors believed that nothing but formalities remained to be accomplished before the DD Corp. would be created and funded and title to Fremont Ford's assets would pass to the new corporate owner. Indeed, those actors had begun to behave as if the DD Corp., with Barnes as its president, was already a viable entity.

Any contention that Barnes viewed himself as merely the steward for FFI in operating the business between April 22 and May 17 is undermined by the actions of Barnes and those of his subordinates and other agents of FFSI. In late April and early May, Frances Baker began making application for various licenses and tax numbers in FFSI's name, arranging for the substitution of FFSI for FFI on telephone service and other billing accounts, researching insurance programs, and doing similar preparatory work. Her filings reflect some inconsistency as to the date on which FFSI would "officially" begin operating Fremont Ford—a sign that the precise date had little real meaning. Baker also opened a checking account in FFSI's name at some undisclosed point before May 5, the checks already having been printed and the first deposit having been made by that date. All of these activities, although clearly done for FFSI, were done at Barnes' instruction, while Baker was still on FFI's payroll.

On April 27, Brinkman, on behalf of FFI, tendered a written "resignation"—this one being unconditional—from the Ford Sales and Service and related agreements between Ford and FFI. The resignation, by its terms, was to be effective upon its acceptance by Ford.

On May 7, Ford-Detroit wrote to Brinkman, stating that the resignations had "become effective." That same day, Barnes, acting for FFSI, and Ford entered into new Sales and Service franchise and related agreements. Also that same day, Coleman drafted a check payable to FFSI for $640,000 representing Ford's 80-percent funding of the new DD Corp. By this time, Coleman had already authorized the filing of necessary instruments for FFSI to qualify to do business in California and FFSI was, in fact, so qualified, effective May 5.

On May 17, a Monday, Coleman appeared in Fremont bearing the 80-percent funding check for the DD Corp. The principals in the sale met that day to sign off on the necessary prepared "minutes" and other documents and to exchange moneys. That same day Smith and service and parts supervisors conducted employment interviews with current bargaining unit employees as described, infra.

On May 18, the dealership was closed to the public (or, at least, the shop and service operation was closed). "Outside" applicants were interviewed that day for bargaining unit positions.

On May 19, Fremont Ford reopened for business with a reduced unit employee complement, as described further below, but one that was composed exclusively of former unit employees.

4. Miscellaneous findings and comments on the question when the takeover occurred

I have noted provisions in the buy-sell agreement that allow the conclusion that FFI and FFSI themselves intended that formal "takeover" of the dealership by the latter would occur before closing (the written instrument indicating that takeover would occur "approximately" 5 days before the closing). I have noted that the actual substitution of FFSI for FFI as the signatory to the necessary franchise agreements and licenses from Ford occurred on May 7 and that FFSI was by then officially qualified to do business in California. This combination of facts invites the conclusion that the parties themselves intended to make FFSI legally responsible for the operation of the dealership by May 7.[22] Thus from a practical standpoint, considering Barnes' actual control, and seemingly from a contractual standpoint as well, it was FFSI that was in place and operating the business by no later than May 7.

Although the foregoing considerations persuade me that both buyers and sellers had begun to treat the takeover as having been accomplished at least by May 7, it is true that some expenses, rental amounts, and certain taxes were pro-rated at closing using May 17 as the cutoff date. Such arrangements, however, do not directly answer the question who was in operational control of the dealership before May 17. At best, they are indirectly probative on that point and are not as weighty as those indications set forth next that also point to the conclusion that the parties to the transaction viewed FFSI's takeover as an accomplished fact well before May 17.

A letter from Brinkman to the Unions dated April 20 makes it reasonably clear that FFI's principals viewed the transaction as having been effectively completed by that date. Thus, Brinkman, writing as FFI's president, told the Unions (emphasis added):

> Certain assets of Fremont Ford, Inc. have been sold to Fremont Ford Sales, Inc. Our ownership . . . terminates as of the close of business on or about May 1, 1982. When the buy-sell agreement is totally consummated, you will be notified of the exact date.

I note, incidentally, that this is further indication that the parties were confident that Ford-Detroit would give final authorization for the creation of the DD Corp., for Brinkman's letter was written 2 days before Coleman says that such authorization was given.

[22] I recognize, but discount, Coleman's comment while testifying that there was still some process of "approval" of the franchise transfer by Ford-Detroit that had to take place after the May 7 date when FFSI became signatory to the franchise and related agreements with Ford. Coleman was particularly unconvincing when he said this and it is difficult to understand how it could be that the ongoing dealership could operate after May 7 without someone being licensed or franchised to sell Ford products. Since FFI's right to do so was admittedly extinguished as of May 7 when Ford-Detroit accepted its resignation, I conclude that Coleman's vague testimony about some necessary further "approval" process by Ford-Detroit with respect to FFSI's franchise was, essentially, an improvisational fiction.

Although the reasons for it are not well explained, Brinkman amended his April 20 announcement in another letter to the Unions dated May 3. There, Brinkman said (emphasis added):

> Certain assets of Fremont Ford, Inc. . . . have been sold to Fremont Ford Sales, Inc.
> Our ownership . . . terminates as of the close of business on or about May 17 . . . and our collective bargaining relationship with you will cease as of that date.
> When the buy-sell agreement is totally consummated, you will be notified of the exact date.

Here, there is the suggestion that the parties to the sale intended for collective-bargaining purposes to treat the date of closing as the critical takeover date, despite the evidence already discussed that for other purposes the substantive takeover was intended to occur earlier.

To make matters necessarily more confusing to the employees and to their collective representative, Brinkman wrote another letter the next day, May 4, this one directly to employees in the unit. There, Brinkman stated (emphasis added):

> Certain assets of Fremont Ford, Inc. . . . have been sold to Fremont Ford Sales, Inc., a new corporation.
> It is anticipated that the existing Ford Sales Agreement . . . will terminate during the week of May 17, and a new . . . Agreement will be issued to the new owners at that time.
>
> Your employment with Fremont Ford, Inc. will terminate on the date of termination of our Ford Sales Agreement, and you will be paid all the monies due you.
> We will keep you informed of the effective date of the Buy-Sell Agreement with the new corporation.
> Application for employment with the new ownership may be obtained from your department manager.[23]

It seems here that Brinkman (with Barnes' apparent knowledge and acquiescence—see fn. 23) contemplated that for duration-of-employment purposes the critical date would be the date that the various Ford franchise agreements were reissued to FFSI. This understanding is, of course, consistent with the specific requirement in the buy-sell agreement that "takeover" would precede "closing."

There are at least three additional and undisputed circumstances tending to show that the parties to the sale privately intended that FFSI would take over formal operational and financial responsibility at some point in early May well before May 17. Thus, Barnes acknowledged that the initial deposit in FFSI's local bank account on May 5 came from insurance payments for damage done to the dealership building in an accident that had occurred shortly before that date. As Barnes explained, it had been agreed that the insurance payment would go directly to FFSI, with the understanding that FFSI would be responsible for repairing the damage to the building despite the fact that leasehold rights had not yet formally passed to FFSI and were still held by FFI. Similarly, Barnes acknowledged that he had placed a newspaper advertisement on an unspecified date in "early May" for a "service special" scheduled to run until May 31, a period spanning the official closing date of May 17, therefore suggesting Barnes' view in "early May" that the takeover was already a fait accompli. Finally, as detailed below, Barnes wrote to the Unions on May 3, offering to discuss the "effects" of the sale of assets on "employees represented by your Union," a seeming admission that he was then in a position to control the future.

D. The Alleged Unfair Labor Practices

1. Introduction and comments on credibility

The behavior of Barnes and his agents in the days shortly before and after May 17 is the focus of findings in this section, although some additional background will be narrated. It deserves mention that Barnes and his supervisory agents gave the impression of trying to adhere to a predetermined, generalized line, and they were often evasive, grudging, incomplete, and given to sanitizing when called on to furnish details about their own statements and conduct. Although their ultimate accounts after many rounds of adverse examination are not seriously at variance with those of the nonadverse witnesses called by the General Counsel (employees and agents of the Union), I found the latter to be more candid, sincere, and forthcoming in testifying about some transactions, particularly the conversations within the dealership between and among supervisors and unit employees about their prospects for retention.

2. Evidence of Barnes' intentions to operate "flat-rate" and "nonunion"

In January, Barnes appeared before an industry "Board of Adjustment" called to resolve a grievance over his discharge of a service technician. When the Board of Adjustment ruled against him, Barnes said to the Unions' representatives in attendance, including Machinists 1546 Business Representative Nick Antone, whom I credit: "You guys are not going to be around here. There's no union going to run my store. . . . I'll take care of that when I become the sole owner." Shortly after that service coordinator Smith echoed this, saying to employee Darrell Cooper that Barnes was "mad enough to blow the whole union out of the water."

At some point after plans were set in motion for him to buy the business, Barnes admittedly decided that he would run the service department on a "flat-rate" basis. In contrast to the hourly pay requirement in the labor agreement, mechanics working flat-rate would receive a fixed sum for a specific type of service or repair work, no matter how much time they spent on the work.

[23] This message was admittedly inserted by Brinkman at Barnes' urging. Against the argument that Respondent is not otherwise bound by Brinkman's "understandings" regarding the timing of takeover, I would observe from this that Barnes was involved in—and influenced—preclosing announcements signed by Brinkman.

Unions in this industry are notoriously opposed to flat-rate arrangements. Barnes agreed with the characterization of "flat-rate" as being a "code word" for "nonunion"—at least in the Bay area. In any case, the record amply shows elsewhere—and Barnes does not seriously dispute—that his intention to operate flat-rate was accompanied by an express decision to operate nonunion.[24] Indeed, as events unrolled, the term "nonunion" was used both consecutively and interchangeably with "flat-rate" by Barnes and his agents in discussions about Barnes' operating intentions after his formal takeover.

3. Dealings with the Unions and the unit employees as May 17 approached

I have noted that Brinkman issued a series of letters to the Unions and to all the employees of Fremont Ford containing conflicting messages about the dates when FFI's bargaining relationship with the Unions would end and when the employees of FFI would be terminated. I have inferred from Barnes' admitted involvement in the drafting of at least one such letter and from other factors cited above that Barnes was at least knowledgeable—if not influential—in the timing and content of all of them. If nothing else, the fact that FFSI had control over the timing of the closing transactions recommends a finding that Barnes, FFSI's operator-in-place, was the source of whatever confusion there existed about the timing of things.

In any case, Barnes clearly added to the confusion when he announced to the Unions yet another date as the real date on which he would become the "owner." In a letter dated May 3 Barnes, as "President" of FFSI, wrote to the Unions in pertinent part as follows (emphasis added):

> This letter will notify [you] that effective as of May 20, Fremont Ford Sales, Inc. . . . will become the owner of certain assets of Fremont Ford, Inc. . . .
> Please be advised that Fremont Ford Sales, Inc. stands ready to meet and confer with [you] to discuss the effects this sale may have on the employees represented by your union.

Consistent with findings above that the parties privately viewed the "takeover" as effective in early May, this letter makes it sound as if Barnes saw himself by then as positioned and empowered to deal on FFSI's behalf with the Unions about future employment terms. It also appears from Barnes' willingness to discuss the "effects" on unit employees of the sale that he had reasonably clear expectations or intentions about the job future of the unit employees. This implicitly suggests that Barnes had an expectation that, at whatever point he might formally be labeled the "owner" of Fremont Ford, his unit employee complement would be composed mostly of current employees.

Similar inferences flow from Barnes' first meeting with a representative of the Unions. On May 6, Machinists 1546 Business Representative Joe Bobo met with Barnes by appointment in Fremont Ford offices. Synthesizing the credible portions of their testimony about this meeting I find that Bobo told Barnes that he hoped to head off a problem before it started and asked Barnes what it would take "to keep this a union store." Barnes then mentioned three "problem" areas to Bobo. He first referred to the subject of seniority for vacation purposes. Bobo reminded Barnes of an arrangement that the Unions had made with FFI when it had bought the dealership that effectively ceded to that successor the right to treat a retained employee's seniority for vacation purposes as starting from the date of business takeover while continuing to treat the employee's original hire date in the operation as the key date for purposes of layoff and recall. Barnes then said that there were "some" employees whom he did not want to retain, not mentioning names, but suggesting that there were "three or four" such unwanted workers. Bobo replied that he had known of an instance where the Unions had agreed to treat the first 30 days after takeover as "probationary" and during which the employer could discharge without recourse under the grievance procedure.

Finally, and obliquely, Barnes raised the matter of a possible flat-rate system by asking if the Unions had any flat-rate shops. Barnes says that Bobo answered abruptly that there were none, whereupon the subject was dropped. Bobo said, more convincingly, that he replied to Barnes' overture by saying that he was "not interested in blazing any new trails, but, you know, everything is open for negotiations."[25]

The meeting ended this way: Barnes said that the sale had not yet closed and he could not make any "commitments" but that he "would be getting back" to Bobo when he became the "total" owner. Bobo said that this would be "fine," and proposed to set up a meeting between Barnes and Bobo's own "supervisor" in the hopes that "maybe they could work something out."

Barnes never did "get back" to Bobo, but there is reason to pause for additional comment about this stage in Barnes' behavior. It is implicit in their credited accounts—and I find—that Bobo was here seeking to prevent terminations of existing employees and thereby a preservation of the continuity of the bargaining unit through the period of closing, however it might be defined. His remarks show his willingness to make concessions that would lessen any incentive that might otherwise prompt Barnes to engage in wholesale terminations before Barnes emerged as the "total" owner. Barnes' admissions reflect that he so apprehended this approach. Thus, Barnes showed successive concerns; first about how seniority would be treated (presumably, if he were to retain everyone); then, after Bobo made reassuring remarks on that score about how he might deal with some three or four disfavored employees. It was only after Barnes had received an expression of the Unions' flexibility in areas that might otherwise deter him from retaining certain employees that Barnes obliquely raised the question of the Union's flexibility towards a flat-rate operation in the future.

[24] Barnes equivocated in testimony about this. His pretrial affidavit contains admissions that he wished to operate "flat rate" and "nonunion" and so informed Smith. Smith testified that Barnes used both terms in their meetings on the subject of his future plans. Coleman testified similarly that he and Barnes talked about "flat-rate" in its code word sense during their March discussions about "labor problems" that could be expected.

[25] In finding that Bobo expressly left the door open for further negotiations on this subject, I am mindful that it was not a welcome subject for the Unions. I would nevertheless infer from the undisputed willingness expressed by Bobo to be flexible in the other "problem" areas raised by Barnes that Bobo was doing everything he could to obtain Barnes' continued recognition of the Unions on a voluntary basis. While he may have had to swallow hard before saying it, I fully credit Bobo's testimony that he effectively told Barnes that he was willing to negotiate on the subject of a flat-rate system.

This all has the air of collective bargaining. Barnes' willingness to meet with the Unions at this stage may be interpreted as a concession by Barnes that he preferred to staff his ultimate work force mostly with current employees and thus recognized that the Unions would continue to be their bargaining representative. Certainly, his remarks to Bobo that only "some" of those current employees were unwanted was a tacit admission that he was prepared to retain the majority of them. Barnes' testimony elsewhere reveals that he had specific concerns about the suitability of only a few current employees, having had almost a year by then to reduce the work force to acceptable dimensions and to remove the obviously undesirable help.[26]

Barnes' willingness to meet with the Unions before May 17 must nevertheless be seen as a kind of pose; for he had already decided to operate nonunion. Indeed, as findings below make clear, he had already put together detailed plans for a hiring process which presumed in advance that there would be no union in the picture and which was apparently calculated to ensure that result. Rather, Barnes' meeting with Bobo seems to have been part of a more general pattern of conduct suggested above and revealed more plainly below—a pattern in which Barnes and his agents sought to conceal Barnes' future operating intentions from the Unions and from the unit employees until the last minute, while encouraging them in the belief that they would remain part of the picture.

From Barnes' and Coleman's sketchy and elliptical disclosures about their conversations on this subject during the week of March 15, it is at least clear that Barnes had then informed Coleman that he planned to run the dealership on a flat-rate/nonunion basis. Coleman voiced no objection from Ford's standpoint, saying that it was up to Barnes how to proceed. The two prospective DD Corp. officers also clearly discussed the subject tactically, admittedly anticipating that "labor problems" would attend Barnes' attempt to operate flat-rate/nonunion. Coleman also told Barnes about another dealership that had been unsuccessful in an NLRB proceeding (apparently involving successorship issues) because its owner had failed to demonstrate a "clear, defined break in ownership." This information admittedly caused Barnes to insist later that every existing employee complete new application forms for work with FFSI. Barnes and Coleman also admittedly discussed the likelihood that the dealership would be picketed at the point when Barnes announced or acted on his intentions.

When, in late April, Barnes confided his intentions to Smith, he also admittedly told Smith to profess ignorance (not only about the intended flat-rate/nonunion changes, but also that a sale was pending) if he were asked about them by any of the unit employees. He gave similar instructions to other shop foremen and managers. When Smith asked why Barnes wanted the current employees to file formal applications (which would contain the background and current employment information already known to the managers or available in the dealership's existing personnel files), Barnes simply said that "it was procedure for dealer development that all prospective employees fill out applications."

Every person working at Fremont Ford was required to complete such applications, including the sales force and the managers and supervisors whom Barnes admittedly intended without reservation to retain. Barnes himself went through the formality of "applying" for employment with FFSI, simply to be consistent with the portrayal of a "clear, defined break."

In fact, the applications that everyone completed were not even consulted during the interviewing and hiring process that ensued on May 17-18. This and the other features already noted cause me to find that the termination/application process was for no independent business purpose, but was purely cosmetic; a process calculated solely to dramatize what was, from the employees' perspective at least, an otherwise hard-to-spot transfer of Fremont Ford's assets into new corporate hands.

Around the first of May, as Barnes admits, he had already drafted for use in the hiring process a highly detailed document, 14 pages in length, captioned "Terms of Employment." This laid out the precise terms that Barnes intended to impose (including specific job-by-job rates under the flat-rate system). It contained a line for employee signatures.[27]

That conduct is further indication that Barnes did not approach or conduct discussions with Bobo on May 6 with any genuine open-mindedness about the possibility that he might continue to recognize the Unions. His preparation by about May 14 of want-ads soliciting outside applicants likewise signals a fixed intention to operate nonunion. Those advertisements that began running on May 16, stated, inter alia:

[26] Barnes testified somewhat inconsistently about his intentions regarding the suitability of existing employees. He explained finally that the reason that he had not already gotten rid of all undesired employees was that there remained some who were admittedly "marginal" enough to be able to win their jobs back through exercise of the grievance procedure in the union contract. Elsewhere, he also admitted that he left hiring decisions on and after May 17 to Smith and his departmental subordinates and that he did not prohibit the retention of any current employees. Smith said at one point that all the employes were "good" and that there was not "anything wrong" with any of them. See also my analysis of 8(a)(3) issues, infra, in which I conclude that Respondent's agents offered conflicting, inconsistent, and otherwise unbelievable reasons for the nonretention of certain employees.

[27] These are not inappropriately called "individual employment contracts" by the General Counsel, who attacks their legality. When Barnes drafted them, he used the same format as that in the current union contract, although the resemblance ends there. Barnes' intended changes as reflected in his "terms" were far more sweeping than those hinted at in discussions between Barnes and Bobo on May 6.

> Fremont Ford is under new ownership.
> . . . .
> This is a flat rate house shop.

It was in the specific context of adverse questioning about this advertisement that Barnes conceded that the term "flat rate" was a "code word for 'nonunion'" within the greater Bay-area labor market.

In the period after Smith learned in late April of Barnes' intentions to operate flat-rate/nonunion, Smith was regularly confronted by bargaining unit employees who asked him about Barnes' plans, their own employment prospects, "rumors" that Barnes was going nonunion, and similar, predictable inquiries. Smith admits that he consistently "followed instructions" by claiming ignorance of Barnes' intentions. I also find from the accounts of several employees that Smith sometimes compounded the deception. For example, Smith told shop steward Fred Huffstetler, "Don't worry about it. The Union is going to stay. . . . The only thing you have to worry is you're going to lose your vacation time and be put on 30-day probation."[28] I note the similarity of these statements to the message suggested in Barnes' meeting with Bobo on May 6, reinforcing the inference that Barnes was working a calculated deception until the last minute, that he could live with the Unions provided he could get concessions in certain limited "problem" areas.

I also credit the testimony of service writer Marvin Wiggins that both Smith and Radcliff told him, respectively, that he was "guaranteed" a job in the "new" operation, and that he had nothing to worry about. Smith also told Wiggins that the new application was simply a "formality." Similarly, when Smith passed a new job application to Darrell Cooper in early May, he said, "Don't get panicked, nothing is going to change." Cooper asked, "Are we going to be a union shop?" and Smith said "Probably," causing Cooper to pursue the question until Smith said "Yes, we are." There are other examples, merely cumulative on the point that between late April and May 17, Barnes and his agents were concealing—and, at times, inventing—facts pertaining to Barnes' fixed plans.

4. May 17–19: Barnes denies recognition to the Unions, begins interviewing and hiring current employees and outsiders

May 17 was a busy day, with precise sequences in doubt, but it included these events: Barnes told supervisors that morning to tell unit employees to clear personal tools and belongings from the premises before 5 p.m. quitting time. Later (it is not clear whether before or after the meeting of principals where buyout moneys traded hands), Barnes was visited by the Union Representatives Bobo and Day. The meeting was short. Day said they had come to get a contract signed. Barnes said he "had no evidence that [the Unions] represented any of my employees," then added that "it would be a couple of days" before he would be "in operation." Bobo and Day then left, pausing to confer briefly with shop steward Huffstetler and to mention the possibility of an "informational" picket line when the shop reopened for business. This potential picket threat somehow filtered back to Barnes that day. As noted above, it had been anticipated for months by Barnes and Coleman.

At a later point on May 17 Barnes had one or more meetings with Smith and some supervisors where he laid down basic instructions for interviewing and hiring. Smith, who conducted most of the interviews, and Fleming, who helped out, gave testimony from which I find that Barnes told them both that he intended to be a "nonunionized organization," and that applicants should be told this. Barnes also directed that employees should go over the 14-page package of "terms" prepared by Barnes, with the understanding that they would sign it as a condition of hire. Finally, Barnes told them that he was "looking for skilled people who would be willing to cross a picket line" and authorized his interviewers to promise such candidates that they would be guaranteed 40 hours' pay each week as a hedge against any lack of work due to the possible picketing.

Smith said he participated in most of the interviews to be sure that Barnes' instructions were followed and especially to go through the written employment terms with each applicant. Although Smith says that Barnes also told his interviewers not to "discriminate" on the basis of "union activity," Smith admittedly took Barnes' overall instructions to mean, inter alia, that Barnes would need employees "sympathetic" to his intended nonunion status.

Smith also readily admitted that many employees interviewed on May 17 were ruled out from further employment consideration based on their declared refusals to work in a nonunion shop or to cross a picket line.[29] Fleming also admits as much, although his admissions were not as candid and only followed transparent and unworthy attempts to convince listeners that applicants' responses in this area had no bearing on their suitability for hire in the post-May 17 operation.

Accordingly, while more might be said, case by case, about the details of some of the May 17 interviews, one central feature is clear; they were not conducted for the purposes that one normally supposes an employer has in mind (e.g., to ascertain an applicant's employment history or communications skills or technical specialities). These were admittedly known factors in the case of the current employees at Fremont Ford. Rather, as Smith admitted, the "only thing" that he did with each applicant on May 17 was "to go over what the new contract would be that [Barnes] would want them to enter into"; and the "only thing" that Smith "really didn't know about them was . . . whether or not they wanted to cross a picket line and work in a non-Union shop."

The May 17 interviews are thus more properly understood as a kind of particularly coercive polling process where, as a condition of further consideration, current employees must express "willingness" to work in a nonunion setting, according to terms set forth in individual employment "contracts," and in the face of probable picketing. Although Barnes may have issued formal instructions to Smith and to his other interviewers not to "discriminate" based on "union activities" in their eventual hiring choices, it is plain that Barnes' instructions necessarily required that discriminations be made by his hiring agents linked to the current employee/applicant's willingness to forgo union representation as a condition of his continued employment at Fremont Ford. Smith so understood them, as evidenced by his conclusion that he must select for retention only those "sympathetic" to Barnes' plans.

[28] Service Manager Radcliff also told Huffstetler and others roughly the same thing ("No problem. Don't worry about it. We're going to stay union").

[29] In testimony on May 6, Smith specifically named six employees ruled out in this connection: S. Kirkendall, D. Burkhardt, D. Cooper, W. Deetz, F. Huffstetler and J. Lawson. Smith's testimony elsewhere suggests that the list should be larger by at least one name, Marvin Wiggins. See also, Analysis, infra, dealing with the case of David Lawson.

The May 18 interviews with the outside applicants differed in certain respects from those on May 17. More than one hundred outsiders filed through and were hurriedly interviewed, two-by-two, to determine their threshold qualifications. A relative few of them were deemed sufficiently qualified to warrant protracted discussions. It was only in those latter cases that Smith, Fleming, and Radcliff took the trouble to go over in detail Barnes' nonunion, flat-rate intentions and to ascertain the candidates' willingness to go along with that program and to cross a picket line, if need be.

It requires no squinting to see that the interview process as a whole was really a means by which to deliver ultimatums to prospective employees; that they either forgo union representation and be willing to cross a picket line and work flat rate, or that they look elsewhere for work. The unit employees who were allowed to come to work on Wednesday morning, May 19, were necessarily persons who had convinced Smith and the other hiring agents that they would abandon union representation if that was required to keep a job in the "reopened" Fremont Ford operation.

5. The unit complement before and after the May 19 reopening; observations about the shrinkage

There were 22 unit employees at Fremont Ford on May 17; there were 10 when the doors opened again on May 19. All 10 employees in the May 19 complement had been unit employees in the May 17 complement.[30] Barnes and Smith offer inconsistent testimony about the precise reasons for the shrinkage in the unit complement and the precise numerical limits Barnes imposed on hiring for a May 19 complement. There is a consistent strain in their testimony that Barnes intentionally limited the unit complement because of anticipated drops in service business from expected picketing. But, curiously, there were no corresponding reductions in the sales force (which was retained largely intact; i.e., all but 2 of about 18 salespersons, if Barnes' vague recollection can be credited). Barnes' explanations—particularly about the latter anomaly—seemed improvised and half-hearted.

Smith's testimony did not clarify the picture. He said at one point, seemingly trying to rationalize the size of the unit complement on reopening, that 10 employees was "normal" considering the available work in the period immediately preceding the takeover.

Adding to doubt about the adequacy of explanations for Barnes' alleged imposition of a starting ceiling no higher than 10 employees is the fact that in the following week Supervisors Fleming and Radcliff continued to call former unit employees to sound them out about their willingness to accept Barnes' terms. Here I rely on admissions made by Fleming and Radcliff and, where there may be conflict, on the more specific testimony of employees Cooper, Evans, and Huffstetler. See, for example, Huffstetler's testimony that Radcliff called him and asked if he would come back if Smith were no longer in the picture. Huffstetler said he might, if the shop were "union." Radcliff asked: "What if it is not union?" Huffstetler replied: "Well, I don't think so." In addition, three more employees from the complement (J. Lawson, S. Kirkendall, and V. Bilbrey) were back to work within 2 weeks of May 19.

All of this makes it sound as if Barnes was prepared to reopen with an even larger unit complement, i.e., as many as he could find provided they had purged themselves of any notion that there would be any continued union presence. In any case, I conclude that the haltingly uttered and inconsistent explanations advanced by Barnes and Smith for the May 19 shrinkage in the work force do not illuminate Barnes' underlying rationale except—indirectly—as they suggest concealment of purposes which Respondent found it to be not in its interests to disclose.[31]

To penetrate more deeply into Barnes' tactical judgments on a record where Barnes seemed to try his best to conceal them would require speculation about the details of his reasoning processes and an assessment of the adequacy of his understanding of the law of successorship—otherwise academic points. The credible record nevertheless preponderates on the side of these broad conclusions: First, through concealment of his intentions and by the broadcasting of false signals before May 17,

[30] The table below adapts a stipulated list of the 22 unit employees on May 17, with asterisk indicating the 10 carryovers as of May 19. As noted separately, some additional May 17 employees later returned to work across the picket line. Others were later sounded out but indicated unwillingness to return on Barnes' terms. The examination of Smith at Tr. 741-751 about the specific duties and departmental status of each individual is relied on for general classification purposes.

Barnes was trying to postpone the point of reckoning with the Unions until the asset transfer, even though his plans were fixed before then. Second, by a contrived and coercive process resulting in a "reopening" with a complement reduced by more than 50 percent, Barnes was trying to blur the legal picture from a "majority" standpoint, thereby further postponing the day of reckoning and perhaps guaranteeing that the eventual "full" complement would consist mostly of newcomers.

6. The picketing and its aftermath

The Unions picketed Fremont Ford for about 2 months after May 19. There was an exchange of correspondence between counsel for the Unions and for Respondent in September in which legal positions are set forth that do not need to be recorded here. During that period, there were additional hires.[32]

III. ANALYSIS, CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

A. Bargaining Duty and 8(a)(5) Issues

1. General legal setting

"The subject of successorship is shrouded in somewhat impressionistic approaches." Machinists Lodge 94 (Lou Ehlers Cadillac) v. NLRB, 414 F.2d 1135, 1139 (D.C. Cir. 1969). "There is no fixed definition of 'successor,' nor is there a uniformly accepted set of obligations which flow from the determination that, in certain circumstances, a party is a 'successor.'" 1 Morris, The Developing Labor Law 795 (2d ed. 1983).

Whatever may be said about Respondent's potential legal duty to continue a bargaining relationship with the Unions it is not disputed that Respondent is a "successor" in the nontechnical sense that it always intended to, and did, "continue" virtually intact the car sales and service operation which has at all times done business under the name "Fremont Ford." Indeed, "continuity" in operations was deemed sufficiently important to affect even the choice of Respondent's corporate name when the plans were made to set up a DD Corp. through which Barnes might buy the Fremont Ford assets formerly held by the predecessor, FFI. I do not dwell further on the obvious operational "continuity" associated with Respondent's acquisition of Fremont Ford.

The more important question here (and in virtually all successorship cases arising under the NLRA) is whether there can be said to have been sufficient continuity in the complement of employees employed by the otherwise continuing employing enterprise. More specifically, the question of legal successorship has devolved, for better or worse, to an inquiry into whether a "majority" of employees in the successor operation (at an appropriate time for counting) were carried over from the predecessor operation.[33]

These are some additional considerations that the Supreme Court has held may properly influence the questions whether a successor in the operation of a business may be treated as having acquired in the process some or all the labor relations obligations which bound his predecessor.

The Court said in Wiley:[34]

> Employees, and the union which represents them, ordinarily do not take part in negotiations leading to a change in corporate ownership. The negotiations will ordinarily not concern the well being of the employees, whose advantage or disadvantage, potentially great, will inevitably be incidental to the main considerations. The objectives of national labor policy, reflected in established principles of federal law, require that the rightful prerogative of owners independently to rearrange their businesses and even eliminate themselves as employers be balanced by some protection to the employees from a sudden change in the employment relationship . . . . [376 U.S. at 549.]

And the Court said in Burns:[35]

> It has been consistently held that a mere change of employers or of ownership in the employing industry is not such an "unusual circumstance" as to affect the force of the Board's certification within the normal operative period if a majority of employees after the change of ownership or management were employed by the preceding employer. [406 U.S. at 279]
> . . . .
> . . . where a bargaining unit remains unchanged and a majority of the employees hired by the new employer are represented by a recently certified bargaining agent[36] there is little basis for faulting the Board's implementation of the express mandates of Sec. 8(a)(5) and Sec. 9(a) by ordering the employer to bargain with the incumbent union. [Id at 281.]

The Burns Court left no doubt that a labor relations successor will not normally inherit his predecessor's labor agreement unless he adopts or tacitly assumes it. 406 U.S. at 281–91. See also, e.g., World Evangelism, 248 NLRB 909 (1980), enfd. 656 F.2d 1349 (9th Cir. 1981); Audit Services v. Rolfson, 641 F.2d 757, 763 (9th Cir. 1981).

[32] Respondent contends that there were 28 employees in the unit complement as of September 27—a date deemed significant by Respondent for "majority" counting purposes, a minority of whom were unit employees on May 17. (See R. Br. 55-56, including table of hires totaling only 13.) Respondent has not indicated with any clarity the sources in the record (generally omitting citations), nor the reasoning underlying its assertions in this regard—a matter of no ultimate moment (see sec. III).

[33] Thus, while the Board has at times set forth a kind of checklist containing a variety of factors for determining whether an employer is a "successor" in the technical sense of having acquired labor relations obligations (see, e.g., Stewart Granite Enterprises, 255 NLRB 569, 572 (1980), one must resist the implication that factors other than the majority factor carry any real weight in the ultimate determinations. See, e.g., Zim's Foodliner v. NLRB, 495 F.2d 1131, 1140 (7th Cir. 1974). Accord: Saks & Co. v. NLRB, 634 F.2d 681 (2d Cir. 1980).

[35] NLRB v. Burns Security Services, 406 U.S. 272 (1972).

[36] Although the Court here alluded to the "recent certification" of the union involved in Burns, it has been repeatedly held that when other factors favoring treating an employee as a successor are present, it is of no significance, as in this case, that the union may not have been "recently" certified, or that it may owe its exclusive representative status to some lawful process other than a Board certification. Stewart Granite Enterprises, supra, at 572, fn. 16, and authorities cited.

There is greater doubt regarding precisely when a successor must recognize and bargain with the incumbent union when he has not adopted or assumed the predecessor's union contract. In dicta, the Burns Court suggested two paradigms. In one, where it is "perfectly clear" that the successor's complement of employees will be composed in the main of the bargaining unit employees of his predecessor, the Court said that the successor must "initially consult" with the incumbent union before making any changes in the predecessor's terms and conditions of employment. 406 U.S. at 294–295. The Court also envisioned a category of cases at the other end of the continuum where it would not be until after the successor has hired a "full complement" that it will be apparent whether a majority of the employees will be from the predecessor unit and, therefore, it will not be until such full complement is hired that a duty to bargain may arise. Ibid. In the meantime, the Court said, such employers are free to set "initial terms" of employment without consulting with the predecessor union. Ibid.

The Burns Court did not purport to define with precision the circumstances that would make it "perfectly clear" that a prospective employer intended to use mostly predecessor employees in his new operation; neither did the Court elaborate on the conditions that must obtain before a successor might claim the right to "wait and see" how the hiring shook out before dealing with the questions of recognition and bargaining with the union representative of the predecessor complement. The Board has said that "the precise meaning and application of the Court's [perfectly clear] caveat is not easy to discern." Spruce Up Corp., 209 NLRB 194 at 195 (1974). And it is well to recall the general admonition of the Court in Howard Johnson Co. v. Detroit Local Joint Executive Board, 417 U.S. 249, 256 (1974) that:

> Particularly in light of the difficulty of the successorship question, the myriad factual circumstances and legal contexts in which it can arise, and the absence of congressional guidance as to its evolution, emphasis on the facts of each case as it arises is especially appropriate.

Mindful of these general principles and considerations, I turn next to their appropriate application herein.

2. Did Respondent ever become a successor for labor relations purposes?

Respondent claims under Burns that it was entitled on May 17–19 to impose "initial terms" on prospective employees and then to wait until a "full complement" was on board before making the head count that would determine whether it owed a duty to recognize the Unions. Respondent argues that it was not until September 27, more than 4 months after its admitted acquisition of the assets of the business, that such a complement was achieved, which September 27 complement proved to include only a minority of "predecessor" employees. This configuration, Respondent argues, left it free to ignore the Unions.

I set aside doubts expressed earlier about the adequacy of Respondent's proof regarding the eventual composition of the unit on September 27 and whether, as Respondent asserts, 28 is a "full complement."[37] Assuming that Respondent's assertions on that subject are supported by this record, I conclude that they are irrelevant. Rather, I conclude below that Respondent owed a duty to recognize the Unions much earlier, but in any case by no later than May 19, in the light of the "majority" configuration of the unit on that latter date.

a. Successorship by takeover before asset transfer

An employer in a business takeover need not have acquired title to the assets of the business before he may be treated in law as the successor for collective-bargaining purposes. East Belden Corp., 239 NLRB 776, 791 (1978); Sorrento Hotel, 266 NLRB 350, 356–357 (1983), and authorities cited. See also, e.g., Carlton's Market, 243 NLRB 837, 845 (1979). Rather, where a prospective buyer steps into the management of a union-represented business pending a conclusion of the sale of assets and does not then substantially alter the composition or appropriateness of the bargaining unit, he will be treated as a successor fitting within the "perfectly clear" exception suggested in Burns as triggering a duty to recognize and bargain with the incumbent union before making any subsequent changes affecting employment in the bargaining unit. Sorrento Hotel, supra at fn. 23.

In essential agreement with the principal position urged by the General Counsel, I conclude that for many months before May 17 Respondent occupied the same status as the pre-asset-transfer successors in the cited cases, with the legal consequence that Respondent was not free unilaterally to change at a later date the conditions of employment that were maintained in effect when it took over the management of Fremont Ford. Accordingly, and without regard to questions of the "majority" configuration as of May 19 (or September 27, or any other post-May 17 date) I conclude that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by all complained-of actions on and after May 17, and by some actions before that, as well.

Respondent devotes considerable attention on brief to attempts to distinguish this case from the East Belden line of cases, supra, citing some factors present in one or more of them that do not appear in this case (or vice-versa). This is an essentially sterile approach, however, for comparison among the factual settings of this and the cited cases discloses hundreds of factual differences but few, if any, legally significant ones.[38] The East Belden cases have materially in common that they each involve a buyer who has already taken over substantial control of the employing enterprise under circumstances where both buyer and seller have every expectation that the sales transaction will close.[39]

[37] See fn. 32.

[38] An example of a potentially significant difference: This case shows more strongly than some of the cited cases that the actual control of the business had been in Barnes' hands for at least several months before the May 17 closing transactions.

Respondent also argues ultimately regarding the East Belden cases that "the crucial factor is when the succeeding enterprise took over from the predecessor for its own benefit." I do not agree that those cases may be properly interpreted as setting forth a test for legal successorship that requires an analysis as to whose "benefit" is being served by the interim management of a business by a buyer-in-place. At best, those cases merely depict a uniform rejection by the Board of the claims by the respective successors that their interim management was merely a kind of "caretaking" for the "benefit" of the seller. To that extent, if anything, those cases seem to apply something close to a presumption that the buyer-in-place is operating for his own "benefit." East Belden, supra at 791; Sorrento Hotel, supra at 356–357; Carlton's Market, supra at 845; see also Ethan Allen, Inc., 218 NLRB 208, 217 (1975), enfd. in pertinent part 544 F.2d 742 (4th Cir. 1976).

I also believe that a "benefit" test could not reasonably be a useful guide for determining questions of employees' rights under the Act in a successorship setting involving a buyer-in-place. For one thing, such takeovers as are presented here and in the East Belden line inevitably serve the "benefit" of both buyer and seller in some sense, and it is not at all clear in most instances how one might allocate between buyer and seller the "benefit" to be derived from any given management action of the buyer-in- place.

In any case, for reasons discussed above, it is evident that Barnes took actions in the management and operation of Fremont Ford before May 17 which served his ultimate "benefit" as buyer more than it served any identifiable interim interests of Brinkman-Pettitt. I have in mind here Barnes' wholesale management reshufflings, and his extraordinary expenditures such as those involved in the reorganization of the service department hierarchy, especially the costs of bringing Smith into the operation from Idaho. Even more clearly, Barnes' use of his own business time and that of his subordinates (particularly Frances Baker) in laying the groundwork for his own purchase of the business, all done while those persons were still on FFI's payroll, shows that Barnes was using the dealership and its personnel for the benefit of Barnes/FFSI well before Respondent would concede that FFSI had taken over for its own benefit.[40]

Accordingly, a "benefit" analysis leads either to a deadend or, as applied herein, it does not truly enhance Respondent's case.

Exactly when Respondent might be said to have "taken over" Fremont Ford is admittedly a matter for reasonable debate. The general public in the Bay area (necessarily including the Unions and the bargaining unit employees of Fremont Ford) could be forgiven for believing that the takeover occurred when Barnes depicted himself as the "new owner" in September 1981, and began conducting his advertising campaign based on the theme, "new dealer—new deal." But, while I have found that Barnes and Brinkman-Pettitt's association in July 1981 was "influenced" by the prospect that Barnes would eventually buy out the business, I have no record basis for finding that there were any clear plans at that time for a sale to Barnes. Because of this, and because there is no evidence that Respondent (i.e., FFSI) existed even inchoately at that time, I do not find any clear warrant for treating Barnes as having acquired any significant status as a successor at that early date. Neither would such a finding affect my recommended disposition of this case.

I would reject even more quickly the May 17 (or 19), 1982 dates posited by Respondent as the true date(s) on which Respondent "took over" the operation. Respondent's takeover clearly was contractually perfected no later than May 7. Among other factors noted above, I have found that it was on that date that Ford treated Respondent as the new operator with exclusive rights to the franchise, it was on that date that Ford drafted the funding check for the DD Corp., and, it was on "approximately" that date that the formal "takeover" specified in the buy-sell agreement would take place. By this time, Barnes, acting as president of FFSI, had already invited bargaining with the Unions and had even engaged in one "bargaining" session with the Unions' representative, Bobo, on the subject of the effects of the sale on unit employees. Moreover, Respondent expressly admits (Br. 13) that Respondent "began operations in early May," a concession that cannot be squared with its position elsewhere that its takeover of the business did not occur until on or after May 17.

In the final reckoning, however, the question when Respondent succeeded to the operation of Fremont Ford is not answered simply by relying on formal agreements, or records reflecting the subjective beliefs of parties to the sale about who actually had the "rights" to the franchise on a given day, nor by other subjective (and often inconsistent and self-serving) understandings or statements of the parties to the sale as to when the transaction would be deemed to be complete. Rather, the East Belden cases suggest that the "takeover" is more properly understood as the act of managing the business by the buyer after the agreement to sell has been reached.

Judged from that perspective I have no difficulty in concluding that the takeover occurred in January 1982 when the key parties agreed that Barnes, already the "operator," would become the buyer of the business as soon as a DD Program package could be put together. It was at this point that Barnes acquired a new status, that of buyer-in-place; and it was from that point onward that his operation of the business may be seen as a "succession" in the same sense in which the prospective buyers in the East Belden cases were deemed to have become the successors by virtue of their entry into the operation of businesses that they intended to buy.

[39] E.g., Sorrento Hotel, supra at 352, in which the successor took over interim management of the business expressly "in anticipation of a successful conclusion of negotiations."

[40] Of course it could be argued by Respondent that these actions also worked to the "benefit" of FFI since it was in FFI's interest as well that there be a prompt closing of the sale, free of any hitches that might otherwise be present if Barnes and Baker, et al., had not taken those "anticipatory" steps. But this merely brings us back to the first point; that in situations like this it is not legally productive to attempt to sort out whose "benefit" is really being served when a prospective buyer has already taken over the basic operation of the business while waiting for the sale to close.

However much Respondent might insist that the January arrangements were still tentative and technically subject to repudiation until May 17, it is clear from the findings above that Brinkman-Pettitt and Barnes (experts in the business with a long history of Ford dealership experience behind them) clearly counted on and fully expected that the deal would go through without substantial hitch. Rather than closing the doors, Brinkman-Pettitt committed themselves for the next several months to financial participation in a dealership that they had pronounced nearly dead 6 months earlier and that had continued by their own account to be a hemorrhagic drain on their resources. So far as this record shows, they had no other takers for the business when they decided to sell to Barnes. For his part, Barnes clearly felt that the DD Program application would be approved, despite his testimonial hedging. This record contains no indication of any other reason why Barnes would stay on as Fremont Ford's general manager after it was declared in January to be in such bad shape that it was "30 days from closing." Neither does the record suggest that Barnes had any backup plans to support himself if the sale via the DD Program were to fall through.

I am thus more influenced by the actions in detrimental reliance taken by these experienced gentlemen in January than by any abstract arguments about the technical legal defeasability of their agreement when I reach this conclusion: January marked a clear point at which Brinkman-Pettitt effectively turned the operation over to Barnes, certain that he would buy it under a program familiar to all of them. By then Brinkman-Pettitt clearly knew they could not get their money out of the business unless and until the DD Program application could be perfected and the necessary arrangements for the creation of a DD Corp. could be made. They had to cooperate to close the sale, and they must have appreciated as well that Barnes, as buyer and as current operator, would have the greater leverage in any contest over management decisions in the meantime.

If, despite the detrimental reliance of the parties to the sale, the January agreement between Barnes and Brinkman-Pettitt is not a clear enough point of demarcation for concluding that an East Belden type of successorship then occurred, there can be no doubt that by March 19 Respondent's status as such a successor was clearly fixed. By then a specific DD Corp. had been conceived and named. By then there had been formal recognition that Barnes could no longer appropriately act as an agent of FFI, hence his resignation from the presidency of that corporation; and there was formal recognition as well of his status as the agent for the prospective DD Corp. There were no apparent obstacles to the conclusion of the transaction. Coleman had been thorough in preparing papers and getting necessary signatures. Specific, detailed understandings had been reached regarding the precise terms and conditions under which the assets would change hands, and similarly specific provisions had been made to ensure that Respondent would have control over the operation pending the closing and transfer of assets.[41] As in Sorrento Hotel, supra at 357, "By the time of Respondent's . . . assumption of management responsibility, its prolonged continuation in that role was a virtual certainty, the 'basic terms' of the long-term . . . agreement previously having been worked out."

Accordingly, by March 19 at the latest, Respondent's status was so clearly fixed that its continuation of the operation with the same employees thereafter rendered it the legal successor to the relationship previously maintained between the owners of Fremont Ford and the Unions. Also, consistent with the analysis in the East Belden cases, Respondent then owed a duty to bargain collectively with respect to any future changes having an impact on unit employees' terms and conditions of employment. This included, inter alia, a duty to notify and bargain about intended en masse terminations in the unit and the standards for selecting who would be retained in a shrunken complement. See, e.g., Sorrento Hotel, supra at 358. See also, e.g., Valley Iron & Steel Co., 224 NLRB 866, 877 (1976) (selection of employees for layoff an important condition of employment and proper subject for collective bargaining).

b. Did Respondent become bound to the contract

Consistent with conclusions above that Respondent's legal successorship attached in January, it is evident that Respondent's admitted honoring and applying of the Union contract for roughly 5 additional months amounted to an assumption of that contract. Burns, supra, 407 U.S. at 272; see also, e.g., Audit Services, supra, 641 F.2d at 763. The same conclusion would hold if Respondent's legal successorship did not attach until March 19, there still being a substantial period after that during which Respondent honored and applied the labor agreement in all respects.

There are at least three other distinct bases for treating Respondent as having acquired a successor's obligation to recognize and bargain with the Unions herein, although each theory carries with it a somewhat different mix of remedial obligations.[42] I summarize below the alternative bases on which it may be found that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) by refusing to recognize the Unions as its employees' representative.

[41] I refer here not only to the formal provisions in the buy-sell agreement ensuring that the status quo would be preserved for Respondent's benefit pending the closing, but also to the more fundamentally important fact that Barnes, FFSI's acknowledged agent, was already running things. Indeed, although the formal provisions in the buy-sell agreement assume a situation where the buyer is an outsider needing rights of access and supervision to ensure that the seller does not waste or otherwise devalue the subject business, the real situation here was essentially the reverse. By then, it was the sellers who were on the outside looking in, so complete had been their surrender of operational control to Barnes.

[42] Since I am persuaded that the most appropriate and comprehensive remedy for the violations of Sec. 8(a)(5) that I have found under an East Belden analysis is to require Respondent to restore the overall status quo ante May 17, I do not address the potential variances in remedy for violations found under alternate theories set out below.

c. Alternative grounds for finding successorship

1. Voluntary recognition before May 17

Even ignoring that Respondent was a buyer-in-place before the asset transfer, it may be found alternatively herein that Barnes planned to operate after May 17 with a substantially unchanged complement; or at least that such was his plan through May 6. When Barnes invited bargaining with the Unions over the effects of the sale of Fremont Ford on unit employees and when he met with Bobo on May 6 and expressly told Bobo that he had doubts about the suitability of only "some" of the employees, it was "perfectly clear" from that conduct that a majority of employees would be retained. Indeed, Barnes implicitly and properly conferred recognition on the Unions by that conduct. His later change of heart and disavowal of a relationship was therefore unlawful. See, e.g., Bellingham Frozen Foods, 237 NLRB 1450, 1463-1464 (1978), enfd. in pertinent part 626 F.2d 674 (9th Cir. 1980), cert. denied 449 U.S. 1125 (1980).

2. Section 8(a)(3) "but for" theory

The complaint alleges, and I agree (see sec. IV, (B), infra) that Respondent's action in terminating employees en masse and in failing thereafter to rehire some of them independently violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1).

If those acts of discrimination had not taken place, Respondent would have employed on May 19 those additional 12 employees found below to have been unlawfully denied rehire. Adding their numbers to the employees who were retained on the May 19 "reopening" date clearly yields a majority in what Respondent conceded is a typical "full complement" in the reopened operation (i.e., 22 of 28). Where, but for unlawful discrimination in the retention of predecessor employees, a successor would have retained enough of them to constitute a majority of employees in his new complement, the successor will be deemed to have owed a duty to bargain with the predecessor union—indeed the duty will be deemed to have attached before the point at which he might otherwise lawfully impose "initial terms" on a unilateral basis. See, e.g., Potters Drug Enterprises, 233 NLRB 15, 20 (1977), enfd. mem. 584 F.2d 980 (9th Cir. 1978).

Accordingly, even if Respondent had never set foot inside Fremont Ford's doors before taking it over, its inherently discriminatory hiring process warrants treating it in law as a successor who owed a duty to recognize and bargain with the Unions before making any changes in bargaining unit working conditions.

3. "Representative complement" theory

Since Burns, the Board, with the approval of the courts of appeal, has interpreted a potential successor's duty to bargain with the predecessor union as being perfected as soon as it has hired a "representative complement" a majority of whom are from the predecessor unit, and even though, in some sense, the successor's "full" complement might not be reached until some indefinite future point. Hudson River Aggregates, 246 NLRB 192 (1979), and authorities at fn. 3, enfd. 639 F.2d 865, 870 (2d Cir. 1981); Pre-Engineered Building Products, 228 NLRB 841 (1977), enfd. 603 F.2d 134, 136 (10th Cir. 1979); Premium Foods, 260 NLRB 708 (1982), enfd. 709 F.2d 623, 628 (9th Cir. 1983) ("The count need not be delayed until the employer has completed the hiring of all employees in the bargaining unit").

Searches for an elusive "majority" in cases like this can be attenuated. But it is at least clear that when the doors of Fremont Ford opened on May 19, the complement of 10 employees then on hand was "substantial and representative" in the sense in which the cited authorities use the term. See, e.g., Premium Foods v. NLRB, supra at 630. The May 19 complement would also meet the tests enunciated in General Extrusion Co., 121 NLRB 1165, 1167 (1958).[43]

Accordingly, even under the interpretation of these events most favorable to Respondent, and ignoring Respondent's pre-May 17 takeover of the operation, Respondent's bargaining duty clearly attached when it opened its doors on May 19 with a representative complement of employees who had all come from the ranks of the predecessor operation. Respondent was not entitled to "wait and see" for 4 months more how the "majority" picture might change.

B. Independent 8(a)(3) and (1) Issues

Here I address only the discrimination and related coercion visited on members of the bargaining unit by Respondent's mass terminations and subsequent tainted interview and rehire processes.[44]

[43] In General Extrusion, the Board held that at least 30 percent of the ultimate complement and 50 percent of the job classifications must be in existence at the time a labor agreement is signed in order for the labor agreement to bar a representation election in the unit. Assuming without deciding that the same tests would apply here, it is clear from findings above (at fn. 30) that the May 19 complement was "representative" in the General Extrusion sense. Thus, the exact size of the unit complement on September 27 (when Respondent says the count should have been made) is alleged by Respondent to have been 28. Assuming this to be the case (but see fn. 32), the startup complement of 10 employees on May 19 was clearly sufficient to meet the General Extrusion "30 percent-of-complement test. Since all or virtually all the job classifications in Respondent's "ultimate" (i.e., September) complement likewise existed as of May 19, this satisfied the "50 percent-of-classifications" test

[44] The complaint alleges (at par. 34) that 47 named persons were terminated on May 17 and (at par. 38) that those terminations violated Sec. 8(a)(3) and (1). Those 47 named individuals include not only the 22 bargaining unit employees on hand on May 17, but also (apparently) all other persons in Fremont Ford's employ on that date (sales, clerical, supervisory, managerial, etc.). The complaint elsewhere alleges that Respondent independently discriminated against 13 named bargaining unit employees by failing to rehire them upon the May 19 reopening. The latter list is at minor variance with the proof (see discussion, infra, in main text).

The General Counsel has apparently abandoned the allegation that the termination on May 17 of nonbargaining unit personnel constituted independently unlawful discrimination under Sec. 8(a)(3). The record does not systematically show whether the names of nonunit personnel in par. 34 were, in fact, the ones terminated on May 17. The matter received no attention in the General Counsel's posttrial brief (nor in those of the other parties). I assume that the General Counsel's par. 34 allegation was grounded on the legally defensible proposition that employees who are not the direct targets of an unlawfully discriminatory plan may nevertheless be coerced in the exercise of Sec. 7 rights when they are incidentally harmed by discriminatory actions against the target group. I would agree that violations of Sec. 8(a)(1) necessarily occurred when nonunit employees underwent the meaningless ritual of being terminated and being required to resubmit employment "applications." I would not find in the

The operative complaint paragraph names 13 unit employees from the May 17 unit complement as having been wrongly denied rehire. That allegation is at variance with the otherwise agreed-on proof as to the hiring shakeout on May 19 that 12 employees from the May 17 complement were no longer on board on May 19.[45]

I have found that Respondent owed a duty to bargain over such matters as intended mass terminations and rehire terms for unit employees and I provide a recommended make-whole remedy below that would require offers of reinstatement and backpay to all employees in the unit on May 17. It is therefore arguably superfluous to consider the independent discrimination issues. But because the individual cases have common aspects of discriminatory character, and because Respondent's defenses are susceptible of summary treatment, I deal with the discrimination counts if for no other reason than to demonstrate the existence of alternative grounds for imposing an essentially similar status quo ante remedy.

1. Prima facie case

The overall patterns of Barnes' admitted behavior and motivations constitute the prima facie elements in the discrimination cases. First, of course, is Barnes' declared intention to switch to a nonunion operation. See, e.g., Love's Barbecue Restaurant, 245 NLRB 78, 80 (1979) ("Kallman's conceded intention not to allow the employees to be unionized itself supports a conclusion of illegal motive"), enfd. in pertinent part 640 F.2d 1094, 1097 (9th Cir. 1981). The mass firings and the rehiring process in which employees were handed ultimatums which expressly included statements that the reopened operation would be nonunion were clearly parts of Barnes' final solution—essentially to blast through to nonunion status.

It is also clear in all the circumstances detailed in findings, supra, that requiring prospective employees to express a willingness to cross a picket line and to work "nonunion" as a condition of their retention violates Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. See, generally, East Belden, supra, 239 NLRB at 1794–1795. See also, e.g., Love's Barbecue, supra, 245 NLRB at 79. I would reach a similar conclusion with respect to Barnes' insistence that prospective employees sign individual employment contracts where it is clear that this was part of his program to drive home the point that employees must forfeit union representation as a condition of retention. See, e.g., J. M. Tanaka Construction, 249 NLRB 238 (1980), enfd. 675 F.2d 1029, 1036 (9th Cir. 1982).

With the hiring process thus tainted a prima facie case was made that the Fremont Ford employees who were not retained were the victims of unlawful discrimination. Smith independently conceded that six named individuals were ruled out from consideration based on nothing more than their expressed unwillingness to go along with Respondent's ultimatums. I also find that there are others whom Smith failed to list whom Respondent would have put to work immediately on reopening or within a few days thereafter had it not been for their continued expressions of unwillingness to accept Barnes' unlawful package of terms. As I find below, Respondent failed in each instance to meet its burden under Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083, 1089 (1980), enfd. 662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981), of demonstrating that those employees would have been terminated even if they had never engaged in protected conduct.

2. Respondent's defenses

In the cases of Steve Kirkendall, John Lawson, and Virgil Bilbrey, any evidence that Respondent may have put into the record with respect to their potential unfitness (and I detect none) does not outweigh the admitted fact that they were returned to work within 2 weeks of May 19, making it difficult for Respondent to argue seriously—let alone meet its Wright Line burden of demonstrating—that those employees would have been fired even absent their initial (protected) unwillingness to work on Barnes' unlawful terms.[46]

A similar analysis is warranted with respect to employees Darrell Cooper, Terry Evans, and Fred Huffstetler. While there is vacillating, inconclusive, and sometimes deprecating testimony by Smith and others about the work performance of those employees, Smith and others also admitted that they had had no pre-May 17 intentions to discharge them; neither had these employees been warned or disciplined for alleged shortcomings. Even more significant, each was later called by supervisors Fleming or Radcliff who sought to induce them to return—clearly undermining any suggestion that Respondent found them so unfit that they would not have circumstances that any identifiable nonunit employee suffered independently unlawful discrimination under Sec. 8(a)(3). Neither in the circumstances would I impose upon the Board's compliance processes the task of attempting to figure "lost" earnings for nonunit personnel. This could conceivably involve, for example, attempts to divine how many cars a salesman might have sold but for the May 18 shutdown of operations (the only date on which it might be argued that the "terminated" nonunit employees suffered a loss of work opportunity). My recommended remedy does, however, address the matter of incidental damage done to nonunit employees' rights by Respondent's violations.

[45] See and compare complaint par. 53 with findings at fn. 30. The complaint erroneously suggests that Charles Ross and John Pack did not carry over to May 19. The complaint omits John Lawson from the group of those who were not immediately returned to work on May 19.

[46] In these and some other cases under discussion there is the potential argument that even if Barnes had imposed only "lawful" terms, some of the alleged discriminatees might have refused to come to work anyway. This defense ignores conclusions under Sec. 8(a)(5) above that Barnes was not free to impose any unit-applicable terms on a unilateral basis as of May 17. In addition, it was Barnes' unlawful conduct that made it impossible to know whether employees were deterred from accepting his package because they did not like the flat-rate or other kinds of terms which he might lawfully impose if he were a "Spruce Up" successor, or whether employees were simply deterred by the plainly unlawful features of his package of overall terms, i.e., that the shop would be "nonunion" and that employees wanting jobs would have to reconcile themselves to that fact. As the Board said in Spruce Up supra at 197:

> We believe we are entitled to resolve doubts against the wrongdoer. . . . We cannot say with absolute certainty how many of the claimants would have accepted employment had . . . [the successor employer] consented to recognize the Union and commence bargaining on that date. It seems reasonable to us that they might have.
> . . . .
> It is clear that they cherished that right to representation, and that Respondent's refusal to grant it was a significant motivating factor in their unwillingness to accept employment been retained even if they had not refused Barnes' unlawful terms.

The six remaining discriminatees were never offered jobs in the post-May 19 operation. Of them, William Deetz, Marvin Wiggins, and Dan Burkhardt were among those named by Smith as having been "ruled out" from further consideration by virtue of their declared refusals during May 17 interviews to accept Barnes' unlawful terms. Two of them (Deetz and Wiggins) credibly testified that each had been told before May 17 by supervisors that he would be retained after May 19. As their respective supervisors and Smith admitted, none of the three had been warned, disciplined, or otherwise singled out for removal before May 17, factors that are persuasive in concluding that Respondent failed under Wright Line to demonstrate that they would have been terminated even absent their privileged refusals to accept unlawful terms. But I do not believe that a Wright Line "mixed motive" analysis even applies to them. Smith admittedly "ruled them out" at a time when he had not otherwise made a determination as to who would stay on and thus failed to rehire them based on a single, unlawful, motive.

As to Charles Kiesling, Mel Fosen, and David Lawson (the last of the May 17 discriminatees), I conclude that Respondent failed in its Wright Line burden by failing to make a credible showing that there were plans before May 17 to terminate them or even to take action to correct the alleged shortcomings which they may have displayed. Indeed, as Smith admitted, describing the entire class of employees in the May 17 complement, some were better than others, but there was not "anything wrong" with any of them; they were all "good" employees.

As to Fosen, moreover, Respondent concedes (Br. at 64) that he "performed adequately." Respondent adds, however: "More importantly, Larry Smith testified that at the time of the sale there was no opening for Mr. Fosen."

If "no opening for Mr. Fosen" is Respondent's ultimate fall-back position, it may be treated summarily: If, arguendo, there was "no opening" it was for a number of reasons directly traceable to Barnes' unlawful behavior independently found elsewhere—most obviously in the failure to remain bound by the union contract and in the failure to notify and bargain in good faith with the Unions before implementing any of the wholesale changes imposed at and around the time of the asset transfer (including the "terminations" themselves). Barnes cannot credibly rely on any supposed May 17 doubts about bargaining unit needs (therefore "no opening") linked to picketing where he and Coleman had been anticipating (perhaps even counting on) for months the certainty of picketing by the Unions as soon as he showed his hand.

The General Counsel acknowledges on brief that there is credible evidence that bodyshop employee Charles Kiesling may be alcoholic. The record also shows that this information was known before May 17. Arguably, Barnes may have preferred to wait until the point when he (wrongly) believed he could ease out Kiesling without having to defend himself in a grievance proceeding. Respondent's burden under Wright Line requires more—a demonstration that Kiesling would not have been part of the post-May 17 picture in any nondiscriminatory case. Specifically, Respondent failed to rebut the presumption that had Barnes continued to recognize the Unions and to honor the contract during the asset transfer period Kiesling would have remained. His ultimate future may have been in doubt, given this record, but Barnes' unlawful conduct has made it impossible to know what the processes of good faith collective bargaining might have produced in Kiesling's case.

There is this additionally to be said about Respondent's defense to David Lawson's nonhire: Respondent does not ultimately rely on any alleged shortcomings in Lawson; rather it rests on a claim (Br. 62) that Lawson was one of "numerous people" "who received" "job offers," but "who had stated they would not cross [the picket line]." This is not an attempt to carry Respondent's burden under Wright Line; it is simply a challenge to the conclusion above that, in the circumstances, Respondent could not lawfully insist, inter alia, that unit employees cross picket lines to keep their jobs after May 17. Respondent thus underscores what was a prima facie element in the General Counsel's case as to David Lawson and all other May 17 unit employees who were not permitted to stay on.

I conclude in summary that, in addition to being the victims of unilateral changes violating Section 8(a)(5), each employee in the unit on May 17 was independently the victim of discriminatory treatment violating Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

On the foregoing analyses and on the whole record, I reach these ultimate

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Unions are, jointly and severally, labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. At all times material including on and after May 17, 1982, the Unions have been the exclusive joint collective-bargaining representatives of Respondent's auto service, parts, and bodyshop employees in an appropriate collective-bargaining unit more specifically defined as the multiemployer collective-bargaining unit covered by the collective-bargaining agreement, which was admittedly honored, applied, and implemented by Respondent until on or about May 17.

4. By effectively succeeding to the operation of Fremont Ford in January 1982 (and in no case later than March 19, 1982), without significant change in the operation nor in the unit employee complement, Respondent then became bound to existing the collective-bargaining relationship with the Unions.

5. By admittedly honoring the existing collective-bargaining agreement and applying its terms for a substantial period to employees in the unit on and after the date of its succession found above Respondent assumed the obligations of that contract and became bound to it.

6. By the totality of acts below, and by each of them, Respondent has failed and refused to bargain collectively in good faith with the Unions as the exclusive representative of employees in the unit, and thereby has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and, derivatively, Section 8(a)(1), of the Act.

(a) Failing to give the Unions adequate advance notice of Barnes' fixed intentions to engage in wholesale changes affecting terms and conditions of employment in the bargaining unit after the transfer of assets to Respondent, thereby frustrating the Unions' statutory right to bargain collectively about those intended changes.

(b) Affirmatively dispersing false and misleading information to the Unions and to unit employees regarding Barnes' plans for changes affecting the bargaining unit, including refusing to talk candidly with the Union's representative Bobo during a May 6, 1982 meeting and by falsely extending recognition and promising to "get back" to Bobo.

(c) Repudiating the union contract on May 17, 1982, and thereafter refusing to apply it to employees in the unit.

(d) Admittedly refusing in general to recognize the Unions as the unit employees' collective representative on and after May 17, as well as by the discrete acts of unilaterally imposing a flat-rate system and otherwise changing wages, hours of work, and other terms and conditions of employment prevailing until May 17 in the unit.

(e) By direct dealing with unit employees and bypassing the Unions by tendering to applicants on and after May 17 certain written "terms of employment."

7. By the totality of the acts below, and by each of them, Respondent has discriminated with respect to the hire, tenure, and other terms and conditions of employment of employees in order to discourage membership in and activities on behalf of the Unions, and thereby has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(3) and, derivatively, Section 8(a)(1) of the Act:

(a) Terminating all 22 employees named in fn. 30, effective May 17, 1982, and requiring them to submit new written applications for continued employment.

(b) Requiring as a condition for consideration for reemployment in the bargaining unit after May 17 that employees affirmatively state their willingness to accept nonunion status, to sign individual employment contracts and to cross a picket line.

(c) Failing immediately to recall the 12 employees indicated in fn. 30 by the absence of asterisks.

(d) Imposing on all unit employees permitted to return on May 19 or hired thereafter the requirement that they sign individual employment contracts.

(e) Applying the terms set forth in those contracts rather than the terms in the existing labor agreement to all employees hired on and after May 19.

8. By the totality of the acts below, and by each of them, Respondent has independently interfered with, restrained, and coerced employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act and thereby has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

(a) Terminating employees of Fremont Ford other than those in the bargaining unit on May 17 and requiring them to submit written applications for reemployment.

(b) Telling bargaining unit employees that Respondent's operation after May 17 would be nonunion, and that they must be willing to sign individual employment contracts and cross a picket line to keep or get a bargaining unit job.

THE REMEDY

The foregoing analysis and ultimate conclusions of law show that this is a case involving fundamental violations susceptible of various legal characterizations. The violations have in common, however, that they involved a trampling on bargaining unit employees' rights to the various statutory protections generally referred to by the Court in Wiley, supra, as providing "protection . . . from a sudden change in the employment relationship." Whether analyzed as 8(a)(5), (3), or (1) violations, the actions of Barnes in first hiding his unlawful plans from the employees and from their union representatives and then implementing them with unit-shaking consequences require the customary and presumptively appropriate remedy; the reestablishment of the status quo ante the central violations which occurred on May 17, 1982.

It is not only most appropriate to reestablish the conditions and employment complement ante May 17; it is virtually impossible to envision how anything short would suffice to prevent Respondent from deriving advantage from the May 17 blitz and its aftermath. Where it has been concluded that Respondent assumed the existing labor agreement and became bound to it before May 17, Respondent must reinstate that agreement as the governing instrument and apply the same to all unit employees, retroactive to May 17. To the extent that the agreement requires contributions to pension trusts, these trusts must be made whole for any lapses due to Respondent's May 17 repudiation of the labor agreement and underlying labor relationship Merryweather Optical Co., 240 NLRB 1213 (1979).[47]

Most importantly, to reestablish conditions ante May 17 Respondent must offer reinstatement to their pre-May 17 jobs to all 22 unit employees terminated effective May 17, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges established per the labor agreement or otherwise, discharging, if necessary to make room for them, any "outside" employees hired after May 17, and make those 22 employees whole in the manner generally provided in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest as provided in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

I also provide in my recommended Order for "broad" cease-and-desist language, Respondent's unlawful conduct having been blatant, pervasive, and destructive of fundamental employee rights.[48]

---

[47] Whether that agreement automatically renewed itself after its stated expiration date, or whether a successor agreement bound Respondent, are matters for the compliance stage. The pertinent facts were not litigated herein.

[48] Cf. Hickmott Foods, 242 NLRB 1357 (1979).

Finally, I provide for posting of appropriate remedial notices in a manner ensuring that the nonunit employees incidentally harassed with pro forma terminations and reapplication requirements will be assured against future victimization.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On November 9, 1983, Administrative Law Judge Stephen J. Gross issued the attached decision. The General Counsel and the Respondent filed exceptions and supporting briefs, and the Charging Party filed exceptions adopting the General Counsel's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The judge found that on November 2, 1982, when the Respondent withdrew recognition of the Union, it possessed the requisite objective considerations for a good-faith doubt of the Union's majority status. In so doing, the judge found that in calculating union support, the Respondent was justified in including the strike replacements among those employees who opposed representation by the Union. We disagree.[1]

As a preliminary matter we note that in Station KKHI, 284 NLRB 1339 (1987), we overruled the presumption set forth in Pennco, Inc.[2] that "permanent strike replacements hired during a strike support the union."[3] In overruling Pennco, however, we declined to adopt the contrary presumption that permanent strike replacements who cross a picket line repudiate the union as a collective-bargaining representative.[4] We noted that "adoption of this presumption would disrupt the balance of competing economic weapons long established in strike situations and substantially impair the employees' right to strike by adding to the risk of replacement the risk of loss of the bargaining representative as soon as replacements equal in number to the strikers are willing to cross the picket line."[5] Thus, we declined "to maintain or create any presumptions" concerning the union sentiments of strike replacements, stating that we would "review the facts of each case, but [would] require 'some further evidence of union non-support' before concluding that an employer's claim of good-faith doubt of the union's majority is sufficient to rebut the overall presumption of continuing majority status."[6]

The judge found the Pennco presumption rebutted here by evidence that: (1) the replacements were aware that the Union was "not bargaining for them" and that the Union was seeking their discharge; (2) some employees had approached the Respondent's president about how to get rid of the Union; and (3) there were some flat tires and incidents of verbal abuse of replacements crossing the picket lines. Even in the absence of the now rejected Pennco presumption, however, those factors are insufficient to support the Respondent's asserted good-faith doubt.

Admittedly, in Station KKHI one of the factors that the Board relied on in overruling Pennco was that

> . . . replacements' attitude towards union representation may be influenced by [the awareness of the union's primary concern for the strikers' welfare rather than that of the replacements], which in turn undermines the basis for an evidentiary presumption of support for the union.[7]

Nevertheless, as noted, we declined to adopt a presumption that these replacements oppose union representation. In this regard, unions often demand, at least in the first instance, that the replacements be discharged and the strikers rehired. Frequently, as in the instant case, the union's position may be modified in the course of the negotiations on the issues underlying the strike.[8] Indeed, in the instant case, as the strike wore on, the Union took a progressively weaker position until, at the bargaining session of October 23, it requested only that the Respondent discharge those replacements (about 32 out of 201 total replacements) who had not yet completed the probationary period. Moreover, here the replacements' knowledge of the Union's position was based on statements made by the Respondent's representatives at meetings held between the Respondent and nonstriking employees and on occasional letters to the employees from the Respondent's president. In a letter following the October 23 bargaining session, the Respondent stated that the session had been taken up primarily with a dispute over the right to the 217 jobs in the bargaining unit. The letter thus did not accurately reflect the position of the Union, which by that time had conceded most of the unit jobs to the replacements. Particularly inasmuch as the Respondent's letter misstated the Union's position in a manner likely to influence replacements against the Union, we do not rely on the replacement employees' purported awareness of the Union's position on reinstatement in assessing the Respondent's asserted good-faith doubt.

[1] The judge also found that the Respondent, in concluding that the antiunion employees outnumbered the prounion employees, properly relied on a statement by the union representative that of the striking employees "approximately 30 percent" would not seek reinstatement. We find it unnecessary to rely on this finding of the judge since even assuming that "approximately 30 percent" of the strikers did not support union representation, as set forth below, the Respondent has not established a good-faith doubt that a majority of all the employees were of that view.

Concerning the expression of replacement employee opposition to the Union, the judge noted that this consideration is supported only by the Respondent's president's testimony that some employees had voiced antiunion sentiments. The judge himself properly concluded (JD at fn. 26) that such "[u]nqualified, nonspecific testimony . . . has been rejected as valueless." In any event, the testimony did little to further the argument that the Respondent had an objective basis for counting all of the replacements in the antiunion camp.[9]

Finally, the judge properly noted that the picket line misconduct and harassment here was "much less extreme" than that in I T Services[10] and that no one had shown that the Union was "in any way responsible." The misconduct alleged here consisted of 12 nails found in the Respondent's driveway, 425 dollars' worth of damage to the tires of nonstriking employees and some undefined picket line incidents that the Respondent's president testified had been reported to supervisors by nonstriking employees. No employee testified in this regard. These incidents of picket line misconduct cannot be equated to the "pervasive" violence present in I T Services and are insufficient to justify the conclusion that the 201 replacements opposed the Union.

In view of the foregoing, we find that the Respondent did not possess objective considerations when it concededly withdrew recognition of the Union and, accordingly, that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. Furthermore, because the Respondent's subsequent refusal to execute the collective-bargaining agreement it had negotiated with the Union was premised on its withdrawal of recognition, we find that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act in refusing to execute that agreement.

AMENDED CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

Substitute the following for the judge's Conclusion of Law 2 and add Conclusion of Law 3.

"2. Dold violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act when it withdrew recognition of Local 340 on November 2, 1982.

"3. Dold violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act when, on or after November 4, 1982, it refused to execute the collective-bargaining agreement it had negotiated with Local 340."

AMENDED REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) by withdrawing recognition from the Union and refusing to execute the agreed-on collective-bargaining agreement, we shall order the Respondent, in addition to adopting those remedies provided in the remedy section of the judge's decision, to cease and desist from the unfair labor practices found, and to take the following affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. The Respondent shall be ordered to recognize and, on request, bargain with Local 340 as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of its employees. The Respondent shall also be ordered to execute the collective-bargaining agreement negotiated with Local 340. We shall also order the Respondent to make all affected unit employees whole for losses they may have incurred by virtue of the Respondent's unlawful conduct in the manner set forth in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), plus interest on any amount due paid in the manner prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded.[11] Further, the Respondent shall make whole employees for any losses they may have suffered by its failure to execute the collective-bargaining agreement with backpay, if any, computed in accordance with Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 682 (1970), with interest computed in accordance with New Horizons for the Retarded, supra.

---

[9] See, e.g., Cail's Generators & Armature Co., 237 NLRB 1198, 1199 fn. 7, and 1201 (1978). With respect to the union's request for the discharge of replacements and asserted antiunion sentiments voiced by unidentified employees, we find, as did the judge, that the facts here are less compelling than those in I T Services, 263 NLRB 1183 (1982). In any event, as noted in Johns-Manville Sales Corp., supra at fn. 10, we would weigh these factors differently than did the judge in I T Services.

[10] The judge in I T Services set forth in detail the violence which occurred there, noting the apparently racial character of some of the invective, and found that some of the violence occurred in the presence of the union president or was committed by union picket captains.

[11] In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Dold Foods, Inc., Wichita, Kansas, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discouraging membership in or lawful strike activity on behalf of United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL–CIO & CLC, District Local 340, or any other labor organization, by unlawfully failing to recall striking employees to existing vacancies on the labor organization's unconditional offer, on behalf of such employees, to return to work.

(b) Failing and refusing to recognize and bargain with Local 340, on its request, as the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit.

(c) Refusing to execute the collective-bargaining agreement negotiated with Local 340 as the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit.

(d) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Make whole, with interest, any employee whose recall was delayed by reason of Dold's unlawful acts.

(b) Recognize and, on request, bargain with Local 340 as the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit.

(c) Execute the collective-bargaining agreement negotiated with Local 340 as the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit and give it retroactive effect.

(d) Make whole employees for any loss of wages or other employment benefits they may have suffered by reason of its refusal to execute the collective-bargaining agreement in the manner and with interest as described in the remedy section of the decision.

(e) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(f) Post at its facility in Wichita, Kansas, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[12] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 17, after being signed by Dold's authorized representative, shall be posted by Dold immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Dold to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(g) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the complaint is dismissed insofar as it alleges violations of the Act not specifically found.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT discourage you from membership in, or participating in lawful strike activity on behalf of, United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL–CIO & CLC, District Local 340, or any other labor organization, by unlawfully refusing to recall striking employees to existing vacancies in accordance with their Union's unconditional offer, made on their behalf, to return to work.

WE WILL NOT refuse to recognize and bargain with Local 340 as the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit.

WE WILL NOT refuse to execute the collective-bargaining agreement negotiated with Local 340 as the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit.

---

[12] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

We will not in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

We will make whole those employees who engaged in the March 1 through November 8, 1982 strike against us and whose recalls were delayed by reason of our unlawful acts by reimbursing them for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from the delay in recall, less any net interim earnings, plus interest.

We will, on request, bargain with Local 340 as the exclusive representative of our employees in the bargaining unit.

We will execute the collective-bargaining agreement negotiated with Local 340 as the exclusive representative of our employees in the appropriate unit and give it retroactive effect.

We will make whole, with interest, employees for any loss of wages or other employment benefits they may have suffered by reason or our refusal to execute the collective-bargaining agreement.

Stephen E. Wamser, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Joseph P. Carey, Esq., of White Plains, New York, for the Respondent.

DECISION

Statement of the Case

Stephen J. Gross, Administrative Law Judge. Respondent Dold Foods, Inc. operates a food processing plant in Wichita, Kansas. Dold and United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL-CIO & CLC, District Local 340, as representative of Dold's production, distribution, and maintenance employees, were parties to a collective-bargaining agreement that expired in November 1981. Bargaining toward a new contract began in October 1981. But the employees became dissatisfied with the results of the bargaining, and in March 1982 most of Dold's employees went out on strike. Bargaining between Dold and Local 340 continued. Meanwhile Dold replaced the striking workers with new employees.

About 8 months after the strike began Local 340 concluded that the strike was lost. It thereupon offered to accept the Company's remaining contract terms and, on behalf of the strikers, offered to have the striking employees return to work. At issue here are the nature and timing of those offers by the Union and of Dold's responses to the offers.[1] Specifically:

(1) According to the General Counsel, on October 23 and then again in early November, the Union agreed to all terms of the Company's proposed collective-bargaining agreement. (Unless otherwise specified, all events referred to in this decision occurred in 1982.) Given that agreement, claims the General Counsel, Dold was obligated to execute a written contract with the Union embodying its terms. Dold has refused to do so.

(2) If the Union unconditionally offered to return the strikers to work, Dold came under an obligation to fill job openings with the employees who had been striking, and to do so in order of seniority. The General Counsel contends that Local 340 did make that kind of unconditional offer and that Dold failed to respond appropriately.

My conclusions about these contentions are that Local 340 did not in fact accept Dold's contract proposals on October 23; and that while the Union subsequently did purport to accept Dold's proposals, Dold was not required to respond to the Union's acceptance because by then Dold had come to believe, based on appropriate considerations, that Local 340 did not represent a majority of Dold's employees. On the other hand, in early November Dold did wrongfully fail to honor the Union's bona fide offer to return the striking employees to work.[2]

A. Did the Union Accept Dold's Contract Offer on October 23

Attorney Frank Hylton represents Local 340 in its dealings with Dold. Joseph Carey, also an attorney, represents Dold on labor matters. Hylton and Carey met privately on October 23 at a hotel in Wichita. Five Dold officials—all members of Dold's negotiating committee—were also present in the hotel. From time to time Carey would report back to that committee about his conversations with Hylton and would receive instructions from the committee. After the completion of Hylton and Carey's private discussions, Hylton and Union Business Agent Phillip Immesote met with Carey and Dold's negotiating committee.

A couple of things about the events of October 23 are clear. One has to do with a Dold contract proposal regarding an employee pension plan. Dold had earlier proposed that its employee pension plan be changed in various ways. Hylton had expressed concern that such changes might be unlawful and might therefore open both Dold and Local 340 to legal action by employees. Hylton had said he would look into the matter. At the October 23 meeting Hylton told Dold's representatives that he had not yet satisfied his concerns about the pension problems, but that he would do so soon and advise Carey of his conclusion.

It is also clear that in the course of the meeting Hylton asked that the parties meet again as soon as possible. In response to that request the parties agreed to hold a meeting on November 3.

What is less clear is whether at any time during the course of the October 23 meeting, or during the telephone calls setting up the meeting, any representative of the Union agreed to accept the Company's terms for the collective-bargaining agreement. Hylton testified that he said that the Union was accepting the last proposal by the Company, first in the premeeting telephone conversations and then privately to Carey during the October 23 meeting. Carey flatly denied Hylton's contention. All the members of Dold's committee testified. In no case does their description of the October 23 negotiations refer to any acceptance by the Union of Dold's contract proposals. Immesote (the union official) did not testify.

[1] This proceeding began on November 8, 1982, with the filing of a charge by Local 340 in Case 17-CA-11309. The Union filed a second charge, Case 17-CA-11309-2, on December 1 and then amended it on December 7. A complaint and order consolidating cases were issued on December 23.

[2] Certain errors in the transcript have been noted and corrected.

As will be discussed more fully below, my conclusion is that no representative of Local 340 stated to Dold that the Union accepted Dold's contract proposals. Assuming that a union representative had made such a statement, it is evident that no contract existed when the October 23 meeting closed. The point is that Hylton had previously, specifically voiced concern about Dold's pension plan proposal and then, on October 23, said that he had not yet looked into the matter, that his concerns remained, that he would undertake to resolve the matter soon, and that he would call Carey as soon as it was resolved. There is simply no way to square that kind of behavior with a purported acceptance of all of Dold's terms. That is particularly obvious since on October 23 there were only two Dold proposals left to discuss: One involving medical insurance, and the pension plan proposal that Hylton said he wanted to consider further. All other contract provisions had either already been agreed to or had been unilaterally implemented by Dold on the ground that impasse had been reached.

B. Did a Union-Dold Contract Come into Being on October 26

Hylton telephoned Carey on October 26 to say that he had determined that Dold's adoption of its pension plan proposal would be unobjectionable. That raises the question of whether Hylton had ever said that Local 340 accepted Dold's most recent contract proposals. If Hylton had said that, arguably a contract between Dold and Local 340 would have come into being when Hylton told Dold that he no longer objected to the pension plan change. As I add up the evidence, as late as October 26 Hylton had never told Dold that Local 340 accepted Dold's contract proposals. (In November Local 340 did communicate just such a message to Dold, which will be covered later in this decision.)

First, nothing in the record suggests that Hylton should be credited over Carey in the case of conflicts in their testimony. Rather, Carey was more credible than Hylton. Hylton had significant memory lapses; Carey did not. Carey's version of events was often supported by other witnesses; Hylton's was not.

Second, if Hylton, on behalf of Local 340, had told Carey that the Union accepted Dold's contract proposals, one would expect Hylton to have asked for confirmation that a contract had been agreed on—first from Carey during the premeeting telephone calls; then from Carey at the meeting on October 23; then from Dold's committee on October 23; and finally from Carey during the telephone conversation of October 26—but Hylton never did so.

Third, the Union at no point provided Dold with a written contract to execute.

Fourth, during the course of the October 23 meeting the parties agreed, at the Union's request, to hold another meeting on November 3. The Union did not indicate why it wanted that meeting; however, the request for the meeting suggests that the union representatives thought that there was more to be accomplished before a contract could be signed.

C. Was Dold Justified in Doubting That Local 340 Represented a Majority of the Bargaining Unit Employees

On November 2 Dold called the Union to cancel the November 3 meeting. Dold has continued to refuse to meet with Local 340 and has refused to enter into a collective-bargaining agreement with the Union even though the Union sent a telegram to Dold on November 4 specifically accepting all of Dold's contract proposals. The General Counsel argues that Dold has thereby failed to satisfy its obligation to bargain with the Union and has accordingly violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. Dold, however, contends that since at least as far back as November 2 it has had good reason to believe that Local 340 does not represent a majority of Dold's bargaining unit employees. If Dold did believe, in good faith, that Local 340 had lost its majority status and, further, if that belief was based on "sufficient objective considerations," Dold was under no obligation to enter into a collective-bargaining agreement with the Union or to bargain with the Union at all.[3] The burden is on Dold to prove such "objective considerations," and "the burden is a heavy one."[4]

Employee categories—strikers, union members who did not strike, returned strikers, and replacements: As of early November, 229 Dold employees were working in bargaining unit jobs, as follows:

> Members of the bargaining unit at the time the strike began but who continued to work—12 employees
> Members of the bargaining unit who went out on strike but who subsequently abandoned the strike and returned to work—16 employees
> Employees hired by Dold after the strike began as permanent replacements for the strikers—201 employees

In March 1982, 221 employees had gone out on strike.[5] As indicated in the table above, however, 16 of the striking employees later abandoned the strike. That meant that as of early November there were a maximum of 205 strikers; however, according to Dold's president, Steven Ritter, far fewer then 205 employees then remained on strike. Ritter based that view on an assertion made by Union Business Agent Immesote. As of September, Immesote reported, 30 percent of the Dold employees then out on strike had abandoned any interest in their jobs at Dold.

[5] As of March 1, 1982, Dold employed 233 bargaining unit employees. As noted above, 12 of those employees never participated in the strike.

Ritter testified that not long after Immesote made that remark, he began to focus on whether the Union represented a majority of the Company's employees. Ritter proceeded on the following assumptions.

1. The striking employees remained members of Dold's bargaining unit, but only if they intended to return to work at Dold.[6]

2. Given Immesote's statement, only 144 strikers (70 percent of 205) ought to be deemed to be part of the bargaining unit.

3. All of those 144 strikers could be assumed to be in favor of representation by Local 340.[7]

4. The 12 employees who, though members of the bargaining unit on March 1, never went out on strike, should also be deemed to support Local 340.[8]

5. Similarly, the 16 strikers who subsequently abandoned the strike had to be deemed supporters of Local 340.[9]

6. As for the 201 employees hired since the beginning of the strike as permanent replacements, on the other hand, Ritter took the position that all could be assumed to oppose representation by Local 340.

Under those assumptions, while 172 members of the bargaining unit still favored representation by Local 340, 201 employees—a clear majority—opposed representation by Local 340. Thus, if the assumptions that Ritter made on the way to arriving at his totals were appropriate ones, Dold did not violate Section 8(a)(5). Two of those assumptions merit scrutiny: First, the assumption that 30 percent of the strikers could be deemed not part of the bargaining unit on the basis of Immesote's remark; and second, the assumption that all 201 replacement employees opposed representation by Local 340.

Immesote's 30-percent figure: A striker loses his membership in the bargaining unit if he abandons his interest in returning to his former job.[10] Strikers are presumed to retain an interest in returning to their jobs unless there is evidence to the contrary.[11] The question is whether Dold had sufficient grounds to reasonably conclude that, as of early November, 30 percent of the strikers no longer wanted to return to work at Dold.

As noted earlier, Ritter concluded that over 60 strikers had abandoned any intention to return to Dold. That conclusion was based on a remark that Union Business Agent Immesote made to Ritter in September during the course of a telephone conversation. Immesote did not testify; however, according to Ritter's undisputed testimony, Immesote—> reported 30 percent of the people will not return to work for one reason or another. I think he mentioned that some had retired and some had moved out of the state, some had taken other jobs, and some had no intention of returning to Dold Foods.[12]

It is not altogether clear that Dold had the right to rely on Immesote's statement in determining whether Local 340 represented a majority of the bargaining unit employees. For one thing, Immesote made it clear to Ritter that the 30-percent figure was an approximate one.[13] For another, given the context of the conversation, it is possible that Immesote deliberately used an inflated figure. (Immesote wanted Ritter to agree to recall the striking employees, even if that meant displacing the replacement employees. Immesote's purpose in reporting that many strikers would not be returning to Dold was to indicate to Ritter that even if Dold did recall all the striking employees, not all the replacement employees would have to be laid off.)

Nonetheless I think Ritter made appropriate use of Immesote's remark. Immesote represented the striking employees and could be expected to be in a better position than anyone else to know about the individual strikers' circumstances and future plans. Moreover at the time Immesote made the remark the strike had lasted 7 months, it had been unsuccessful at shutting Dold down, and all or nearly all the strikers had been replaced. Given that situation one would expect that some of the strikers would have chosen to leave Dold permanently.

(The above numbers are taken from the testimony of a Dold witness. Other evidence provides somewhat different numbers. See, e.g., Jt. Exh. 15. But the differences are immaterial.)

[6] Striking employees remain members of the bargaining unit, whether they have been replaced, as do replaced exstrikers who are awaiting job openings in order to return to their former employment. See, e.g., Bio-Science Laboratories v. NLRB, 542 F.2d 505 (9th Cir. 1976), enfg. 213 NLRB 171 (1974). As will be discussed in more detail below, however, strikers who abandon interest in returning to their former jobs thereby lose their membership in the bargaining unit.

[12] The question of whether an employee has abandoned his job (for purposes of determining bargaining unit status) hinges on the employee's intent. Evidence of actions such as moving beyond commuting distance, retirement, and accepting a permanent position elsewhere is commonly found to show the requisite intent: See, e.g., Belt Supermarket, supra.

[13] In Randle-Eastern Ambulance Service, 230 NLRB 542 (1977), enfd. in part 584 F.2d 720 (5th Cir. 1978), a union official had told the employer that "50 to 25 or 20 percent" of the strikers would not be returning to work. The Board refused to take that statement into account in determining whether the employer had a reasonable basis for doubting the union's majority status. That ruling was based at least in part on factors not present here (such as the fact that some of the strikers who purportedly abandoned their employment at the employer might have done so because of the employer's unfair labor practices). See 230 NLRB at 552, reversed on this point 584 F.2d at 728–729.

Immesote's figure merely provided a specific—and not surprising—figure for Ritter to work with.[14]

The union views of the replacement employees: To recapitulate, Dold President Ritter assumed that, as of the end of October 1982, all persons who had been employed by the Company just as the strike began and who remained members of the bargaining unit—172 in all—remained in favor of representation by Local 340. All 201 replacement employees, said Ritter, could be assumed to oppose representation by that Union. Dold's defense, therefore, hinges on Ritter's assumption about the replacement employees' views concerning representation by Local 340.

D. Current Board Law

The most clear-cut striker replacement situation is where the employer claims that employees hired to replace strikers, and who had to cross a picket line to get to work, should be assumed, without any further information, to be opposed to representation by the incumbent union. Given those bare facts, the Board will reject the employer's claim and instead presume that the replacement employees "support the [incumbent union] in the same ratio as those whom they have replaced."[15] Moreover, the Board has adopted the same position even where additional facts increase the possibility that the replacement employees do not favor representation by the incumbent union. In Pennco, for example, the replacements not only had to cross a picket line, on occasion they were met by violence from the strikers. According to the Board, however, "the occurrence of some violence on the picket line is, at best, one factor weakening the presumption of majority status but not alone rebutting it."[16]

In Randle-Eastern some of the striker replacements encountered violence at the picket line and, in addition, at the bargaining table the union demanded that the replacements be laid off to make room for the strikers. Yet there too the Board concluded that the replacements "are presumed to support the union in the same ratio as those whom they have replaced."[17]

In I T Services, however, the Board ruled in the employer's favor. The issue again was whether the employer could presume that replacement employees opposed representation by the incumbent union. In I T Services, apart from the fact that the replacement employees had to cross a picket line to get to work: (1) the union demanded that the replacements be discharged, the replacement employees knew of that demand, and the union made the demand even though "[T]here was room for the strikers even if no replacements were let go";[18] (2) a company dispatcher testified that with minor exception "each of the strike[r] replacements . . . told him that they did not want the union to represent them";[19] and (3) "almost on a daily basis" the replacement employees were subjected to threats, racially oriented taunts, and violence by strikers, sometimes under circumstances indicating that the union supported those acts.

The Board concluded that, given all these circumstances, the employer "had an adequate objective basis to support a good-faith doubt of the Union's majority."

E. The Facts at Hand

Dold does not take issue with cases such as Windham and Pennco. Rather, the Company argues that Ritter's conclusions about the anti-Local 340 views of the replacement employees was warranted given the facts at hand and the Board's view as expressed in I T Services.

Local 340's demand that replacement employees be fired. About 10 weeks into the strike (in May 1982) the Union demanded that "all permanent replacement employees be fired to make room for striking employees if a contract is ever signed."[20] Dold advised all of its employees—strikers and nonstrikers—of that position.

As touched on earlier, by September the Union had changed its position. It then asked only that sufficient replacement employees be displaced to make room for the 144 or so strikers still interested in returning to Dold. Finally, during the last bargaining session (on October 23), the Union again asked that sufficient replacement employees be let go to make room for the strikers.[21] That, however, was merely a pro forma request. Local 340's main argument at that bargaining session was that Dold should displace the 32 replacement employees who were still in a probationary status to make room for a like number of strikers.

Dold's subsequent letter to employees stated:

> At the October 23 Session most of the time was spent . . . on the subject of who has the legal right to hold the 217 jobs in the bargaining unit. Manage-

[14] Ritter testified that, once the Company did begin recalling strikers, 34 percent failed to return to work as they were recalled. That, suggested Ritter, confirmed Immesote's 30-percent estimate. But that 34-percent figure was developed considerably after Dold stopped bargaining with Local 340. It accordingly sheds no light on whether Dold based its refusal to bargain on appropriate grounds. See I T Services, 263 NLRB 1183 (1982); Pennco, Inc., supra, 250 NLRB at 718 fn. 16.

See S & M Mfg. Co., 172 NLRB 1008 (1968). ("As the only employees then working were . . . newly hired employees who had crossed the picket line to go to work and who are not shown to have manifested their support for the Union, it cannot be found that there were any union adherents among the employees working [on the date in issue]"); *Titan Metal Mfg. > ment, once again, repeated that no permanent replacement employees will lose their jobs to returning strikers.[22]

Statements by employees: According to Ritter, nonstriking employees repeatedly asked "how do we get rid of the union and how do we have a vote."[23] Ritter did not specify how many employees made such comments nor, with one exception, did he identify the employees involved. No employees testified on this (or any other) subject.[24]

Violence. On 12 separate occasions Dold officials found nails on the company driveways near the picket line. Dold reimbursed various nonstriking employees a total of $425 for damage to tires resulting from picket line actions. Dold received 47 or 48 reports of strikers doing minor damage to nonstriking employees' automobiles, and of threats and verbal abuse by strikers.

Statements by the Union about whom it represented: At a bargaining session on October 13, a union official said that "they [the union negotiators] do not care about the permanent replacement employees and that they are not bargaining for them."[25] Dold told all of its employees about that statement.

F. Conclusion—Dold's Belief About the Views of the Replacement Employees

How the facts here compare to I T Services: In I T Services, the strikers' attempt to intimidate the replacement employees and the violence the strikers directed against them was pervasive. And the Union itself supported at least some of that activity. At Dold the manifestations of striker hostility were much less extreme, and no one has shown that Local 340 was in any way responsible for any acts of striker violence.

In I T Services the union never relented in its demand that all replacement employees be terminated. Local 340 at first demanded the same of Dold. Then, as the strike drew to an end, the Union virtually suggested that 30 percent of the replacement employees be kept on. The Union ultimately retreated to the position that the Company need discharge only those 32 replacement employees who were so new at Dold as to still be in a probationary status.

Finally, in I T Services an employee credibly testified that almost all the replacement employees had said that they opposed representation by the Union. Here we have only Ritter's testimony that some unspecified number of Dold employees had asked how they might get rid of the Union.[26]

In sum, I T Services in no way compels the conclusion that Dold had sufficient basis to warrant the conclusion that Local 340 lacked a majority support. Nonetheless, I think that the facts add up to so high a probability that Dold's replacement employees opposed representation by Local 340 that Dold's position on the matter should be upheld.

The Factual Issue: Dold's contentions raise two broad questions. First, purely as a factual matter is it likely that the replacement employees opposed Local 340. Second, even assuming that the replacement employees did oppose representation by the Union, should the Board nonetheless reject Dold's contention on the ground that accepting them would conflict with the purposes of the Act.

Turning to the factual issue, because only a scattering of employees expressed their views on the subject to Dold officials, Dold had no direct evidence of how the replacement employees as a whole felt about representation by Local 340. But given the facts of the strike, it clearly is more likely that the replacement employees opposed representation by Local 340 more than they favored it.

The Policies Underlying the Act: As touched on above, however, that is not the end of the matter. In cases such as Pennco, the Board's rejection of employer contentions about the views of replacement employees did not rest exclusively, or even primarily, on a determination that the replacement employees in fact probably preferred representation by the incumbent union. Rather, the Board's decisions focus on what kind of rule would best further the policies of the Act. Specifically, in Pennco the Board pointed out that permitting an employer to question union majority support on the ground that replacements for strikers can be assumed to oppose union representation "would effectively impair" the right to strike and would "disturb the delicate balance of competing weapons which the Board and the courts have recognized in the labor relations arena."[27] Similarly, in Mobile Home Estates the Board concluded that it would "not presume the replacements do not support a strike" because "to do so would be to overburden the right to strike because, if that were the guide, . . . an employer could refuse to recognize the union any time there was a strike and replacements."[28]

Given the policies expressed in Pennco, it may be that employers should be permitted to act on the belief that all of their replacement employees oppose the incumbent union only if each of the replacements has said so. If that is the law then, of course, Dold did not have an adequate basis on which to found its position about the minority status of Local 340.

[22] Letter dated October 25, 1982, Jt. Exh. 19 (emphasis in original). The letter is wrong in stating that the Union contended that the strikers had "the legal right" to all 217 bargaining unit jobs. That contention was made only in respect to the 32 positions held by the probationary employees. Given the Union's request that sufficient replacement employees be displaced to make room for all strikers who wanted to return, the error is insubstantial.

[23] Tr. 185; see also Tr. 200.

[24] Dold employees filed a decertification petition on November 19, 1982. That occurred after Dold refused to bargain with Local 340 and accordingly is irrelevant to whether Dold had sufficient basis to doubt Local 340's majority status. See I T Services, supra. Moreover a decertification petition does not, in itself, provide a basis for doubting a union's majority status. Walker Die Casting v. NLRB, 682 F.2d 592 (6th Cir. 1982); Taurus Waste Disposal, 263 NLRB 309 (1982).

[25] The quote is from Dold's October 25 letter to employees, supra. Ritter testified that union officials repeatedly made such statements. No party denies the accuracy of the statement in the letter or of Ritter's testimony on the subject.

[26] Unquantified, nonspecific testimony about employees' statements opposing union representation has been rejected as valueless. Seeburg Corp., supra. (Seeburg involved union members who refused to participate in a strike, or who abandoned it. It did not involve replacement employees. For purposes of evaluating Ritter's testimony about employee comments, the difference is inconsequential.)

I read cases such as Pennco and I T Services as holding only that: (1) as noted earlier, the burden on an employer to prove its claims about the antiunion views of replacement employees "is a heavy one,"[29] so that such claims should be considered with caution and perhaps, skepticism; and (2) for the employer to prevail, the facts of the case must virtually compel the conclusion that the replacement employees oppose the incumbent union. My conclusion is that Dold meets this test—but only barely. The closeness of the question hinges on the fact that there were only 201 replacement employees, during the time in question, versus 172 employees who, under the requisite presumptions, must be considered to have supported Local 340. That means that if only 15 replacement employees favored representation by Local 340, the Union had the support of a majority of the employees.

Here we have a statement by the incumbent union that it does "not care about the permanent replacement employees" and that it is "not bargaining for them." Given the emotions generated by strikes, that viewpoint on the part of Local 340's officials is understandable and, perhaps, inevitable. That, however, does not make the statement less offensive to replacement employees who had to have reacted bitterly to it. In sum, here we have an announced union position calculated to make an enemy of each of the replacement employees, together with union demands that the replacements be displaced to make way for the strikers plus property damage and other unpleasantness suffered by the replacements as they crossed the picket line. Even taking into account the policies expressed in Pennco, that, as I see it, adds up to a showing by Dold that its doubt about Local 340's status was based on convincing objective considerations.

G. Other Matters Pertaining to Dold's Refusal to Bargain

Dold's Good Faith: Dold first announced its doubt about Local 340's majority status in early November. Yet nothing had occurred at or near that time that was relevant to the issue of the extent of employee support for the Union. I accordingly have considered whether Dold in fact had a good-faith doubt about Local 340's status. Having considered the matter, I find that Dold did. Dold was not required to announce its doubt at its earliest opportunity. I credit Ritter's testimony that at the time Dold announced its doubt, and at all relevant times thereafter, Ritter believed that Local 340 was not supported by a majority of the bargaining unit.

Did Dold's representation petition temporarily relieve Dold of the duty to bargain?: On November 3 Dold petitioned the Board for an election on the ground that it doubted the majority status of Local 340. (The Board's decision in that matter will be discussed below.) On November 4 Dold wrote Local 340 to say that "it is the employer's position that from the filing of any petition with the NLRB under Section 9 of the Act, further acts of collective bargaining are inappropriate pending resolution of the question concerning representation raised by such petition." Dold's pleadings present a similar claim—that the pendency of its representation petition freed it from any obligation it otherwise would have had to bargain with Local 340.

The short answer to Dold's contention is that the pendency of an employer's representation petition is irrelevant to the employer's duty to bargain. N. T. Enloe Memorial Hospital, 682 F.2d 790 (9th Cir. 1982), enfg. 250 NLRB 583, 587–588 (1980); Cornell of California, 222 NLRB 303, 307 (1976). Until July 1982 the filing of a representation petition by an outside union required the employer to cease bargaining with the incumbent. Shea Chemical Corp., 121 NLRB 1027 (1958); however, that changed in July 1982. Since then the filing of such a petition has not relieved an employer of its duty to bargain. RCA Del Caribe, 262 NLRB 963 (1982). Similarly, before September 30, 1982, the filing by employees of a decertification petition stayed an employer's duty to bargain. Telautograph Corp., 199 NLRB 892 (1972). Since that date employers have been required to bargain with the incumbent union notwithstanding the pendency of a decertification petition. Dresser Industries, 264 NLRB 1088 (1982). Thus, even if an employer's representation petition were to be considered similar, for present purposes, to a representation petition filed by employees or by a rival union, Dold's petition itself would not have relieved Dold of its bargaining duties.

Res judicata questions: An employer has two ways in which to test the validity of its belief that the incumbent union has lost majority support. One is to refuse to bargain and await the unfair labor practice proceeding that is likely to follow. Dold did that and that is what this case is about. The second is to file a representation petition. As just noted, Dold also did that.

The standards in the two kinds of proceedings are the same.[30] That is: (1) if an employer has an adequate basis for believing that the Union has lost its majority status, then the employer also has an adequate basis for obtaining a Board order requiring an election (and vice versa); and (2) if an employer's claimed basis for refusing to bargain is insufficient to avoid a finding that the employer has violated the Act then, similarly, there are insufficient grounds to grant the employer's election petition (and vice versa).

Dold supported its election petition with many of the documents and factual allegations it presented here—including the fact that Dold had hired numerous replacement employees and that 30 percent of the employees who had gone out on strike no longer were interested in returning to Dold.

The Board's Regional Director for Region 17 dismissed Dold's petition on November 16. According to the Regional Director:

> . . . it does not appear that further processing of this petition is warranted. The evidence relied upon by the Employer as objective considerations is in> sufficient to establish that a question concerning representation exists. Thus, barring evidence to the contrary, new employees, including striker replacements, are presumed to support the Union in the same ratio as those whom they have replaced. See, e.g., Windham Community Memorial Hospital, 230 NLRB 1070.

After unsuccessfully seeking reconsideration of that Order by the Regional Director, Dold appealed to the Board. But the Board affirmed the dismissal:

> Having duly considered the matter, the Board concluded that the allegations in Employer-Petitioner's request for review of the Regional Director's administrative dismissal of the instant petition are insufficient to warrant reversal of the Regional Director's action. Accordingly, dismissal of the petition is hereby affirmed.

Given these circumstances, I have focused on whether I should refuse to consider any of the evidence in this proceeding and, instead, rely on the outcome of the representation proceeding to conclude that Dold's refusal to bargain was unlawful. On the face of it, after all, Dold had its opportunity in the representation proceeding to present its case about Local 340's status and accordingly should be precluded from litigating here anything it claimed, or could have claimed, in that proceeding. At least one Board decision arguably supports that approach. General Marine Transport Corp., 238 NLRB 1372 (1978), enf. denied on other grounds 619 F.2d 180 (2d Cir. 1980).

The difficulty with finding against Dold on res judicata grounds is that that issue has not been litigated: None of the parties opted to argue the question (or even mention it) either in their prehearing pleadings, or at the hearing, or on brief. And beyond that, it is not entirely clear that the Board should preclude an employer from fully litigating an unfair labor practice claim of the kind here under consideration solely because of an earlier representation proceeding. Clothing Workers v. NLRB, 365 F.2d 898 (D.C. Cir. 1966).

For these reasons—the issue was not litigated and the outcome of cases such as Clothing Workers—I have refrained from passing on the impact here of the Board's ruling on Dold's representation petition.

H. Dold's Refusal to Honor the Union's Offer to Return the Strikers to Work

An economic striker is entitled to full reinstatement to his former job or to a substantially equivalent job on his, or his representative's, unconditional offer to return to work. If an employer has hired permanent replacements for the strikers, the employer need not discharge the replacements to make room for the returning strikers. But the employer must, when and if a job becomes available for which the striker is qualified, offer him that job.[31] A union is a representative of striking employees for such purposes, and accordingly an employer must honor an unconditional offer to return to work made on behalf of strikers by their union.

According to the General Counsel, on three separate occasions Local 340 made an unconditional offer, on behalf of the strikers, for their return to work. The dates: October 23, and November 4 and 11. The General Counsel claims that Dold failed to respond appropriately to those offers and that Dold thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. Dold agrees that it did not reinstate any employee in response to any offer by Local 340. But according to Dold, the Union at no time made an unconditional offer for the return of the striking employees.

The period October 23 to November 4: The General Counsel argues that at the October 23 meeting representatives of Local 340 made an unconditional offer to return to work on behalf of the striking employees. Dold denies that the Union made any such offer during that meeting. The evidence supports Dold.

To begin with, even if the testimony of the General Counsel's witness—Hylton—is taken at face value, the Union made no unconditional offer at that October 23 meeting. Hylton repeatedly testified that he was the only one to speak for the Union on the subject at the meeting, and the only words he used that could be construed to be such an offer were, "We are going to put the people back to work."[32]

As of October 23 the strike was still in progress, with pickets maintaining an around-the-clock vigil outside Dold's plant; the Union had not agreed to Dold's contract terms; and another bargaining session had been set (for November 3). In those circumstances, Hylton's comment, couched in the future tense, and with the word "unconditional" conspicuously absent, would not have amounted to an unconditional offer to return to work, even if Hylton's testimony on the subject was accurate.[33]

In any case, I do not think that any union representative said anything about returning the employees to work either at the October 23 meeting itself or during the telephone conversations setting up the meeting. Carey flatly denied hearing any such statement. None of the members of Dold's negotiating team testified that Hylton (or Union Business Agent Immesote) said anything about returning the employees to work. Hylton's memory was spotty. Nothing about the circumstances of the meeting and its aftermath, taken as a whole, suggest that Local 340 made an unconditional offer during the course of the October 23 meeting to return the strikers to work.

The period subsequent to November 4: On November 4 Local 340 sent the following telegram to Dold:

[31] Laidlaw Corp., 171 NLRB 1366 (1968), enfd. 414 F.2d 99 (7th Cir. 1969), cert. denied 397 U.S. 920 (1970).

[32] Tr. 88-89. See also Tr. 49, "We were going to . . . put the people back to work," and Tr. 37, "We were going to return the people back to work."

[33] At one place in his testimony Hylton did say that he had told Carey, during the course of an October 20 telephone conversation, that "we're going to return the employees unconditionally to work." Tr. 28. But that claim about the use of the word "unconditionally" is particularly hard to credit, if only because it is so badly outnumbered by Hylton's other statements about what he said.

> [Local 340] accepts the employer's most recent proposals. The strikers hereby officially offer to return to work unconditionally. Your immediate response is expected and requested.

Dold responded, by telegram, that same day, indicating that it would recall strikers as vacancies arose. Despite that telegram, Dold did not treat the Union's November 4 telegram as an unconditional offer to return the strikers to work. The reason for that refusal, says Dold, is that the employees remained on strike until the morning of November 8. Dold claims that that rendered the Union's offer invalid.

A "strike" is the concerted voluntary withholding of services.[34] Accordingly an unconditional offer to return to work and a strike's continuation after the offer are inconsistent with one another.

Dold nonetheless violated the Act when it failed to honor the Union's November 4 offer to return the strikers to work. There is no doubt that picketing continued until November 8; however, picketing does not necessarily mean that the employees refuse to work.[35] Apart from the picketing, Dold had no reason to believe that the Union's unconditional offer to return the strikers to work was less than bona fide. Under the circumstances if, because of the picketing, Dold was unsure of the meaning of Local 340's offer to return the strikers to work, Dold was obligated to clarify the situation by promptly communicating with the Union. Home Insulation Service, 255 NLRB 311 (1981); Soule Glass & Glazing Co. v. NLRB, 652 F.2d 1055 (1st Cir. 1981). Dold, however, did not advise the Union of its concerns until November 11—a week after the Union's offer and 3 days after the picketing stopped. That is too long a delay. In any case, in response to Dold's November 11 message the Union immediately confirmed it's unconditional offer. Yet Dold continued to disregard the Union's offer. (During this proceeding a representative of the Union (Hylton) and the General Counsel (on brief) referred to the "strike" as continuing until November 8. Even treating that as an admission that the work stoppage continued after November 4, I think Dold was still under obligation at least to check with the Union before assuming that the Union's offer was not unconditional. W. C. McQuaide, supra; Harris-Teeter, supra. Moreover, although a Dold representative also referred to the "strike" continuing until November 8, he indicated that he meant only that the picketing continued until then: Tr. 202-203.)

Dold puts forth a second reason why, it claims, it properly treated as conditional Local 340's offer to return the strikers to work: The unfair labor practice charge filed against Dold by Local 340 on November 8.

The charge in question states, in part, that Dold violated the Act because Dold "refuses to return to work former economic strikers who have offered to return unconditionally." Dold claims that were it allowed access to the General Counsel's investigative files in the matter, it would be able to show that by the quoted phrase the Union intended to claim that once the Union made an unconditional offer to return the strikers to work, Dold came under a duty to fire any replacement employees who were still in their probationary period in order to make way for the strikers. (Dold did seek access to the relevant General Counsel files but the General Counsel denied the Company's requests.) Dold goes on from there to argue that a claim of that nature is inconsistent with an unconditional offer to return to work.

I will assume, for present purposes, that Dold's reading of Local 340's unfair labor practice charge is accurate. That is, the charge was the embodiment of a union contention that the Act required Dold to lay off the probationary employees to make room for returning strikers. That assumption, however, is of no assistance to Dold. It is true, as Dold points out, that Dold could have lawfully ignored Local 340's offer if the Union had conditioned its cessation of the strike on the displacement by Dold of any group of replacement employees; however, that has no relationship to the filing of a charge with the Board. Local 340 attached no conditions whatever to its cessation of the strike. As for the charge, a union has the right to test the lawfulness of an employer's recall procedures, and to do so by filing a charge with the Board, without thereby entitling the employer to refrain from recalling the ex-strikers. Indeed had the matter been litigated I would be obligated to find that, by failing to recall striking employees because of the Union's charge, Dold violated Section 8(a)(1) and (4). See, e.g., NLRB v. Scrivener, 405 U.S. 117 (1972); NLRB v. Globe Mfg. Co., 580 F.2d 18 (1st Cir. 1978); Vulcan-Hart Corp., 248 NLRB 1197 (1980), enfd. in part 642 F.2d 255 (8th Cir. 1981).

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Dold violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act when it failed to reinstate employees who had engaged in the strike pursuant to the unconditional offer to return to work made on November 4, 1982, by the striking employees through their representative, Local 340.

2. Dold has not otherwise been shown to have violated the Act.

THE REMEDY

As just stated, Dold wrongfully failed to treat as valid Local 340's unconditional offer of November 4 to have the strikers return to work. If Dold had treated the Union's November 4 offer as valid, some of the striking employees would have been recalled sooner than they in fact were. (Issues such as the number of such employees, their identity, and the extent of the delay of their recall shall be left for resolution in the compliance stage.) Dold will be required to make the affected employees whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits they may have suffered by reason of the Company's discrimination against them. Backpay will be computed as prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), plus interest as computed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). The Company will also be required to cease and desist from its unlawful acts, to notify its employees of the Board's Order, and to take various other actions related to the above requirements.

Geo. V. Hamilton, Inc., and/or CMD, Inc. and General Teamsters, Chauffeurs and Helpers Local 249 a/w International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL-CIO.[1] Case 6-CA-17619

July 28, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

On March 29, 1985, Administrative Law Judge Russell M. King Jr. issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions as modified and to adopt the recommended Order.

The complaint alleges (1) that Geo. V. Hamilton, Inc. and CMD, Inc. are a single employer;[2] (2) that the Respondent, a single employer, has unlawfully refused to recognize and bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative of the Respondent's warehouse employees at both its Hamilton and CMD facilities; (3) that the Respondent has refused to apply the collective-bargaining agreement between Hamilton and the Union (covering the Respondent's Hamilton warehouse employees) to the Respondent's CMD warehouse employees; (4) that the Respondent unlawfully laid off employee Joseph Welsh; and (5) that the Respondent unlawfully refused to provide the Union with requested information assertedly necessary for and relevant to the Union's performance of its function as exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in question.

The judge found that Geo. V. Hamilton, Inc. and CMD, Inc. are not a single employer; that the Union was not unlawfully denied recognition or deprived of information; and that employee Welsh was not unlawfully laid off. Thus, the judge dismissed the complaint in its entirety.

For the reasons set forth below, we find, contrary to the judge, that Geo. V. Hamilton, Inc. and CMD, Inc. are a single employer. Also for the reasons set forth below, however, and notwithstanding our finding of single-employer status, we affirm the judge's conclusion that the Respondent did not unlawfully refuse to recognize and bargain with the Union regarding a unit of warehouse employees at both the Hamilton and CMD facilities. We further find that the Respondent did not unlawfully refuse to provide information to the Union. Finally, we agree with the judge, for the reasons set forth below, that the Respondent did not unlawfully lay off employee Welsh.

I. FACTS

Respondent Hamilton sells, distributes, and installs insulation. The Union has represented Hamilton's warehouse employees since 1973. The Hamilton warehouse employees were covered by a collective-bargaining agreement between Respondent Hamilton and the Union for the period August 1, 1982, through July 31, 1986. During the time of the 1984 events, there were two employees in the warehouse unit: Donald Martin, who worked primarily at the Hamilton facility itself, and Joseph Welsh, who worked primarily in the Shovel warehouse, a public commercial warehouse about a quarter of a mile from the Hamilton facility, in which Hamilton rented space.[3] About twice a month, Welsh went to the Hamilton facility to assist Martin in his warehousing duties; about twice a week, Martin went to the Shovel warehouse to assist Welsh in his warehousing duties. When either Martin or Welsh was on vacation, the other would cover the warehousing requirements at both locations.

Carl Geier is Respondent Hamilton's president, chief executive officer, and majority owner. In April 1984,[4] Carl Geier, his wife Marlene, and Doug Anderson, a Hamilton salesman, formed CMD, Inc., each as one-third owner, and purchased the Shovel warehouse. Carl Geier took no formal management title in CMD. Doug Anderson was named president and Marlene Geier was named secretary-treasurer. Although Anderson was nominally CMD's chief executive officer, most of his time was taken up by his job as salesman for Hamilton. Thus, according to Carl Geier, he functioned as "manager of sorts" at CMD, at least during the early months of CMD's existence, dividing his time equally between Hamilton and CMD.

CMD operated its warehouse the same way that Shovel, its previous owner, had operated it, as a public commercial warehouse, renting space to several long-term and numerous short-term tenants.

[1] On November 2, 1987, the Teamsters International Union was readmitted to the AFL-CIO. Accordingly, the caption has been amended to reflect that change.

[2] A "single employer" relationship exists when two nominally separate entities are actually part of a single-integrated enterprise so that, for all purposes, including liability for actions alleged to be in violation of the National Labor Relations Act, there is in fact only a "single employer." See NLRB v. Browning-Ferris Industries, 691 F.2d 1117 (3d Cir. 1982).

[3] Initially, this public warehouse was owned by the Shovel family. Subsequently, as discussed, infra, it was purchased by Respondent CMD.

[4] All dates are 1984 unless otherwise indicated.

289 NLRB No. 165

Hamilton continued as a long-term tenant of the Shovel (now CMD) warehouse, renting about one-quarter of the warehouse space. Indeed, Hamilton warehouse employee Welsh continued to spend most of his time in Hamilton's rented portion of the CMD warehouse. Prior to CMD's purchase of the Shovel warehouse, Shovel warehouse employees John and Dave Shovel and Hamilton warehouse employee Welsh had occasionally assisted each other in their respective tasks, primarily in unloading trucks as quickly as possible, regardless of whose customer (i.e., Hamilton's or Shovel's), in the mutual Hamilton-Shovel interest of keeping the docks open, to accommodate other trucks that were waiting to load or unload warehouse material. Following CMD's purchase of the Shovel warehouse, however, Welsh and the Shovel brothers (now CMD employees) routinely and normally worked together in servicing the entire CMD warehouse, without regard to any Hamilton-CMD space boundaries. Between the time of the April purchase and the following September, neither Hamilton nor CMD billed each other for these services; starting in September, they began to do so.

On September 10, Hamilton laid off Welsh. Carl Geier told Welsh that he was being laid off because Hamilton was subletting all its warehouse work to CMD, eliminating Welsh's job. The other Hamilton warehouse employee, Martin, continued to perform his normal warehousing duties at the Hamilton facility, apparently unaffected by this subletting.

Welsh and Union Business Agent William Barker protested Welsh's layoff to Geier. Barker argued that since the Shovel brothers were doing the same work as Welsh at the CMD warehouse, they should be considered part of the warehouse bargaining unit, in which case Welsh's seniority would preclude his being laid off ahead of either John or Dave Shovel. Barker also asked Geier for documentation of Hamilton's purported subletting of its warehouse function to CMD. Barker further asked Geier for the names of the principal officers of CMD. According to Barker, Geier "short[ly] and politely told me that it was none of my business."

On September 11, Welsh submitted his written grievance over his layoff. On September 14, Barker notified Geier by letter that the Union was giving "official written notice" of the grievance, and that it was proceeding in accordance with the grievance-arbitration provisions of the collective-bargaining agreement to the next step in the procedure—arbitration. In this context, on September 24, Barker requested in writing that Geier provide the Union with the names of the principal officers of CMD and copies of all written agreements between Hamilton and CMD. On September 26, the Union's attorney wrote to Geier requesting, in the context of Welsh's grievance over his layoff, "all documents, including contracts, entered into between [Hamilton] and CMD between August 1, 1982, and the present time for the performance of any work or services either by [Hamilton] for CMD or by CMD for [Hamilton]." This letter also requested information about the officers, stockholders, and directors of both Hamilton and CMD, "it being the Union's understanding that these are the same people or virtually the same people." The letter stated that the requested information was needed to enable the Union to process Welsh's layoff grievance because (1) it was the Union's understanding that Welsh was laid off ostensibly because Hamilton was now able to have Welsh's work done by CMD, and (2) it was the Union's contention that Hamilton and CMD were a "joint employer" of Welsh, or were "otherwise allied" with each other. The Respondent did not give the Union the information requested in these September 24 and 26 letters.

The Union continued to press for arbitration of Welsh's layoff grievance. On October 15, however, Geier notified the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service (FMCS) that Welsh's grievance was "not subject to arbitration" because (1) Welsh had been offered another job with Hamilton, which he declined, and (2) Welsh's warehouse job with Hamilton had been eliminated, "all work being sublet to CMD, Inc."

The complaint alleges that Welsh's layoff was discriminatorily motivated by his activities in support of the Union. Barker, Welsh, and Martin had been the union negotiators in the protracted (15 months) bargaining in 1982–1983, leading up to the current contract. During these negotiations, the Union filed unfair labor practice charges, and a complaint was issued alleging that Hamilton, through Geier, had failed to bargain in good faith. A settlement was reached, and the current contract was finalized in October 1983 and made retroactive to August 1, 1982. In July or August 1984, subsequent to CMD's formation and purchase of Shovel, Geier offered Welsh a change in jobs, to inventory/recordkeeping. This job was not in the bargaining unit. According to Welsh, Geier told him that, if he took this job, he would have to leave the Union, accept "company benefits," and work under a different pay scale. Welsh ultimately declined the new job. Martin and Barker also testified that at a contract negotiating session in January 1983 Geier stated that the Union had done nothing for the employees, that they should try to better themselves by moving up in the Company, and that once the Union was out he could do what he wanted. Geier denied that he threatened any employees that their advancement in the Company would be curtailed because of the Union.

II. ANALYSIS AND CONCLUSIONS

1. The judge concluded that Hamilton and CMD are not a single employer. We do not agree. In analyzing the instant single-employer issue, the judge applied "a conceptual approach, relying more on economic realities." The judge concluded, in effect, that Hamilton and CMD are not a single employer because it was unlikely that Geier formed CMD and had CMD purchase the Shovel warehouse merely as a means to rid Hamilton of its obligation to bargain with the Union about the Hamilton warehouse employees. In essence, then, the judge has found that Hamilton and CMD are not a single employer because CMD was not formed and operated for an unlawful purpose. Although we agree with the judge that CMD was not formed or operated for an unlawful purpose, we do not agree with the judge that Hamilton and CMD are not a single employer. In this regard, we do not agree with the judge's application of this "conceptual approach" to the instant single-employer issue.[5]

The standards for determining the existence of a single-employer relationship are well settled and are concisely summarized in Central Mack Sales, 273 NLRB 1268, 1271–1272 (1984), as follows:

> In determining whether two or more businesses are sufficiently integrated so that they may be fairly treated, for jurisdictional and other purposes, as a single enterprise, the Board looks to four principal factors: (1) common management; (2) centralized control of labor relations; (3) interrelation of operations; and (4) common ownership or financial control. Radio and Television Broadcast Technicians Local Union 1264 v. Broadcast Service of Mobile, Inc., 380 U.S. 255, 256 (1965); Sakrete of Northern California, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 332 F.2d 902, 905, fn. 4 (9th Cir. 1964). "The Board has determined that no single criterion is controlling, although it considers the first three, which evidence operational integration, more critical than the fourth, common ownership." N.L.R.B. v. Triumph Curing Center and M. F. Lee d/b/a Lee's Sewing Company, Inc., 571 F.2d 462, 468 (9th Cir. 1978), enfg. 222 NLRB 627 (1976).

Of the above-mentioned first three criteria relating to operational integration, particular emphasis has been placed on centralized control of labor relations. Stoll Industries, 223 NLRB 51, 54 (1976). Analyzing the facts in this case in light of the above standards, we find that Hamilton and CMD are a single employer.

Regarding common management of both Hamilton and CMD, the record establishes that Carl Geier, as president, chief executive officer, and majority owner of Hamilton, fully and closely manages that Company. Notwithstanding his lack of an official title with CMD, the record also establishes that, as one-third co-owner with his wife and Doug Anderson, Geier also effectively controls and manages CMD. Anderson's position as president of CMD appears to be no more than titular. Although neither Anderson nor CMD's secretary/treasurer, Marlene Geier, testified at the hearing,[6] the testimony of Carl Geier makes it clear that most of Anderson's time is spent on the road in his capacity as an outside salesman for Hamilton. During the 6-month period following CMD's April purchase of the Shovel warehouse, Geier divided his time equally between Hamilton and CMD.[7]

Carl Geier manages and controls all labor relations matters for both Hamilton and CMD. He has personally negotiated all labor contracts for Hamilton since 1973.

Regarding common ownership of Hamilton and CMD, Geier testified that he is the "substantial majority" owner of Hamilton (he did not disclose his exact percentage of ownership). Hamilton's vice president, Paul Heil, and secretary/treasurer, Edward Koller, also own an unspecified number of shares of Hamilton. As seen, Carl Geier, his wife Marlene, and Hamilton's salesman, Doug Anderson, are each one-third owners of CMD.

[5] The judge stated that this approach was approved by the Board in Parklane Hosiery, 203 NLRB 597 (1973). We find the judge's reliance on Parklane in this regard to be misplaced. In that case, the two respondent employers were alleged to be a single or joint employer, or (alternatively) alter egos. The judge in that case found that the evidence did not establish single or joint employer status. Neither the General Counsel nor the charging party filed exceptions to the judge's finding. Thus, the question of single or joint employer status was not before the Board in Parklane. In any event, in analyzing the single or joint employer issue in Parklane, the judge employed essentially the well-established, four-factor analysis, discussed below, normally applied to a single-employer issue. 203 NLRB at 612–614. It was on the separate, analytically distinct question whether there was an alter ego relationship in Parklane that the judge applied the type of motive/purpose analysis that the judge in the instant case implicitly applied to the single-employer issue. 203 NLRB at 614-619. Although we do not question the application of a motive/purpose analysis to the alter ego issue in Parklane, we note, as did the judge in the instant case (at fn. 27 of the attached decision), that no alter ego issue has been raised in this case and, thus, there is no proper basis for application of Parklane's "conceptual approach."

[6] Carl Geier was the only official of Hamilton or CMD to testify in this proceeding. Indeed, although not an attorney, Geier represented both Hamilton and CMD throughout the hearing.

[7] According to Geier, he is still the "manager of sorts" of CMD, although he was "trying to make a manager out of John Shovel."

Finally, regarding interrelation of operations, we note that during the 5-month period between CMD's purchase of the Shovel warehouse and Hamilton's layoff of warehouseman Welsh, the Shovel brothers (employed by CMD) and Welsh (employed by Hamilton) worked together and interchangeably in servicing the entire CMD warehouse, without regard to any Hamilton-CMD space boundaries. Additionally, following CMD's purchase of the Shovel warehouse, Welsh continued to assist Martin in the Hamilton warehouse facility about twice a month (although Martin no longer came to the Shovel warehouse to help Welsh after CMD purchased the Shovel warehouse and Welsh and the Shovel brothers began to work together in servicing the needs of the entire CMD warehouse).[8]

In light of (1) common management of Hamilton and CMD by Carl Geier; (2) Geier's common control over the labor relations matters of both Companies; (3) the "substantial majority" ownership of Hamilton by Carl Geier and the (combined) two-thirds ownership of CMD by Carl and Marlene Geier; and (4) the close interrelationship of warehouse operations between Hamilton and CMD, we find that Hamilton and CMD are a single employer.

2. However, notwithstanding our finding that Hamilton and CMD are a single employer, we find, under the circumstances of this case, that the Respondent did not unlawfully refuse to recognize and bargain with the Union with regard to, or apply the terms of the Hamilton-Union collective-bargaining agreement to, a unit of warehouse employees at both the Hamilton and CMD facilities.

The issue here is whether the two-employee CMD group constitutes an accretion to the two-employee Hamilton bargaining unit. If so, the Respondent would be obligated to bargain with the Union about, and apply the collective-bargaining agreement to, the CMD employees; if not, the Respondent would be under no such obligation.

In Central Soya Co., 281 NLRB 1308 (1986), the Board addressed the question whether an historically unrepresented unit of 13 feed mill employees at a newly acquired location constituted an accretion to a represented unit of 15 feed mill employees from another location, following consolidation of feed mill operations at the newly acquired, historically unrepresented location. The Board found an accretion and a consequent obligation on the part of the employer to recognize and bargain with the union as the exclusive bargaining representative of the new 28-employee unit of feed mill employees at the newly acquired location, and an obligation to apply the existing collective-bargaining agreement covering the former 15-employee unit to this new 28-employee unit. In so finding, the Board relied expressly on (1) the absence of any substantial change in overall operations following the consolidation of the two feed mills and (2) the fact that the represented employees constituted a majority (i.e., 15 of 28) of the newly combined work force. With particular regard to the latter factor, the Board noted that it had never held that an accretion cannot be found when the two groups of employees in question are of approximately equal size: "In fact, the Board has effectively found valid accretions in cases involving approximately equal size groups even when the represented employees barely constituted a majority of the combined work force." 281 NLRB 1308 (emphasis added). In the same part of its decision the Board describes such majority status as "the key fact." Id. Finally, the Board found that the balance between the sometimes conflicting goals of (1) assuring employees their choice of whether and by whom to be represented, and (2) fostering established bargaining relationships, should be struck in that case in favor of the existing bargaining relationship covering the represented employees, "who constitute a clear majority of the combined work force."

In the instant case, as in Central Soya, there is full operational integration of the previously separate Hamilton and CMD (formerly Shovel) warehouse operations, with no substantial change in those operations. However, unlike the circumstances in Central Soya, the represented Hamilton warehouse employees do not constitute a majority of the employees in the assertedly appropriate unit of Hamilton and CMD warehouse employees. Rather, from the time of CMD's April acquisition of the Shovel warehouse and the resultant combining of Hamilton and CMD work at the (now) CMD warehouse, through the allegedly unlawful September layoff of Hamilton warehouseman Welsh, there were an equal number of represente employees (Hamilton warehousemen Martin and Welsh) and unrepresented employees (CMD warehousemen John and Dave Shovel). Thus, a crucia factor in the finding of an accretion in Centra Soya—union majority status—is not present here Consistent with the rationale in Central Soya, w conclude that the CMD warehouse employees d not constitute an accretion to the Hamilton warehouse unit, and that the Respondent did not unlawfully refuse to recognize and bargain with th

[8] We also note in this context that two part-time clerical employees of Hamilton have been trained to work at CMD in the event of a "crisis" and that three CMD employees (the Shovel brothers and a clerk) are covered under Hamilton's group health insurance plan (for which coverage Hamilton bills CMD).

Union regarding a unit of Hamilton and CMD warehouse employees, or unlawfully refuse to apply the terms of the Hamilton-Union collective-bargaining agreement to such a unit.[9]

3. As noted above, in September, about 5 months after CMD's acquisition of the Shovel warehouse and the resultant integration of Hamilton and CMD warehouse operations, Hamilton warehouseman Welsh was laid off. He filed a grievance and the Union requested the Respondent to provide it with certain information assertedly relevant to and necessary for the Union's processing of the grievance. The Respondent is alleged to have violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by its failure and refusal to provide the requested information.

The issue here is whether, following the operational integration of the Hamilton and CMD warehouse functions, but where we have found no accretion of the CMD employees to the Hamilton unit, the Respondent remained under an obligation to continue to bargain with the Union regarding the Hamilton employees. For the reasons discussed below, we find that the Respondent no longer remained under such an obligation.

The Board has held that an employer is not obligated to continue to recognize and bargain with a union as the exclusive bargaining representative of one group of its employees when that represented group is merged with an unrepresented group in such a manner that an accretion cannot be found and the original represented group is no longer identifiable. Thus, in Abbott-Northwestern Hospital, 274 NLRB 1063 (1985), there was a collective-bargaining agreement covering the separate Northwestern and Abbott divisions. The contract expressly included psychiatric assistants at the Northwestern division, but expressly excluded psychiatric assistants at the Abbott division; the union had never been recognized as the representative of the psychiatric assistants at the Abbott division. During the term of the contract, the employer consolidated the Northwestern and Abbott divisions into one mental health function, at Northwestern, and transferred the approximately 63 unrepresented Abbott psychiatric assistants to Northwestern, where they were fully integrated with the approximately 9 represented Northwestern psychiatric assistants. Thereafter, this integrated staff of psychiatric assistants performed the same basic duties and functions under common supervision at Northwestern.

The employer initially attempted to apply the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement to the 9 psychiatric assistant positions identified as "Northwestern" positions, and attempted to apply the terms of its policies applicable to unrepresented employees to the 63 psychiatric assistant positions identified as "Abbott" positions. However, the employer ultimately found this to be unworkable and notified the union that it was withdrawing recognition of the union as the bargaining representative of "any of the psychiatric assistants" in question. Thereafter, the employer treated all its psychiatric assistants, including the formerly represented Northwestern psychiatric assistants, as being unrepresented.

The complaint in Abbott-Northwestern alleged (1) that all the psychiatric assistants employed at the recently integrated Northwestern facility were properly included in the unit in question, but (2) that the employer actually violated the Act only by withdrawing recognition of the union as the representative of the nine psychiatric assistants who had worked and been represented by the union at Northwestern prior to the integration of the Abbott and Northwestern mental health functions.

The Board dismissed the complaint. The Board noted that, after the consolidation at Northwestern of the formerly separate Northwestern and Abbott mental health functions, the employer was faced with having to apply different terms and conditions of employment to "a small portion of a larger group of employees, even though all of them performed the same tasks under common supervision at the same facility." 274 NLRB at 1064. The Board found that a unit including some of, but not all, the psychiatric assistants was inappropriate. According to the Board: "In our view, no unit is appropriate with respect to the Respondent's psychiatric assistants which fails to include all of them."[10] The Board dismissed the complaint inasmuch as the unit from which the respondent withdrew recognition on a limited basis was inappropriate.

[9] Cf. Special Machine & Engineering, 282 NLRB 1410 (1987), discussing and directly applying Central Soya in finding that a unit of 28 unrepresented production employees was, under the circumstances, an accretion to a unit of 50 represented production and maintenance employees.

In reaching our conclusion here, we note that in the Central Soya discussion of accretions involving "approximately equal" groups of represented and unrepresented employees, the Board cited Public Service Co. of New Hampshire, 190 NLRB 350 (1971), a case that appears to be inconsistent with the principal rationale of Central Soya and with our holding in the instant case. In Public Service Co. of New Hampshire, the majority of a three-member Board panel found that five unrepresented employees constituted an accretion to a unit of five represented employees. The panel majority did not refer to or discuss the absence of a majority of represented employees, although a dissent emphasized the absence. Despite the citation of Public Service Co. of New Hampshire, it is clear from the Board's analysis in Central Soya and in the instant case that to find an accretion, even when the two groups in question are of approximately equal size, there must be a showing, inter alia, that the employees in the represented group outnumber the employees in the unrepresented group. Accordingly, Public Service Co. of New Hampshire is overruled.

[10] Id. at 1064. The Board also found that the 63 historically unrepresented psychiatric assistants for Abbott could not properly be found to be an accretion to the 9-member historically represented unit of Northwestern psychiatric assistants.

Similarly, the Board has refused to find that a certified union continued to be the exclusive representative when the unit for which it was certified has been integrated with an unrepresented group such that the separate identity of the certified unit has been completely obscured. In Renaissance Center Partnership, 239 NLRB 1247 (1979), the employer owned and operated the Renaissance Center (the Center), an urban commercial development that included, inter alia, the Detroit Plaza Hotel (the Hotel). In November 1977, the union became the certified representative of the Center's approximately 59 security guards; the Hotel's approximately 67 security guards were unrepresented. In April 1978, the Center and the Hotel operationally and administratively consolidated the two security guard groups under (and as employees of) the Center.[11] Following the integration of these two groups, the security guards were all placed under control of the Center, with common supervision, identical terms and conditions of employment, and complete interchangeability of duties: the former Hotel security guards were completely integrated with the Center's guards.

The union filed a unit clarification (UC) petition, asserting that the approximately 67 unrepresented former Hotel guards constituted an accretion to the represented unit of approximately 59 Center guards. The Center, on the other hand, filed a representation (RM) petition, asserting that the consolidation of the (unrepresented) Hotel guards with the (represented) Center guards raised a question concerning representation as to the overall integrated guard unit.

The Board found that a question concerning representation existed, even though the initial certification year had not yet expired.[12] The Board reasoned as follows:

> The consolidation of the two groups has precipitously increased the size of the Employer's security force and has completely obscured the separate identity of the certified bargaining unit which existed prior to the consolidation. It is the kind of unusual circumstance which justifies an exception to the certification-year rule.
> We therefore find that the Regional Director's decision finding an accretion improperly disenfranchises the former hotel employees and that the certified unit is no longer appropriate because of the merger of the two security groups and resultant intermixing of the represented and the larger unrepresented work forces. Rather, only the overall security force of the Employer is now appropriate. Because the Union claims to represent all of the Employer's guards and security officers, a question concerning representation exists in the overall unit.[13]

The Board directed an election in the overall unit it found appropriate.

As in the cases discussed above, in the instant case there also was a complete operational and administrative integration of a union-represented unit with a nonrepresented work group. Thus, in April, the two-location Hamilton warehouse function was fully integrated with the single-location CMD warehouse operation, under the complete operational and administrative control of the Respondent single employer. The represented two-employee Hamilton warehouse unit was fully integrated with the unrepresented two-employee CMD warehouse work force. In light of the full operational and administrative integration of the Hamilton and CMD warehouse functions and work forces under the Respondent single employer, we find, consistent with Abbott-Northwestern, supra, and Renaissance Center, supra, that a unit of only Hamilton warehouse employees ceased to be an appropriate unit when the Hamilton and CMD warehouse function and work forces became integrated in April. Rather, we find that as of April the only appropriate unit was an overall unit comprised of all warehouse employees employed by the Respondent single employer Hamilton and CMD, about which overall unit a question concerning representation existed. Accordingly, we find that as of the time of the Union's September requests for information related to the grievance over the layoff of Hamilton employee Welsh, the Hamilton unit had already been rendered inappropriate; that a question concerning representation existed regarding the appropriate overall unit of Hamilton and CMD warehouse employees; that the Respondent was, therefore, no longer under an obligation in September to bargain with the Union about the Hamilton employees; and that the Respondent was particularly under no obligation in September to provide the Union with information related to the grievance over the layoff of Hamilton employee Welsh. Consequently, we shall dismiss this allegation of the complaint.

4. Finally, we agree with the judge's dismissal of the allegation that the Respondent unlawfully laid [11] The Center and the union had not reached a collective-bargaining agreement.

[12] As the Board explained, the certification year rule requires a certified union's majority status to be honored for 1 year and representation petitions are usually barred during this 1-year period.

off Joseph Welsh. More specifically, we find that the General Counsel has not met her burden of making a prima facie showing sufficient to support the inference that union or other protected conduct was a motivating factor in the Respondent's decision to lay off Welsh.[14]

Welsh's layoff occurred on September 10. The General Counsel's evidence of Welsh's union activity consists of his membership in the Union and his participation as part of the Union's three-man contract negotiating team over a 15-month period ending in October 1983. The General Counsel also relies on the Respondent's unwillingness to recognize the Union as the representative of employees in the Hamilton and CMD warehouses and the animus exhibited in the remarks made by Carl Geier to employees Martin and Welsh and Union Business Agent Barker in a negotiating session during January 1983. In those remarks, set out in section I, above, Geier essentially stated that the Union had done nothing for the employees, that they would do better by seeking to rise in the Company, and that once the Union was out he would be able to do what he wanted.

To the extent that the General Counsel contends that the Respondent was retaliating against Welsh for his union activity, we note that Welsh's membership in the Union was longstanding and we find that, insofar as his activity consisted of more than mere membership, it was too remote in time to be linked to the September 1984 layoff. For the same reason, we find Geier's January 1983 comments an inadequate basis for drawing an inference of unlawful motive in the September 1984 layoff. To the extent that the General Counsel's 8(a)(3) argument regarding Welsh derives from her allegation that his layoff was the result of the Respondent's failure to apply the bargaining agreement to all the warehouse employees and, accordingly, its failure to lay off a less senior employee rather than Welsh, her argument fails because we have concluded that the Respondent was not obligated under the Act to apply the agreement to all those employees.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RUSSELL M. KING JR., Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard by me in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, on January 16, 1985. The original charge was filed by the General Teamsters, Chauffeurs and Helpers Local 249 a/w International Brotherhood of Teamsters Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America (Union) on September 12, 1984, and the complaint was issued on October 26, 1984, by the Regional Director for Region 6 of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) on behalf of the Board's General Counsel.[1] The complaint alleges that sometime in the spring of 1984 Geo. V. Hamilton, Inc. (Hamilton) and CMD, Inc. (CMD) became a single employer.[2] The Union had represented the warehouse employees of Hamilton under a collective-bargaining agreement that expires July 31, 1986. The complaint alleges that commencing in September Hamilton and CMD refused to recognize and bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the warehouse employees and has refused to furnish the Union with certain information needed to perform its duties, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. Lastly, the complaint alleges the unlawful layoff of employee Joseph Welsh on September 10 because of his union and protected, concerted activities, in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.[3] Both Hamilton and CMD deny that they are a single or joint employer and allege that since CMD is separate from Hamilton, CMD has no obligation to recognize and bargain with the union or to furnish the requested information. Regarding employee Welsh, Hamilton's president Carl H. Geier maintains that Welsh was terminated because his job was eliminated and he failed to accept an alternative job offer.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the brief filed by the General Counsel, I make the following

Findings of Fact[4]

I. JURISDICTION

The pleadings, admissions, and evidence reflect the following regarding jurisdiction. At all times material, Respondent Hamilton, a Pennsylvania corporation with its office and place of business in McKees Rocks, Pennsylvania, has been engaged in the wholesale sale, distribution, and installation of insulation materials and related products. During the 12-month period ending September 30, 1984, Respondent Hamilton, in the course and conduct of its operations, described above, purchased and received at its Pennsylvania facility products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 from points located outside the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

At all times material, Respondent CMD, a Pennsylvania corporation with an office and place of business in McKees Rock, Pennsylvania, has been engaged in the operation of a warehouse facility.

Thus I find, as admitted, that the Respondent Hamilton has been at all times material, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. I also find that the Union is now and has been at all times material a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.[5]

The jurisdictional allegations of the complaint in this case also allege that Hamilton and CMD constitute a single integrated business enterprise and a single employer within the meaning of the Act, and that collectively both Hamilton and CMD, together, meet the monetary amount found above regarding only Hamilton. Since these facts were vigorously contested in this case, any finding that Hamilton and CMD constitute a single employer or that CMD itself meets the jurisdictional standard will be delayed until later in this Decision.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Testimony and Evidence[6]

William Barker testified as the Union's business agent, a position he had held since 1979.[7] The Union has represented Hamilton's warehouse employees since 1973, with successive contracts.[8] The most recent Hamilton contract ran from August 1, 1982, to July 31, 1986. That contract was negotiated by Barker and employees Joseph Welsh and Donald Martin, and with Geier. Prior to October 20, 1983,[9] there had not been a contract in effect for a period in excess of a year, and Barker testified that at a point in the negotiations he filed a charge with the Board, apparently alleging that Hamilton had not been bargaining in good faith. Subsequently, a complaint was issued by the Regional Director, and Barker testified that a settlement was ultimately reached regarding the complaint and that thereafter the current contract was entered into. The evidence in this case reflects that CMD was formed and, in April, purchased a warehousing facility where some of Hamilton's warehousing activity had been carried on, and eventually Hamilton's warehousing for its own products ceased and it was turned over to CMD. Employee Welsh had worked as a warehouseman for Hamilton at the CMD site and was laid off September 10. Hamilton alleges that the reason for Welsh's layoff was that his position was eliminated by virtue of CMD assuming Hamilton's warehouse activities. Barker testified that he first became aware of the warehousing changeover on September 10 when employee Welsh informed him that he had been laid off. The following day, September 11, Barker and Welsh met with Geier and Barker complained to Geier that Welsh was the most senior of the three warehousemen in the bargaining unit and should remain.[10] Barker testified that he also asked Geier for "documents or subcontracting lease or any paper" regarding the changeover, together with any subcontracting agreement that may exist. Barker further indicated that he asked Geier for the names of the principal officers of CMD, and that Geier's response to all his requests was short, but polite, "none of his business." Welsh's formal and written grievances were also submitted to Hamilton on September 11, and on September 14, Barker wrote to Geier about the grievance, indicating that they would now proceed to the arbitration step of the grievance procedure in the contract. Barker also indicated that Geier could contact the Union's attorney, Samuel J. Pasquarelli, for the selection of a Federal mediator from the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service. On September 24 Barker again wrote to Geier and requested the names of the principal officers of CMD and copies of all written agreements between Hamilton and CMD. Barker never received the requested information.

[4] The facts found are based on the record as a whole and on my observation of the witnesses. The credibility resolutions have been derived from a review of the entire testimonial record and exhibits with due regard for the logic of probability, the demeanor of the witnesses and the teaching of NLRB v. Walton Mfg. Co., 369 U.S. 404, 408 (1982). Regarding those testifying in contradiction of the findings, their testimony has been discredited either as having been in conflict with the testimony of credible witnesses or because it was in and of itself incredible and unworthy of belief. All testimony and evidence, regardless of whether mentioned or alluded to, has been reviewed and weighed in light of the entire record.

[5] Carl H. Geier appeared in this case on behalf of Hamilton and CMD and also gave extensive testimony. Geier is not an attorney, but is president and the majority stockholder of Hamilton. He filed an answer to the complaint on Hamilton's letterhead and, regarding the alleged status of the Union as a labor organization under the Act, Geier's answer stated, "Assumed correct (not familiar with Sec. 2(5) of the Act)." The evidence and testimony in the case supports the finding that the Union is a labor organization as defined by Sec. 2(5) of the Act. Geier had negotiated and entered into successive collective-bargaining agreements (contracts) with the Union since 1973.

[6] The following includes a summary of a testimony of the witnesses appearing in the case. The testimony will appear normally in narrative form, although on occasion some testimony will appear as actual quotes from the transcript. The narrative only and merely represents a summary of what the witnesses themselves stated or related, without credibility determinations unless indicated, and does not reflect my ultimate findings and conclusions in this case unless so indicated.

[7] Barker was present throughout the case.

[8] The Union also represents a separate unit of Hamilton's truck drivers.

[9] The contract was actually signed on October 20, 1983, but its effective date was backdated to August 1, 1982.

[10] The three employees in the warehouse unit were originally Ott, Martin, and Welsh. Ott and Martin worked at Hamilton's own facility and Welsh worked at Hamilton's rented space at the CMD site, then known as the Shovel warehouse, which was owned and operated by the Shovel family prior to its purchase by CMD. When CMD purchased the warehouse, John Shovel and Dave Shovel were kept on as warehousemen for CMD. Ott had retired in January. When Barker talked of seniority, he was apparently referring to Welsh and the two Shovels.

Attorney Samuel J. Pasquarelli testified in the case and identified various correspondence that he was familiar with regarding the matter.[11] On September 26 Pasquarelli wrote Geier requesting copies of all documents and contracts that had been entered into by Hamilton and CMD between August 1, 1982, to date regarding the performance of work for Hamilton by CMD. Pasquarelli also requested in that letter information concerning the officers, stockholders, and directors of both Hamilton and CMD, adding in the letter that the information he requested dealt with employee Welsh's grievance and that it was the Union's contention that CMD and Hamilton were joint employers. Also on September 22, Pasquarelli filed a request for an arbitration panel with the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service (FMCS), sending a copy of that request to Geier. The FMCS replied to Pasquarelli's request on October 8 and sent a copy of that reply to Geier. On October 15 Geier, apparently on behalf of Hamilton, wrote to FMCS indicating that the matter was not subject to arbitration and stating that Welsh's job had been eliminated due to "all work being sublet" to CMD. That letter also stated that Welsh had been offered another position with Hamilton and had declined.[12] A copy of the letter from Geier was also sent to Attorney Pasquarelli. Geier never replied to any of Pasquarelli's letters.

Carl H. Geier testified as the president and majority stockholder of Hamilton.[13] The other officers of Hamilton were Paul Heil, vice president, and Edward Kollar, secretary/treasurer; both of these individuals also own stock. Geier, on behalf of Hamilton, negotiated the existing agreement and signed the same. Geier indicated he was chief operating officer of Hamilton and, as such, is involved in the day-to-day operations at Hamilton. In addition to Geier, the other officers of Hamilton (Heil and Kollar) had the authority to hire and fire employees, as did Officer Manager Gorski. According to Geier, until January Bob Ott had been the warehouse supervisor at Hamilton's facility, and then Ott retired and Donald Martin, who also had worked with Ott, took his place.[14] Geier related that prior to Ott's retirement, Ott himself, together with Don Martin and Joseph Welsh composed the three employees who were in the warehouse unit and represented by the Union. Hamilton used two separate facilities for warehousing purposes. One of the facilities was located at Hamilton's main office on River Avenue, where Martin normally worked. The other warehousing site was known as the Shovel warehouse, located approximately a quarter of a mile from the River Avenue site. It was this site that CMD purchased. Geier testified that when Ott retired in January and employee Martin took his place, no replacement was hired for Martin. According to Geier, Martin's duties mainly included loading and unloading trucks, and completing the relevant paperwork. He was and is paid hourly, but Geier indicated his pay is "something above" the union-contract rate for warehouse employees. Geier added that Martin received time and a half for overtime and kept and the time sheet, which he turned in to Secretary/Treasurer Kollar, who also kept track of the vacation requests of employees. Geier further added that employee Welsh would also follow the same procedure.[15] When either Welsh or Martin was on vacation, one would cover for the other at both warehousing locations.[16]

Geier testified that in the spring of 1984 CMD, Inc. came into existence and that CMD stood for the initials of the first name of the three owners including himself, his wife, Marlene, and Doug Anderson, who was also a salesman at Hamilton. The three owned equal shares and, along with one Larry Niemann, constituted the board of directors. Anderson was the president of the CMD and Geier's wife, Marlene, was the secretary/treasurer. Geier testified that there was no vice president and that the chief operating officer responsible for CMD's day-to-day operations was Anderson. Geier added that he was the manager "of sorts," initially splitting his time between the Shovel warehouse, where CMD was located, and Hamilton's main office on River Avenue. The name "Shovel" is a family name and the warehouse was owned by John Shovel Sr. The Shovel family conducted a public warehousing business out of the Shovel warehouse and approximately one fourth of the space in that warehouse was rented and used by Hamilton for warehousing activities and a "fabric shop." Employee Welsh generally worked at the Shovel warehouse for Hamilton. Also working at the Shovel warehouse were brothers John and Dave Shovel and their sister Joan Shovel, who worked in the office and was assisted by one Susan Mann. The space occupied by Hamilton at the Shovel warehouse was through a written lease for an unknown amount per month.[17] The period of the lease was from March 7, 1982, through March 6, 1985. After CMD came into existence in the spring of 1984, it purchased the Shovel warehouse and its business, but John, Dave, and Joan Shovel continued to work at the warehouse. CMD part owner Anderson did not spend much time at the Shovel warehouse because his main job was that of an outside salesman for Hamilton. Both Geier and his wife, however, did spend some time at the warehouse and his wife, as CMD's secretary/treasurer, would count money and sign checks at the warehouse. Others having the authority to sign CMD checks included Geier himself, Anderson, and Joan Shovel. Geier testified that after CMD purchased the warehouse, it maintained the operation as a public warehouse, and was used by several steady or permanent businesses and some half dozen that "come in and go," including Fisher Body (General Motors), who was "sporadic" but a big customer. Geier indicated that prior to CMD's Shovel warehouse purchase, the Shovels and Hamilton employees would help each other out on occasion, adding that the only change that took place after the CMD purchase was that both Company's billed each other for the services they furnished to one another. Geier testified that some time in April or May, CMD hired one Martin Busch for general warehousing work on the recommendation of John Shovel, and that he (Geier) approved the hiring of Busch, who was paid the same as "casual help." Geier added, however, that Busch was hired because of a sudden rush in business from a particular company and that the business received from that company ended about a month and a half later and thereafter Busch became a Hamilton employee. According to Geier, one additional CMD employee was also hired on a part-time basis to help handle a Fisher Body rush in the late fall and to also occasionally clean the warehouse. Geier testified that the warehousing work at CMD, including that work done for Hamilton, is now handled by Dave and John Shovel, who are assisted on a "few" occasions by Hamilton employee Busch. Geier testified that CMD's office is at the Shovel warehouse, and that Hamilton still occupies the same rented space at that warehouse, adding that eventually he personally only spent a few hours a week at the warehouse. As of the date of the hearing in this case, the old lease between Hamilton and the Shovel family was still in existence, but Geier testified that when it expires (March 6, 1985), a new lease would be entered into between Hamilton and CMD for Hamilton's space at the CMD warehouse. Geier indicated that during the spring and summer Hamilton and CMD did not invoice each other for labor performed by the other employees, but after Welsh left in September, a rate schedule was agreed on and CMD commenced to invoice Hamilton every week. Geier testified that at the time employee Welsh was laid off, Hamilton "sublet" or subcontracted all of its loading and unloading warehousing activities to CMD, but that there was no written document or written understanding of this arrangement at that time, except for the so-called rate schedule, and that they decided to wait on formalizing the arrangement until the Hamilton-Shovel lease expired in March. Geier testified that Hamilton has provided virtually no services to CMD from April to the present time, although he indicated that one of Hamilton's secretaries worked at CMD for a couple of weeks as a training period, and then she came to Hamilton. Geier added that the CMD employees are paid the same wage rate that was established by the Shovel family, and that although John Shovel is paid hourly, he is "probably in the process of becoming a salaried employee." Geier indicated that the CMD employees are "attached" to the Hamilton Blue-Cross and Blue-Shield Hospitalization plan because of the cheaper group rate, and that CMD pays Hamilton its share of the cost on behalf of its employees.

[11] Pasquarelli appeared only as a witness and not as counsel for the Union.

[12] Geier had offered Welsh another position with Hamilton, apparently dealing with inventory and accounting. Welsh had declined that position and among the reasons he gave was that it would take him out of the bargaining unit and it would necessitate his dropping his union membership. This matter will be the subject of further testimony and comment later.

[13] Geier was called by the General Counsel during her case-in-chief, and gave the vast majority of his testimony at that time.

[14] Martin indicated during his testimony that he considered his position was that of "shipper" after Ott left.

[15] The supervisory status of Martin, who replaced Ott, was a potential side issue in this case in that one of Hamilton's defenses alleges that when Ott left, Martin became a supervisor, leaving no warehousemen at Hamilton's facility.

[16] Hamilton employed a total of 20 individuals in various jobs, including warehousemen, truckdrivers, office employees, and an accountant. The insulation was actually installed by independent contractors, hired on a day-to-day basis. Hamilton also employed salesmen, some of whom were "outside" salesmen and some of whom were "inside" salesmen.

[17] Although the lease itself was admitted into evidence, the monthly amount had been excised. Geier was very guarded about monetary amounts throughout this case.

Joseph M. Welsh was the employee whose job terminated after the formation of CMD. He had worked as a warehouseman with Hamilton for 12 years, most recently in the Shovel warehouse. Welsh described the warehouse as having two floors on the "Hamilton side" and three floors on the "Shovels' side,' with three dock doors. According to Welsh, the "dock area" separated the two companies (Hamilton and the Shovel family). Welsh's duties were loading, unloading, inventory, storage, and taking care of customers. Welsh testified that, on occasion he would work in the Hamilton fabricating shop at the Shovel warehouse when things got "a little slow" in the warehouse, and that "a couple of times a month" he would go to Hamilton's River Avenue facility and assist employee Don Martin with warehouse work there. Welsh added that "a couple of times a week" Martin would also come to the Shovel warehouse and assist him before CMD was formed, and after CMD came into being, he continued to help Martin at the River Avenue facility. Welsh testified that he would also help John and Dave Shovel with their work "a couple of times a week," but that after CMD took over the entire warehouse he, John, and Dave Shovel would work together in servicing the entire Shovel warehouse, adding that although he knew CMD had taken over the warehouse he was never informed of any change in his duties or responsibilities by Geier or any other supervisor of Hamilton. After CMD took over the Shovel warehouse, Welsh related that Martin's duties at River Avenue remained the same as his at the Shovel warehouse, although he did have "a little bit more paper work," adding that when Martin was on vacation or sick he would perform Martin's duties at the River Avenue facility. According to Welsh, Martin had no employees working under him and did not direct his (Welsh's) work, adding that he was never told that Martin was his immediate supervisor. Welsh testified that, on occasion, Dave Shovel would also work in the Hamilton fabrication shop when it was slow. Welsh related that in April or May an individual named Busch was hired to work in the Shovel warehouse and remained only a "few weeks," during which time he too would work in the fabrication shop when things were slow in the warehouse.

Welsh testified that he was on vacation September 3 to 10, and when he reported back to work he was told by Geier that his job had been eliminated. The following morning (September 11) he and Union Agent Barker met with Geier, who again stated that Welsh's job "was terminated and [that] he was subcontracting the work out to the Shovel warehouse." According to Welsh, Barker asked to see a document or agreement reflecting the subcontracting, and Geier responded that it was none of his business, to which Barker responded by indicating that John and Dave Shovel were doing the same work that Welsh was doing and thus should be part of the bargaining unit, adding that Welsh had seniority over both Shovels and should not have been terminated at that time. According to Welsh, Geier made no specific response to Barker's remarks, but did state that he (Welsh) had been "sitting on a job offer for 6 to 8 weeks" and had not responded. Welsh conceded that he did receive a job offer from Geier sometime in July or August to work on inventory books and records, but Welsh testified that Geier also had told him that he would have to get out of the Union and accept "company benefits" and a different "pay scale" if he accepted the inventory job. Welsh added that he subsequently told Paul Heil that he "had to decline the job." Welsh also testified that he declined the job because he was happy with his position as a warehouseman and happy with the union benefits. Welsh and Barker represented the Union in the contract negotiations and Welsh testified that it took "at least 15 months" before the new contract was entered into.[18] Welsh indicated that he thought he had been treated "unfairly" because he was in the Union and the contract took so long to finalize when there "was nothing to negotiate." Welsh conceded that when Geier offered him another job in July or August he reacted with a positive attitude "at first," and he further conceded that he never talked to Geier about the matter nor did he inform him personally of his decision to decline the offer.

Donald Martin testified as a present employee of Hamilton in the Hamilton facility on River Avenue, where the main Hamilton office is located. Martin described his duties, before Ott left in January, included loading and unloading trucks, filling orders, and filling out paperwork, including bills of lading. Martin had worked with Ott some 13 years. Martin testified that before January (1984) he worked at both the River Avenue warehouse facility and the Shovel warehouse, adding that he would travel to the Shovel warehouse in a company car "almost every day."[19] Martin indicated that in January or February Geier offered him the job as the "shipper" at the River Avenue warehouse, but that even though Geier did not explain what the job entailed, he accepted it. Martin testified that prior to being offered the "shipper" job, he was covered under the union contract with Hamilton, adding that he had in the past participated in "more than one set of negotiations." As the "shipper," Martin related that he was still an hourly rated employee, but did not receive any raise until May or June. Martin indicated prior to January, Welsh would help him in the warehouse at River Avenue "about twice a month."[20] After January, Martin indicated that Welsh replaced him at River Avenue when he was sick or on vacation. Regarding his duties as a shipper at River Avenue, Martin in effect testified that he had no supervisory duties.[21] Martin testified that after he was made a shipper, no warehousemen worked at the River Avenue facility, and that he called Union Agent Barker and told him about the job, adding that he would have to withdraw from the Union. Martin did not recall or "remember" whether he told Barker in that conversation that he did not think the Union would last very long at Hamilton. Martin also testified about a negotiating session he attended in January 1983. He indicated that present were also Union Agen Barker, Geier, and Paul Heil (Hamilton's vice president). According to Martin, Geier stated at that meeting "that the union has done nothing for us . . . that we should try to better ourselves by moving up in the company . . . once the union was out he could do what he wants."[22]

B. Analysis of Law and Evidence and Initial Conclusions

The General Counsel's case relies solely on the conclusions that Hamilton and CMD are the single or joint employer, and thus they both had continuing and legal responsibilities involving the Union and the contract then in force. The subject of "subcontracting," which appears frequently in testimony, and any duty to bargain over a potential decision by Hamilton to subcontract its warehousing activities to CMD, plays no roll in the General Counsel's theory of the case, and well it should not for if that were urged here, there would be no question about the Union's loss of its warehousemen's unit completely and there would not have been any duty to bargain over the subcontracting decision.[23] There is scant, if any, evidence that CMD was established and then took over Hamilton's warehousing functions to save labor costs, a prerequisite for a duty to bargain over such decisions, much less to furnish information about the same. Otis Elevator Co., 269 NLRB 891 (1984).

The Board's "joint" or "single" employer concept, judicially established in a significant number of cases, normally reflects a judgment that two or more nominally separate business entities may properly be considered sufficiently integrated to warrant their unitary treatment for various statutory purposes, usually in the context of a franchise situation or one that involves combining the business in order to meet minimum required gross receipts enabling the Board to assert jurisdiction. Parklane Hosiery, 203 NLRB 597 (1973);[24] Radio Union Local 1264 v. Broadcast Service, 380 U.S. 255 (1965); Sakrete of Northern California, 137 NLRB 1220 (1962), enfd. 332 F.2d 902 (9th Cir. 1964), cert. denied 379 U.S. 961 (1965). Some of the principal factors that have been considered relevant in determining the extent of integration are (1) interrelation of operations, (2) centralized control of labor relations, (3) common management, and (4) common ownership or financial control. Sakrete of Northern California, above. To put the test another way, when the answer is not black and white, "we are remitted to the test of honesty and justice." Cardozo, J., in Berkey v. Third Avenue R. Co., 244 N.Y. 84, 95, 155 N.E. 58, 61, cited in NLRB v. Deena Artware, Inc., 361 U.S. 398, 402–403 (1960). And yet another way, whether in fact the economic enterprise is one, the corporate forms being largely paper arrangements that do not reflect the business realities. NLRB v. Deena Artware, Inc., above, all cited in Parklane Hosiery, above.

[18] Martin later testified that he also was involved in the negotiations.

[19] Martin's testimony in this regard is at some variance with that of Welsh. Welsh testified that Martin would come to the Shovel warehouse "a couple of times a week."

[20] Here, again, there is a variance in Martin's and Welsh's testimony. Welsh testified that he helped Martin at River Avenue "a couple of times a week."

[21] The term "supervisor" is defined in Sec. 2(11) of the Act. When Martin was questioned by the General Counsel on the subject, each of the some 12 supervisory responsibilities set forth in Sec. 2(11) were individually and specifically set forth to Martin, who replied "No" when he was asked whether he performed the particular function.

[22] After Martin completed his testimony, the General Counsel recalled Union Agent Barker, who essentially corroborated Martin's testimony concerning Geier's remarks. Barker added that Geier "felt that he could better them people with the Union out of there and than I could protecting them people." Geier, at least outwardly, appeared to be upset about this testimony and his spontaneous remarks on the record included, "I never threatened anybody that they could get along better with me than with the Union . . . That is an absolute lie . . . And I don't know how to bring that out." At the time, Geier was not a witness and thus I do not accept these remarks on the record as evidence or testimony in the case. However, Geier later took the witness stand on his own behalf and testified, "it is alleged that I threatened one or both of these two employees at a negotiating meeting which I have never done." In cross-examination of Martin by Geier, Martin conceded in effect that he did not consider any remarks that Geier made at the January negotiating session threatening. Geier, himself, testified that he interpreted Martin and Barker's testimony to mean or indicate that he threatened Welsh "about advancement in the company" because of the Union, and he denied that he ever made any such threat to anyone during any negotiation session.

[23] The General Counsel completely avoids the use of the term "subcontracting" in her brief, calling the actions of Hamilton regarding its warehousing work, an "assignment" to CMD.

This case was difficult for me. I started out by using the "legal" approach, that is, listing in columns certain facts in evidence that were for and against a single employer conclusion, primarily using the four basic factors mentioned above and in Sakrete of Northern California, above. This resulted in only uncertainty and indecision on my part. I then used the "conceptual" approach, relying more on economic realities.[25] After using both approaches, a few dominant and important realities emerged. Hamilton and CMD were really not parallel businesses. Hamilton is in the business of the sale and installation of insulation materials. CMD is in the business of owning and operating a public warehouse. In these regards, the separation was considerably more than nominal. Only a small part of Hamilton's needs involved warehousing, and none of CMD's needs involved insulation. Each could exist with or without the other. The sale of either CMD or Hamilton immediately would have little or no affect on the other. If IT&T owned Sunbeam Bread, they surely would not be considered a single employer, even if there were similar (or even common) labor policy followed by all IT&T subsidiaries. When John Shovel Sr. decided to retire and sell his warehouse, it was not surprising that Geier became interested in owning part of it, having been an eyewitness to its economic and business value and also having a need for the use of one-fourth of its space. In this case the General Counsel, in my opinion, is in the awkward position of, in effect, alleging that Geier participated in the purchase of a whole public warehouse to rid Hamilton of a three-man unit of warehouse employees.[26] In fact, Geier invested in a wholly different business and subcontracted a small portion of Hamilton's business to that new business.[27] The operation of both Hamilton and CMD was a bit ragged, and as the General Counsel ably pointed out, there was some integration and common management and control. Also, the outcome was severe regarding the Union and, no doubt, Geier knew what the outcome would be and was pleased. I perceive that the Board, however, which I am duty bound to follow, has allowed for such results under the facts in this case.

In my opinion, if this case falls within any legal nitch, it is that of Otis Elevator, above, under which guidelines the complaint in this case fails. I shall thus recommend that the complaint be dismissed.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. That the Respondent, Geo. V. Hamilton, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. That the Charging Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. That Geo. V. Hamilton, Inc. and CMD, Inc. are not joint employers, and do not constitute a single employer within the terms of this case and within the meaning of the Act.

4. That the permanent lay off or termination of employee Joseph Welsh on September 10, 1984, did not violate Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

5. That Geo. V. Hamilton, Inc. and CMD, Inc. have not otherwise violated the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law, and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[28]

ORDER

It is recommended that the complaint be dismissed.

---

[24] In this case, the Board adopted completely the decision of Administrative Law Judge Maurice M. Miller.

[25] This approach was also approved by the Board in Parklane Hosiery, above.

[26] The Union still represented another unit at Hamilton. However, the General Counsel argues in this case that certain events surrounding the contract negotiations, mainly in 1983, demonstrate Geier's union animus. I disagree, although I am not convinced that even if there was union animus, the outcome of this case would be affected.

[27] Union Business Agent Barker correctly labeled the situation as one of subcontracting from the beginning. Other issues such as successors business, alter ego, or unit accretion were correctly not raised in this case.

[28] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On December 15, 1983, Administrative Law Judge Burton Litvack issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions, the Charging Party filed cross-exceptions, and the Respondent, the Charging Party, and the General Counsel filed answering briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs[1] and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions as modified[3] and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.

1. The judge found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by refusing to bargain about union security, a mandatory bargaining subject. The Respondent excepts, contending, inter alia, that the record contains no evidence that the Union requested or the Company refused to bargain about union security within the 10(b) period. The Respondent's exception is without merit.

The Union was certified as the bargaining agent for an RN unit in January 1980 and for an LPN-technical unit in January 1981. During RN unit bargaining between May 1980 and September 1981, the Respondent refused to discuss the Union's proposed union-security clause until employees voted whether they would accept a union-security provision. LPN-technical unit bargaining began in September 1981. Evidence about LPN-technical negotiations includes a document pertaining to RN bargaining topics that the Respondent admits accurately reflects the items discussed during LPN-technical unit bargaining. Union security is the second topic listed. The Respondent further admits that, throughout both sets of negotiations, it maintained employees had to vote approval of a union-security provision before the Company would negotiate about union security.

The Respondent concedes that the 10(b) period commenced in July 1981. Based on the Respondent's admissions, we find the record shows that the Union attempted to discuss and the Company refused to consider union security during LPN-technical unit bargaining. Thus, contrary to the Respondent's contention, Section 10(b) does not preclude finding the Respondent refused to negotiate about union security.

2. We clarify the judge's findings that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act through its December 30, 1981 announcement of a wage increase for employees excluding those in the LPN-technical bargaining unit.

The Respondent had an established practice of granting a wage increase around the beginning of each year, and the amount of this annual increase had been set at the Respondent's discretion. In De-

[1] The Charging Party's motion to strike the Respondent's exceptions and brief is denied. The Respondent's request for oral argument is denied as the record, exceptions, cross-exceptions, and briefs adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties.

[2] Because we agree with the judge's finding that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(5) by refusing to bargain about a mandatory bargaining subject, and because the remedy for the violation is an order to bargain in good faith, we find it unnecessary to pass on the judge's finding that the Respondent also violated Sec. 8(a)(5) by engaging in dilatory bargaining tactics.

Chairman Stephens concurs in the deletion of the "dilatory bargaining" language from the cease-and-desist section of the Order, but he does so on the ground that the General Counsel did not prove, by a preponderance of the evidence, that the Respondent engaged in dilatory bargaining during the 10(b) period (i.e., beginning in July 1981), even allowing for consideration of prior conduct as "background" evidence. From September 17, 1981, when formal bargaining sessions for the LPN-technical unit began, through January 8, 1982, when the last such session took place, the parties met nine times. The Respondent's witnesses testified that the dates of meetings were worked out by mutual agreement and that the length of meetings was dictated by the particular agenda set for each meeting, an agenda usually prepared by the union negotiators. Although the Union's principal negotiator could recall specifically only one proposed date when he was unavailable for a meeting, he did not deny that there might have been others. Furthermore, he did not specifically deny the testimony of the Respondent's witnesses concerning how the scheduling and length of the meetings were determined. On this record, Chairman Stephens does not find that a case of dilatory bargaining is made out.

[3] We agree with the judge that the Respondent's withdrawal of recognition occurred in the context of serious unfair labor practices and, therefore, violated Sec. 8(a)(5). The unfair labor practices (refusing to bargain about a mandatory bargaining subject and announcing a unilateral change in terms and conditions of employment) are the type of conduct that would cause employee disaffection with the Union. To remedy the Respondent's refusal to bargain, we shall adopt the judge's proposed remedy extending the Union's certification 6 months. See Colfor, Inc., 282 NLRB 1173 (1987).

The Respondent has moved to reopen the record to submit evidence the Respondent claims shows employees had indicated lack of support for the Union in May 1981, before any of the unfair labor practices occurred. We deny the Respondent's motion for the following reasons. The Respondent has failed to show that the evidence, from an employee who testified at the hearing, is newly discovered. Further, whether employees were dissatisfied in May 1981 is irrelevant, as a union enjoys an irrebutable presumption during the certification year; and evidence about employee dissatisfaction in May 1981 does not affect the judge's finding that the unfair labor practices occurred before and during the gathering of signatures supporting the decertification petition and are the type that would cause employee disaffection with the Union.

cember 1981, around the time it would be customary for the Respondent to announce the amount of the annual increase, the Respondent's contract negotiations with the Union had produced the Union's proposal that the LPN-technical unit receive an immediate 14-1/2-percent increase and a counteroffer of 3.5 percent from the Respondent. Notwithstanding that the Union had reason to believe that an increase of some amount was contemplated for these employees, the Respondent issued an announcement to employees on December 30 stating that nonmanagerial employees other than those in the LPN-technical unit would receive an 8.5-percent raise, and it explained the exclusion of the unit employees with the following footnote statement: "By law, all changes in wage benefits and working conditions for members of the bargaining unit are subject to negotiations with the AFT, F.N.H.P. (AFL-CIO)." We agree with the judge that unit employees could reasonably have concluded from this announcement that because they were being represented by the Union in bargaining, a general wage increase was being withheld from them.

An employer has a duty not to change past practices for employees who are represented by a union until it has bargained to impasse on that subject with the union. NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736, 745–747 (1962).[4] The Respondent had not bargained to impasse on the question whether it would give an increase to the LPN-technical employees. By effectively announcing to them that they would be excluded from any increase, the Respondent not only advised the employees of an action it could not lawfully take at that point, but it also, as the judge found, "discredited and disparaged the Union in the eyes of its members." Further, as it turned out, the Respondent was willing and able to grant the LPN-technical unit the same 8.5-percent increase it granted the other employees, but it waited until after the others had received it, and after the time at which the increase would normally have been given, to make the offer to the Union. We agree with the judge that this constituted bargaining in bad faith.[5]

AMENDED CONCLUSION OF LAW

Substitute the following for Conclusion of Law 6.

"6. By refusing to bargain over union security, a mandatory bargaining subject, and unilaterally changing terms and conditions of employment, the Respondent engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act."

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Rocky Mountain Hospital, Denver, Colorado, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 1(b).

"(b) Refusing to bargain over union security, a mandatory bargaining subject, and demeaning the collective-bargaining representative in the eyes of the unit employees through announcements that imply unilateral withdrawal of existing benefits."

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the petition in Case 27–RD–587 is dismissed.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT fail and refuse to continue to recognize and bargain with Rocky Mountain Federation of Nurses and Health Professionals, Local 5016, AFT, CFT, AFL–CIO as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All full-time and regular part-time technical employees, including licensed practical nurses, radiology technicians, medical laboratory technicians, and EKG-IT-EEG-EMG technicians employed at our hospital; excluding office clerical employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act, and all other employees.

WE WILL NOT bargain in bad faith with the Union by refusing to negotiate on the issue of union security, a mandatory subject of bargaining, and demeaning the collective-bargaining representative in the eyes of the unit employees through announcements that imply withdrawal of existing benefits.

[4] To the extent that the judge's reference to a "duty not to depart from past practice" suggests that an employer is not free to change such practices after good-faith bargaining, we disavow it. The principles applicable here are entirely different from those applicable to an employer's duty regarding maintaining existing conditions of employment during the pendency of a petition for a representation election in which an employee bargaining representative may be chosen. Compare Associated Milk Producers, 255 NLRB 750, 754–755 (1981).

[5] Member Babson, in agreeing that the Respondent engaged in bad-faith bargaining, does not rely on the finding that the Respondent's announcement discredited and disparaged the Union.

WE WILL NOT bargain in bad faith by unilaterally changing terms and conditions of employment by announcing a raise for nonunion employees and, at the same time, announcing that employees in the above appropriate unit are excluded from receiving a raise.

WE WILL NOT maintain in force and effect our present no-solicitation/no-distribution policy insofar as the policy prohibits employees from soliciting at all times in nursing stations, permits employees to distribute literature only in breakrooms, restrooms, and parking lots, and prohibits off-duty employees from entering any area not open to the public during reasonable periods before and after work.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL restate our recognition of and, on request, resume bargaining in good faith for 6 months as if the initial certification year had not expired and bargain in good faith with the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of our employees in the appropriate bargaining unit described above and, if an agreement is reached, embody it in a signed contract.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

BURTON LITVACK, Administrative Law Judge. These matters were heard by me on June 7 through 9, 1983, in Denver, Colorado. On February 3, 1983, the Regional Director for Region 27 of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) issued an order consolidating cases and consolidated amended complaint, based on an unfair labor practice charge in Case 27-CA-7682 filed on January 7, 1982, by Rocky Mountain Federation of Nurses and Health Professionals, Local 5016, AFT, CFT, AFL-CIO[1] (the Union), and an original and first amended unfair labor practice charges in Case 27-CA-7694 filed on January 20, 1982, and January 5, 1983, respectively, by the Union, alleging that Rocky Mountain Hospital (Respondent) engaged in acts and conduct violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act).[2] Respondent timely filed an answer, essentially denying the commission of any unfair labor practices and raising affirmative defenses. Regarding Case 27-RC-587, by order of the Board, the matter was consolidated with the aforementioned unfair labor practice proceedings on February 3, 1983. At the hearing, all parties were afforded the opportunity to examine and cross-examine witnesses, offer relevant evidence, and argue their legal positions, on various points, orally. Also, all parties were permitted to, and did, file posthearing briefs, which were carefully examined. Accordingly, based on the entire record, the posthearing briefs, and my observation of the demeanor of the several witnesses, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent, a state of Colorado corporation, maintains and operates[3] an acute care health care institution, accredited by the American Osteopathic Association, located in Denver, Colorado. Respondent, in the normal course and conduct of its business operations, annually purchases and receives goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points located outside the State of Colorado and annually has a gross volume of revenue in excess of $250,000. Respondent admits that at all times material it has been, and is now, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act and a health care institution within the meaning of Section 2(14) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION

In its answer, Respondent denied the status of the Union as a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act. It is well settled that in the absence of newly discovered or previously unavailable evidence or special circumstances, a respondent in an 8(a)(1) and (5) proceeding is not entitled to relitigate issues that were, or could have been, litigated in a prior representation proceeding. Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co. v. NLRB, 313 U.S. 146, 162 (1941). The parties stipulated that in Case 27-RC-5926 the Union was certified by the Board as the exclusive representative for purposes of collective bargaining of an appropriate unit of certain of Respondent's employees. The record establishes that the Union comprises a chapter of Denver Federation of Nurses and Health Professionals, Local 5016 which, in turn, is an affiliate of the American Federation of Teachers[4] and that the Union exists for purposes of collective bargaining and has engaged in such with Respondent, represents employees regarding wages, hours, and working conditions, and is an organization in which employees participate. During cross-examination of witness Gerald Richardson, a national representative of the American Federation of Teachers, counsel for Respondent adduced the information that, currently, the Union neither operates as a chapter, holds employee meetings, nor issues communications. Other than the foregoing evidence, counsel for Respondent offered no legal argument for the denial of the Union's status as a labor organization at the hearing or in the posthearing brief. Presumably, counsel endeavored to establish that the Union has become defunct: however, a bargaining representative is considered defunct "only if it is unable or unwilling to represent the employees." Yates Industries, 264 NLRB 1237, 1250 (1982); Hershey Chocolate Corp., 121 NLRB 901, 911 (1958). There has been no such showing in this case, and it appears that the Union meets the long-established definition of a labor organization inasmuch as it was formed to, and did, represent health care employees regarding wages, hours, and other conditions of employment. French Hospital Medical Center, 254 NLRB 711, 712 (1981).

---

[1] The name of the Charging Party appears as amended at the hearing.

[2] The General Counsel sought and was granted permission to amend the consolidated amended complaint to include an additional allegation that Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

[3] On or about April 27, 1982, Respondent and Colorado Health Services Corporation and Adventist Health System/Eastern and Middle America, Inc. entered into an agreement whereby the latter was given management control over Respondent's facility. Neither at the hearing nor in its posthearing brief did Respondent make any assertions regarding this fact.

III. ISSUES

1. Did Respondent bargain in bad faith with the Union in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by engaging in mere surface bargaining?

2. Did Respondent bargain in bad faith with the Union in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by the following conduct:

(a) Rigidly insisting on contractual provisions whereby the Union's involvement in Respondent's operations would be eliminated.

(b) Insisting on proposals by which the Union would waive its right to bargain on new issues.

(c) Refusing to negotiate on arbitration of grievances.

(d) Having no position on contract duration at the last negotiating session.

(e) Announcing a wage increase for unrepresented employees and, although authorized to do likewise, offering a lesser amount to its represented employees?

3. Did Respondent violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by announcing a wage increase for unrepresented employees and, although authorized to do otherwise, offering a lesser amount to its represented employees?

4. Did Respondent violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by maintaining in effect overly broad no-solicitation/no-distribution rules?

IV. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Facts

1. Bargaining history

At all times material, at least through April 27, 1982, Respondent maintained and operated an acute care hospital in Denver, Colorado. Robert H. Pierce was the administrator until replaced by Gladys Duran in May 1982. Larry Gnuse was the assistant administrator and personnel director from January 1981 until March 1982; he was replaced by Tycho Christensen as personnel director in March 1982. In January 1980, the Union was certified by the Board as the exclusive representative for purposes of collective bargaining of Respondent's registered nurses, and negotiations for an initial collective-bargaining agreement commenced in May of that year. Gerald Richardson was the chief spokesman for the Union, and Walter V. Siebert, an attorney for the Mountain States Employers Council, represented the hospital during the negotiations. Besides these two individuals various employees and management representatives attended the several bargaining sessions as members of the respective union and management negotiating teams. While these discussions were ongoing, the parties were also involved in Case 27-RC-5926, proceedings involving the Union's petition seeking to represent Respondent's licensed practical nurses and technical employees. In that case, the Regional Director for Region 27, on October 17, 1980, directed that a prior election be set aside and that a rerun election be held. This election was conducted by the aforementioned Regional Director on November 25, 1980, with a majority of the voters casting ballots in favor of representation by the Union. Thereafter, on January 9, 1981, the Union was certified as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the following appropriate unit of Respondent's employees:

> All full-time and regular part-time technical employees, including licensed practical nurses, radiology technicians, medical laboratory technicians, and EKG-IT-EEG-EMG technicians; excluding office clerical employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined by the Act, and all other employees.

Negotiations between Respondent and the Union regarding an initial contract covering the registered nurses (RNs) continued into 1981.[5] The record reveals that between January and September of that year, the parties held 21 bargaining sessions, all of which related solely to the RN unit, with the exception of January, August, and September, when 1 meeting each month took place, 3 meetings a month occurred, that the time periods between meetings were normally never less than 1 week and occasionally 3 weeks or more, and that bargaining sessions rarely lasted more than 3 hours. Regarding the lengthy intervals between meetings, Richardson testified, and the record discloses, that he complained on several occasions to Siebert,[6] and, regarding the length of the sessions, he quoted Siebert as saying, "[W]hen it's productive, we'll meet longer." Within this framework, 3 days after certification in the licensed practical nurse-technical employee bargaining unit (LPN-Tech unit), on January 12, Richardson mailed the following letter, proposing joint negotiations for the two bargaining units to Administrator Pierce:

[4] There are four chapters, which together comprise Local 501. Each chapter encompasses the employees of a particular hospital in the Denver area, including Respondent.

[5] In calendar year 1980, the parties held 12 bargaining sessions during the time period May 15 through December 10. Two such meetings occurred each month, except during June, when only one session occurred, and in September when three took place.

> Since the Rocky Mountain Federation of Nurses and Health Professionals, AFT, AFL-CIO is now certified by the National Labor Relations Board to represent both the bargaining unit comprised of registered nurses and the bargaining unit comprised of licensed practical nurses and technical employees, the Union hereby proposes that contract negotiations for the two bargaining units be consolidated.
> The Union recognizes that the proposed consolidation of the bargaining units for purposes of negotiation is not a mandatory subject of bargaining. However, the Union believes that the proposal has a great deal of merit and, in the interests of expediency and efficiency, should be given serious consideration by the Hospital.
>
> The act of consolidation would not necessarily preclude the negotiating of separate agreements for the two bargaining units.
> In any event the Union has consolidated its negotiating team.
> Thank you for your time and attention in this matter. The Union looks forward to your response.

Pierce failed to respond; 2 months later Richardson restated his bargaining demand. In another letter, dated March 2, to Pierce, Richardson formally renewed "our request to commence contract negotiations for licensed practical nurses and technical employees at the earliest available date" and requested information pertaining to the LPN-Tech unit's size, wages, positions, hours, and other working conditions. Approximately 10 weeks later (May 13), and over 5 months from the Union's initial letter, Siebert sent the following letter to Richardson:

> Please be advised that the undersigned will be representing Rocky Mountain Hospital in negotiations with your union.
> The Employer stands ready to commence negotiations at a mutually agreeable time and place.
> It should be noted, however, that these negotiations will be separate and distinct from negotiations involving any other unit. Consequently any items of agreement made with one unit may not necessarily constitute agreement with the other.

Regarding the matter of joint negotiations, Richardson testified that "we made it clear that we saw many of the proposals being identical and pointed those out that we thought would be applicable to the LPN-Tech unit." In a point conceded by Siebert, Richardson added "that the hospital maintained a posture of separate negotiations."

In all, negotiations for a collective-bargaining agreement covering the registered nurses consumed 15 months and 33 bargaining sessions, with the last one occurring on September 1, 1981. According to Richardson, Respondent abruptly broke off these negotiations, after the filing of a decertification petition, on or about September 9. There is no record evidence that the negotiations were at impasse; in fact, the record discloses that the parties had reached agreement on several points and were actively discussing several others. Thus, Richardson testified that he and Siebert bargained about and agreed on the following RN unit contract provisions: recognition, dues deduction, no discrimination, seniority, hours of work, overtime and premium pay, union activity, access to personnel files, job postings, discipline and discharge, orientation, ethical practices, evaluations, a professional performance committee, termination notice, safety, existing benefits, change of ownership, savings clause, bargaining unit work, bereavement leave, jury duty, educational leaves, in-service education, life insurance, unpaid leaves of absence, unemployment compensation, a bulletin board, and health insurance. Remaining unresolved were significant areas[7] about which there was substantial disagreement and which, assert the General Counsel and the Union, form the basis for bad-faith bargaining by Respondent during the subsequent LPN-Tech negotiations.

Whether previously scheduled as an RN unit negotiating session, the parties next met on September 17, and Richardson and Siebert immediately commenced discussing the LPN-Tech unit collective-bargaining agreement. There is no dispute that, prior to this session, neither had the parties bargained specifically about matters relating to the latter bargaining unit nor had they reached any agreement on any matters pertaining to this projected contract. Subsequent to this session, Richardson and Siebert met seven more times,[8] with the final negotiating session held on January 8, 1982.[9] Siebert testified that, during these contract negotiations, four different types of contract provisions were discernible: clauses of "universal applicability" to both the RN and LPN-Tech bargaining units; clauses requiring slight modification for applicability to the latter group; clauses that were totally dissimilar; and clauses for which there had been no meaningful negotiations during the RN unit bargaining, but for which there were extensive negotiations during the LPN-Tech unit bargaining. Regarding the provisions of "universal applicability," the record discloses that during the September 17 meeting, Richardson and Siebert quickly agreed that certain agreed-on RN unit contract provisions would apply to the LPN-Tech unit agreement. These included: no discrimination, access to personnel files, termination notice, safety, a savings clause, bereavement leave, jury duty, group life insurance, health and welfare, and an employee bulletin board. Further, during the next meeting, October 28, the parties agreed on the following contract provisions, the language for which was either identical to or similar to that agreed on for the registered nurses: seniority, change of ownership, dues deduction, union access, union activity, evaluations, unpaid leaves of absence, ethical practices, and discipline and discharge. According to Richardson, there were other areas (such as hours of work, posting of vacancies, educational leave, vacations, holidays, sick leave, and educational leave) for which he believed the proposed RN unit contract language would also apply to the LPN-Tech unit employees; "beyond wanting to look at it further or wanting to talk with the director of nursing services," Siebert offered no reason to Richardson for refusing to agree that the same language would apply in those areas.

[6] Richardson could not recall Siebert's replies, but did place the onus on the latter for any delays. Larry Gnuse, who was largely responsible for drafting Respondent's contract proposals and who attended almost all negotiating sessions, stated that both Richardson and Siebert had "tight schedules," that the former was unavailable on at least a dozen occasions, and that "there was really no disagreement in terms of how frequently we were meeting." Siebert testified that on one occasion during the RN negotiations, the Union requested that "multiple days" be set aside for bargaining, but that he refused, citing a lack of "flexibility." Further, he testified both he and Richardson often had out-of-state commitments and "there really wasn't much of a push." Finally, in this regard, I note an August 4, 1980 letter from Richardson to Siebert (G.C. Exh. 18) in which the former complained that "meeting only once a week is not acceptable." I further note that in the Union's "negotiation news" newsletters (R. Exhs. 7(a)-(aa)), which were distributed to employees subsequent to a bargaining session and in which the Union discussed the events of that meeting, there is never mention of the frequency (or lack thereof) of the bargaining sessions or their length.

[7] There was no agreement in the following areas: union security, employee classifications, grievance arbitration, entire agreement clause, no-strike/no-lockout, staffing, role of the registered nurse, fringe benefit improvement guarantee, wages, sick leave, holidays, retirement, disability insurance, uniform allowance, and management rights.

[8] The remaining meetings on the LPN-Tech unit contract occurred on September 29, October 28, November 11, December 2, 15, and 17, and January 8, 1982.

As previously stated, it is alleged that Respondent's positions and/or style of bargaining over several contractual proposals during the entire course of bargaining demonstrate its bad faith during the LPN-Tech negotiations. The first such area involves the subject of union secruity. On this, the Union's proposal was consistent from the commencement of the RN negotiations—a union-shop provision requiring membership in the Union within 31 days of employment by Respondent. Counterproposing on July 17, 1980, an open-shop clause, Siebert, according to Richardson, would not even discuss any form of union-security clause. There is no dispute on this point. According to Respondent's chief spokesman, his position to Richardson on this subject was that the Union must first fulfill the requirements of the Colorado Labor Peace Act (8-3-101-CRS 1973), which requires the holding of a "collective-bargaining unit" election in order "to authorize" the inclusion of an "all-union" provision[10] in any collective-bargaining agreement entered into in Colorado subsequent to July 1, 1977, before substantive negotiations on it can be held. In his meetings with Richardson, Siebert interpreted the statute to mean that the mandated election "merely gives the union the right to bargain over that issue." Therefore, the latter testified, "you're really preempted from having a meaningful discussion on that topic until the election is held." Richardson countered that Siebert's interpretation was incorrect and that a union-security clause may be negotiated, but employees must vote on and ratify the provision before such can become effective. Accordingly, he believed bargaining would have been meaningful.[11] Siebert maintained this position through the LPN-Tech negotiations, forestalling any bargaining on union security.

The Union's original contract proposals concerning the RN unit not unexpectedly contained no management-rights provision. In July 1980, Respondent proposed a two-page management-rights article, which set forth, in detail, the reserved rights of management, but did not make such list all inclusive. These included scheduling hours, directing work, hiring, promoting, transferring, suspending, demoting, selecting supervisors and utilizing such individuals to "perform any work when deemed necessary by [Respondent]," limiting union activities so as not to interfere with hospital work, and determining employee competency. On September 28, 1980, and August 18, 1981, respectively, the Union offered two shorter and less detailed counterproposals. The first, a single sentence, recognized that the parties retained rights held prior to the contract, and the latter, one paragraph in length, recognized that the agreement should not be construed to limit the hospital's operation of its business and specifying certain rights retained by Respondent, including the rights to hire, transfer, promote, lay off, discipline, and discharge employees. Richardson testified that Siebert would not accept either counterproposal, saying the changes of such were "slim and zero." The latter testified that there was no lengthy discussion of Respondent's management-rights proposal during the RN negotiations because the Union had other priorities and conceded that, having rejected the union counterproposals, he may have stated that the parties were "miles apart" on that issue. Further, according to Siebert, Respondent insisted on inclusion of its proposal during the LPN-Tech unit negotiations; however, except for brief position statements and agreement to reserve discussion, there apparently was no meaningful bargaining on the issue until January 8, 1982.

Prior to the commencement of the RN unit contract negotiations, Respondent did not have a grievance procedure for its employees. The Union's initial contract proposal included a detailed four-step grievance procedure, with the last step being arbitration. During the RN negotiations, Respondent submitted and bargained about three counterproposals on a grievance procedure. The initial one, presented with several others on June 25, 1980, set forth a rather simplified two-step process. The second, dated February 26, 1981, recognized prior steps and proposed as the final step submission of any unresolved grievance to a labor-management grievance committee that would be authorized to decide grievances pertaining to discipline, discharge, or interpretation of the contract. The second, offered July 21, 1981, was significantly more elaborate, encompassing four steps, with the last recognizing the Union's right to strike if no satisfactory settlement was reached. Regarding arbitration, there is no dispute that Respondent adamantly refused to consider it. Richardson quoted Siebert as saying Respondent considered arbitration to be "an abhorrent process" as it "did not want to delegate authority to third party." Siebert testified that "Mr. Richardson and I had, I guess, what you might call a philosophical difference on the question which we discussed at some length on a number of occasions." The witness continued, saying that "the hospital really wasn't interested in having some third party outsider who was unfamiliar with the [contract and industry] . . . second guessing what the parties had negotiated."[12] Whatever negotiations were had by the parties on a grievance procedure and arbitration were carried over and resumed by them in discussing the LPN-Tech unit contract. Although it is unclear at which meeting, according to Richardson, ultimately "we arrived at a very workable grievance procedure, absent any arbitration or third party review." Analysis of it discloses that Respondent accepted an involved, four-step procedure and that the Union reserved the right to strike if not satisfied with the result of a grievance. Further, it does not appear that any other provisions, including management rights, of the projected contract were rendered beyond the reach of the grievance procedure. On the matter of the entire agreement, or "zipper" clause, the record establishes that Respondent proposed this provision in July 1980 and insisted on its inclusion in both the RN and the LPN-Tech collective-bargaining agreements. The language of the article had each contracting party waiving its right to bargain over matters not covered by the entire agreement and acknowledging that the terms of the contract represented their entire agreement, excluding from consideration any past practices or understandings that may alter or amend the contract's express terms. Another controversial provision was the no-strike/no-lockout clause. Although both Respondent and the Union apparently desired such language, that of the former was considerably more detailed. Specifically, Respondent's proposal subjected any violator to discipline and prohibited sympathy strikes or picketing. On the other hand, Respondent limited the prohibition against strikes by recognizing the Union's rights under other contractual articles.

[9] Both the General Counsel and the Union contend that the drawn-out negotiations were caused, as during the RN unit negotiations, by Siebert's inability to meet more frequently. Thus, Richardson testified that Siebert was too busy to meet during the weeks immediately subsequent to the October 28 and November 11 meetings, and Norma McAdams, who had been an LPN for Respondent for 7 years and who attended the bargaining, corroborated that Siebert was unavailable during the week following the October 28 meeting as he had "other things" scheduled away from Denver.

[10] The term "all-union" encompasses the type of union shop clause involved. Communications Workers v. Western Electric Co., 93 LRRM 2176, 2182, 2183 (1976).

[11] Richardson asserted that Siebert took the same position on dues deduction—that employees would have to vote on whether they would accept such a clause before he would bargain about it. However, Siebert soon dropped this demand and agreed to such a provision both in the RN unit and, later, the LPN-Tech unit contract.

In addition to the foregoing, it is asserted that by its methods and means of negotiating other provisions, Respondent unnecessarily delayed negotiations, thereby exhibiting bad-faith bargaining. In its original RN unit contract proposal, the Union set forth an article on staffing, which provision concerned the numbers of RNs required for a shift and their assignments. Included within this proposal was a detailed point system that was designed to determine when additional nurses in excess of the scheduled staff are required. Also, the Union proposed a professional performance committee, whose role would be to recommend methods to improve patient care. Respondent counterproposed a less detailed staffing article on June 16, 1981, approximately 1 year later. Asked whether bargaining on the Union's original proposal occurred during the interim period, Richardson testified, "We tried on numerous occasions when the Employer responded by saying that he wasn't prepared to discuss it at this time for one reason or another." He later added that Siebert's standard excuse for his lack of preparedness was "he claimed he didn't have an understanding of the complexities and the nuances of the nursing profession and . . . he would always have to get back with some member of management to be responsive."[13] The Union submitted a counterproposal on September 1 that solely related to the RN unit staffing matter. Richardson further testified that staffing continued to be an area of disagreement between Siebert and himself as it concerned the LPN-Tech unit negotiations—"as it related primarily to the LPNs, not so much with the other technical employees . . . we did convey to [the hospital] that we wanted something in the form of a professional performance committee for the LPNs as well . . . we basically consolidated the concept of . . . staffing with the professional performance committee." According to Richardson, what was conveyed to Siebert on September 17 was different than what had been discussed during their prior bargaining; "we wanted to make proposals that related to the LPNs." Siebert had no immediate response; however, the record establishes that the matter was discussed on October 28 (Siebert expressed doubt that Respondent would accept a separate performance committee for the LPNs), on November 11 (Richardson and Siebert discussed the makeup of a professional performance committee in substantive terms), and on December 15 (Richardson informed Siebert that the Union would accept a less formalized staffing system for the LPNs if Respondent "guaranteed" LPN input on decisions).

Another area of alleged delay concerned the matter of retirement coverage. Pursuant to its nonprofit status, Respondent was permitted to, and did, remove its employees from the coverage of the social security system and, under law, was given 18 months to arrange for and implement replacement coverage. Although such action was undertaken in 1980, it was not until March 1981, during an RN unit negotiating session, that Siebert announced what had been done, stating that new coverage was mandated to be effective August 1. The difficulty was that Respondent was still in the process of investigating various alternatives. It is asserted by the General Counsel that Respondent's conduct left little time for bargaining. In this regard, Richardson asserted that Siebert became "evasive" on this subject and "never very definite" concerning options or other types of retirement plans. Despite the above deadline, selection of a retirement carrier remained an unresolved matter when the LPN-Tech unit contract discussions began. On or about November 30, Respondent finally made a proposal of a retirement plan funded by several insurance carriers. Regarding the proposal, Siebert averred that he did not believe that the identity of the insurance carrier was even a bargainable subject. Finally, negotiations of this important subject, according to Richard, "consumed" the entire December 17 bargaining session. Yet another area of delay is alleged to be wages. The Union's original, and constant, demand during the RN unit bargaining was for an immediate increase of 19-1/2 percent; as a counterproposal, Respondent initially offered a wage freeze, maintained this through the spring of 1981 despite the Union's arguments that the hospital would not remain competitive with such a posture, and ultimately proposed a 3-1/2-percent wage rate increase for the RNs, to be effective January 1982. Regarding the LPN-Tech unit negotiations, it does not appear that any formal wage rate discussions occurred prior to December 15. On that date Richardson proposed an immediate 14-1/2-percent wage increase for the technical unit. Siebert counterproposed what he characterized as a "semi-serious" offer of a 3-1/2-percent wage increase for the duration of the agreement.[14]

[12] Siebert testified that, other than engaging in a strike, the Union's only other recourse to protest an adverse grievance adjustment was to file a lawsuit purusant to Sec. 301 of the Act. In such a case, he acknowledged, a Federal district court judge, an outside third party, would render a decision that conceivably could involve interpretation of the collective-bargaining agreement. Siebert left unexplained how this would differ from the role of an arbitrator selected by the parties.

[13] In this regard, I note the testimony of Larry Gnuse that the assistant director of nursing, who had been assigned the task of coordinating all matters concerning staffing both for the RN unit and the LPN-Tech unit negotiations, regularly attended the bargaining.

In summation, after their bargaining session of December 17, Respondent and the Union had agreed on several items inclusive in the projected LPN-Tech unit contract but were apart on others, including wages, vacations, sick leave, holidays, staffing, management rights, the "entire agreement" clause, the social security alternative, and other items. With matters in this posture, and after just 3 months of bargaining and seven bargaining sessions, the Union's certification year had less than a month remaining.

2. The December 30, 1981 raise announcement

There is no dispute that on December 30, 1981, Respondent distributed the following written announcement to its employees:

> To: All Rocky Mountain Hospital Employees
> From: Mr. Robert Pierce, Administrator
> Date: December 30, 1981
> Subject: Annual Wage Increases
> Because of extraordinary expenses from this year's events, low census, and cutting back of federal grant money, Rocky Mountain Hospital is ending the year in a loss situation. Nevertheless, we are optimistic that by vigorous marketing and new outreach programs, and with some increase in charges, our financial situation will improve. Although it will be necessary to put new equipment acquisitions and other capital improvements on hold for a while, the Board of Directors feel it is an important priority to grant wage increases at this time, commensurate with other metro Denver hospitals. We believe Rocky Mountain Hospital can proudly call itself, "the little hospital with the big heart" because of the dedication and competence of our employees. Your needs and the needs of our patients come first.
> Therefore, beginning with the first pay period on January 8, 1982, all employees except those who are exempt status, management or in the LPN-Technician bargaining unit,* will receive an 8.5% increase. This will be in addition to the usual merit increases for those eligible. The above increase will be reflected in your paycheck to be received on January 29, 1982.
> As of January 1, 1982, the hospital and its staff will contribute towards a Social Security Alternative Plan rather than Social Security. Those eligible for Social Security benefits in 1981 will continue to be eligible for the same Social Security benefits in 1982, because of past contributions.
> The Alternative Program will provide protection on January 1, 1982, for those not yet eligible for Social Security benefits, and additional benefits for those with continued Social Security benefit eligibility. The hospital's contribution will be 6.7%, the same as would have been paid into Social Security. The employee contribution will be 6.0%, .7% less than the 1982 Social Security rate. Full details of this plan will be announced shortly. This reduced employee contribution, plus additional tax savings, plus the 8.5% pay increase should result in greater employee financial security in 1982.
> We wish you and your loved ones a very Happy and Prosperous New Year!
>
> ---
>
> * By law, all changes in wage benefits and working conditions for members of the bargaining unit are subject to negotiations with the AFT, F.N.H.P. (AFL-CIO).
>  The Alternative Plan is a continuing subject of negotiations with the Union. Details applicable to bargaining unit employees will be finalized through the negotiations process.

Regarding the annual nature of this type cost-of-living raise, Judith Boyce, who had been a nurse with Respondent for 6 years, and Norma McAdams testified that cost-of-living raises were given to Respondent's employees every January. Regarding the above-announced raise, [14] Regarding how Respondent arrived at its proposed raise, Siebert stated that he most likely made such an offer without consultations with either the administrator, Pierce, or the negotiating committee "because that was not a figure where realistically the parties would end up." Larry Gnuse testified that although Siebert would not normally make a wage proposal without prior consultation, regarding the 3.5-percent wage offer, "it's my recollection that because it was proposed earlier to the RNs, that it would have been acceptable under the way the team was operating to go ahead and do that in the LPN-Tech unit also." Nevertheless, he did recall discussing the proposal with Siebert before offering it to the Union.

Larry Gnuse testified that in late 1981 Respondent was in a tough financial position and the decision was made to delay any cost-of-living adjustment until a survey of what competing hospitals were paying was completed. In this regard, explained Gnuse, there was intense competition for nurses, and Respondent felt it could afford to pay only what was necessary to retain its staff. Accordingly, it was Gnuse's responsibility to gather data and make a recommendation to the hospital board of directors' executive council, which, in turn, was charged with making a recommendation to the full board. A recommendation was made, and on December 7, 1981, 8 days before the 3.5-percent raise counteroffer was made to the Union by Siebert, the executive board approved a hospital administration proposal that "beginning in January an average of 8.5% increase will be given to all non-exempt employees." The executive board's approved proposal was given to the board of directors on December 21. Its minutes regarding the raise read as follows: "Salary increases must be implemented, and Mr. Pierce stated that the Executive Committee did approve the 8.5% increase. . . . The 8.5% increase was ratified for all non-managerial employees, and will be presented by the negotiating committee to the union at its next session."

The board of directors having approved the cost-of-living raise, Gnuse informed Siebert "that the wage proposal . . . that that is what we were supposed to offer to the Union on the next available negotiating session after it was passed." Gnuse denied that Siebert played any role in establishing this figure—"Mr. Siebert was directed to make an 8.5 percent offer." The announcement of the raise was made 9 days before the next scheduled meeting with the Union, January 8, 1982. Gnuse explained that the timing of the announcement was based on competitive factors and rumors that no raise would be given, testifying, "I had to get it out as soon as possible to squelch those rumors . . . . We couldn't afford to delay." Regarding why the LPN-Tech bargaining unit employees were not given the raise at the same time it was announced for the other employees, Gnuse listed four reasons: the hospital could not lawfully alter or modify the wages of represented employees except through negotiations; the announcement had to be immediate to avoid losing staff; "We also realized that the announcement of an 8.5 percent increase would put economic and political pressure on the union to accept maybe an 8.5 percent increase like everybody else. Up to this point they had steadfastly clung to . . . a fourteen and a half percent increase and the hospital could not afford that"; and Respondent was accommodating previous objections from the Union over wage increase announcements.[15] Walter Siebert gave a slightly different explanation for Respondent's conduct, "I think the rationale there was that historically the hospital had announced in December . . . wage increases effective in January . . . . My thought was that I didn't want to preempt the union from collective bargaining over the issue of wages. So rather than announce that the wage increase unilaterally would be applicable to the persons for whom we were . . . bargaining, we would discuss that with the union, modify our offer and tell them that we would make it effective on the same day."

3. The last bargaining session

At the conclusion of the December 17 bargaining session, the parties scheduled their next meeting for January 8, 1982, and compiled an agenda[16] for discussion during it. Union spokesman Richardson described his attitude prior to the meeting as follows: "Recognizing that we had been at negotiations for a long period of time over items that at least from my experience have never faced such opposition to . . . that the certification year was soon to be up, my attitude was to try to reach agreement on all outstanding items, recognizing that we had the best that we thought we could do and that the Employer wasn't going to move any further." The record discloses that during this session there was serious discussion of all the unresolved contractual provisions, with substantial movement by both parties. More specifically, regarding a wage increase for the LPN-Tech employees, Siebert, in accord with his instructions, offered to the Union an immediate 8.5-percent across-the-board pay raise, identical to that announced for the other hospital employees, and said, "But that certainly did not preclude them from further bargaining on the issue." Richardson announced his acceptance of the offer. Regarding Respondent's proposed management-rights clause, there was substantial discussion that resulted in an agreed-on revised version. Thus, several points were removed, including the language reserving to Respondent, the exclusive rights to have supervisors perform any work deemed necessary, to limit union activity on hospital property, to schedule operations and determine the number of and duration of shifts, to terminate employees who are laid off or transferred because of "process or technique, and to transfer employees from job to job or from shift to shift, and several reserved rights were modified by the inclusion of the changing of certain words." Also, Respondent withdrew its insistence that the "zipper" clause be included in the projected contract, and Siebert accepted, with some modification, the Union's September 1 staffing counterproposal. For his part, true to his convictions, Richardson accepted Respondent's offers concerning holidays, sick leave, vacations, hours of work, the basic social security alternative proposal, uniforms, and employee discounts.

There is no dispute that agreement was reached in the above areas, and there is also no dispute that certain matters were left unresolved. The most significant of these was contract duration. Regarding this issue, Richardson testified that, at the start of the RN unit negotiations, he proposed a 1-year contract "because of the novelty of the relationship." Siebert opined that this would be reasonable, but there was no definite acceptance. He further testified that his preference for a 1-year term was mentioned on two other occasions during the RN unit negotiations. On one occasion, when Siebert proposed a wage freeze in lieu of a raise in wages, Richardson objected, saying that in a year Respondent would no longer be competitive; Siebert disagreed. Also, according to Richardson, during a meeting on May 13, 1981, while he and Siebert were discussing health and welfare, "as [contract term] applied to [that subject], we had a brief discussion on the length of the agreement. I am asking him if it is acceptable to approach health and welfare as we have with regard to the RNs and the LPNs together, and he responds by saying depending on the length of contract." Regarding discussions of the term of the LPN-Tech unit contract prior to January 8, 1982, Richardson admitted that there had been no specific negotiations on that issue. Richardson insisted, however, that on September 17 he went through the Union's RN unit proposal "item by item"—"We gave them the same package for the technical unit. They were the proposals that we worked from."—and included was his proposal for a 1-year contract.[17] Ultimately, Richardson conceded regarding when the contract term was raised during the LPN-Tech unit negotiations, "I think it wasn't until the last day," and admitted he could not say with certainty that Siebert knew what he had in mind regarding that issue. Siebert testified that contract duration was only discussed at the final bargaining session—"that was the only time that I recall it was discussed." He continued, stating that duration was never mentioned as a topic to be discussed at a future meeting; consequently, the hospital never prepared a position on it. Further, he averred, duration is usually the last item for agreement inasmuch as economic decisions must be made before, and only then can you determine how long the contract should be effective. Finally, he denied having any discussion on duration during the RN unit negotiations or any inkling regarding how long the Union desired the LPN-Tech unit contract to be. Larry Gnuse, who attended most of the RN unit and LPN-Tech unit negotiations, stated that contract duration "was brought up in earnest . . . in the final negotiations day," and conceded, regarding earlier discussion, "it may have been mentioned in passing." In any event, there is no dispute concerning what was said about the issue at the January 8 meeting. Richardson stated that it arose on presentation by Siebert, of the hospital's pay raise offer. The former inquired regarding whether such was just for 1982, and Siebert responded, "it depends on the length of the agreement." Richardson replied that the Union wanted a 1-year contract. Siebert said that he would like to leave the matter open and suggest an extra year with a wage reopener. To this, Richardson said, "we would be agreeable to more than one year with reopeners that deal with compensation." At the conclusion of the session, according to Richardson, "I give him complete discretion or convey our ability to live with the hospital's complete discretion . . . a single year or pick a multi-year with reopeners or a multi-year with wage adjustments agreed to at this time"; Siebert said he would draft something.[18] The latter did not controvert this testimony, and he corroborated Richardson concerning the options discussed.

[15] In July 1980 and January 1981, the hospital announced cost-of-living raises for all staff nurses, team leaders, and charge nurses and advised the Union of such by letter. Presumably the announcements and the implementation of these raises formed the basis for alleged "unilateral change" 8(a)(1) and (5) violations, matters that were remedied by a settlement agreement, containing a nonadmission clause, in Cases 27-CA-7092, 27-CA-7092-2, 27-CA-6781, and 27-CA-6819. Inasmuch as the Regional Director for Region 27 has not revoked his approval of the settlement agreement, I am precluded from examining the merits of the allegations and from considering the underlying conduct as unfair labor practices.

[16] At the end of each bargaining session, the parties would draw up a list of items for discussion at the next session. Siebert admitted that this did not mean that he and Richardson could not discuss other matters as they arose at the next meeting. The items on the agenda for discussion on January 8 were wages, holidays, and shift differential.

Other items as well remained open. Richardson testified that the matter of short-term disability and whether this was covered under the social security alternative plan was unresolved. Also, on September 17 while the parties discussed the proposed recognition clause, a problem developed when it was observed that the job classification "bio-med tech" had apparently been inadvertently omitted from the LPN-Tech unit certification. This resulted in a further complication, with no wage rate applicable to the position. According to Richardson, he attempted to resolve the matter by stating to Siebert on January 8 that the Union only desired recognition in the certified unit. However, he admitted no agreement was reached. Further, Richardson stated that there remained lack of agreement concerning shift differential pay and that Siebert "suggested" that they leave that issue open because "he may be able to add a little more in that area." Finally, it appears that also unresolved was the issue of vesting in the contractual retirement program, for, in a newsletter that was distributed to employees subsequent to the January 8 session, the Union listed as unresolved three benefit items: shift differentials, vesting in the retirement program, and short-term disability.

4. The decertification petition and Respondent's withdrawal for bargaining

The petition in Case 27-RD-587 was filed by Patricia Eich on January 11, 1982. The record discloses that the individual who commenced obtaining signatures for the decertification was Jack White, who, at the time, was a tech in the engineering department. He testified that, during December 1981 and early January 1982, he collected signatures from 35 LPN-Tech bargaining unit employees. He was assisted in collecting the signatures by Eich, an x-ray technician. She was given the petition papers by White, observed each employee sign, and, in all, was able to obtain approximately 12 signatures. White estimated that at least 60 employees were in the LPN-Tech bargaining unit; they knew those employees who signed to be unit members. Sometime on January 11 both White and Eich went to the offices of Region 27 of the Board, filed the aforementioned petition, and returned to the hospital. Thereupon, they went to Administrator Pierce's office and spoke to him there. White estimated the time of day as between 12 and 1 p.m.; Eich placed it as prior to 3:30 p.m. ("But I'm not sure.") According to White, "We told him that we had just been at the National Labor Relations Board office and we had filed a petition for the decertification of the union and I believe we also told him that probably about 60 percent of the employees had signed the petition. And he said, 'Thank you.' And that's about it." According to Eich, "We just told him that we had come back from the Labor Board and filed a petition with a majority—with 60 percent of the votes—the people that signed it." There is no record evidence that Respondent was either aware of or participated in the decertification petition process.

[17] Scrutiny of G.C. Exh. 13, the table of contents, and compilation of union proposals made to Respondent during the RN unit contract negotiations and the document from which the parties worked on September 17, 1981, establishes that contract terms are not included as a proposal.

[18] Both counsel for the General Counsel and the Union attach significance to the failure of Siebert to accept one of the contract duration options. Regarding the extent of his authority to agree to anything during bargaining, Siebert testified that he had "full authority" to bargain with two exceptions—all agreements were tentative until a final agreement was reached and whatever was negotiated had to be approved by the hospital board of directors. Also his authority was limited "in terms of direction . . . from my client." Siebert denied receiving any direction on contract duration.

Larry Gnuse testified regarding Siebert's authority: "Our counsel . . . was more—was directed once—was basically fed information from myself and from the negotiating committee in terms of what is . . . workable language. His job was to put that into proposals. He also got direction directly from the hospital administrator." Regarding the latter, Siebert portrayed his contacts with Pierce as irregular and sporadic. Gnuse corroborated this, stating that Siebert was not in "constant contact" with Pierce because he dealt primarily through the negotiating committee.

At 1:26 p.m. (MST) on January 11, Siebert sent the following mailgram to Richardson:

> WE HAVE BEEN INFORMED THAT A PETITION HAS BEEN FILED WITH THE NLRB FOR A DECERTIFICATION ELECTION. IT IS OUR UNDERSTANDING THAT THE PETITION WAS SUPPORTED BY MORE THAN A MAJORITY OF THE EMPLOYEES IN THE LPN TECH UNIT. CONSEQUENTLY AT THIS TIME WE ARE SUSPENDING BARGAINING AND WITHDRAWING OUR PROPOSALS ON THE INFORMATION AND BELIEF THAT YOU NO LONGER REPRESENT A MAJORITY OF EMPLOYEES IN THE UNIT.

Regarding how Siebert learned of both the filing of the decertification petition and the contents of the conversation among Pierce, White, and Eich, Larry Gnuse testified that he spoke to Pierce on the afternoon of January 11 and informed him of the filing of the decertification petition supported by 60 percent of the LPN-Tech unit employees. Shortly thereafter, Gnuse telephoned Siebert and informed him of what had occurred. In any event, subsequent to January 11, the Union has demanded that Respondent resume bargaining, and the latter has continually refused, citing a belief that the Union no longer represents a majority of employees in the above unit.

Other than the statements by employees White and Eich, there exists no other record evidence to support Respondent's asserted belief. Further, at the hearing, Respondent's counsel stated that the January 11 mailgram was also intended as a withdrawal of recognition from the Union as the majority representative of the LPN-Tech bargaining unit employees. For purposes of discussion, I will consider the January 11 telegram as both suspending negotiations and withdrawing recognition.

5. The no-solicitation/no-distribution rules

Although unclear in the record, Respondent, during calendar year 1980, maintained in effect a no-solicitation/no-distribution rule that was printed on page 53 of its personnel policies manual, a document distributed to all employees. The rule, General Counsel's Exhibit 30, reads as follows:

> SOLICITING
> Solicitations by Employees
> No materials shall be distributed to and no solicitation shall be made of any employee in any public area within the premises. Any solicitation must be confined to non-work, non-public and non-patient areas and during non-working time.
>
> Solicitations by Non-Employees
> Non-employees may not solicit on the Hospital premises for any reason whatsoever.

The rule was one basis for the Union's objections to the initial representation election, involving the LPN-Tech unit employees, in Case 27-RC-5926. The objection was deemed meritorious. In addition, the rule was also considered as an allegation of the unfair labor practice charges that eventually resulted in the settlement agreement, discussed in footnote 15, supra.

LPN Norma McAdams testified that she observed a notice, General Counsel's Exhibit 31, posted for approximately 1 week sometime during the spring of 1982 on the bulletin board of the nurses station, Three North, and possibly on the bulletin board located outside the personnel office. The notice reads as follows:

> March 17, 1982
> To: All Employees
> From: Larry Gnuse, Assistant Administrator/ Special Projects
> Re: Solicitation–A Reminder
> Due to a recent rash of solicitors in the hospital, the Rocky Mountain Hospital solicitation policy has been reproduced below. The policy applies to all solicitations.
> If you are solicited in violation of the policy, please remind the person(s) of the policy and/or, if necessary, contact the Personnel Department.
>
> "In order to prevent interference with the hospital's patient care responsibilities, the rules below must be observed:
> 1. Nonemployees: Persons who are not employed by the hospital are not permitted to distribute material or to solicit employees for any purpose whatever on hospital grounds or inside the hospital building, at any time.
> 2. Employees: Every employee's work deserves his or her full attention during scheduled working time. Therefore, employees may not solicit other employees for any purpose, at any time, in an area strictly devoted to patient care, such as patient's rooms, operating rooms, and patient treatment areas, such as X-ray and therapy areas.

> An employee who is on his/her free time or break time, may not solicit or distribute literature to employees who are working."

Larry Gnuse testified that when he was hired in January 1981, Kay Beavers, the former personnel director, told him that the solicitation/distribution policy printed in the personnel manual (G.C. Exh. 30) was no longer in effect and had been superseded by the policy set forth in the March 1982 notice. According to Gnuse, he affixed the revised rule to page 53 of his master copy of the personnel manual but did not, at that time, distribute the revised rule to the hospital employees because he was informed this had previously been done. Subsequently whenever copies of the manual were given to new employees or, on request, to present employees, a folded copy of the revised rule would be inserted.[19] The witness further testified that the March 17 notice was posted because the hospital, at that time, had been encountering problems including a lawsuit, solicitations by a private detective during worktime for information, and selling activities on hospital property by nonemployees.

Tycho Christensen, Respondent's present personnel director, testified that at the time of his hire (March 29, 1982), he observed the March 17 notice posted on bulletin boards inside and outside the personnel office, was told that it had replaced the no-solicitation/no-distribution policy, printed on page 53 of the personnel manual, and believed it had been distributed to all employees. In any event, he commenced ripping page 53 out of the booklets and replacing it with an insert of the new rule whenever the manual was given out. According to Christensen, during April 1982 he discussed with Respondent's attorney possible updating of the entire personnel manual, including the no-solicitation/no-distribution rule. The latter was of the view that the language was adequate, but suggested some modifications. Accordingly, in late April 1982, General Counsel's Exhibit 33, Respondent's revised no-solicitation/no-distribution policy, was posted on the bulletin board located outside the personnel office.[20] Christensen testified that this represents Respondent's current solicitation/distribution policy, that copies were distributed only to new employees on receipt of the personnel manual, and that he considered the posting sufficient to place current employees on notice of the revised policy. The rule reads as follows:

> ROCKY MOUNTAIN HOSPITAL
> NO SOLICITATION RULE
>
> Solicitations are not permitted by employees for any purpose during working time or in immediate patient care areas. An employee may not engage in solicitation of other employees during their working time.
>
> Distribution of literature by employees is not permitted for any purpose during working time or at any time in working areas.
> Working time does not include meal, break, or rest periods or other specified times during the workshift when employees are not properly engaged in performing their work tasks. Immediate patient care areas include: Patient rooms, therapy rooms, nursing stations, x-ray and other patient-treatment rooms. Work areas are defined as areas of the premises where employees perform their work tasks, but do not include break rooms, restrooms, or parking lots.
> Off-duty employees are prohibited from entering any area not open to the public, and are prohibited from interfering with an on-duty employee's performance of his work tasks.
> Non-employees may not solicit for any purpose or engage in distribution of literature of any kind on the hospital premises at any time, except that non-employees, as members of the general public, are free to utilize the public cafeteria in a manner consistent with its purpose.
> Solicitation of or distribution of literature to non-employees on the facilities' premises is prohibited.[21]

Norma McAdams testified that she observed the new rule posted on the personnel office bulletin board in January 1983.[22] Finally, regarding the no-solicitation/no-

---

[19] McAdams testified that she went to the personnel office on March 15, 1982, to obtain a personnel manual. She did so because the previous evening a fellow employee asked her a question about Respondent's sick leave policy and she did not have a copy of the personnel manual. Inside the office, she asked the assistant personnel director for a copy of the manual, observed either the assistant or Gnuse reach up to a shelf for it, was handed the manual, and as she was aware that there were supposed to be inserts, including possibly new personnel policy, inquired whether there were inserts. The assistant said there were none.

[20] Christensen stated that the bulletin board is utilized for the posting of all important employee literature because it is located near the timeclocks and almost all employees pass by it going to or coming from the parking area.

[21] In the third paragraph of the current policy, immediate patient care areas are defined as including nursing stations. There is rather scant evidence regarding areas in the record, and all the evidence comes from the testimony of Norma McAdams. In responding to questions regarding her understanding of the meaning and reach of G.C. Exh. 31, she included nurses stations as being areas in which patient care is administered or in which solicitations would not be allowed. There is no evidence regarding patient access to the areas or what is done by nurses therein. Finally, asked whether "charting" is an essential element of patient care, she answered affirmatively.

Regarding the last sentence of the rule, the record discloses that, other than clericals, management, and some laboratory employees, all employees wear uniforms at work, not all employees wear their uniforms to work and, although name tags are required, employees occasionally forgot to affix them to their uniforms.

[22] McAdams identified G.C. Exh. 32 as a document that she observed posted on the bulleton board of the nurses station in wing, Three North, during the spring of 1982. It reads:

> TO: All RMH Employees
> FROM: Robert H. Pierce, Administrator
> SUBJECT: Unauthorized Inquires[sic]
> DATE: January 18, 1982
> It has come to the attention of Administration that certain unauthorized people have been conducting inquires[sic] on hospital personnel matters. Individual employees should not try to answer such questions, such persons should be referred to Administration.
> Your cooperation will be greatly appreciated.

distribution rules set forth in General Counsel's Exhibits 30 and 31, there is no record evidence of enforcement of either against any employee or nonemployee of Respondent.

B. Analysis

1. The alleged unlawful no-solicitation/no-distribution rules

Paragraphs 5(c) and (d), respectively, of the consolidated amended complaint allege that the no-solicitation/no-distribution rules set forth in General Counsel's Exhibits 30 and 31 are overly broad and, therefore, violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Without regard for the merits of either allegation, I will recommend dismissal of both paragraphs for the following reasons: First, I believe the paragraphs involve conduct that occurred outside the Section 10(b) of the Act 6-month statute of limitations period. Thus, there is no dispute that the original rule existed in, at least, 1980 and was the subject of objections to the conduct of the representation election in Case 27-RC-5962. Larry Gnuse, who testified in an honest and forthright manner and is credited in most instances, stated that the no-solicitation/no-distribution rule, set forth in General Counsel's Exhibit 31, was in effect on his hire in January 1981 and was intended to supersede the prior rule. Notwithstanding that each may have been republished in 1982 (the original rule in the employee manual given to Norma McAdams on March 15[23] and the other when posted on bulletin boards on March 17), such conduct was more than 6 months prior to the filing of the charge in Case 27-CA-7694, and there is no evidence that the rules were enforced during this period of time.[24] Contrary to the General Counsel, the 10(b) 6-month statute of limitations period does apply, and the date for its consideration is that of the amended charge. Thus, I do not believe that the latter can be said to relate back to the date of the original charge, January 20, 1982, noting that the events of the amended charge (no-solicitation/no-distribution rules) cannot be said to have arisen out of the same course of conduct, engaged in by Respondent (bargaining in bad faith and canceling bargaining sessions), as set forth in the original charge. Cf. Michigan Consolidated Gas Co., supra; Air Express International, supra. Rather, the amended charge and the original charge appear to constitute separate and distinct unfair labor practices, resulting in a new statute of limitations period for the former. Industrial Workers ATW, supra. Further, it is clear, and I so find, that the current no-solicitation/no-distribution rule superseded and revised both of the predecessor policies in that regard. Regarding this, it was uncontroverted that the new rule (G.C. Exh. 33) was published in April 1982, having been posted on the personnel department bulletin boards and observed there by Norma McAdams in January 1983. Tycho Christensen testified that the rule was intended to supplant that set forth in General Counsel's Exhibit 31, and there is no evidence to the contrary. Relying on Sunnyland Packing Co., 227 NLRB 590, 595 (1976), the General Counsel argues that the existence of a third no-solicitation/no-distribution rule does not foreclose findings regarding prior rules when there has been no disclaimer about them, and when the manuals containing the prior rules have not been recalled. I find Sunnyland Packing, however, inapposite inasmuch as the respondent, who published an employee booklet containing a no-solicitation/no-distribution rule accompanied by language which, in effect, required employees to inform the company if anyone solicited employees to engage in union activities, sought to establish that the unlawful passage had been removed from new editions of the pamphlet and was no longer meant to be effective, but with the above factors casting doubt about that assertion. Respondent merely asserts that the disputed no-solicitation/no-distribution rule language has been revised and that, so modified, the rule remains in effect. That no employee handbooks were recalled or that Respondent did not specify that all prior rules were no longer valid are hardly relevant considerations inasmuch as General Counsel's Exhibit 33 was posted on the bulletin board on which all significant personnel documents are placed. There is no record evidence, and it would be insulting the intelligence of the skilled hospital staff, to assert that they did not understand that the effect of the posting was to establish that rule as Respondent's current policy on solicitations and distributions.[25]

The relevant issue, then, is the facial validity of the latter and current policy, the legality of which is the subject of amended consolidated complaint paragraph 5(e), an amendment to the complaint at the hearing. Regarding such rules at a hospital facility, the Board, with court approval, has permitted broader applicability than in the more standard industrial setting. Thus, in St. John's Hospital, 222 NLRB 1150 (1976), enfd. in part 557 F.2d 1368 (10th Cir. 1977),[26] the Board referred to its general rule,

On a motion by counsel for the Respondent, I ordered that par. 5(b) of the consolidated amended complaint, which alleges the foregoing notice as violative of Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act, be stricken as involving conduct outside the 10(b) statute of limitations period. I reaffirm that ruling, noting that the date of the notice and its observation by McAdams occurred more than 6 months prior to the filing of the amended charge in Case 27-CA-7694 and that the amendment (allegation of an overly broad no-solicitation/no-distribution rule) does not, at all, arise out of the same course of conduct by Respondent (bad-faith bargaining) as set forth in the original charge so as to relate to it. Cf. Michigan Consolidated Gas Co., 261 NLRB 555 fn. 1 (1982); Air Express International Corp., 245 NLRB 478, 487 (1979). Rather, although properly filed, the amended charge alleges a separate and distinct violation of the Act; therefore, to be unlawful, conduct must have occurred within 6 months of its filing. Industrial Workers AIW Local 594 (Warren Plastics), 227 NLRB 1541 (1977).

[23] Although I credit McAdams on this, I believe her testimony establishes that she knew full well that there should have been an insert, setting forth a revised no-solicitation/no-distribution policy.

[24] Contrary to both the General Counsel and the Union's representative, the burden was on the General Counsel to show that the rules were effective during the statutory 10(b) period and not on Respondent to show each was no longer in effect.

[25] Unlike Sunnyland Packing, in which the respondent sought to establish that language no longer was in existence and that it intended that such should be the case, Respondent would hardly have intended that three conflicting policies remain in effect. It seems reasonable, and I find, that Respondent, at all times, intended that the rule, posted in April 1982, be taken as its only no-solicitation/no-distribution policy.

[26] That hospital's rule prohibited solicitations during working time in working areas and in all areas to which patients and visitors have access and distribution of literature in any area except nonworking areas where patients and visitors do not have access.

that no-solicitation rules are presumed unlawful if extended to this conduct during nonworking time, irrespective of whether this occurs in a work or nonwork area, and that no-distribution rules are presumed valid unless they extend to activities during nonworking times in nonworking areas, and stated that "hospitals may be justified in imposing somewhat more stringent prohibitions on solicitation than are generally permitted . . . a hospital may be warranted in prohibiting solicitation even on nonworking time in strictly patient care areas, such as the patients' rooms, operating rooms, and places where patients receive treatment, such as x-ray and therapy areas." The Board concluded that the respondent's rule was invalid to the extent that it prohibited solicitation and distribution in all areas where patients and visitors have access, "other than immediate patient care areas." Id. at 115. The Board appeared to establish a presumption regarding the foregoing and place the burden of proof on hospitals to establish that solicitations and distributions would disrupt patient care in other hospital areas. This theme was picked up by the Supreme Court in Beth Israel Hospital v. NLRB, 437 U.S. 483 (1978), and NLRB v. Baptist Hospital, 442 U.S. 773 (1979). In the former, the Court wrote approvingly of St. John's Hospital and interpreted the Board to mean that employees' Section 7 rights are presumptively restrained and coerced by prohibitions against solicitations and distributions in other than immediate hospital patient care areas (such as lounges and cafeterias) unless "the facility has . . . justified the prohibitions as necessary to avoid disruption of health care operations or disturbance of patients." Beth Israel Hospital, supra at 507.[27] Therein, the hospital failed to establish that patient care was adversely impacted on by union solicitations in its cafeteria. In Baptist Hospital, the court concluded that the hospital had presented compelling evidence that patient care tended to be disrupted by union-solicitation activities in its corridors and sitting rooms on floors of the facility containing patients' rooms or operation and therapy rooms, but that the hospital had not justified its prohibition against these activities in the first floor cafeteria, lobby, or gift shop. Subsequent Board decisions indicate that it closely scrutinizes the record in order to ascertain whether a hospital has offered sufficient evidence to prove that a prohibition against solicitations and/or distributions in other than immediate patient care areas[28] is necessary to prevent disruptions of health care operations or disturbances of patient care. Baylor University Medical Center, 247 NLRB 1323 (1980); Medical Center Hospitals, 244 NLRB 742 (1979).

Turning now to examination of General Counsel's Exhibit 33, Respondent's current no-solicitation/no-distribution policy, the initial sentence prohibits solicitations "during working time or in immediate patient care areas," and these latter areas are later defined as including the nursing stations. Apparently, then, solicitation in the nursing stations is prohibited at all times and not just on working time. As discussed in footnote 28, supra, the Board has never extended its listing of those areas of, what it considers to be, immediate patient care to include nursing stations, and I will not do so. Thus, this aspect of Respondent's rule is "presumptively invalid." Baptist Hospital, supra at 780. Whether Respondent's nursing stations should be included in those "other" hospital areas in which solicitations may adversely impact on patient care or disrupt health care operations to permit prohibitions on such activity depends on the record evidence. In this regard, there is no record evidence of the type of work performed in the nurses stations, whether patients ever enter these locations, or whether, as in Baptist Hospital, these areas are physically separated from immediate patient care areas or are utilized by employees on breaks from work. Id. at 785 fn. 15. It may well be that solicitations in these locations would disturb patients or disrupt health care operations;[29] however, the burden of proof on these points was on Respondent. It failed to offer such evidence, and I shall not speculate. That Norma McAdams considered the nursing stations as being areas of "patient care" is not, I believe, enough to overcome the Board's presumption that a ban on solicitations in such areas interferes with employees' Section 7 rights. The second paragraph of the current rule prohibits distribution of literature "at any time in working areas," and defines such areas as specifically excluding breakrooms, restrooms, and parking lots. Counsel for the General Counsel argues that the specified exclusions leave the clear impression that they are the only areas so excluded and that such normally nonpatient care areas as the cafeteria, the gift shop, and the first floor lobby seem to be considered "work areas" by Respondent. Accordingly, it is argued, the policy is ambiguous in this regard and, therefore, unlawfully broad. Arguing to the contrary, counsel for Respondent asserts that "reasonable employees" should "understand which areas are included" and that the specified exclusions were merely illustrative of the hospital's nonwork areas. Although not free from doubt, as we are dealing with prohibitions on time-honored Section 7 activities, I believe that in drafting a no-solicitation/no-distribution rule any employer has an obligation to its employees to specify what is and what is not prohibited, thereby not leaving to an employee's interpretation whether particular conduct would violate the rule. The definition of "working areas" could potentially inhibit the distribution of materials in clear nonwork areas (J. H. Block & Co., 247 NLRB 262 (1980)), and "Respondent must assume the burden of ambiguity." Continental Bus System, 229 NLRB 1262 (1977).

The fourth paragraph of the no-solicitation/no-distribution policy prohibits "off-duty" employees from entering any nonpublic areas of the hospital and "from interfering with an on-duty employee's performance of his work tasks." Counsel for the General Counsel, citing

[27] The distribution between disruption of health care operations and disturbance of patients is significant inasmuch as the former may occur not in the presence of patients where doctors, nurses, and a hospital's staff are performing their normal work. Baptist Hospital, supra at 781 fn. 11.

[28] As noted by the Court in Baptist Hospital, supra, "nothing in its subsequent opinions to [St. John's Hospital] has suggested that the Board views areas other than patients' rooms, operating rooms, and treatment rooms as areas of immediate patient care." Id. at 781 fn. 10.

[29] It is unclear whether such patient care work as "charting" is done in the nursing stations.

Eastern Maine Medical Center, 253 NLRB 224 (1980), affd. 658 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1981), argues that this provision is unlawfully broad on its face as employee solicitations or distributions before or after work are prohibited. In Eastern Maine, both the Board and the court found a no-solicitation/no-distribution policy unlawfully broad partly because this rule could be interpreted as prohibiting such conduct during "reasonable periods" before and after work. In support, the Union points to Republic Aviation Corp. v. NLRB, 324 U.S. 793 (1945), in which the Supreme Court stated, "it is therefore not within the province of an employer to promulgate and enforce a rule prohibiting union solicitation by an employee outside of working hours, although on company property." Id. at 803–804 fn. 10. Arguing that the phrase is permissible, counsel for Respondent points to the Board decisions in Tri-County Medical Center, 222 NLRB 1089 (1976), and GTE Lenkurt, Inc., 204 NLRB 921 (1973). In Tri-County, the Board upheld a rule denying off-duty employees access to a hospital, stating such a provision would be presumptively lawful if it limits access solely concerning the interior of the facility and other working areas, is "clearly disseminated" among all the employees, and applies to off-duty employees seeking access for any purpose. Id. at 1089. Analysis of this provision convinces me that it is unclear whether it refers to off-duty employees who remain at the hospital (the Eastern Maine situation) or off-duty employees who leave and then come back to the hospital (the Tri-County situation). In any event, under either analysis, the paragraph is overly broad. Thus, if it refers to off-duty employees inside the hospital, the rule could be interpreted as prohibiting solicitations by off-duty employees of other off-duty employees in nonpublic areas during "reasonable periods" before and after work and, therefore, it is unlawfully restrictive. Republic Aviation, supra; Eastern Maine, supra. If the rule refers to off-duty employees who are away from the hospital, but who wish to return to be within the Tri-County guidelines, I note that, to be considered as not unduly restrictive of Section 7 rights, such a provision must apparently, on its face, be limited to access to the interior of a facility. Respondent's rule contains no such limitation and, contrary to its counsel, as there is no record evidence that no nonpublic areas exist in the exterior areas of the hospital, it clearly has the potential of being interpreted as being applicable to outside areas. As stated above, given the conflict between this type of rule and employees' Section 7 rights, there can be no opportunity for an overly broad interpretation if such a rule is to be found lawful. Finally, counsel for the General Counsel and the Union attack the last paragraph of Respondent's no-solicitation/no-distribution policy by which "solicitation of or distribution of literature to non-employees on the facilities' premises is prohibited." They argue that given the large number of employees, the fact that not all employees wear uniforms to work, and the fact that conceivably an employee might not be wearing a name tag, the provision might inhibit employees exercising their Section 7 rights. In both Republic Aviation, supra, and NLRB v. Babcock & Wilcox Co., 351 U.S. 105 (1956), the Supreme Court reasoned that, in deciding on the validity of rules restricting solicitations and distributions of literature on plant premises, an adjustment between employees' Section 7 rights and employees' property rights was required—an accommodation "with as little destruction of the one as is consistent with the maintenance of the other." Babcock & Wilcox, supra at 112. With the foregoing in mind, certain factors convince me of the facial validity of the instant provision. Initially, Respondent's rule does not prohibit solicitations or distributions to employees, but rather to "non-employees," and I am aware of no Board or court decision limiting or curtailing an employer's exercise of its property rights in such a manner. Next, the rule appears to be, in part, designed to protect the hospital's patients[30] from such activities. In this regard, the Supreme Court and the Board recognize that patients "need a restful, uncluttered, relaxing, and helpful atmosphere, rather than one remindful of the tensions of the marketplace in addition to the tensions of the sick bed." Beth Israel Hospital, supra at 509 (Justice Blackman concurring); Eastern Maine Medical Center, supra at 227 (Board decision).[31] Regarding this, I note that, within the hospital, patients may not be wearing normal patient attire, such as when checking in or when present as outpatients; Respondent's rule clearly protects them and serves a legitimate business purpose. Finally, weighing the above concerns of the General Counsel and the Union against Respondent's property rights establishes only a minimal risk of interference with employees' Section 7 rights. Thus, there appears to be relatively few employees who do not wear uniforms to work or while working or who do not wear name tags, and there are ample locations, both inside and outside the facility, where solicitation and distribution activities can occur.

In conclusion, regarding General Counsel's Exhibit 33, Respondent's current no-solicitation/no-distribution policy, I find it to be overly broad and violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act insofar as it prohibits solicitations, at any time, in nursing stations, as it too broadly defines "work areas" so as to prohibit distribution of literature in such public areas as the cafeteria and the gift shop, and as it prohibits off-duty employees from entering any area not open to the public during reasonable periods before and after work. In other aspects, it fully comports with the Board and court guidelines in this area of the law.

2. Alleged specific acts of bad-faith bargaining

The complaint sets forth several specified actions by which Respondent allegedly bargained with the Union in bad faith—in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. Initially, although not so alleged, I consider whether Respondent demonstrated bad faith by engaging in dilatory actions regarding not only the scheduling of bargaining sessions, but also the entire range of bargaining with the Union.[32] In this regard, the record establishes that, notwithstanding the Board's certification of the Union on January 9, 1981, as the bargaining representative of Respondent's LPN-Tech employees, more than 8 months passed until the parties commenced contract negotiations on September 17; that, during the next 18-week period and despite the end of the Union's initial certification year in early January 1982, the parties held just eight bargaining sessions, none of which lasted more than 3 hours as Respondent found them not productive; that, except for meetings on December 15 and 17, the time period between each meeting was no less than 12 days; and that after one session, Respondent's spokesman Siebert informed the Union that he would be unavailable for a 2-week period due to other commitments elsewhere. As background[33] evidence regarding what appears to be rather unduly delayed and lethargic bargaining during this 4-1/2 month period, I note that, while the Union received its certification in the midst of bargaining for a contract covering the RN unit employees, the Union's spokesman Richardson twice (on January 12 and March 2) wrote to Respondent's administrator Pierce demanding the start of negotiations for a contract covering the LPN-Tech unit employees; that not until May 13, 5 months after the certification, did Siebert formally notify Richardson that he would be the bargaining representative for Respondent in the LPN-Tech contract negotiations; and that Siebert continually refused Richardson's request that the parties facilitate the LPN-Tech unit negotiations by combining them with the ongoing RN unit discussions. Regarding this latter point, I note that most, if not all, of Respondent's positions on specific contractual provisions during the LPN-Tech negotiations were identical, or at least similar, to those taken during the RN negotiations, and Siebert never offered an explanation for his refusal to agree to consolidate the bargaining or to, at least, permit RN unit contract agreements to immediately apply to the projected LPN-Tech unit contract. The foregoing background suggests that the blame for the almost leisurely approach to bargaining during the period September 17, 1981, through January 8, 1982, falls on Respondent. Continental Insurance Co., 204 NLRB 1013, 1013–1014 (1973), enfd. 495 F.2d 44 (2d Cir. 1974). This must be so because it strains credulity to believe that the Union, with its certification year due to expire and with bargaining finally commencing after an 8-month delay,[34] would deliberately have prolonged the negotiations. Inherent in the duty to bargain collectively, as defined by Section 8(d) of the Act, is the obligation to meet at reasonable times and places. St. Louis Comprehensive Neighborhood Health Center, 248 NLRB 1078 (1980). Eight sessions over an 18-week period, after an 8-month delay in the start, hardly meets this requirement; rather, it means that, at most, Respondent engaged in calculated "foot-dragging" designed to avoid or frustrate the bargaining process until the expiration of the Union's certification year (NLRB v. Cable Vision, 660 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1981); Woody Pontiac Sales, 174 NLRB 507 (1969)) or, at the very least, entered the LPN-Tech unit negotiations with a total lack of regard for its bargaining obligations under the Act.[35] In either case, I have no doubt that Respondent engaged in dilatory action regarding the scheduling and conduct of the bargaining in the period September 17, 1981, through January 8, 1982, and, therefore, engaged in bad-faith bargaining, violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. St. Louis Health Center, supra; O & F Machine Products, supra.

[30] In his brief, counsel for Respondent states that the rule was meant to protect both patients and visitors and that Respondent has a compelling and valid business justification for protecting both classes of individuals from unwanted union solicitations or distributions.

[31] Regarding visitors, the Board is less charitable: "We are not persuaded . . . that the special concern for patient welfare . . . which we share with the Court, compels that a similar protection from organizational solicitation be afforded members of the public who are not themselves patients in the hospital environment." Eastern Maine Medical Center, supra at 227.

Next, although likewise not specifically alleged as an act of bad-faith bargaining, is the matter of Respondent's admitted refusal to even discuss the Union's proposed union-security clause, which, if included in the projected contract, would have established a union shop with employees required to join the Union within 31 days of employment. Notwithstanding its own proposal for an open-shop clause, this is not a case of mere inflexibility of position, for Respondent steadfastly refused to bargain over the Union's proposal for reasons assertedly having to do with the Colorado Labor Peace Act. At the outset, not only is it settled law that union security is "properly a 'condition of employment'" and, therefore, a mandatory subject of bargaining, but also failure or refusal to bargain on this subject constitutes a violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. NLRB v. Andrew Jergens Co., 175 F.2d 130, 133 (9th Cir. 1949); United States Gypsum Co., 94 NLRB 112, 114 fn. 9 (1951). Respondent's agent Siebert argued to union spokesman Richardson that there could not be any bargaining on the issue of union security until the employees fulfilled the requirements of the above State of Colorado statute by voting on whether they would accept such a contractual provision and that employee acquiescence to such a provision meant only that a union could lawfully bargain for this type of clause. However, I believe Siebert's assertions in this regard were without any validity and, most likely, disingenuously maintained. Thus, the very wording of the applicable statutory provision, "ratification of an all-union agreement" and petitions for elections covering "agreements entered into" suggests that what the Colorado legislature had in mind were elections to approve previously bargained for contractual union-security clauses and that such clauses could not be enforced prior to such ratification. Support for this view is found in Communi-

[32] The issue was the subject of extensive litigation during the hearing and, thus, may be subject to findings by the Board. Pay 'N Save Corp., 210 NLRB 311, 322 (1974).

[33] Although beyond the 6-month statute of limitations period in Sec. 10(b) of the Act, evidence of the events prior to July 1981 can be utilized to add "meaning to actions or inactions which take place within the period of limitations." Crane Co., 244 NLRB 103, 110 (1979).

[34] Gnuse did not substantiate his assertion that Richardson was unable to meet on at least 12 proposed dates, nor do I believe that out-of-town commitments kept him from being available for meetings. Further, the fact that the Union never publicly complained about Respondent's dilatory tactics may mean nothing more than that the former chose to concentrate on the substantive aspects of the bargaining in its newsletters.

[35] Although the duty to bargain is that of Respondent's, the fact that negotiator Siebert may have legitimately been unavailable to meet on various occasions is no defense to this allegation. He acted as Respondent's agent and Respondent must bear the consequences. O & F Machine Products Co., 239 NLRB 1013, 1019 (1978); Woody Pontiac Sales, supra at 511.

cations Workers of America v. Western Electric Co., supra, in which the Colorado Supreme Court concluded that certain contractual union-security clauses were unenforceable as the affected employees had not approved the provisions by the required "referendum." Specifically, it stated that "the union security provisions here in issue [are] invalid and unenforceable because of the lack of employee approval through an all-union referendum." Id. at 2183. Clearly, what is contemplated is a negotiated clause subject to employee approval. If Siebert's asserted interpretation was correct, employees would be asked to approve the general concept of a union-security clause, leaving the parties free to bargain over the specific type of clause. Employees would thus be buying the proverbial "pig in a poke," and it is inconceivable that the Colorado legislature had such a view in mind. I believe that, as one experienced in labor relations, Siebert was well aware of this. Accordingly, I find that Respondent's failure and refusal to bargain concerning the Union's proposed union-security clause, a mandatory subject of bargaining, during the course of the LPN-Tech unit negotiations was a deliberate course of conduct not undertaken by mistaken knowledge of the law and constituted an act of bad-faith bargaining, violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. Andrew Jergens Co., supra.

The complaint alleges as acts of bad-faith bargaining Respondent's refusal to agree to a clause regarding arbitration of grievances and its insistence on inclusion in a projected LPN-Tech unit contract a management-rights clause and a zipper clause. Notwithstanding being alleged as specific unfair labor practices, these acts are ignored as such by counsel for the General Counsel in her posthearing brief, and each is discussed as a mere indication of surface bargaining, itself an alleged act of bad-faith bargaining. Being somewhat confused by this inconsistency, but aware that it is reflective of the manner in which these matters were presented at trial, I will discuss the three acts as both constituting indicia of surface bargaining and as separate instances of bad-faith bargaining. Regarding Respondent's longstanding rejection of arbitration, counsel for the General Counsel argues that Respondent never deviated from its position, originally taken during the LPN-Tech unit negotiations, that it would not agree to have an outside third party, who was not familiar with the industry, interpret the parties' projected contract, and that the Union's only option, if dissatisfied with the resolution of a grievance, was to strike. On this latter point, according to the General Counsel, the Union's strike option was thwarted by Respondent's proposed all-inclusive no-strike clause. Initially, I note that nothing in the Act requires or compels acceptance of particular contractual language by either negotiating party. H. K. Porter Co. v. NLRB, 397 U.S. 99 (1970). I believe it intellectually dishonest to separate the matter of arbitration from the entire range of bargaining over a grievance procedure, of which arbitration was, in the Union's proposals, a major component. The record establishes, and Richardson admitted, that there was extensive bargaining over the subject of a grievance procedure, culminating in what Richardson characterized as a "workable" procedure. Moreover, alternatives to arbitration, such as resolution of grievances by a joint committee or by the administrator as a final grievance procedure step, were proposed and discussed at length by the parties. Further, although a provision of the agreed-on grievance procedure reserved for the Union the right to strike if not satisfied with a grievance result, nothing required the Union to exercise the right. In this regard, although in many contracts the quid pro quo for a no-strike pledge is an arbitration clause, and although the Board normally finds as an indicia of bad-faith bargaining an employer's insistence on a broad no-strike clause while resisting arbitration of grievances, such is not the case because the proposed no-strike clause, broad in other respects, recognized the Union's right to strike under other contractual provisions, such as the grievance procedure. Finally, it does not appear that any other contractual provisions were rendered beyond the reach of the grievance procedure and its strike clause. In these circumstances, contrary to the General Counsel, I find no bad-faith bargaining in Respondent's refusal to agree to an arbitration provision.

Regarding Respondent's demand that a two-page management-rights clause be included in the projected LPN-Tech unit collective-bargaining agreement, the record establishes that throughout the RN unit and the LPN-Tech unit negotiations, up until January 8, 1982, whenever the issue was discussed (and there is scant evidence that management rights were ever discussed in detail except during the last session), Respondent rigidly insisted on its own originally proposed language, rejecting the two shorter, less detailed union counterproposals. Of course, there is no dispute that at the January 8, 1982 session Siebert agreed to substantial changes in Respondent's proposal, modifying and removing numerous words and phrases. This resulted in, I believe, a significantly altered management-rights provision. Arguing that Respondent manifested bad faith with this contract provision, counsel for the General Counsel relies on the longstanding rigidity of Respondent on this clause and the language thereof. At the outset, an employer's insistence on the inclusion of a management-rights clause in a collective-bargaining agreement is not a per se violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. NLRB v. American National Insurance Co., 343 U.S. 395 (1952); San Isabel Electric Services, 225 NLRB 1073, 1078 (1976). Therefore, if bad faith exists, it must be manifested in the language of Respondent's management-rights proposal or in the manner of the bargaining regarding it. Regarding the former, Respondent's proposed language reserved not only standard rights of management, but also the rights to limit union activity on the facility's property, to utilize supervisors to perform any work deemed necessary, and to determine employee competency. Yet, the proposed language does not appear to be as restrictive as in other management-rights clauses that have been scrutinized by the Board. Thus, in Stuart Radiator Core Mfg. Co., 173 NLRB 125 (1968), the proposed contract clause reserved to management, among others, the rights to discontinue part or all of its operations, to transfer or relocate part or all of its operations to other locations, to perform these at the new location, and to subcontract all or any part of its operations. Moreover, the respondent in Stuart Radia- tor proposed language limiting grievances to the express terms of the contract, and none of the reserved management rights were to be amenable to the grievance and arbitration procedure. I can find no language in the agreed-on management-rights clause that renders it immune from the coverage of the grievance procedure. In addition, of course, on January 8, Respondent agreed to alterations of, and deletions from, its management-rights language; among those items deleted were the right to have supervisors perform any necessary work, the right to limit which activity on hospital property, the right to schedule operations and determine the number and duration of shifts, and the right to transfer employees from job to job and shift to shift. Thus, as in Long Lake Lumber Co., 182 NLRB 435 (1970), Respondent did not foreclose bargaining over the elimination of the specific rights enumerated in the proposals, "and any action taken by the employer pursuant to the management rights clause could be challenged through the grievance procedure, after which the union would have the right to take economic action in support of its positions, if necessary." San Isabel Electric Services, supra at 1079; Long Lake Lumber, supra at 438. In short, I fail to see any bad faith on Respondent's part in either insisting on the inclusion of the management-rights clause or bargaining about it.

On the matter of the insistence by Respondent of the inclusion of an "entire agreement," or zipper clause, there is no dispute that the proffered language was extremely broad and that Respondent ultimately withdrew insistance on any such language at the January 8, 1982 bargaining session. There is little, if any, record evidence regarding specific bargaining on this subject at any prior meeting. In NLRB v. Tomco Communications, 567 F.2d 871 (9th Cir. 1978), the court held that such a clause "is nothing but a diluted form of waiver, and so is governed by the same principles that apply to a management functions clause . . . . The Company could rightly insist on [the zipper clause's] inclusion in the contract." Id. at 879. I do not believe the General Counsel has established bad faith on Respondent's part in this regard.

3. The December 30, 1981 raise announcement

The complaint alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by its printed announcement on December 30, 1981, announcing a general 8.5-percent wage increase for all employees, but withholding same from the LPN-Tech bargaining unit employees. In support, counsel for the General Counsel argues that the announcement served to demean the Union in the eyes of the employees, misrepresented applicable law, and placed the onus for withholding the raise on the Union. Respondent argues that the announcement constituted no more than lawful economic pressure, enhanced rather than demeaned the Union in employees' eyes, and did not constitute a unilateral change of a condition of employment.

At the outset, it is important to understand that this allegation concerns the published announcement; it is not alleged, nor does the record disclose, that Respondent actually withheld the 8.5-percent wage increase from the LPN-Tech employees. Therefore, contrary to the Union's representative, no discriminatory act was committed, nor was any unilateral change ever implemented. With this said, several significant facts are readily apparent. First, there is no question that Respondent had established a past practice of giving to employees an annual cost-of-living raise, usually in January. Thus, employees McAdams and Boyce testified to this without contradiction, and negotiator Siebert testified "that historically the hospital had announced in December wage raises effective in January." However, it appears that the amounts of the raises varied at the discretion of Respondent. Second, the cost-of-living raise, which would be effective in early January 1982, was decided on after a study by Larry Gnuse by the hospital's board of directors on December 21, 1981, and an 8.5-percent raise was to be given to all employees and announced to the Union at the next scheduled bargaining session on January 8, 1982. Third, on December 30, written notification of the pay raise was given by Respondent to all employees. In pertinent part, it read:

> Therefore, beginning with the first pay period on January 8, 1982, all employees except those who are exempt status, management or in the LPN-Technician unit,* will receive an 8.5% increase. This will be in addition to the usual merit increases for those eligible. The above increase will be reflected in your paycheck to be received on January 29, 1982.
> . . . .
> * By law, all changes in wage benefits and working conditions for members of the bargaining unit are subject to negotiations with the AFT, F.N.H.P. (AFL-CIO).

Finally, the announcement of the wage raise was made at a crucial stage of the LPN-Tech unit contract negotiations, with less than 2 weeks remaining in the Union's certification year.

It is alleged that, by this announcement, Respondent announced the withholding of the annual cost-of-living raise from the LPN-Tech unit members. In his posthearing brief, counsel for Respondent argues that nowhere in the document was it explicitly stated that the general wage increase would be withheld from unit employees—only that the amount of their raise "would necessarily be subject to negotiation with the Union." Contrary to counsel, what he reads into the announcement just does not comport with its plain meaning. Thus, my understanding of the language of the document is that LPN-Tech unit employees were to be excluded from receipt of an across-the-board raise, with the subject of a pay raise for them, and not merely the amount of a matter for negotiation between Respondent and the Union. Clearly, unit employees could reasonably believe that, due to the status of the Union as their bargaining representative, the general wage increase was to be withheld from them; the onus for Respondent's announced conduct was therefore placed squarely on the Union. Moreover, that the LPN-Tech employees were entitled to, and it would have been unlawful for Respondent to have withheld, the 8.5-percent raise also seems clear. Thus, inasmuch as they had annually received such a cost-of-living raise in the past, it had, in effect, become "an existing form of compensation, and a term and condition of employment regularly expected by the employees." General Motors Acceptance Corp. v. NLRB, 476 F.2d 850, 854 (1st Cir. 1973). Accordingly, the footnote, marked by the single asterisk, was a misstatement of the applicable law inasmuch as Respondent was under a duty to not depart from past practice and to continue giving cost-of-living raises to the LPN-Tech unit employees in the same manner as it would absent the Union. NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736, 746 (1962); General Motors Acceptance Corp., supra; Diamond Motors, 212 NLRB 820 (1974).[36] Based on the foregoing, I believe Respondent discredited and disparaged the Union in the eyes of its members—thereby weakening its authority as the LPN-Tech unit's bargaining agent at a critical point in negotiations and its ability to function in this capacity. Therefore, Respondent violated its duty to bargain collectively with the Union in good faith and interfered with, restrained, and coerced employees in the exercise of their statutory rights, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. Circle Import Export Co., 244 NLRB 255, 257 (1979); Tyson's Foods, 187 NLRB 525, 531 (1970).

In defense, Respondent argues that the announcement itself constituted lawful economic pressure on the Union. Citing Chevron Oil Co. v. NLRB, 442 F.2d 1067 (5th Cir. 1971), counsel asserts that an employer may lawfully exert economic pressure on a union to obtain the best possible contract terms as long as it is done in the course of good-faith negotiations. In Chevron Oil Co., the respondent engaged in more drastic conduct than herein involved by, during contract negotiations, actually withholding from the represented employees a wage raise that was given to all other (unrepresented) employees.[37] In the underlying NLRB decision, the Board stated, "It has long been an established Board principle that, in the context of good-faith bargaining, and absent proof of other unlawful motive, an employer is privileged to withhold from organized employees wage increases granted to unorganized employees or to condition their grant on final contract settlement." Chevron Oil Co., 182 NLRB 445, 449 (1970). Accepting this principle of law but, unlike the Board, concluding the withholding of the raise was not done "within a bad faith bargaining context," the court found the conduct not violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. Chevron Oil Co., 442 F.2d at 1074.[38] The instant case is distinguishiable in two critical respects. First, unlike in Chevron Oil Co., the record establishes, and I found, that Respondent engaged in bad-faith bargaining with the Union during the LPN-Tech negotiations by its dilatory scheduling and conduct of the bargaining sessions and by its failure and refusal to discuss the subject of union security without a prior employee "referendum" on the issue. Therefore, Respondent's announcement of December 30 was made in a context of surrounding unfair labor practices. Next, Respondent's obligation under NLRB v. Katz, supra, was to give to the LPN-Tech unit employees a wage increase; unlike Chevron Oil Co., Respondent's December 30 announcement amounted to an announced intention to alter what had become a condition of employment employment. Eastern Maine Medical Center v. NLRB, supra at 9; NLRB v. United Aircraft Corp., 490 F.2d 1105, 1110 fn. 4 (2d Cir. 1973). Based on the foregoing, Respondent's defense is without merit.

Next, counsel for the General Counsel and the Union's representative urge a finding of bad-faith bargaining based on the 9-day relay between the granting of the cost-of-living raise to the nonunion employees and the offer of the identical raise at the January 8 bargaining session to the Union for the LPN-Tech unit employees. They argue that this offer presented the Union with a "Hobson's choice"—either accept the offer and, in effect, abdicate its role as the employees' bargaining representative or refuse it and, thereby, deny to the membership benefits enjoyed by all other employees. I find merit in this contention. Thus, Larry Gnuse admitted that an important consideration underlying the timelag between the December 30 announcement and the January 8 offer was Respondent's desire to place maximum "economic and political pressure on the union" to accept as a wage increase the identical amount given to nonunion employees. That this strategy was successful is seen from the fact that Richardson did, indeed, agree to the 8.5-percent raise for the LPN-Tech employees. Given the December 30 written announcement's apparent unlawful withholding of the 8.5-percent cost-of-living raise from the membership and the subsequent 9-day delay until the next bargaining session, during which the pressure to negotiate some sort of equivalent raise must have been intense, the Union's bargaining leverage at the time the offer was communicated at the last negotiations session was nil. Further, I found Gnuse's economic justifications for the timelag utterly unconvincing and believe the only reason for it was his above admission. Considered in this light, that Siebert accompanied his offer with the comment that such would not preclude the Union from seeking more appears to have been a meaningless gesture, mere "window dressing." I believe that the deliberate timing of this offer to the Union, 9 days after the announcement of the identical cost-of-living raise for nonunion employees and its preceived withholding from the LPN-Tech employees, rendered bargaining on the offer virtually impossible and undermined the entire bargaining process as well as demeaning the representative status of the Union. Clearly, such constitutes bad-faith bargaining, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. J. P. Stevens & Co., 239 NLRB 738 (1978).

[36] On the other hand, had the footnote read as argued by counsel, it would have been a correct statement of the law. The record establishes that Respondent determined the amount of each yearly cost-of-living raise. Thus, while Respondent was under a duty to continue its past practice, it "could not unilaterally determine the size of the increase that each employee would receive; it would be required to bargain over this discretionary element." NLRB v. Blevins Popcorn Co., 659 F.2d 1173, 1189 (D.C. Cir. 1981); Oneita Knitting Mills, 205 NLRB 500 fn. 1 (1973).

[37] There was no evidence that, by withholding the raise, the company altered a preexisting condition of employment.

[38] Contrary to the union's representative, to establish unlawful motivation, evidence beyond the announcing of or actual withholding from represented employees of wage increases granted to unrepresented employees itself must be adduced, for, of itself, that disparity is "not so inherently destructive of important employee rights that an unfair labor practice should be found even in the absence of proof of such a motive." Sun Oil Co., 245 NLRB 59 (1979).

4. Surface bargaining

Permission was granted at the hearing for the General Counsel to amend the complaint to allege as further bad-faith bargaining in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act that Respondent engaged in surface bargaining with the Union. Before considering the merits[39] of the allegation, it is important to understand exactly what that term means; I start by examining Respondent's obligation, pursuant to Section 8(d) of the Act, to "confer in good faith with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment." Such has been interpreted as imposing on a party the duty "to enter into discussion with an open and fair mind and a sincere purpose to find a basis of agreement." NLRB v. Herman Sausage Co., 275 F.2d 229, 231 (5th Cir. 1960). Further, the duty to bargain in good faith prohibits "mere pretense at negotiation . . . without [a] spirit of cooperation." NLRB v. Wonder State Mfg. Co., 344 F.2d 210, 215 (8th Cir. 1965). The above, of course, in most situations is not susceptible of easy analysis, and whether a party has complied with its bargaining duty "generally requires inquiry into [its] state of mind during the bargaining." Seattle First National Bank v. NLRB, 638 F.2d 1221, 1225 (9th Cir. 1981). There is no shortcut method of analysis by this. "That determination must be based on reasonable inference drawn from the totality of conduct evidencing the state of mind with which the [party] entered into and participated in the bargaining process. All aspects of the Respondent's bargaining and related conduct must be considered in unity, not as separate fragments each to be assessed in isolation." "M" System, Inc., 129 NLRB 527, 547 (1965). Finally, although good-faith bargaining presupposes an effort to resolve differences, "the duty imposed on the parties . . . does not obligate a party to make concessions or yield a position fairly maintained." Continental Insurance Co. v. NLRB, 495 F.2d 44, 47 (2d Cir. 1974). Surface bargaining, on the other hand, is the antithesis of good-faith bargaining. This entails merely going through the formalities without any "serious intent to adjust differences and to reach an acceptable common ground." NLRB v. Insurance Workers, 361 U.S. 477, 485 (1960). By engaging in surface bargaining, the party's goal is to frustrate, through "shadow-boxing" or a "cat and mouse game," the process rather then enhance the chances of reaching some sort of agreement. NLRB v. Holmes Tuttle Broadway Form, 465 F.2d 717, 719 (9th Cir. 1972). The ultimate question is, of course, to distinguish between good-faith bargaining and surface bargaining. "[W]e look to whether the parties' conduct evidences a real desire to reach an agreement—a determination made by examination of the record as a whole, including the course of negotiations as well as contract contract proposals." Chevron Chemical Co., 261 NLRB 44, 45 (1982). Thus, whether Respondent engaged in surface bargaining depends on whether it desired "to reach ultimate agreement to enter into a collective bargaining contract" with the Union. Insurance Workers, supra.

The crux of the arguments of the General Counsel and the Union on this issue is that Respondent went through the motions of collective bargaining regarding the LPN-Tech unit employees, delaying such until the expiration of the certification year in the hope—or expectation—of the occurrence of some event that would permit it to withdraw from further bargaining. The following factors are relied on as indicia of surface bargaining: Respondent's dilatory tactics and refusal to discuss union security; Respondent's refusal to concede its positions on management rights, arbitration, a zipper clause, and no-strike/no-lockout; and handling of the December 30, 1981 wage announcement; and the duration of the agreement which matter, the complaint alleges, was raised by Respondent at the last bargaining session and January 8, 1982, in order to make certain that no final agreement could be reached. Initially, I have concluded that Respondent, after having delayed the start of bargaining for 8 months, engaged in unlawful dilatory tactics during the 4 months of actual bargaining with the Union over the LPN-Tech unit contract and that by refusing to discuss a union-security clause, it likewise bargained in bad faith. These, however, are per se violations of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act and do not involve the matter of Respondent's state of mind, as seems to be involved in a surface bargaining allegation. Standing by themselves, these factors would not necessitate a finding of the latter. I have also previously concluded that Respondent did not engage in bad-faith bargaining regarding the issues of management rights, the entire agreement (zipper) clause, or the no-strike/no-lockout clause. Rather, I believe the record clearly supports a finding that Negotiator Siebert engaged in mere hard bargaining on these issues, eventually compromising on management rights and withdrawing the zipper clause as a proposal. Although he maintained adamant positions on these provisions, there is no evidence that he ever refused to discuss either or that Respondent's positions were anything but honestly taken. Finally, of course, the Act does not compel concessions. H. K. Porter, supra. Accordingly, I do not believe such are indicia or surface bargaining. Regarding the matter of Respondent's refusal to accede to an arbitration provision, I agree with Respondent's position that bargaining on this cannot be separated from bargaining over a grievance procedure. Here, the record reveals hard bargaining by both Richardson and Siebert and an agreement that each could accept without undue reservation. Further, various final steps to the grievance process were discussed, and although the Union acquiesced to a right to strike, in lieu of arbitration, if dissatisfied with a grievance result, the Board does not scoff at this significant economic weapon. Long Lake Lumber Co., supra at 438. Bad-faith surface bargaining will not be inferred from this. Regarding the December 30 cost-of-living raise announcement for nonunion employees and the timing, 9 days later, of the identical offer to the Union for the LPN-Tech employees, both the General Counsel and the Union's representative assert that, besides constituting bad-faith bargaining, these indicate that Respondent was engaging in surface bargaining. In support, they argue that such are reflective of Respondent's entire bargaining history over wages, that during the period of the RN unit negotiations it originally offered a wage freeze, and only at a late stage of the bargaining did it offer a 3-1/2-percent wage increase, and that, prior to January 8, the identical small increase was offered to the Union. I disagree. The issue regarding surface bargaining is whether Respondent bargained with no intent to reach a final agreement. Even finding, as I did, that Respondent's handling of the 8.5-percent wage offer constituted bargaining in bad faith, it is a far different matter to conclude that this is also reflective of an attitude not to reach final agreement. Just the opposite is true—that Respondent sought to force an agreement on its own terms, at least regarding the raise in wages.

[39] Regarding the relationship, if any, between Sec. 10(b) of the Act and counsel for the General Counsel's "continuum of negotiations" theory, I note at the outset that, as mentioned earlier, Sec. 10(b) establishes a statute of limitations for the finding of unfair labor practices of 6 months preceding the date of the filing of a charge. Beyond that period, events cannot be found to have been unfair labor practices. However, as stated by the Supreme Court in Machinists Local 1424 v. NLRB, 362 U.S. 411 (1960):

> It is doubtless true that Section 10(b) does not prevent all use of evidence relating to events transpiring more than six months before the filing . . . of an unfair labor practice charge. However . . . due regard for the purpose of Section 10(b) requires that two different kinds of situations be distinguished. The first is one where occurrences within the six-month limitations period in and of themselves may constitute . . . unfair labor practices. There, earlier events may be utilized to shed light on the true character of [such matters] . . . and for that purpose Section 10(b) . . . does not bar such [evidence]. The second situation is that where conduct occurring within the limitations period can be charged to be an unfair labor practice only through reliance on an earlier unfair labor practice. There the use of the earlier unfair labor practice is not merely "evidentiary" . . . . Rather, it serves to cloak with illegality that which was otherwise lawful.

Id. at 416–417. With this in mind, by "continuum of negotiations," the General Counsel apparently means that, despite the separate and distinct bargaining units, Respondent and the Union actually engaged in one long series of negotiations from the spring of 1980 through January 8, 1982. As evidence of this, she points to the existence of the same parties and negotiators and similar, if not identical, proposals for both units. Moreover, I note that the LPN-Tech unit bargaining commenced immediately after the other was broken off by Respondent, and that Negotiator Siebert admitted not having consulted with Administrator Pierce prior to the start of the LPN-Tech discussions. Based on the foregoing, the General Counsel's theory has some validity, and conduct during the RN negotiations is relevant for viewing future events; however, the question remains, how does it comport with the meaning of Sec. 10(b) of the Act? It seems to me that alleged elements of surface bargaining must be present during the LPN-Tech negotiations in order to utilize conduct during the RN negotiations to "shed light upon" the former. If such elements are not susceptible of discovery, then conduct during the RN negotiations, outside the statutory 6-month statute of limitations, cannot be used to establish a violation during the LPN-Tech negotiations.

Concerning conduct duration, it is argued that Respondent's attitude never to reach final agreement is clearly shown by Siebert's conduct on this matter at the January 8 meeting. Essentially, it is argued that the term of the agreement was a nonissue; that, at the least, Siebert should have been aware the Union was seeking a 1-year contract for the LPN-Tech employees, and that, at the most, Siebert had authority to agree to the Union's position without further consultation. Initially, there is nothing in the record to warrant the conclusion that, prior to the last bargaining session, Respondent knew, or should have known, that the Union was seeking a 1-year contract. Thus, contrary to Richardson, the bargaining during the RN contract discussions would not support this conclusion. In this regard, I note that not only did such negotiations involve a different group of employees, but also there was no written proposal from the Union for a 1-year RN unit contract. Further, even crediting Richardson regarding RN unit discussions during which the length of the contract was mentioned, the references were vague at best and clearly not specifically directed toward discussion of a 1-year term. Finally, and the most significant point, Richardson admitted that during the entire period of the LPN-Tech unit contract discussions prior to January 8 the subject of contract duration was not discussed in any context. Accordingly, to say that Siebert should have known that the Union desired a 1-year LPN-Tech contract is not supported by the record. Next, the record discloses that, at the January 8 session, Siebert and Richardson discussed various alternative proposals regarding contract terms. It does not appear to have been an issue raised by the former merely as an avoidance tactic and, given the options discussed, it is not unreasonable that Respondent should have taken time to consider them. Therefore, it cannot be said that, even if Siebert possessed authority to do so, it was a delaying tactic for him not to have immediately agreed to one of the proposed alternatives. Finally, contrary to the complaint allegation, it is clear that contract duration was not the only unresolved issue at the close of the January 8 bargaining session. Thus, remaining for resolution were short-term disability and whether such was covered under the social security alternative plan; the status of the "bio-med tech" job classification; shift differential pay; and vesting in the retirement program. Based on the foregoing, neither can it be said that Respondent made agreement impossible by raising the matter of contract duration so as to have engaged in bad-faith bargaining,[40] nor may such be considered as an indicia of bad-faith surface bargaining.

Notwithstanding the evidence of bad-faith bargaining, concerning dilatory tactics, the refusal to discuss union security, and the December 30, 1981 cost-of-living raise announcement, I do not believe the conclusion is warranted that Respondent's bargaining evinced a desire to avoid reaching ultimate agreement. Rather, based on the record as a whole, there is ample evidence that Respondent engaged in extremely tough bargaining, conceding on some points, modifying other proposals, and dropping other demands. I believe that, at most, Respondent engaged in a pattern of bargaining, elements of which were in bad faith, designed to force the Union to acquiesce to an agreement on the former's terms. I do not believe this constitutes surface bargaining designed to avoid a agreement, and I will recommend dismissal of this allegation.

5. The withdrawal of recognition

It is not in dispute that, based on the filing of the decertification petition in Case 27-RD-587 on January 11, 1982, and with knowledge that the petition was supported by more than a majority of the employees in the LPN-Tech bargaining unit, Respondent, on that same day, suspended further bargaining with the Union thereby, according to its attorney, withdrawing recognition from the Union as the collective-bargaining representative for the employees. It was uncontroverted that immediately following the filing of the petition, employees

[40] I will recommend dismissal of the complaint in this regard.

White and Eich informed Respondent's administrator Pierce that approximately 60 percent of the bargaining unit employees executed the petition, and that this formed the underlying justification for Respondent's actions—an asserted belief that the Union no longer represented a majority of the LPN-Tech employees. It is well established Board law that, absent unusual circumstances, there is an irrebuttable presumption that the majority status of a certified union continues for 1 year from the date of certification, but that after that initial year the presumption becomes rebuttable by an affirmative showing that the union no longer, in fact, commands a majority or by evidence of a sufficient objective basis for a reasonable doubt of the union's majority status. Pennco, Inc., 250 NLRB 716 (1980): GAF Corp., 195 NLRB 169 (1972). Moreover, the mere filing of a decertification petition, standing alone, neither provides a reasonable ground for an employer to doubt the majority status of a union nor permits an employer to withdraw from bargaining with an incumbent union. Dresser Industries, 264 NLRB 1088 (1982). However, "if an employer is presented with a valid decertification petition supported by majority of the unit employees, it may be privileged to withdraw from bargaining" on the basis of a "good-faith doubt as to continued majority status." Id. at 1089 fn. 7. It is asserted by counsel for Respondent that Respondent had such a good-faith doubt based on the statements made to Pierce by White and Eich on January 11 and that, therefore, Respondent had "a duty under the law" to cease bargaining with the Union.

Contrary to counsel, the record establishes that Respondent's actions were taken in the context of serious unfair labor practices, all that occurred either prior to or in the midst of the gathering of the signatures necessary for the filing of the decertification petition. Moreover, these unfair labor practices (dilatory bargaining, refusing to bargain over a mandatory subject of bargaining—union security, and engaging in conduct that demeans a union in the eyes of its members) all possessed the inherent tendency to cause dissatisfaction with the Union, thereby undoubtedly contributing to the majority support for the decertification petition. When an employer's asserted doubt of a union's majority status is tainted by unremedied unfair labor practices, which affect the union's status, cause employee disaffection or improperly affect the bargaining relationship itself, the legality of a cessation of bargaining and/or withdrawal of recognition based on same is negated. Abbey Medical/Abby Rents, 264 NLRB 969 (1982); Chicago Magnesium Castings Co., 256 NLRB 668 (1981); Guerdon Industries, 218 NLRB 658, 660–661 (1975). Although unalleged in the complaint, the foregoing was fully litigated and briefed by counsel for Respondent and the Union's representative. It is clear that Respondent's conduct, in this regard, was violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act, and I so find.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act and a health care institution within the meaning of Section 2(14) of the Act.

2. The Union is an labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. All full-time and regular part-time technical employees, including licensed practical nurses, radiology technicians, medical laboratory technicians, and EKG-IT-EEG-EMG technicians employed by Respondent; excluding office clerical employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined by the Act, and all other employees constitute a unit appropriate for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

4. Since January 9, 1981, the Union has been, and is now, the exclusive representative of employees in the above appropriate unit for purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

5. By withdrawing recognition from, and suspending bargaining with, the Union as the collective-bargaining representative of its employees in the above-described appropriate unit, Respondent engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

6. By bargaining in bad faith with the Union as the collective-bargaining representative of its employees in the above-described appropriate unit by engaging in dilatory bargaining tactics; refusing to bargain over union security, a mandatory subject of bargaining; and demeaning the Union in the eyes of the aforesaid employees, Respondent engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

7. By maintaining in force and in effect an overly broad no-solicitation/no-distribution policy, Respondent has engaged in conduct violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

8. Respondent engaged in no other unfair labor practices.

REMEDY

Having found that Respondent engaged in certain acts and conduct violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative actions designed to effectuate the policies and purposes of the Act. I have found that Respondent unlawfully withdrew recognition from and suspended bargaining with the Union as the collective-bargaining representative of its LPN-Tech employees. Therefore, I shall recommend that it be ordered to continue recognizing and, on request, resume bargaining with the Union and to do so in good faith, and in the event that an agreement is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement. Further, in recognition of the serious nature of the bad-faith bargaining, particularly the dilatory tactics engaged in by Respondent during the year following the Union's certification by the Board as the collective-bargaining representative of Respondent's LPN-Tech employees, in order to ensure that the employees will be accorded the statutorily prescribed services of the Union for the period provided by law, and on my belief that the remedy for unfair labor practices must be tailored so as to adequately restore the status quo ante, I shall recommend that the initial year of certification be extended for 6 months, this period to commence on the date that Respondent restates its recognition of the Union as its LPN-Tech bargaining unit employees' collective-bargaining representative. Mar-Jac Poultry Co., 136 NLRB 785 (1962). Finally, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to post a notice setting forth its obligations.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[41]

ORDER

The Respondent, Rocky Mountain Hospital, Denver, Colorado, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Failing and refusing to continue to recognize and bargain with Rocky Mountain Federation of Nurses and Health Professionals, Local 5016, AFT, CFT, AFL-CIO as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All full-time and regular part-time technical employees, including licensed practical nurses, radiology technicians, medical laboratory technicians, and EKG-IT-EEG-EMG technicians employed by Respondent; excluding office clerical employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act, and all other employees.

(b) Bargaining in bad faith with the Union as the duly designated representative of employees in the above-described appropriate unit by engaging in dilatory bargaining tactics, refusing to bargain over a union-security proposal, a mandatory subject of bargaining, and demeaning the Union in the eyes of the aforesaid unit of employees.

(c) Maintaining in force and effect an overly broad no-solicitation/no-distribution policy insofar as employees are prohibited from soliciting at all times in nursing stations; employees are permitted to distribute literature only in break rooms, restrooms, and parking lots; and off-duty employees are prohibited from entering any area not open to the public during reasonable periods before and after work.

(d) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Recognize and, on request, bargain in good faith with Rocky Mountain Federation of Nurses and Health Professionals, Local 5016, AFT, CFT, AFL-CIO, as the exclusive bargaining representative of employees in the appropriate unit described above and, if an agreement is reached, embody it in a signed contract. The certification year shall extend for an additional 6 months from the date Respondent restates its recognition of the Union as the above employees' bargaining representative.

(b) Post at its facility in Denver, Colorado, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[42] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 27, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER RECOMMENDED that, inasmuch as Respondent has been ordered to continue to recognize and bargain, on request, with the Union, as the initial certification year has been extended for a period of 6 months to accommodate bargaining, and as the Union's irrebuttable presumption of majority status therefore continues, the petition in Case 27-RD-587 is dismissed.

IT IS FURTHER RECOMMENDED that, insofar as the complaint alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by bargaining in bad faith by surface bargaining, rigidly insisting on contract provisions whereby the Union's involvement in Respondent's operations would be eliminated, insisting on proposals by which the Union would waive its right to bargain on new issues, and having no position on contract duration at the final bargaining session and Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by maintaining overly broad no-solicitation/no-distribution rules outside the 10(b) statute of limitations period, it is dismissed.

[41] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[42] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

July 22, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

By Chairman Stephens and Members Babson and Cracraft

On April 18, 1985, Administrative Law Judge David G. Heilbrun issued the attached decision. The Respondent, the Charging Party, and the General Counsel filed exceptions and supporting briefs, and the Respondent filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The judge found Federation of Nurses and Health Professionals, AFT, AFL-CIO (the Union)—the labor organization certified to represent the bargaining unit at Rocky Mountain Hospital—was a nonexistent, defunct entity, and therefore the Respondent entertained a good-faith doubt as to the Union's continued representative status. Alternatively, the judge found that the Respondent's change in leave policy and termination of several licensed practical nurses were responses to pressing business necessities and concluded there was no obligation to bargain. We reverse.

1. The judge found that, because the Post Office returned a document the Respondent mailed to the Union and Respondent assertedly had had no contact with the Union in 2 years, the Union was defunct. The judge cited no relevant precedent for his finding, which is not surprising, as his decision is contrary to well-established law. The correct standard for determining defunctness is whether a union is unable or unwilling to represent the employees, regardless of the relative inactivity of the union. See Kent Corp., 272 NLRB 735 (1984); Pioneer Inn, 228 NLRB 1263 (1977), enfd. 578 F.2d 835 (9th Cir. 1978); Hershey Chocolate Corp., 121 NLRB 901 (1958).

The Union is one of four chapters comprising the Denver Federation of Nurses and Health Professionals, AFT, AFL-CIO. On January 1981, the Union was certified as the bargaining representative of the Respondent's full-time and regular part-time technical employees including licensed practical nurses and other specified employee categories. After a hearing held in 1983, the Union's labor organization status was established in another unfair labor practice case. See Rocky Mountain Hospital, 289 NLRB 1347 (1988). The vice president of the Denver Federation testified during the instant proceeding that the Union continues to be affiliated with the Denver Federation.

Thus, contrary to the judge's finding that it is nonexistent, the record indicates that the Union is an active chapter of the Denver Federation. Further, we find no evidence that the Union is unable or unwilling to represent the employees. We find of no significance that the Post Office, for unexplained reasons, did not deliver one document to the Union, especially in light of the fact that other mail was delivered. Nor, in view of the Respondent's serious unfair labor practices in the related case, 289 NLRB 1347, in which the Respondent rejected its obligation to bargain with the Union,[1] do we find significant the judge's finding that the Respondent has had no contact with the Union for 2 years.[2]

In short, based on the above-cited precedent, we find that the Union is not defunct. We further find that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act. Therefore, we do not adopt the judge's finding that the Respondent entertained a good-faith doubt about the Union's continued representative status on the grounds that the Union is a nonexistent, defunct entity.

2. Nor do we agree with the judge's dismissal of the allegation that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) by unilaterally changing the leave policy and laying off employees.

Before October 1983, the Respondent used a voluntary leave-without-pay system to reduce staffing when the patient census was low. Because the leave policy was voluntary, the number of days taken varied from employee to employee. Due to a decline in patient census, employees were asked with increasing frequency to take leave days. When some licensed practical nurses complained that they were taking more leave days than others, the Respondent in October and November 1983 converted the voluntary system to a mandatory rotating roster leave system. The Respondent instituted this change without consulting the Union.

[1] Because in the related case we dismiss the decertification petition, the Respondent cannot in the instant case rely on the petition to defend its conduct as privileged under Telautograph Corp., 199 NLRB 892 (1972).

[2] As the cited precedent makes clear, the relative inactivity of the Union is not the standard by which defunctness is judged. We observe, however, that the reason for the judge's confusion about the Union's continued existence may be explained by organizational changes in the Union's relationship to the Denver Federation about which former employee Norma McAdams testified. Because nothing in the record about the relationship suggests that the Union is defunct, we find it unnecessary to address the facts further.

On February 17, 1984, the Respondent laid off 17 employees, including 4 licensed practical nurses. The layoffs occurred because the Respondent experienced a drastic decline in patient census in late 1983 and early 1984. The Respondent selected the four licensed practical nurses who were not qualified to dispense medication, considering them less versatile in terms of patient care. The Respondent did not consult with the Union about the layoffs.

The Union is the certified bargaining agent for unit employees. It is well established that absent extenuating circumstances an employer must bargain to impasse before implementing a unilateral change in mandatory bargaining subjects. NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736 (1962).

The Respondent's leave policy concerns a mandatory bargaining subject. Converting to a mandatory leave system caused some employees to suffer a decline in working hours. Thus, contrary to the judge's characterization of the change as a routine adjustment, the change was a substantial change about which the Respondent was obligated to bargain before it could be lawfully implemented.[3] Cf. San Antonio Portland Cement Co., 277 NLRB 309 (1985) (change from oral to written communication of work schedules not substantial, but change from random selection of off-duty employees for emergencies to designated on-call system was substantial change).

The Respondent was also obligated to notify and bargain with the Union concerning the layoffs. See Laper Foundry & Machine, 289 NLRB 952 (1988). See also Advertiser's Mfg. Co., 280 NLRB 1185 (1986), enfd. 823 F.2d 1086 (7th Cir. 1987). As the Seventh Circuit stated in Advertiser's Mfg. Co., 823 F.2d at 1090:

> Layoffs are not a management prerogative. They are a mandatory subject of collective bargaining. Until the modalities of layoff are established . . . a company that wants to lay off employees must bargain over the matter with the union.

Contrary to the judge's determination, we do not find that the Respondent's economic circumstances justify suspending the bargaining obligation. The patient census decline cannot fairly be characterized as sudden or unexpected: the decline began in late 1983 and moreover the unilateral change in leave policy (which occurred 3 months before the layoffs) was instituted to handle employee complaints about the impact of a system designed to deal with low patient census.

Accordingly, we find that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) by making unilateral changes in terms and conditions of employment by changing from a voluntary leave days system to a mandatory leave days system and by laying off unit employees.[4]

CONCLUSION OF LAW

The Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by making the following unilateral changes in terms and conditions of employment of its employees:

(a) Changing from a voluntary leave days system to a mandatory leave days system.

(b) Laying off employees Teresa M. Lucero, Eunice Barnes, Kathleen Gallegos, and Ann Dailey in February 1984.

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, we shall order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

We shall order the Respondent to reinstate Teresa M. Lucero, Eunice Barnes, Kathleen Gallegos, and Ann Dailey and make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from their unlawful layoffs in accordance with F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest as prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded.[5] We shall also order that, on the Union's request, the Respondent restore the voluntary leave days system. Finally, we shall order the Respondent to notify the Union and on its request bargain concerning all changes in terms and conditions of employment of unit employees.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Rocky Mountain Hospital, Denver, Colorado, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

---

[3] The judge also appears to find there was no change in practice in leave policy. We cannot agree with the judge's finding and his reliance on Woods School, 270 NLRB 171 (1984). The record shows the leave policy here changed from voluntary to mandatory, and in the case the judge cites for support there were no exceptions filed on the "previously coexisted" finding.

[4] The General Counsel argues the layoffs' unlawfulness is linked to the Respondent's unilateral change in licensed practical nurses' job requirements. Because we find the complaint and the facts support the above theory for finding the layoffs violative, we find it unnecessary to address the manner in which the Respondent chose whom to lay off.

[5] In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

(a) Refusing to bargain with Federation of Nurses and Health Professionals, AFT, AFL-CIO as the exclusive certified bargaining representative of unit employees by unilaterally making changes in terms and conditions of employment of unit employees without first notifying and bargaining with the Union.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer employees Teresa M. Lucero, Eunice Barnes, Kathleen Gallegos, and Ann Dailey immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from their unlawful layoffs, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the decision.

(b) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful layoffs and notify them in writing that this has been done and that the layoffs will not be used against them in any way.

(c) On the Union's request, rescind the mandatory leave days system and restore the voluntary leave days system.

(d) On request, bargain with the Union concerning proposed changes in terms and conditions of employment of unit employees.

(e) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(f) Post at its facility in Denver, Colorado, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[6] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 27, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(g) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain with Federation of Nurses and Health Professionals, AFT, AFL-CIO as the exclusive certified bargaining representative of unit employees by unilaterally making changes in terms and conditions of employment of unit employees without first notifying and bargaining with the Union.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer Teresa M. Lucero, Eunice Barnes, Kathleen Gallegos, and Ann Dailey immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed and WE WILL make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from their layoffs, less any net interim earnings, plus interest.

WE WILL notify each of them that we have removed from our files any reference to the layoff and that the layoff will not be used against her in any way.

WE WILL, on the Union's request, rescind the mandatory leave days system and restore the voluntary leave days system.

WE WILL, on request, bargain with the Union concerning proposed changes in terms and conditions of employment of unit employees.

ROCKY MOUNTAIN HOSPITAL

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

DAVID G. HEILBRUN, Administrative Law Judge. These cases were tried at Denver, Colorado, January 8, 1985. The charges were filed by Federation of Nurses and Health Professionals, AFT, AFL-CIO (the National Union) on March 5 and April 9, 1984 (the later charge amended October 17, 1984), and the consolidated complaint was issued October 22, 1984. The primary issue is whether Rocky Mountain Hospital (Respondent) has refused to bargain with the Rocky Mountain Federation of Nurses and Health Professionals (the Rocky Mountain Chapter) and, in that context, unilaterally implemented certain changed terms and conditions of employment resulting in part in the termination from employment of four individuals, and is thus in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act.

On the entire record,[1] including my observation of the demeanor of witnesses, and after consideration of briefs filed by the General Counsel and Respondent, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT AND RESULTANT CONCLUSION OF LAW

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is a Colorado corporation engaged in the offering of acute health care services at its hospital facility in Denver, Colorado. In the course and conduct of such business operations, Respondent has an annual gross volume of revenue in excess of $250,000, while annually purchasing and receiving goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from sources outside Colorado. On these admitted facts, I find that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act, and a health care institution within the meaning of Section 2(14).

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Labor Organization

On January 9, 1981, a Certification of Representative issued to the Rocky Mountain Chapter in Case 27-RC-5926 covering a unit of full-time and regular part-time technical employees including licensed practical nurses (LPNs). The certification stemmed from a rerun election conducted on November 25, 1980, at which 52 employees were eligible to vote and the tally of ballots showed that 47 did so. Following the certification, an extended course of bargaining ensued in which an initial collective-bargaining agreement was not reached between the parties with respect to this unit. Based on unfair labor practice charges, as filed by Rocky Mountain Chapter, he issues of a consolidated complaint were heard in June 1983 and on administrative law judge's decision (JD-SF)-269-83) issued on December 15, 1983, holding that Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act in several regards. The recommended remedial action was that Respondent continue recognition of Rocky Mountain Chapter as representative of the technical unit employees and that a related RD petition be dismissed. This judge's decision was duly transferred to and continued before the Board, but exceptions taken thereto have not as yet been ruled on. The RD case was one supported by 60 percent of unit employees as of early 1982, and this fact was communicated to Respondent, becoming a principal basis of its withdrawal of recognition at that time.

The instant record establishes that Rocky Mountain Chapter was, and is still considered to be, one of four hospital chapters comprising the Denver Federation of Nurses and Health Professionals, AFT, AFL-CIO (the Denver Federation). Employees of Respondent who are deemed members of Rocky Mountain Chapter continue to attend meetings of the Denver Federation; however, there is no evidence that the chapter itself has officers, collects dues, or publishes any communications in its own right. A document mailed to the last known Denver address of Rocky Mountain Chapter was recently returned as undeliverable, and Respondent has had no contact from the organization in more than 2 years.[2]

The Rocky Mountain Chapter has little residual substance. The consolidated complaint as originally issued did not recognize the distinction between it as an entity and the National Union on whose initiating charges the present proceeding is based. These charges in turn, the latest of which being the amendment of October 1984, refer to the Rocky Mountain Chapter as certified bargaining agent with respect to allegedly unlawful unilateral changes of October 1983 and February 1984; however, evidence of record here does not show any validity for such an entity at these points in time. The presumption of majority status becomes rebuttable after a labor organization's certification year has passed. I therefore find, independently of and subject to whatever disposition is made concerning the pending judge's decision, that Rocky Mountain Chapter is a nonexistent, defunct entity, as to which Respondent entertained a good-faith doubt of its continued representative status at all times material to this case. Cf. Burger Pits, 273 NLRB 1001 (1984); Consumat Systems, 273 NLRB 410 (1984).

Additionally, the announced Board doctrine as of early 1982 provided that the filing of a timely decertification petition raised a real question concerning representation, and consequently an employer's refusal to bargain with an incumbent union after such filing did not violate Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. Telautograph Corp., 199 NLRB 892 (1972). When Telautograph was overruled in Dresser Industries, 264 NLRB 1088 (1982), the Board exempted the situation of employer "reliance upon then applicable Board law as set forth in Telautograph." There is, however, a separate basis to deal with the entire thrust of the consolidated complaint, and that discussion follows.

[2] The same Denver address, that of 360 Acoma, Room 216, was used for certified mail service of the consolidated complaint in this proceeding and a postal receipt shows it to have been delivered on October 29, 1984, with the receiving signatory being "Alison Mall." This is the same surname as Dorothy Mall, the current vice president of the Denver Federation and a witness in this proceeding; however, the significance of this similarity in names, if any, was not developed for the record.

B. Preliminary Matter

Cecelia Lewis, Respondent's director of nursing and nursing administrator, was an early witness in the case, expressly called by the General Counsel under Federal Rules of Evidence 611(c). In this context, off the record discussion between counsel was confirmed with respect to Respondent examining Lewis first, with the General Counsel's principal examination to follow as though undertaken traditionally (Tr. 42). This procedure was later termed as done "on somewhat experimental grounds" (Tr. 60).

The technique is highlighted and endorsed as an expedient, where appropriate, in Board proceedings; one which draws its essential rationale from comparable situations of the labor arbitration process. In that forum, it has long been recognized that good reason exists to have job terminations initially explained by the party best situated to first advance evidence on the subject. It was illuminatingly described nearly 30 years ago in the following passage:

> Thus, it is quite common, in cases where an employee is questioning the company's right to discharge him, for the union to expect and the arbitrator to look to the company to present its side of the story first. While this may seem revolutionary to a court-trained lawyer who expects the plaintiff to go forward, the reversal of normal court procedures has its advantages. . . . Benetar, The Trial of a Labor Arbitration, 2 The Practical Lawyer 34, 38–39 (October 1956).

This quotation enlarged on a still earlier writing to the effect that order of presentation may, at an arbitrator's discretion, be varied by asking at the outset of a hearing that the party in possession of "the basic facts" then "present its evidence first" in application of Voluntary Labor Arbitration Rule 26 of the American Arbitration Association as then in effect. Elkouri, How Arbitration Works at 165, The Bureau of National Affairs (BNA), (1952).

Both these teachings were echoed by a nationally prominent arbitrator who later observed how the "moving party" in discharge cases should manifest with an employer proceeding first on the fundamental rationale that any change in "status quo" is knowledge best "within [its] purview." Kagel, Anatomy of a Labor Arbitration at 80–81, BNA (1961).

The theme remains current as esteemed symposium contributors recently presumed how discipline or discharge cases signify that the employer "presents its case first" for to initiate an arbitration hearing on such issues "the company counsel will have to proceed." Proceedings of the Thirty-Fifth Annual Meeting, National Academy Arbitrators—Conduct of the Hearing at 35, 107, BNA, (1982).

C. Basis of Analysis

The consolidated complaint alleges, particularly, that in October 1983 Respondent unilaterally, without notice to or bargaining with the Rocky Mountain Chapter, began requiring mandatory leave days of employees within the unit in contrast with policy up to that point of soliciting voluntary leave days to better align staff with lowered patient needs of a diminishing census. Further, the consolidated complaint alleges that on February 17, 1984, Respondent terminated Teresa Lucero, Eunice Barnes, Kathleen Gallegos, and Ann Dailey as a reflection of its comparably instituted change requiring LPNs to be trained in the dispensation of medications.

It is conceded by Respondent that mandatory leave was required in October 1983 as a final step in avoiding continued overstaffing and the concomitant higher-than-necessary overhead. This was communicated to employees through memoranda of October and November 1983 dates, with a "rotating roster" to be the medium used when there were insufficient requests for time off on voluntary leave for particular days. The effect of this change was to reduce hours worked, as with Gallegos and Dailey who were both on an approximate half-time basis by February 1984.

A program of offering medication-dispensing training had been available to LPNs beginning early in 1981. Approximately 89 percent of those so employed eventually successfully completed the written and clinical phases of this training to become retitled, but without a pay differential, as LPN-1s. Lewis testified that a chief reality at the hospital from late 1983 into early 1984 period was a drastic drop in patient census leading to a search for cost-effectiveness by better employee utilization or the closing of units. This, in turn, resulted in the mandatory leave policy and review of configurations among employees of the entire nursing department. The upshot of Lewis' review was the termination of 17 persons on February 17, 1984, including those named in the consolidated complaint. These four employees of the unit were the only LPNs not retitled as dispensers of medication, and thus in Lewis' view least versatile in terms of patient care. Three of the four named individuals who were terminated from this unit in February 1984 testified that they had chosen not to undertake the extra training because it would not have led to increased compensation for the added responsibility of administering medication. The fourth terminated LPN, Eunice Barnes, had passed the preliminary written examination for LPN-1, but progressed no further because of inopportune unavailability of the nursing educator who facilitated the clinical implementation phase of such training.

The General Counsel's theory of these assertedly unlawful terminations is limited to invoking Section 8(a)(5) of the Act, in consequence of which the theory of discrimination to encourage or discourage union membership is not involved. For this reason, holding that a violation is present insofar as the terminations are concerned must rest on the notion that Respondent was under an obligation to bargain with the Rocky Mountain Chapter as to a modification in duties that formed the contrast between those LPNs retained and those actually terminated. Respondent concedes that notice of the commencement of medication dispensation training was not given to the Rocky Mountain Chapter, and former LPN Norma McAdams testified that she had obtained the LPN-1 classification herself, but only in the context of not receiving full observation and followup as contemplated by the written training outline.

D. Analysis

Both parties have cited United States Supreme Court decisions in support of their respective positions. However, NLRB v. Insurance Agents, 361 U.S. 477 (1960), alluded to by the General Counsel, contains only dictum with respect to unilateral action by an employer that tends to subvert a union's representative position, while Respondent's reliance on First National Maintenance Corp. v. NLRB, 452 U.S. 666 (1981), is misplaced because that holding addresses only the process of making a business decision in contrast to bargaining over effects of that decision. Cf. Akron General Medical Center, 232 NLRB 920, 925–926 (1977). However, when employer action is fundamentally a classic matter of exercising managerial prerogatives, coupled with a need for prompt attention to pressing business necessities, the obligation to notify a labor organization and bargain over effects of the action is not present. See Postal Service, 203 NLRB 916, 919 (1973), and cases cited. Here the transition from voluntary to mandatory leavetaking was merely to counteract employee dissatisfaction with fairness of the voluntary approach, and to assure that a gross surplus of LPNs did not appear for duty on a given day. The circumstances permit a characterization of this routine change as adjustment "relating to diminishing available hours of work" and not violative of the Act. See Kal-Die Casting Corp., 221 NLRB 1068 (1975). Further, the rotating roster of mandatory leave taking had "previously coexisted" with the voluntary program of the department and was thus "a part of the managerial prerogative." See Woods School, 270 NLRB 171 (1984).

The subsequent necessity of terminating LPNs was but an extension of the Employer's reaction to the fact of a continually falling patient census. The actual reduction in force was balanced throughout Lewis' department, and all non-LPN-1s were affected save for one in the specialized function of instrument aid and one regularly assigned to central supply. Additionally, a single male medical attendent was kept on the midnight shift where his physical abilities could be unexpectedly required. The predominant characteristic of the LPN layoff selections was that of retaining more flexible personnel, and this criterion had long manifested insofar as those fully trained in medication dispensation was concerned. Cf. Markle Mfg. Co., 239 NLRB 1142, 1147 (1979). For this reason the Employer's action may not be classified as a change in duties of employees, but merely a recognition of what skills did or did not exist within the targeted group. An equally significant factor is that the initial program of offering and qualifying LPNs in medication dispensation was of settled completion well outside the limitations period defined by Section 10(b) of the Act.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On May 13, 1986, Administrative Law Judge Clifford H. Anderson issued the attached decision.[1] Respondent Kevin Vainio filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed limited exceptions, a supporting brief, and a brief in answer to the Respondent's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decisionand Order.[3]

1. We agree with the judge that the Respondents violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) by discharging employee Leonard Dalasera. In adopting the judge's conclusions, however, we observe that the proper standard for determining whether the Respondents could avoid being held liable for a violation notwithstanding their failure to rebut the General Counsel's prima facie case is whether the Respondents established they would have discharged Dalasera even in the absence of his protected conduct. Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083, 1089 (1980), enfd. 662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981), approved in NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393, 400 (1983). We agree for the reasons the judge cited that the Respondents failed to meet their burden here.

2. We also agree that the Respondents violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by engaging in a course of conduct designed to avoid reaching an agreement with the Union. We find it unnecessary to pass, however, on the judge's following statements:[4] "An important factor . . . was Respondents' technique of rejecting the Union proposals and then counterproposing the terms of employment currently in place," and "Finally, Respondents sought substantial wage concessions without making any concessions on non-economic terms of employment." We rely instead on the other factors the judge cited.

3. We adopt the judge's conclusion that the Respondents violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by transferring equipment, personnel, and work from their Butte, Montana facility to Idaho Falls, Idaho, without bargaining with the Union about the transfer. As more fully described by the judge, the primary focus of this allegation was the decision to transfer employee Du Frame and not whether to operate lab services at the Idaho Falls facility in the first

[1] On May 22, 1986, the judge issued an erratum, correcting certain errors in his decision and recommended Order.

[2] We note the following errors in the judge's decision:

In his heading to sec. III,B,2 of his decision, the judge referred to June 13 rather than January 13.

In sec. III,B,4 of his decision, the judge stated employee Christopher Knutson was hired January 28, 1986. The correct year is 1985.

In sec. III,E,1, par. 1, the judge referred to Drs. Kevin and David Vainio, rather than Drs. Leonard and David Vainio.

In sec. III,E,2, par. 4, the judge stated the Respondents held a meeting with employees March 18, 1983. The correct year is 1985.

In sec. III, fn. 10 of his decision, the judge referred to Mr. Kevin Vainio rather than Dr. Leonard Vainio.

In sec. III,E,2, par. 7, the judge referred to Drs. David and Kevin Vainio rather than Drs. David and Leonard Vainio.

In sec. III, fn. 9, the judge stated the General Counsel alleged the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(3) by denying employee Leonard Dalasera a paid vacation day because of his union activities, but did not rule on the allegation. The General Counsel, however, did not except to the judge's failure to make the finding and we therefore do not pass on it.

In the absence of exceptions, we adopt pro forma the judge's finding that the Respondents violated Sec. 8(a)(1) by threatening to close their facility in an April 15, 1985 meeting Respondents David and Leonard Vainio held with employees.

We also adopt pro forma in the absence of exceptions the judge's finding that the Respondents violated Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1) by unilaterally changing their vacation pay practice. That finding was made only in the judge's erratum. See Wilco Business Forms, 280 NLRB 1336 fn. 2 (1986).

[3] We amend the remedy to provide that the Respondents shall make their employees whole for the unilateral changes the Respondents unlawfully made in their holiday and vacation benefits in the manner prescribed in Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 682 (1970), enfd. 444 F.2d 502 (6th Cir. 1971).

In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

We amend Conclusion of Law 4 by substituting the words "vacation benefits" for the words "holiday pay" to conform more closely to the judge's findings.

We shall substitute our Order for the judge's recommended Order to conform more closely to the Conclusions of Law and the judge's findings and to add our usual requirement that the Respondents preserve their records and make them available to the Board to analyze the Respondents' backpay liability.

We do not adopt the judge's recommendation that the Respondents be required to bargain a minimum of 15 hours per week and submit to the Regional Director bargaining reports every 15 days. We find it unnecessary at this stage of this proceeding to determine the standards under which the Respondents will be found to have complied with our bargaining Order. Cf. Leavenworth Times, 234 NLRB 649 fn. 2 (1978) (rejecting a similar remedy on other grounds); Eastern Maine Medical Center, 253 NLRB 224, 228 (1980) (same), enfd. 658 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1981).

We shall issue a new notice to conform to the Order.

[4] Sec. III,E,4,a, par. 4 of his decision.

289 NLRB No. 144

place.[5] This allegation implicitly was treated by the parties and analyzed by the judge, under NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736 (1962), on the basis that Du Frame's transfer was a mandatory subject of bargaining. We agree that Du Frame's transfer can be treated as falling within the second category of management decisions, which involve mandatory subjects of bargaining, described in First National Maintenance Corp. v. NLRB, 452 U.S. 666, 676-677 (1981), and find Otis Elevator Co., 269 NLRB 891 (1984), inapplicable to the instant situation.

4. The judge concluded that the Respondents did not violate Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by unilaterally closing their laboratory for 3 days beginning June 12, 1985. The judge relied on the fact that the Respondents lawfully discharged lab employees Matt Grigsby and Christopher Knutson immediately before the closing.

Respondent David Vainio, employee Lloyd Tom Patton, and Grigsby all testified that David Vainio initially indicated that the entire lab was closed after an altercation involving Grigsby and employee Knutson on June 12, which led to Grigsby's and Knutson's lawful discharges. Vainio, Patton, and Grigsby also testified, however, that Vainio later clarified the situation. Vainio and Patton testified Vainio returned to the lab and said that the surfacing operation was closed, but the remainder of the lab would remain open. Grigsby testified Vainio later pointed to Grigsby and Knutson and said they were discharged.

Only Grigsby and Knutson worked in the surfacing operation at the time, and the General Counsel does not contend the lab remained closed for more than 3 days. Accordingly, we conclude the Respondents "closed" the surfacing operation only to effect the lawful discharges, making no change in operations over which they had a duty to bargain. We therefore agree with the judge that the Respondents did not violate the Act by this conduct.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondents, David Vainio, H. Marie Vainio, Kevin Vainio, and Leonard Vainio, d/b/a Professional Eye Care, Butte, Montana, their officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Coercively interrogating any employee about union support or union activities.

(b) Attempting to convince any employee that it is unnecessary to vote for the Union, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers Local Lodge 88, AFL-CIO, by soliciting employees' complaints and grievances and promising to remedy those grievances.

(c) Threatening any employee that the Respondents will close their facility or subcontract their employees' work if employees select the Union as their collective-bargaining representative.

(d) Harassing any employee because of the employee's union activities or because the employee gave testimony at a National Labor Relations Board representation hearing.

(e) Informing any employee that it would be futile to select the Union as the collective-bargaining representative.

(f) Threatening any employee that the Respondents will fail to bargain in good faith with the Union.

(g) Changing any employee's shift, or the Respondents' vacation benefits, because of the employee's support for the Union.

(h) Discharging or otherwise discriminating against any employee for supporting International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers Local Lodge 88, AFL-CIO, or any other union.

(i) Transferring their equipment, personnel, and work from their Butte, Montana facility to any other facility without notifying the Union of their intent to do so and affording the Union the opportunity to bargain concerning that decision and the effects of that decision.

(j) Changing employees' terms and conditions of employment without first bargaining with the Union in good faith regarding those changes.

(k) Failing to bargain in good faith with the Union as exclusive collective-bargaining representative of their employees in the unit set out below in paragraph 2(e) by engaging in a course of conduct designed to undermine the Union and avoid reaching an agreement.

(l) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Make Beverly Riley and Leonard Dalasera whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against them, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the judge's decision.

(b) Remove from their files any reference to the unlawful discharges and notify the employees in writing that this has been done and that the discharges will not be used against them in any way.

[5] We note that the Respondents admitted that, prior to the advent of the Union and not when Du Frame's transfer was under consideration, they had already made a threshold decision to have lab services at the Idaho Falls facility. We also note that the Respondents have not argued to us the particular contention concerning the nature of the decision that our dissenting colleague is making.

(c) Restore to their Butte, Montana laboratory facility the laboratory equipment, personnel, and work unlawfully transferred unilaterally to their Idaho Falls, Idaho facility and make their employees whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the Respondents' unlawful transfer in the mannner set forth in the remedy section of the judge's decision.

(d) Restore their vacation and holiday benefits and make their employees whole for any benefits unlawfully withheld in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the judge's decision, as amended.

(e) On request, bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit concerning terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody the understanding in a signed agreement:

> All laboratory employees employed by the Respondents at their facility located at 225 South Idaho, Butte, Montana; but excluding all office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(f) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(g) Post at their Copper City Optical; Butte, Montana; and Idaho Falls, Idaho facilities copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[6] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 19, after being signed by the Respondents' authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondents immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondents to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(h) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

MEMBER JOHANSEN, dissenting in part.

I dissent only from the majority's conclusion that the Respondents violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by transferring equipment, personnel, and work from their Butte, Montana facility to Idaho Falls, Idaho, without bargaining with the Union over the transfer decision.[1] My colleagues reach their conclusion on a record devoid of any evidence regarding the Respondents' economic motivation for the transfer and thus no basis exists on which to determine whether the transfer decision is a mandatory subject of bargaining under Section 8(d) of the Act, pursuant to the Board's decision in Otis Elevator Co., 269 NLRB 891 (1984) (Otis Elevator II).

The majority dispose of the problem by focusing on only one element of the Respondents' decision (the transfer of personnel) and then concluding that that element was a mandatory subject of bargaining. In fact, the Respondents' decision also involved the transfer of equipment and work, and all three components must be considered in determining whether the Respondents' decision is a mandatory subject of bargaining.

The facts are not in dispute. Briefly, the Respondents operate retail optical outlets and optical laboratories. In January 1985 the Union began an organizational campaign among the Respondents' Butte, Montana facility's lab employees. The Union's efforts were successful and the Union later attempted to meet with the Respondents to negotiate a collective-bargaining agreement. The Respondents met the Union's organizational campaign and efforts to negotiate a contract with numerous and aggravated unfair labor practices.

Before the union campaign began, however, the Respondents closed a facility in Bozeman, Montana, and intended at some point to open a laboratory facility in Idaho Falls. After closing the Bozeman facility the Respondents stored the laboratory equipment from that facility in the Butte lab.

In April 1985 the Respondents hired employee Keith Du Frame for the Butte lab. Du Frame had wanted to work in the Respondents' Missoula, Montana facility and was told when hired that he would be transferred to Missoula when an opening became available. In May Du Frame asked Respondents David and Leonard Vainion for a transfer out of the Butte lab and they agreed to transfer him to Idaho Falls. They told Du Frame to take equipment from Butte to Idaho Falls to set up a laboratory. Du Frame opened the Idaho Falls lab

[6] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

[1] I agree that the Respondents violated Sec. 8(a)(1) and (3) by their preand postrepresentation election conduct, and Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1) by the course and conduct of their bargaining and by their unilateral changes in their holiday and vacation benefits practice. I also agree that the Respondents violated Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1) by failing to afford the Union an opportunity to bargain about the effects of their transfer decision. Failing to give the Union clear and timely notice of the decision before it effected the decision necessarily denied the Union that opportunity. P. J. Hamil Transfer Co., 277 NLRB 462, 463 (1985).

May 20.[2] It is undisputed that some unit work was transferred from Butte to Idaho Falls. The Respondents did not notify or bargain with the Union about the transfer of equipment, personnel, and work.

The Board in Otis Elevator II, relying on the Supreme Court's decision in First National Maintenance Corp. v. NLRB, 452 U.S. 666 (1981), held that managerial decisions that affect the scope, direction, or nature of a business are excluded from the duty to bargain as defined in Section 8(d) of the Act.[3]

Assuming that the managerial decision has something more than an "indirect and attenuated impact on the employment relationship,"[4]

> the critical factor to a determination whether the decision is subject to mandatory bargaining is the essence of the decision itself, i.e., whether it turns upon a change in the nature or direction of the business, or turns upon labor costs.[5]

In the instant case, I find that the decision at issue involved more than just the transfer of one employee. The facts recited above reveal that the transfer of equipment and unit work was also involved. Accordingly, I believe that the Respondents' decision is the kind of managerial decision that must be analyzed under Otis Elevator to determine whether it is a mandatory subject of bargaining. Here, however, the General Counsel presented no evidence showing that the Respondents' tranfer decision turned on labor costs. As the General Counsel has failed to make that showing, the Respondents' decision is necessarily excluded from Section 8(d) and the Respondents' refusal to bargain about the decision cannot properly be found to have violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1).

Accordingly, I conclude the Respondents did not violate Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by transferring equipment, personnel, and work from their Butte facility to Idaho without bargaining with the Union.

Notice To Employees
Posted by Order of the
National Labor Relations Board
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

We will not coercively question you about your union support or activities.

We will not attempt to convince you that it is unnecessary to vote for the Union, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers Local Lodge 88, AFL–CIO by soliciting your complaints and grievances and promising to remedy those grievances.

We will not threaten you that we will close our facilities or subcontract your work if you select the Union as your collective-bargaining representative.

We will not harass you because of your union activities or because you gave testimony at a National Labor Relations Board representation hearing.

We will not inform you that it would be futile to select the Union as your collective-bargaining representative.

We will not threaten that we will fail to bargain in good faith with the Union.

We will not change your shifts, or our vacation benefits, because of your support for the Union or any other union.

We will not discharge or otherwise discriminate against any of you for supporting International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers Local Lodge 88, AFL–CIO or any other union.

We will not transfer our equipment, personnel, or work from our Butte, Montana facility to any other facility without notifying the Union of our intent to do so and without affording the Union an opportunity to bargain concerning that decision and the effects of that decision.

We will not change your terms and conditions of employment without bargaining with the Union in good faith.

We will not fail to bargain in good faith with the Union as exclusive collective-bargaining representative of those of you in the unit set out below by engaging in a course of conduct designed to undermine the Union and avoid reaching an agreement.

We will not in any other manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

[2] The judge did not state what equipment Du Frame took to Idaho. The witnesses consistently testified, however, that the equipment moved to Idaho came mainly from the Bozeman facility equipment stored at Butte. The only significant equipment moved from Butte that had not originally come from Bozeman was a soldering machine, which the Respondents replaced within a month after the transfer. Only some Bozeman hand tools, incidental equipment, and an "edger" were used at Butte while stored there. The edger had been put to use only a few weeks before the move.

WE WILL make Beverly Riley and Leonard Dalasera whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from their unlawful discharges, less any net interim earnings, plus interest.

WE WILL notify each of them that we have removed from our files any reference to his or her discharge and that the discharge will not be used against him or her in any way.

WE WILL restore to our Butte, Montana laboratory facility the laboratory equipment, personnel, and work that we unlawfully transferred unilaterally to our Idaho Falls, Idaho facility and WE WILL make you whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from our unlawful transfer, with interest.

WE WILL restore our vacation and holiday benefits and make you whole for any benefits we unlawfully withheld from you, with interest.

WE WILL, on request, bargain with the Union and put into writing and sign any agreement reached on terms and conditions of employment for those of you in the following bargaining unit:

> All laboratory employees employed by us at our facility located at 225 South Idaho, Butte, Montana; but excluding all office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

DECISION

CLIFFORD H. ANDERSON, Administrative Law Judge. I heard these consolidated cases in trial at Butte, Montana, on various days in August 1985 and January 1986. The matter arose as follows.

On 4 February 1985, the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers Local Lodge 88, AFL-CIO (the Charging Party or the Union) filed Case 19-CA-17267 against Professional Eye Care, a business entity owned and operated by Dr. David Vainio, H. Marie Vainio, Dr. Leonard Vainio, and Kevin Vainio (Respondents). The Charging Party amended the charge on 13 February 1985. On 29 March 1985, the Regional Director for Region 19 of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint and notice of hearing in the case. On 22 April 1985 the Charging Party filed charge 19-CA-17445 against Respondents and on 21 May 1985, the Regional Director issued an order consolidating cases, consolidated complaint, and notice of hearing, consolidating the above-referenced cases. On 20 May 1985 the Charging Party filed Case 19-CA-17511 against Respondents and on 6 June 1985 the Regional Director issued a second order consolidating cases, amended consolidated complaint, and notice of hearing combining all the above cases. On 14 June 1985 the Charging Party filed Cases 19-CA-17569 and 19-CA-17570 against Respondents and on 27 June 1985 the Regional Director issued a third order consolidating cases, amended consolidating complaint, and notice of hearing joining all the above cases. Respondents filed appropriate answers to the complaints and the matter was tried in Butte, Montana, in August 1985.

On 30 September 1985, the Charging Party filed Case 19-CA-17833 against Respondents, which charge was amended on 4 November 1985. On 6 November 1985 the Regional Director issued a complaint and notice of hearing with respect to this charge. On 4 November 1985 the Charging Party filed Case 19-CA-17913 against Respondents and on 9 December 1985, the Regional Director issued an order consolidating cases, consolidated complaint, and notice of hearing joining these latter two cases. On 29 November 1985 counsel for the General Counsel filed with me a motion to reopen the record in the original consolidated cases and to consolidate those cases with Cases 19-CA-17833 and 19-CA-17913. There being no opposition, the motion was granted on 13 December 1985 reopening the record in the earlier matter, consolidating all the above cases, and scheduling additional hearings. These hearings were held in January 1986. Briefs were submitted on 7 March 1986.

The consolidated complaints alleged a course of conduct by Respondents including violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act (Act), discharges and adverse actions against employees in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act, and a series of acts and conduct in violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. Respondents in part deny the conduct attributed to them and otherwise suggest that the conduct alleged does not rise to the level of a violation of the Act.

All parties were given full opportunity to participate at the hearing, to introduce relevant evidence, to call, examine, and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally, and to file posthearing briefs.[1]

On the entire record, including oral argument by Respondents and posthearing briefs from the General Counsel and Respondents, and from my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT[2]

I. JURISDICTION

The four Respondents have operated affiliated business enterprises with common ownership, directors, management, and supervision, and formulated and administered a common labor policy affecting employees in such enterprises; have common bank accounts and purchasing accounts; have shared common premises and facilities; have provided services for and made sales to each other; have interchanged personnel, and have held themselves out to the public as a single-integrated business enterprise. These various enterprises, annually in the course and conduct of their business operations, collectively sell and ship goods or provide services from Montana-based facilities to customers outside the State of Montana, and collectively sell and ship goods or provide services to customers within the State of Montana, which customers are themselves engaged in interstate commerce by other than indirect means, of a total volume in excess of $50,000. During the same period, these enterprises collectively purchased and caused to be transferred and delivered to Montana facilities materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from sources located outside the State of Montana or from suppliers located within the State who in turn obtain such goods and materials directly from sources outside the State. Finally, the collective enterprises annually enjoy a gross volume of business in excess of $500,000. Respondents, and each of them, are employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.[3]

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION

The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background and Summary of Allegations

At relevant times, Professional Eye Care has been owned and operated by the Vainio Family—mother, H. Marie Vainio, and sons, Drs. David and Leonard Vainio and lawyer Kevin Vainio. Drs. David and Leonard Vainio are practicing optometrists. Kevin Vainio maintains a law practice in Belgrade, Montana. The facility at issue is an optical laboratory (the lab) serving Respondents' retail optical outlets. The lab is located at 225 South Idaho, Butte, Montana. Dr. David Vainio is primarily responsible for the operation of the lab, with Dr. Leonard Vainio assuming additional supervisory responsibilities. Kevin Vainio apparently has no regular role in the operation of the lab save as discussed below. Until 11 January 1985, Becky Hoffman was a statutory supervisor at the lab. She was then transferred to one of Respondents' retail optical facilities where she worked as a statutory employee.

Lab employees initiated contact with the Union in late 1984 and an organizational drive was commenced that culminated with a demand for recognition of the Union served on Respondents on 11 January 1985. Respondents did not elect to recognize the Union and the Union filed a petition seeking to represent lab employees in Case 19–RC–11136. Hearings were held on the Union's representation petition in February and March 1985. An election was held among lab employees on 16 April 1985 with the Union being certified as representative of lab employees on 24 April 1985.

During the period between the demand for recognition and the election, the General Counsel alleges various violations of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act, including the termination of optical outlet employee Beverly Reilly. The complaint also alleges misconduct after the election violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act including the termination on 17 April of employee Leonard Dalasera and the termination on 12 June 1985 of employees Chris Knutsen and Matt Grigsby.

Following the issuance of the 24 April 1985 certification, the parties engaged in collective bargaining, which is the subject of various allegations of violations of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. Included in these allegations are contentions that Respondents (1) changed the terms and conditions of employment of unit employees without either notifying the Union or providing it an opportunity to bargain, (2) failed to provide relevant information to the Union, and (3) bargained in bad faith without intention to reach a collective-bargaining agreement.

Respondents at relevant times have had various retail optical outlets in cities within the States of Montana and Idaho. Respondents' operations included an optical laboratory in Bozeman, Montana. That lab was closed about September 1984 and certain of its equipment was transferred to the Butte lab. Respondents' retail facility in Idaho Falls, Idaho, was opened about August 1984. Space was provided at that facility for a laboratory but, until the events discussed here, the Idaho lab was neither equipped nor staffed.

Respondents had been suffering difficult economic circumstances in late 1984 and had been reducing operations, which included layoffs of staff at the Bozeman laboratory and other facilities. The Mountain State Optical facility, a retail facility in Butte, Montana, was closed on 10 January 1986.

For ease of understanding and analysis, the allegations of violations of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act will be dealt with separately.

B. Evidence Concerning Allegations of Violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act

1. Events of 11 January

There is no doubt that the Union's letter demanding recognition was received by Respondents on 11 January 1985, and that the receipt of this letter from the Union pute were substantially reduced. Where not otherwise noted, these findings are based on such stipulations and concessions or on the unchallenged testimony of credible witnesses.

[3] Respondents did not dispute that the above-described business entities rendered Professional Eye Care's operations, described infra, subject to the Board's statutory and discretionary jurisdiction. Further, each Respondent conceded his or her individual subjection to the Board's jurisdiction. These facts being established, and without objection by the General Counsel, further inquiry into the business structure of Professional Eye Care and its legal status under appropriate state law was deemed irrelevant to a resolution of the issues in the case. Accordingly, with the agreement of all parties, no formal findings were made concerning what type of legal entity Professional Eye Care is beyond the uncontested fact that both Professional Eye Care and Respondents are subject to the provisions of the Act.

was the Vainio family's first knowledge of their employees' union activities.

Longtime employee Leonard Dalasera testified that late in the morning of Friday, 11 January 1985, he was summoned to the office by Dr. David Vainio, who asked about the Union's letter. Dalasera testified that he identified the letter as a letter from Gary Taylor, union representative, saying that the lab employees wished to join the Union. D. Vainio responded, in Dalasera's recollection, "Is this a friend of yours?" Dalasera said yes. D. Vainio continued asserting, "I will not sign a union contract or do anything about this." Five to ten minutes later, in Dalasera's recollection, after he had returned to his work station, D. Vainio came down and changed his shift hours. Dalasera had up to that time alternated his hours with employee Tom Patton. Dalasera recalled that in announcing the change in Dalasera's lunch hour, which was to take effect immediately, D. Vainio asserted the purpose of the change was "so you can not be with your friends." Employee Tom Patton testified that he heard Dalasera summoned into the office on 11 January 1985 and soon after Dalasera's return to his work area, David Vainio came into the area and told Dalasera: "The first thing that will be changed are your hours."

D. Vainio did not specifically deny these conversations with Dalasera. He testified, however, that Dalasera's shift change occurred as a result of the need to keep certain vital equipment operating for a longer period each day. Dalasera's hours were restored some weeks later.

2. The 13 June restaurant incident

On Sunday, 13 January 1985, employees Leonard Dalasera and Tom Patton were having late morning coffee at a Butte restaurant known as "The Restaurant." As was apparently customary after church, Dr. Leonard Vainio and his mother, Helen Marie Vainio, arrived at The Restaurant for breakfast. Employees Dalasera and Patton, as well as L. Vainio, each testified to the occurrences at The Restaurant that morning. There is no dispute that when L. Vainio arrived and saw the two employees already seated at a table he committed: "What is this, a union meeting?" Thereafter, he continued the conversation criticizing the work product of the employees. Both employees Dalasera and Patton specifically recalled that L. Vainio added, after he asked them whether they were engaged in a union meeting, that the employees "were going to need union protection." Patton further recalled that L. Vainio added that Respondents could have its lab work done elsewhere, if necessary. Helen Marie Vainio did not address these events in her testimony. L. Vainio testified that the "union meeting" remark was made by him in an entirely humorous vein and that he did not threaten the employees in any way.

3. The Dalasera harrassment allegations

The following day, Monday, 14 January 1986, Leonard Dalasera testified to a conversation between himself, D. and L. Vainio, and their mother. Dalasera testified that at approximately 6 o'clock in the evening at the lab Vainio interrogated him regarding his motives for joining the Union and started singing derogatory songs about unions. He recalled that D. Vainio then said that he would sign a union contract "over his dead body" and asked Dalasera how much his union dues were. L. Vainio told Dalasera that productivity was down among the lab employees since the advent of union organization.

H. M. Vainio testified that Dalasera is overly sensitive, but did not address the remarks attributed to her by Dalasera. D. Vainio denied making any threats to employees, or statement regarding his opposition to signing a collective-bargaining agreement. L. Vainio denied threatening Dalasera during his employment, but did not otherwise address the specifics of this conversation.

Dalasera testified that following the onset of union organization at the lab his relationship with D. Vainio deteriorated. More specificially, he alleged, and other employees corroborated his testimony, that D. Vainio became verbally abusive about perceived failings by Dalasera and often became loud and violent—throwing items in Dalasera's direction. D. Vainio did not so much as deny the alleged mistreatment of Dalasera during the period. He suggested that if his treatment of Dalasera had been impulsive or subject to fits of temper it did not constitute a change in behavior, but was rather a continuing pattern established long before the onset of union activities at the lab. In so characterizing his temper and activities, D. Vainio was corroborated by his brothers Leonard and Kevin and his mother Helen Marie Vainio.

On 8 February, a representation hearing was conducted. At least one issue in that hearing was whether it was appropriate for the National Labor Relations Board to assert jurisidiction over Respondents' operations.

Dalasera testified at the hearing regarding the amount of work done in the lab. K. Vainio was counsel for Respondents at that hearing. Following the hearing, L. Vainio returned to work. K. Vainio also went to the lab and there had various conversations or a single extended conversation with Dalasera. Dalasera, corroborated by other lab employees, testified that K. Vainio, in high dudgeon, essentially perpetually badgered Dalasera regarding his work speed and the quantity of work he put out. K. Vainio testified that while he did have an ongoing conversation with Leonard Dalasera that afternoon regarding his work output, it was not because of animus towards Dalasera either because of his testimony or his union activities but was rather based on a need to discover in detail the quantity of work output, which formed the basis of Dalasera's testimony earlier that day. K. Vainio described his conduct in interrogating Dalasera as essentially benign if somewhat heated and repetitious.

4. Job interview conduct

Former laboratory employee Christopher Knutson testified that he was hired by Respondents on 28 January 1986, following an employment interview with D. Vainio. During that employment interview, Knutson testified that D. Vainio asked him what he thought about unions. Knutson responded that he had some correspondence from the Union seeking to represent employees in the lab and that he was being required to appear at a hearing in Febuary regarding the matter. Knutson then testified that D. Vainio said "in more or less these exact words—that rather than have the union in the lab, he would just as soon shut it down." D. Vainio denied making this threat.

5. Employee meetings

On 18 March 1985, K. Vainio met with the lab employees. He initially discussed a letter he had received from an optician employee of Respondents complaining of the quality of the lab's workmanship and threatening to resign if it did not improve. K. Vainio asked employees what could be done to address the problem reflected in the letter. Employees responded with suggestions regarding equipment and recommended shifting employee Leonard Dalasera from final inspection to other work or even terminating him. Kevin Vainio informed the employees that he would discuss the suggestions with his brothers. Later some of the requests were honored.

On 15 April, before the scheduled 16 April election,[4] a lab employee meeting was held by D. and L. Vainio. Although there was strong disagreement regarding the specifics of the conversation, it is undisputed that L. Vainio analogized the election campaign to a poker game. Employees testified that L. Vainio told them that, in the nature of guessing the opponent's card hand, the employees should determine the Employer's intentions with respect to the Union. If the employees thought that the Employer would negotitate with the Union and pay higher wages, they should vote for the Union. If the employees guessed wrong, however, and Respondents did not sign a contract, the employees would be out on a picket line the next day. Employees also testified that the Vainios solicited employees' grievances and promised to remedy the grievances they raised.

L. Vainio, generally corroborated by his brother, testified that although his general analogy was to a poker game he merely told the employees that they did not know what would be the consequence of selecting the Union, that they might end up with something if a favorable contract was negotiated, but they might also end up with something worse. L. Vainio further recalled he told employees that Respondents might not be able to negotiate a contract with the Union and that the employees would then probably be out on strike. The Vainios denied that they solicited or promised to solve employee grievances.

6. Postelection threat allegations

The election was held on 16 April and decided favorably to the Union. The certification of representative was issued on 24 April. Former employee Matt Grigsby testified that on 17 April, in the morning, D. Vainio walked into the surfacing lab and told Chris Knutson and Grigsby that he had no intention of engaging in collective bargaining and, in a heated voice, said that if the work "didn't shape up" he would turn it over to a subcontractor and shut down the lab. Grigsby testified that somewhat later that same morning he approached D. Vainio and asked him directly if he was going to shut down the lab and Vainio repeated his statement. Knutson testified that during this conversation D. Vainio was in the course of taking inventory. D. Vainio said no more materials would be ordered for the surfacing lab because, when the work then underway was finished, the lab would be shut down. Knutson recalled that he and Grigsby decided that Grigsby would ask D. Vainio about his intentions regarding closure, that Grigsby approached Vainio and, in Knutson's hearing, asked if he was going to shut the surface lab down. D. Vainio said yes. D. Vainio testified that no plans were made to shut down the surfacing lab or the entire lab of the facility, but there was a period when, in fear of a strike, he made certain arrangements to subcontract work if it became necessary. D. Vainio specifically denied making the threats attributed to him.

C. Evidence Concerning Allegations of 8(a)(3) Violations

1. The discharge of Beverly Riley

There is no dispute that Respondents decided to close the Mountain State Optical facility before they had any knowledge of employees' union activities. The facility was closed on 10 January 1985. D. Vainio testified that about 7 or 8 January he had a discussion with L. Vainio in which he informed L. Vainio that Beverly Riley, the clerk at the facility, was to be terminated with the closure. D. Vainio testified he neither spoke to laboratory employee Becky Hoffman, a supervisor and admitted agent of Respondents at this time, about his decision nor did he directly communicate his decision to Beverly Riley.

Becky Horrman testified that soon after the Union's demand letter arrived at the lab on 11 January, she had a conversation with L. Vainio. He told her to call Debbie Bjaoic, the clerk at Copper City Optical, and Beverly Riley to inform them that they would be laid off at the end of the day. He continued saying, "if you want to unionize, that's fine, but we don't need your kind of people, and we will shut the lab down." Hoffman testified that she was also told that she was to transfer to Copper City Optical the following Monday, which she did, working thereafter as a clerk. Debbie Bjaoic, who did not testify at the hearing, had been the dispensing employee at Copper City Optical until the events in question.

Beverly Riley testified that she had been employed at Mountain State Optical since at least June 1984. In very early January 1985, knowing that Mountain State Optical was to close and that her job there would thus be eliminated, Riley spoke with D. Vainio on an occasion when he was at the Mountain State facility and asked him if she would have a job after the closure. She testified that D. Vainio told her that she would still have a job. She recalled he told her that an employee at Copper City Optical would be let go and she would be transferred to that facility. Riley testified that on the morning of 11 January 1985, she commenced work at Copper City Optical. About 5 p.m. the same day she received a telephone call from L. Vainio, who told her that he would have to let her go. She testified: "I asked what his reason was, was it job performance or what I had done. He told me that he had to take this action, and I had the members of the lab to thank for his actions. He had been presented with some union papers and he was going to let me go."

[4] The Regional Director for Region 19 determined after the initial hearing that a second hearing on the Union's representation petition was necessary and the hearing was held in early March 1985. Following that hearing, the Regional Director issued a Decision and Direction of Election on 19 March and soon thereafter an election was scheduled for 16 April 1985.

D. Vainio, testifying initially on behalf of the General Counsel, recalled he had a conversation with Riley by telephone about 11 January. He testified:

> I said that we were closing the location that she was working in, and we were going to have to lay her off. She said, well, could she work some place else. And I said, well, we might consider putting you in the lab. But, I was not able to because a letter that I had just received—maybe even that day—from the union, stating that we could not make any changes in the laboratory. I said that I couldn't use you down there.

L. Vainio testified that he had a conversation with D. Vainio about 7 or 8 January in which it was decided that Beverly Riley was to be released on the closure of Mountain State Optical and that Becky Hoffman would be transferred to the Copper City Optical facility. He testified that on 11 January he was not present at the lab until late in the day. Although he did not claim complete recollection of the events, L. Vainio testified that he had a conversation with Becky Hoffman in which he expressed some surprise that Riley was working at Copper City Optical that day and told Hoffman to call Riley up and terminate her. He recalled that Hoffman was reluctant to make the call and that he ultimately decided to call Riley himself. He testified that he called Riley at Copper City Optical and told her that Respondents were going to have to terminate her employment. She asked if there was any other place for her and L. Vainio responded that "at the current time" there was not. He recalled that she then asked about the lab and if there was a place for her there. He responded that there was nothing at the lab "because of this letter I just received from the Union. We were not to make any changes in the laboratory." Thereafter, effective the following Monday, Hoffman was transferred to Copper City Optical and Riley was terminated. About 5 May 1985, Hoffman was transferred back to the lab and Riley was rehired to her position at Copper City Optical.

2. The discharge of Leonard Dalasera

On 1 April 1985, Leonard Dalasera received a termination notice from Respondents effective by its term on 15 April. His last day of employment was 16 April 1985. Some 3 days later he was reinstated by Respondents.

Respondents' witnesses uniformly assert that Dalasera was a longtime employee of marginal skills and special sensitivities. The evidence clearly reflects Dalasera has long had more than a simple employer-employee relationship with D. Vainio and his wife, Marie Vainio, as well as other members of the Vainio family. The Vainio family testified to a longstanding attachment to Dalasera, which caused him to remain in their employ despite his numerous work inadequacies and subsequently caused him to be reinstated a few days after his discharge. The Vainios explained that the discharge was simply a result of the continuing difficulties with Dalasera's quality of work, a matter made more important by the optician's letter attaching the quality of lab work for which Dalasera was responsible as final inspector—coupled with the fact that lab employees recommended that Dalasera be transferred or terminated.

3. The discharges of Knutson and Grigsby

On the morning of 11 June 1985, D. Vainio entered the lab area and observed employees Matt Grigsby, Chris Knutson, Tom Patton, and Mike King out of their work stations talking. D. Vainio testified essentially without contradiction that he lectured the employees about the quality of their work, and that work was "stacked up in here, and all you guys are doing is sitting around. Everytime I come in here, you are sitting. And if I come in here one more time, and catch you meeting like this, some of you are going to go."

The events of 12 June are partially disputed. D. Vainio testified that when he arrived at the lab that morning he observed a repeat of the prior day's events. When the employees saw him, Vainio recalled they jumped up and returned to work. David Vainio again rebuked the employees, telling them that he had caught them off task the day before and adding, according to Knutson and Grigsby, that if he caught them "one more time, that's it, you are gone." At this point, D. Vainio picked up a telephone in the lab area and placed a call. During the course of the call, D. Vainio testified that he was interrupted by comments from employee Knutson standing some 10 feet away. Vainio recalled that Knutson, in derogatory terms, challenged Vainio's authority to hire or fire employees. D. Vainio testified that he got very, "perturbed" immediately ended the telephone call, walked over to Chris Knutson and said, "you're fired, get out of here." He recalled that Knutson was in a defiant mood, telling Vainio he had no authority to terminate him. The conversation developed into a shouting match with Vainio demanding Knutson to leave the facility and Knutson declining to do so.

At this point Vainio testified that he grabbed Knutson's shirt and that Knutson stepped back, ripping the shirt. Knutson then punched Vainio in the eye and knocked off Vainio's glasses. Vainio testified that at this juncture he observed employee Matt Grigsby blocking his exit and that Grigsby would not let him pass. Vainio testified he then told Grigsby to "get out," passed through the lab exit and, as he did so, told the employees "this lab is closed," pointing to the surfacing rather than the edging portion of the lab. He also repeated to Grigsby and Knutson that they were to leave. D. Vainio testified that sometime during these events he realized that other employees were in the process of leaving. He went to another part of the building, obtained a secretary as witness, and returned to the lab. There he announced, pointing to the surface lab, "This lab is closed" and pointing to the edging lab, "This lab is open." Vainio then turned to employees Patton, King, and Dalasera and told them, "If you three decide to leave you are leaving on your own, I am not firing you, this area will continue, but the other two employees must get out."

Former employee Matt Grigsby testified that D. Vainio had lectured both him and employee Chris Knutson on 11 June for being out of their work area talking to other employees. On the morning of 12 June Grigsby and other employees were engaged in a conversation when they were again surprised by D. Vainio. Grigsby recalled that Vainio was unhappy and cursed the fact that another "meeting" was going on and asserted he had specifically told Knutson and Grigsby before about being out of their work area. Vainio told them "not to sit around wasting his money." Grigsby testified that Vainio's outburst caused the employees to disburse to their individual work areas. Grigsby then observed Vainio walk around the area in obvious anger gesticulating and hectoring employees and finally going to the phone and placing a call. Grigsby testified that during this call Chris Knutson challenged D. Vainio's right to hire or fire employees by stating in a voice that could be heard by all that "Vainio couldn't hire us and if he didn't hire us he sure couldn't fire us." Grigsby recalled that Vainio was angered by these remarks, terminated his phone call, walked up to Knutson, and exchanged profanity and abuse with him. At this point Grigsby testified he could not follow events but soon after heard a scuffle and looked up to see D. Vainio being pushed away from Knutson. Then Grigsby heard D. Vainio announce, "That's it, everyone's gone. That's it, everyone's fired." Grigsby then challenged Vainio to "put it in writing." He testified that D. Vainio declined his invitation, left the room, and came back pointing to Grigsby and Knutson saying, "You and you are fired and this area is shut down." A few minutes after leaving, Vainio again returned with a clerical employee as a witness and pointed to Grigsby and Knutson and announced that they were fired and that the lab area was shut down.

Former employee Chris Knutson testified that on the morning of 12 June employees Grigsby, King, Patton, and he were discussing Board proceedings when David Vainio entered the lab and told the employees that they were to return to their work stations. Vainio said in Knutson's memory: "I've warned you for the last time. The next time it happens, you'll be fired." At this point D. Vainio went to the telephone and began to order lenses from a supplier. Knutson testified:

> I began to stew over what had been said, and I said, in a loud enough voice where I knew he could hear me, isn't it strange that a person who stood up in court, under oath, and told these people that he could not hire nor fire nor had the authority to do so, now is going to tell me that he's going to fire me. I said, I don't buy it. Then I said, isn't it strange—Tom—referring to Lloyd Patton. Tom stood up and said, yes, I think it is a little strange. He came over to my area and we began to talk about it in a loud enough voice to where we knew David could hear.
> Upon hanging up the phone, David [Vainio] came over and said, look you smart aleck, you say something like that again and you're out the door. And I said, hey don't tell me you're going to fire me, because you don't have the authority remember? You told me you couldn't fire anyone, so, you know, don't tell me you're firing me. He came up to me and said, you're fired.

The conversation then escalated to exchanges of abuse and insults with a concomitant increase in the temper of each party. Knutson recalled that at one point D. Vainio made contact with him and in the ensuing scuffle Knutson's shirt was ripped. In response Knutson "put my hand in his face and pushed him away." Vainio's glasses fell to the floor.

Knutson recalled that during his altercation with D. Vainio, Matt Grigsby interjected, challenging one of D. Vainio's remarks. Knutson testified, "It was at that point that the attention was switched from myself to Matt and David and Matt had words, and Matt ended up getting terminated as well." Knutson recalled that David Vainio told Grigsby that he had been warned and to "basically either keep your mouth shut or you'll be fired as well. And [Grigsby] refused to do so at which time, David [Vainio] did terminate him." Dalasera's testimony was not at odds with the above sequence of events.

Grigsby and Knutson were terminated that day and have not been offered reinstatement.

D. Evidence Concerning Allegation of 8(a)(5) Violations

1. Chronology of bargaining[5]

Following the Union's certification on 24 April 1985, Gary Taylor, the Union's representative, attempted to reach the Vainios by telephone at the lab and by leaving messages soliciting return calls without success. On 30 May 1985, still unable to make contact with agents of Respondents, Taylor sent a letter to the lab seeking to meet and bargain with Respondents. Taylor followed up this letter with a visit to the lab on 3 June but found no principals available. On 5 June he again visited the lab and spoke to D. Vainio, who indicated he would have to get together with his brothers and could give no date for beginning bargaining. On 25 June, Taylor called K. Vainio in response to a message left on his recording machine. In their conversation a bargaining session was set for 12 July 1985. On 28 June Taylor again went to the lab and spoke to David Vainio seeking reinstatement for terminated employees Knutson and Grigsby. In his conversation with D. Vainio, Taylor asked if the Vainio brothers were coming to the then-scheduled 12 July meeting. D. Vainio said no. Taylor asked when the parties were going to sit down and negotitate a contract and, in response, D. Vainio indicated "never."

On 19 July[6] Gary Taylor and Kevin Vainio held initial negotiations at the lab. Taylor offered a standard Machinists contract as the Union's initial written proposal. K. Vainio argued the contract was not suitable to the optical business. Taylor responded that while this was true with respect to certain portions of the proposed contract, those portions could be modified. Wages were then discussed with K. Vainio seeking substantial economic relief from current wage rates. Under questioning, Vainio indicated that he did not know the rates of current unit employees. K. Vainio also rejected the Union's proposals with respect to health insurance stating that Respondents wished to maintain its own health plan. When pressed for details of the plan, Vainio confessed ignorance and suggested those details would be supplied later. K. Vainio also demurred with respect to Taylor's questioning of Respondents' policies regarding paid holidays indicating he would have to talk to his brothers. With respect to vacation pay, K. Vainio indicated that Respondents did not wish to offer paid vacations for employees and that they had never done so. As the meeting progressed, Respondents essentially rejected all the Union's proposals dealing with certain of the proposals with a degree of purported levity, i.e., suggesting the Union's funeral leave proposal should be written so that if an employee died he could take off as much time as he wished. The meeting ended without a second meeting being scheduled, but K. Vainio agreed to contact Taylor once he had gotten together the necessary information promised.

[5] The following chronology is based on record documents and the essentially unchallenged credible testimony of Gary Taylor.

[6] The 12 July bargaining session was canceled by Kevin Vainio and a new session was scheduled for 19 July.

K. Vainio did not thereafter contact Taylor and as a consequence Taylor tried numerous times to contact Vainio by telephone. By letter dated 26 August, Taylor wrote Respondents demanding continued bargaining. Respondents did not respond to Taylor's letter at which point Taylor again called Kevin Vainio about 4 September. A message was left in mid-September, and K. Vainio reached Taylor by telephone and they scheduled a bargaining session for 23 September. Taylor went to the lab as scheduled on 23 September, but only M. Vainio was present. No Vainio brother was available and no meeting occurred. Taylor left after asking that K. Vainio call him. Again Respondents' agents failed to contact the Union and Taylor again made numerous attempts to contact Respondents. Ultimately K. Vainio returned Taylor's phone calls on 17 October. In that telephone call the parties agreed to meet on 28 October.

On 28 October K. Vainio and Taylor met at the Union's offices. The parties again utilized the Union's initial proposal as a basis for bargaining. Vainio declined to accept any proposal involving holiday pay reasserting that Respondents did not pay employees holiday pay. Respondents subsequently modified their proposal and agreed to a progressive vacation policy of 1 week paid vacation after 1 year of service, with 2 weeks paid vacation after 3 years of service. Wage rates were again discussed with Respondents repeating the need for substantial economic relief in wages and proposing that employees should pay for any and all damages occurring during the production process. Taylor argued that the damage proposal suggested by Respondents could mean employees might have a zero net wage rate.[7] The meeting ended with a later meeting being scheduled for 22 November.

Taylor canceled the 22 November meeting based on a scheduling conflict and a later meeting was scheduled for 13 December. On that date Taylor, Jim Duggan, a union representative, and K. Vainio met in K. Vainio's Belgrade, Montana offices. Respondents again submitted no written proposals and, in Taylor's recollection, K. Vainio said he had lost the proposals Taylor had previously given him. K. Vainio announced that his brothers had refused to approve his earlier offer of paid vacation based on service. He indicated that Respondent would offer only 1 week paid vacation irrespective of employees' length of service. The Union protested the change in Respondents' proposal and the apparent lack of authority of K. Vainio to commit Respondents. K. Vainio demurred reasserting his brothers' unwillingness to offer greater vacation benefits. No further progress was made at the meeting and it ended with an agreement to meet again in January. A few days later Taylor received a letter from K. Vainio announcing Respondents' intention to lower employee Leonard Dalasera's wages to $5 per hour and offering to bargain concerning the matter. Taylor responded and a negotiation session was set for 17 January 1986. The hearing in the instant matter closed on 16 January 1986 before additional bargaining occurred.

2. The transfer of work to Idaho

Respondents had operated an optical lab in Bozeman, Montana, until sometime in September 1984. At that time the lab was closed and its equipment, at least in part, was transferred to the Butte lab. Respondents also operated a retail optical facility in Idaho Falls, Idaho. At the time the Idaho facility was opened it was contemplated that lab services would be provided on site. The space provided in Idaho Falls, however, had never been physically equipped as a laboratory, nor had any personnel been hired to staff that lab until the events in question.

About April 1985, Respondents hired a new lab employee, Keith Du Frame. Du Frame had initially expressed a desire to work in Missoula, Montana, but Respondents hired him for the Butte lab with the understanding that if a job opening became available in Missoula, he would be transferred. In early May, Du Frame approached D. and L. Vainio about employment other than at the Butte lab. Respondents determined it would be appropriate to transfer Du Frame to the Idaho Falls facility and instructed him to take laboratory equipment from the Butte lab as necessary to establish the Idaho Falls lab. Thereafter Du Frame took certain equipment from the Butte facility, moved it to the Idaho Falls facility, and commenced operation of the lab there about 20 May 1985. The Idaho Falls lab thereater did the work generated by the Idaho Falls retail facility and, insofar as the record reflects, continues in operation.

[7] D. Vainio testified that Respondents felt that employees were deliberately damaging materials and that this proposal was designed to reduce such vandalism.

There is no dispute that Respondents at any time notified the Union of its intention to transfer personnel and equipment from the Butte lab to the Idaho Falls facility nor offered to bargain concerning the decision or its effects on lab unit employees.

3. Holiday pay issues

It is clear that with respect to all of Respondents' operations, bookkeeping procedures and payroll practices tended to be ad hoc rather than standardized. Clearly, they were not subject to written or fixed personnel policies and practices. Respondents' lab is normally closed on such traditional holidays as New Year's Day, Fourth of July, Thanksgiving, and Christmas. The General Counsel adduced testimony that until July 1985 when such holidays fell on normal workdays for lab employees, they received pay for the holiday. For example, in 1983 when Christmas fell on a Sunday, a day when the lab is normally closed, employees were paid for the day following Christmas, 26 December, whether they worked the entire day or not. D. Vainio testified that in July 1985 he decided that lab employees should not receive pay for holidays not worked and instructed his bookkeeper to so restrict pay. He made this decision to standardize practices within Respondents' operations. Consistent with the instructions, Respondents' employees were not paid for the Fourth of July, Labor Day, and Thanksgiving holidays in 1985.[8]

There is no dispute that Respondent did not inform the Union of the changes initiated in either holiday or vacation pay.

4. Vacation time

The General Counsel introduced testimonial evidence that lab employees such as King, Dalasera, and Patton received a week's paid vacation after 1 year of service and that employees were told that this was Respondents' policy by Supervisor Becky Hoffman in the period before union organization. Dalasera testified that around 20 July 1985 he requested permission from D. Vainio to take a day of paid vacation and that D. Vainio said he would let Dalasera know later. Several days later Dalasera testified that he again requested vacation time of D. Vainio and was told that he would not get vacation time because he was a "union employee" and because vacations had to be "negotitated." D. Vainio testified that he declined Dalasera's request for time off because of the press of business at the lab and, while he did mention that vacations were a negotiable item with the Union Vainio denied that he told Dalasera he could not have a vacation because he was a union employee.[9]

E. Analysis and Conclusions

1. Initial comments on credibility

While substantial parts of the testimony in the instant matter were undisputed, significant portions of the testimony regarding conduct alleged to be violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act involved direct testimonial conflicts between the members of the Vainio family and various current and former employees. Generally, where statements were attributed to members of the Vainio family, particularly to D. Vainio, by current and former employees, unless specifically discussed below, I have credited the employees. While I do not believe that any witness wilfully misstated events in his or her testimony, I believe that in several of the rather impassioned encounters, described in part, supra, K. and D. Vainio and, at least in one instance, K. Vainio, in the heat of the events, were unable to retain their perspective and, as a consequence, were unable to recall all they said and did. So too, the denials of the Vainio family members addressed to attributed acts and conversations were often general denials denying only the making of wrongful statements and corroborating employees concerning other portions of alleged conversations. In contrast, I found the demeanor of the present and former employees superior.

In making this credibility resolution, which is based in large part on demeanor, I am cognizant of the fact that Respondents adduced evidence that current and former employees have differing degrees of bias against Respondents that would tend to diminish their credibility. I also note that the employees too became impassioned during events. I have considered all of these factors and the record as a whole as well as demeanor in reaching this general credibility determination. However, this initial credibility resolution does not resolve several specific conflicts, which are further discussed below.

2. Alleged 8(a)(1) violations

Consistent with the credibility resolutions set forth above, I find, as alleged by the General Counsel in its consolidated complaints, that during the organizational campaign D. Vainio made numerous statements violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Thus, on the day the Union demanded recognition, I find D. Vainio interrogated employee Dalasera about his union activities and changed his shift because of his role in supporting the Union. The following week I find that D. Vainio informed employees that it would be futile for them to select the Union, that he would sign a contract only over his dead body, and that if the Union came in he would close the lab. I find further he made similar comments on numerous subsequent occasions as alleged in the General Counsel's complaints. I further find that in April, hard after the election, he threatened to subcontract unit work and that in July he informed employee Dalasera that he could not have a vacation because he was a union employee. All the above acts chill employees' Section 7 rights by making it obvious to them that Respondents would punish employee union activities. The acts thus violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act as alleged.

[8] Respondents adduced evidence of payment practices at its facilities other than the lab. I received such evidence over relevant objections from the General Counsel. They are relevant to practices at those facilities. Considering the record as a whole, I find the evidence of Respondents' payroll practices outside the lab insufficient to overcome the uncontradicted testimony of employees regarding practices at the Butte lab.

[9] The General Counsel also alleges that in telling Dalasera his vacation was lost because of the Union Respondents violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act and in actually denying him the requested vacation because of his union activities violated Sec. 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

Discrediting the denials of D. Vainio and K. Vainio, I find as alleged in the complaint described by Leonard Dalasera and other employees that D. Vainio harassed Dalasera by both verbal abuse and the throwing of items because of Dalasera's union activities and because of his testimony at a Board hearing. I reject Respondents' defense that, in effect, the acts and conduct of D. Vainio directed against Dalasera had been longstanding in nature and had not changed as a result of Dalasera's union activities. Conceding these things are matters of degree, the evidence seems clear, and I find, that the abuse Dalasera had previously suffered was significantly increased both in duration and type during the union campaign. The harassment of Dalasera following the second representation hearing by K. Vainio was not, I find, based on a legitimate need of Vainio to inquire of Dalasera's activities at the workplace for purposes of litigation. Rather, I find K. Vainio's badgering of Dalasera was at least in part because of Dalasera's testimony at the hearing, an activity protected under the Act. There is no question, given the finding above, that Respondents' conduct violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. I find by engaging in such acts, Respondents violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

The General Counsel alleges surveillance of the employees' union activities at The Restaurant on 13 January apparently based on the admitted opening remark of L. Vainio to the employees: "What's this a union meeting." Even under the employees' version of events, no surveillance occurred in this meeting as alleged in the complaint. There is no doubt that the Vainio's meeting with the employees was coincidental, and that following a brief conversation with the employees L. Vainio did not attempt to observe or listen in on the employees' conversation. Thus, the surveillance allegation is without merit and will be dismissed.[10]

The General Counsel alleges that K. Vainio solicited employees' grievances at an 18 March 1983 meeting. There is no dispute that K. Vainio held an employee meeting to discuss problems in the production process and to solicit employees' suggestions with respect to those production problems. It is also true that K. Vainio indicated to the employees that he would at least attempt to meet some of their grievances in order to improve the lab's quality of output.

During a union campaign, as was underway at that time, such conduct has been held standing alone to violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. This is so because the solicitation of employee grievances and the promise of meeting those grievances may be seen as an effort by an employer to undermine support for the Union. Not all such conduct, however, violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. See, for example, PYA/Monarch, Inc., 275 NLRB 1194 (1985). There, reversing an administrative law judge, the Board found that the solicitation of grievances relating to the production process and the supplying of new equipment to employees was not a violation where the solicitation of grievances was related to pure production problems and the subsequent remedying of those grievances was simply the result of previous business decisions.

Here, I find that K. Vainio's meeting with employees was specifically related to the letter Respondents had received from one of its opticians attacking the quality of lab products and threatening to resign in consequence. Therefore, I find that Respondents' decision to hold the meeting and the solicitation of grievances that occurred in it were narrowly related to an important and suddenly developing business problem and was not related to employees' union activities. Even during an election campaign, an employer is not foreclosed from addressing business problems as they arise. On this record, and even though as found elsewhere in this decision, there was a pattern of antiunion activities by agents of Respondents, the 18 March meeting was justified by business reasons. Therefore, I find that the General Counsel failed to meet her burden of proof with respect to this allegation. Accordingly, I shall dismiss the 18 March grievance solicitation allegation at the meeting of D. and K. Vainio.

At the meeting of D. and K. Vainio with employees the day before the election, the General Counsel alleges that Respondents' agents solicited grievances from employees, promised to remedy those grievances, threatened to close the facility, and informed employees it would be futile for them to choose the Union as their bargaining representative since Respondents would not sign a contract. Consistent with my credibility resolutions described above, I find that the conduct alleged by the General Counsel occurred as the employees testified. Unlike the 18 March meeting held by K. Vainio, this meeting was clearly a preelection meeting dealing with Respondents' attempts to convince employees that it was unnecessary to vote for the Union. There can be no benign aspect or business justification for the grievance solicitation and promises to remedy these grievances that occurred. The threats to close and the statements that no contract would be signed are classic violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. I find that the General Counsel has sustained her burden with respect to these allegations and find therefore that Respondents violated the Act as alleged.

3. The discharges

a. Beverly Riley

The discharge allegation concerning Beverly Riley presents both factual and legal issues. Respondents agents testified to a management decision to transfe Becky Hoffman from the lab to the Copper City Optica facility, which decision was made before Respondent had knowledge of union activities. Thus, under Respond ents' view of the facts, Riley was to have been termina ed with the closure of the Mountain States Optical facil ty on 10 January 1985. L. Vainio testified that onl through an administrative error was Riley still employe on 11 January. The General Counsel produced eviden from both Hoffman and Riley that management had d cided to transfer Riley from the Mountain State facili to the Copper City Optical facility where she would replace the previous Copper City Optical employee and that she was fired only after and because of the lab employees' union activities. Thus, there is directly contradictory testimony between D. and L. Vainio on the one hand and Beverly Riley and Becky Hoffman on the other. The General Counsel also adduced evidence, previously credited, that Leonard Dalasera was interrogated by D. Vainio on receipt of the Union's demand letter and informed D. Vainio that he, Patton, and significantly Hoffman, were behind the union drive. As previously found, Patton and Dalasera had their shifts changed and, the General Counsel argues, Hoffman was immediately transferred because of her union activities.

[10] The General Counsel also alleges interrogations and threats occurring in this conversation. I credit the employees here over the denials of K. Vainio. These violations are merely cumulative with those found, supra.

I find Hoffman and Riley to be credible witnesses with a superior demeanor and an accurate memory of what transpired. I credit their testimony over that of D. and L. Vainio. Thus, I find, consistent with the General Counsel, that in fact a decision had been made and implemented by Respondents to place Riley at the Copper City Optical facility effective 11 January and that decision was changed only after Respondents learned of the union activities at the lab. Then, in response, they determined to transfer Hoffman to the Copper City facility. In making this factual resolution I rely on the credibility resolutions noted above. I further find that the version of the events given by the Vainios is simply inconsistent and illogical given the undisputed fact that Riley had been transferred from the Mountain State to the Copper City Optical facility and was working there on 11 January. L. Vainio's suggestion that this was a simple administrative mistake seems farfetched given the total pattern of events. Accordingly, I find that Riley was, as of 11 January, the permanent employee at Copper City Optical and was discharged thereafter only as a consequence of Respondents' learning of the employees' union activities.

The General Counsel argues from these facts that Riley was simply an innocent victim of Respondents' decision to transfer Hoffman and as such she was an "innocent bystander" who suffered as a result of the personnel actions Respondents took to retard employees' union activities at the lab. Thus, argues the General Counsel, despite the fact that Riley did not engage in union activities and was not suspected of engaging in union activities by Respondents, her discharge was a consequence of Respondents' illegal acts and hence violates the Act. Respondents challenge the legal contentions of the General Counsel and argue that inasmuch as Riley did not engage in either union activities or other protected concerted activities the General Counsel's discharge allegation cannot stand as a matter of law.

The General Counsel's arguments, supported by case citations on brief, are correct. Where an employer discriminates against an employee, irrespective of that employee's real or suspected union or protected concerted activities, as a consequence of or in an attempt to hide wrongful acts directed against other employees because of their protected conduct, the "innocent bystander" is protected by the Act. Thus, an employer may not with impunity terminate employees in an attempt to conceal the discharge of other employees for their union activities. Nor may an employer discharge an employee in order to make room for the transfer of a union employee from one location to another where the transfer is designed to discourage the latter employees' union activities.

However, the instant case presents a more complicated situation than that argued by the General Counsel. Granted it is a convention notion that those injured as a consequence of the employer's illegal act are protected irrespective of their union activities, the situation here is made more complex by the fact that the transferred employee was a statutory supervisor. The General Counsel does not contend in its complaint that the transfer of Becky Hoffman from the lab to the Copper City Optical was because of her union activities and was in any way illegal. This is a correct view of the law because an employer has an absolute right under Board law to take advance action against statutory supervisors because of their union activities. Put another way, a supervisor engaging in union activities is not protected. Under the Act an employer is free to transfer a statutory supervisor. Thus, on the facts of this case, the legal arguments the General Counsel makes is that an employee or "innocent bystander" is protected from discharge if the discharge results from an employer's transfer of a supervisor because of the supervisor's union activities. The General Counsel has not incorporated this final legal complexity into her legal arguments at trial or on brief. I find the issue on this narrow question presents difficult issues the resolutions of which are far from free from doubt.

It is unnecessary to resolve the legal questions presented by the General Counsel's "innocent bystander" theory, however. This is so because in crediting the testimony of employees Hoffman and Riley, I have credited Riley's version of the conversation between herself and L. Vainio on 11 January 1985. In that credited version of the conversation L. Vainio informed Riley not only that she was discharged but that she was discharged as a consequence of the Union's organizational activities at Respondents' lab and that she had lab employees to blame. That conversation, coupled with Hoffman's credited version of an earlier conversation with L. Vainio that he well knew that in transferring Hoffman, Riley would be laid off, I find that the layoff of Riley was not a simple consequence of Respondents' decision to transfer Hoffman. Rather, I find, based on the credited testimony, that the decision to transfer Hoffman and the decision to lay off Riley were separate decisions consciously reached by Respondents' agents. Thus, I find that not only did Respondents seek to transfer Hoffman, but they further sought to cause the discharge of an employee, here Riley, and to inform that employee that her discharge was caused by the Union. Thus, rather that characterize Riley's discharge as an "innocent bystander" discharge here, I find that her discharge was designed to indicate to those who would support the Union the power Respondents have over their employees. She is therefore an example to other employees that they could lose their jobs because of union activities. Given this determination, the Riley discharge ceases to be an exotic theoretical construct with the legal difficulties described above and is rather a conventional "exemplary" discharge designed to show union employees Respondents' power. As such, the violation is a traditional violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. This is so because, irrespective of the union activities of Riley, Respondents' actions, indeed their explict statements, made it clear to employees that lab employees' union activities caused Riley's discharge. Accordingly, I find the General Counsel has met her burden concerning the Riley discharge and find a violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

b. Leonard Dalasera

The General Counsel correctly asserts that: (1) Leonard Dalasera's union activities became known to Respondents as of the Union's demand for recognition in January; (2) thereafter, Respondent committed various unfair labor practices against him including interrogations, shift changes, and harassment; (3) his termination notice was received about 1 April but was to be effective by its terms on 15 April, the day before the scheduled union election, and (4) the discharge was, in fact, carried out on 16 April 1985.

In defense Respondents argue that: (1) Dalasera was an unsatisfactory employee, (2) his failures as a final inspector of lab work were the cause of commercial difficulties including a complaint by an optician in Respondents' employ, and (3) on 18 March 1985 K. Vainio solicited employees' suggestions to improve production—a meeting I found not to violate the Act—and was told by employees that Dalasera should be terminated or transferred from the work he had done up to that time. Respondents further showed that Dalasera and the Vainio family had a longstanding relationship that transcended simple employer-employee relations, that the decision to terminate Dalasera was reached only reluctantly, and was rescinded but a few days after its taking effect. In essence Respondents argue that as a result of D. Vainio's feelings toward Dalasera, the Vainios' fears about his sensitivity and his long service and special relationship with the family, Dalasera's relationship to Respondents cannot be viewed in simple employer-employee terms but must be judged as a family matter transcending union questions. To these contentions, the General Counsel demurs arguing that the only change in Dalasera's work performance in April 1985 was the employees' union activities and the scheduled 16 April election.

The bulk of the assertions made by both the General Counsel and Respondents are uncontestably true to a degree but must be weighed and balanced. On the basis of the record as a whole and in particular the unfair labor practices already found, I am convinced that while Dalasera's employment relationship with Respondents was undoubtedly special, the timing of the termination notice and actual discharge itself turned on the employees' union activities and the upcoming union election. Under the Board's Wright Line analysis[11] the General Counsel by the above-credited evidence has established a strong prima facie case that Dalasera's union activities were the cause of his discharge. Consequently the burden of proof shifted to Respondents to show that Dalasera would have been terminated even if he had not engaged in such activities. I do not credit the testimony of the Vainio family, primarly D. Vainio, that his decision to fire Dalasera was free from antiunion motivation. On this record, and in particular in light of the close timing of the termination notice, the termination itself and the time of the election—even considering the admittedly highly special relationship between the Vainio family and Dalasera—I find Respondents have not met their burden of proof as assigned it under Wright Line. In part, this is based on my agreement with the General Counsel that Dalasera's work quality and other employees' views about his work were longstanding and unchanged. Accordingly, I find that the General Counsel has sustained her burden of proof on this allegation. Therefore, I find that in terminating Dalasera, Respondents violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

c. Chris Knutson and Matt Grigsby

The Knutson and Grigsby terminations occurred after or as a part of a confrontation between D. Vainio and the employees. Respondents argue provocation, insubordination, and, in effect, discharge for cause. The General Counsel argues that the true reason for the discharges was the employees' union activities including their intention to participate in trial preparation with counsel for the General Counsel. The General Counsel argues Respondents' reasons for the discharges are mere pretext. For the reasons appearing below I reject the General Counsel's imputation of knowledge of employee pretrial preparation to Respondents and find the discharge allegations without merit.

The General Counsel contends that during the week of 10 June 1985, counsel for the General Counsel was in the area preparing for the then-scheduled 25 June hearing in this matter. Various employees testified that they were aware of the Government lawyers' presence in the area and it is clear that this was a matter of common interest to employees in the lab on 11 and 12 June. On the morning of 12 June there was a discussion among the employees regarding the upcoming hearing and their preparations for that hearing with Government lawyers. It was this conversation that D. Vainio came upon and which caused the rebuke of the employees for not being on task. The General Counsel argues that it is a permissible inference that D. Vainio heard or learned of the Government lawyers' activities and/or the subject matter of the employees' lab conversation and that the subsequent events were a result of that fact. Conceding that this inference is critical to the Government's case concerning the 12 June discharges, I find there is insufficient evidence on this record to draw such an inference. I specifically decline to do so. The record contains no other evidence of any kind that the Vainios were aware of the employees' activities vis-a-vis trial preparation. There is no evidence that D. Vainio could have heard the conversation's specifics and he denied that he did. Accordingly, I find that D. Vainio had no knowledge of employees' activities as witnesses and did not overhear the conversations at issue.

[11] Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), see also NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983).

Given that Respondents had no knowledge of the nature of the employees' conversations on the mornings of 11 and 12 June, there was nothing inherently suspicious in D. Vainio's rebukes to employees on those occasions to cease their conversation and resume work. While it is undisputed that D. Vainio's manner on those occasions was curt and perhaps even abusive, there is ample record testimony to indicate that his conduct on other occasions was sufficiently similar that no adverse inference arises from his unhappy or abusive manner.

Rejecting the General Counsel's claim that the 12 June altercation was but a pretext seized on by Respondents to cloak its true motive for discharging the employees, it is appropriate then to look to the actual events for purposes of evaluating Respondents' defenses. Regarding Chris Knutson, unchallenged evidence clearly indicates that Knutson's remarks during D. Vainio's telephone call and thereafter during his confrontation with Vainio constituted a direct challenge to Vainio's authority and, without doubt, enraged Vainio. On this record the evidence is clear, and I find, that D. Vainio terminated Chris Knutson because of Knutson's remarks made during and after his telephone call on the morning of 12 June and for no other reason. Challenging the authority of a supervisor and owner under the circumstances presented here constitutes insubordination sufficient to justify the discharge and rebut any contention of pretext. I find the General Counsel had not met her burden with respect to Knutson's discharge.

The General Counsel argued that the altercation between Knutson and Vainio occurred after Vainio's announcement of Knutson's discharge and, as a consequence, Knutson's conduct during that altercation could not be a basis for sustaining Respondent's defense as to Knutson. The altercation between Knutson and Vainio is, however, highly relevant to the Grigsby discharge. It is clear that Vainio's initial rage was directed at Knutson. Relying on Knutson's testimony, which I credit here, Grigsby later interjected himself into the altercation in a manner that caused Vainio to fix on him as an ally of Knutson. Grigsby's testimony on this question is not inconsistent. Thus I find that D. Vainio, initially upset by Knutson's remarks, terminated Knutson. The subsequent altercation between Vainio and Knutson exacerbated Vainio's unhappiness and, during those events, through misfortune or otherwise, Grigsby's conduct directed D. Vainio's attention to him and Grigsby's discharge resulted. Inasmuch as I have found Vainio's discharge of Knutson unrelated to union activities, so too I find his discharge of Grigsby equally devoid of impermissible motivation. Given this finding, it is unnecessary to make a determination regarding the "fairness" of Grigsby's termination. Irrespective of the events as they occurred on 12 June, I find that D. Vainio perceived Grigsby's conduct as allying him with Knutson at a time when D. Vainio had fired and then had an altercation with Knutson. I find that this perception precipitated Grigsby's discharge.

Having found that the discharges on 12 June did not result from the employees' union or other protected concerted activities, the allegations of the General Counsel fail and I shall dismiss these allegations. The General Counsel also alleges a 3-day closure of the lab commencing on 12 June as a violation of the Act. In light of the lack of merit of the discharge allegations, I shall also dismiss the General Counsel's contention that the surface lab was improperly closed for 3 days commencing on 12 June.

4. Allegations of 8(a)(5) violations

a. The course of conduct allegation

The General Counsel argues Respondents engaged in a course of conduct of bad-faith bargaining based on the essentially undisputed details of bargaining described above. Thus, the General Counsel argues Respondents were dilatory at best and more generally unwilling to communicate with the Union with respect to scheduling of bargaining sessions. The General Counsel argues the bargaining sessions that were held were rendered unproductive by Kevin Vainio's (1) lack of authority to commit Respondents to fixed proposals, (2) lack of knowledge regarding current terms and conditions extant in the unit, and (3) unwillingness to make concessions on any of the Union's proposals, or to submit proposals of his own other than regressive or static proposals. Thus, the General Counsel argues over the entire bargaining process there were few meetings. Respondents never submitted a written proposal—indeed lost and treated with less than business formality the proposals of the Union. Respondents made essentially but a single concession and subsequently withdrew that concession. Finally, Respondents consistently made wage proposals that were significantly less than the status quo. The General Counsel also argues that Respondents would make proposals, for example, the proposal to retain its existing health plan, but would at all times fail to supply details despite requests to do so. Thus, the General Counsel argues Respondents' conduct indicates a complete lack of good faith and the absence of any intention to reach an agreement with the Union regarding terms and conditions of employment. This conduct, argues the General Counsel, coupled with the statements of Respondents' agents expressing an intention not to bargain in good faith found violative above, demonstrates that Respondents engaged in a course of conduct designed not to reach agreement with the Union but rather to delay bargaining and to undermine the Union. With a plethora of authority cited on brief for both the individual elements of insufficient bargaining and her final bad-faith conclusion, the General Counsel argues that Respondents must be found to have engaged in a general course of bad-faith bargaining.

Respondents on brief and at the trial correctly argued that it is not compelled to make concessions in bargaining. Respondents further argue that because of the unusual business nature of Respondents, it was necessary for K. Vainio to consult with his coowners before final commitments could be made, that the scheduling of meetings included cancellations on both sides, and that as a family-run business under economic duress, Respondents' conduct taken as a whole did not rise to the level of a violation of the Act.

The specifics of the negotiation process, as testified to by Union Representative Taylor essentially without contradiction from Respondents' agents, support the General Counsel's factual arguments that Respondents simply did not enter into the bargaining process in a businesslike way with a serious intention of coming to agreement. The entire course of Respondents' conduct over the entire period of negotiations, in light of D. Vainio's repeated statements that no contract would ever be reached, and the lack of any essential participation by Respondents in the bargaining process other than as a passive denier of union suggestions, renders it clear that no good-faith bargaining took place.

An imporatant factor in my finding was Respondents' technique of rejecting the Union's proposals and then counterproposing the terms of employment currently in place. When asked by the Union for specifics concerning such proposals, K. Vainio responded with an admission of ignorance or, in at least one case, incorrect statements,[12] and other statements were never followed up with more specific information despite requests. Thus, not only were Respondents unwilling to make changes in the terms and conditions of employment, they were unwilling even to describe in detail what the current terms and conditions of employment were. Further, looking at the pattern of bargaining, I agree with the General Counsel that Respondents did not engage in collective bargaining in a businesslike way. It is clear that the Union's numerous telephone messages were usually not returned.[13] Respondents simply treated bargaining in a less than serious way. Respondents never submitted written proposals to the Union, on at least one occasion lost the Union's proposals, and Respondents' agent clearly was not prepared for the bargaining. Thus, K. Vainio was uninformed regarding terms and conditions of Respondents' employees and had not either consulted the coowners or obtained sufficient bargaining authority to make proposals varying from the status quo. Finally, Respondents sought substantial wage concessions without making any concessions on noneconomic terms of employment. This conduct combined with the other failings described above make it clear that Respondents simply did not intend to reach an agreement with the Union or enter into a collective-bargaining agreement.

Based on all the above, the record is clear and I find that Respondents have engaged in a course of conduct designed to avoid reaching an agreement with the Union. This conduct included failure to address bargaining seriously, failure to provide requested information to the Union concerning current terms and conditions of employment or the specifics of its proposals, and the failure to provide an informed bargaining representative the sufficient authority to effectively negotiate with the Union on Respondents' behalf. Such conduct violates Section 8(a)(5) of the Act and I so find.

b. Unilateral change allegations

(1) Lab transfer

The General Counsel contends that on 20 May 1985 Respondents transferred personnel, equipment, and work from the Butte lab to the Idaho Falls facility in violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. Respondents do not dispute that some work, some equipment, and one employee were transferred to the Idaho Falls facility. Nor do they dispute that the Union was never informed of the actions nor offered an opportunity to bargain regarding the decision to transfer what had, up to that time, been unit work. Respondents in essence make two arguments, first that the transfer was made in good faith and, second, that the transfer to Idaho Falls and long been intended and that the timing of the transfer was caused by a fortuitous transfer request of an employee.

The Supreme Court's decision in NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736 (1962), addresses each of Respondents' defenses here. First, the Court held that good faith by an employer in making unilateral changes is not a defense to a violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. Second, concerning Respondents' argument that the transfer to the Idaho Falls facility had been set in motion prior to the Union's certification as representative of lab unit employees, the Supreme Court in Katz considered merit pay increases that had been granted by an employer during union negotiations. The Court distinguished between the simple implementation of previously determined business decisions and the implementation of management decisions about which there was a large measure of discretion.[14] Here, the decision to staff equip the Idaho lab facility had not been firmly decided until well after the union certification. This later decision to initiate the transfer was based on the "informed discretion" of Respondents by Respondents' own admission. Under such circumstances the decision was not yet fixed and Respondents were obligated to notify and bargain with the Union. Accordingly, sustaining the General Counsel's allegation, I find that by transferring the equipment, work, and personnel from the lab in the Idaho Falls facility, Repondents violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

(2) Holiday pay

The General Counsel also contends that Respondents violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by unilaterally changing unit employees' holiday pay without bargaining with the Union. The record reflects that D. Vainio changed the holiday pay practice previously in effect among lab employees in July 1985. Respondents' defense in essence is that like so many of the personnel practices at the lab an informal, perhaps ad hoc, system had previously been in effect. In July Respondents put order and consistency into effect—here making the lab practice consistent with the practice in place at Respondents' retail facilities. Thus, in effect Respondents argue that they merely brought order out of chaos and that their actions must be viewed as benign in context. Again, essentially for the reasons asserted in Katz, supra, I reject Respondents' defense. There is no doubt, irrespective of however employees have been treated in Respondents' retail facilities, that lab unit employees were made worse off by the changes instituted in July. The Union had no opportunity to bargain regarding the matter. Such conduct violates Section 8(a)(5) of the Act, and I so find.

[12] Such as the statement that Respondents did not have paid vacations.

[13] There was some dispute at the hearing regarding the proper location at which to contact K. Vainio, i.e., either at the lab or at his Belgrade, Montana office. I find that dispute unnecessary to resolve. The lack of communication continued over a sufficient period that, irrespective of what might have initially been a mistake, Respondents' failure to make it clear to Taylor where and how he should contact K. Vainio rebuts any argument of innocent mistake in the continuing inability to return calls.

[14] NLRB v. Katz 369 U.S. at 746.

5. Summary

As set forth in detail above, I have found that Respondents have violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by engaging in numerous acts of threats, interrogations, solicitation of grievances, harassment of employees, and changes of working conditions because of employees' union activities. Save for the solicitation of grievance allegations involving K. Vainio and the surveillance allegations involving L. Vainio, I have sustained the General Counsel's allegations of violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

I have found that Respondents violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discharging employees Dalasera and Riley. I have dismissed the General Counsel's allegations that Respondents improperly discharged employees Knutson and Grigsby.

I have found that through (1) dilatory bargaining, (2) the failure to supply relevant requested information to the Union, and (3) the failure to supply an informed negotiator cloaked with sufficient authority, and (4) other conduct described above, Respondents engaged in a general course of conduct designed to avoid reaching an agreement with the Union in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. Further, I have found that Respondent, in transferring personnel, equipment, and work from the Butte lab to an Idaho Falls lab and in changing lab employees' holiday pay, in each case without notifying or bargaining in good faith with the Union concerning such changes, violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. I have determined that the General Counsel's allegations that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by a 3-day closure of the lab commencing 12 June 1985 is without merit.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondents engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that they be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. With respect to the discharges of Dalasera and Riley I shall recommend that Respondents make whole their employees for any loss of earnings or other rights and benefits they may have suffered by reason of Respondents' discrimination against them. Backpay shall be computed in the manner set forth in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest as provided in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See also Isis Plumbing Co., 139 NLRB 716 (1962).[15] Respondents shall also be required to remove any reference to these discharges from their files and to so notify the employees. Sterling Sugars, 261 NLRB 472 (1982).

To remedy the unilateral changes found violative of the Act, I shall order Respondents to restore the status quo ante and to make employees whole for any loss of wages and benefits the unilateral changes caused, with interest, as set forth in the cases cited above. The General Counsel seeks an order extending the Union's certification year to a period extending to 1 year after the commencement of bargaining in good faith. In light of my findings regarding Respondents' failure and refusal to engage in good-faith bargaining to date, the requested extension of the certification years is in accord with Board policy and will be granted.[16]

The General Counsel also seeks an order requiring Respondents to, inter alia (1) bargain on request within 15 days of the Board order; (2) bargain on request for a minimum of 15 hours per week until agreement or lawful impasse is reached or until the parties agree to a cease bargaining; and (3) prepare bargaining progress reports every 15 days and submit them to the Regional Director for Region 19, and also serve such reports on the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers Local Lodge 88, AFL-CIO, so as to provide the Union with an opportunity to reply. Given that I have found that Respondents have engaged in a uniform course of conduct designed to defeat the Union as representative of employees and not to engage in good-faith bargaining, I find the General Counsel's requested remedy here appropriate.

The General Counsel seeks special language in the order to assist in policing compliance with the order. The nature of this order does not warrant the extraordinary language requested.

Respondents' unfair labor practices were widespread, involved essentially all unit employees, and spanned the entire period from the commencement of the union activity to the time of the hearing. I find that Respondents' general disregard for the employees' fundamental statutory rights warrant the imposition of a broad order directing Respondents, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, from engaging in unfair labor practices "in any other manner." See Mid-Continent Refrigerated Service Co., 228 NLRB 917 (1977); Federal Alarm, 230 NLRB 518 (1977).

On the basis of the above findings of fact and on the entire record, I make the following

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondents, and each of them, are employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The following employees of Respondents constitute a unit appropriate for purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

---

[15] As in each case the discharged employee was subsequently reinstated, no reinstatement order is appropriate.

[16] See Mar-Jac Poultry Co., 136 NLRB 785 (1962), and its progeny.

> All laboratory employees employed by Respondents at their facility located at 225 South Idaho, Butte, Montana; but excluding all office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the National Labor Relations Act.

4. Respondents violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by interrogating employees about their union activities and sympathies and the sympathies of other employees, by soliciting employee complaints and grievances and promising to remedy such grievances, by threatening employees with closure of the facility or the subcontracting out of work if employees selected the Union as their collective-bargaining representative, by harassing employees because of the employees' union activities or because of their testimony in Board representation hearings, by informing its employees that it would be futile to choose the Union as its collective-bargaining representative, by threatening to bargain in bad faith, and by changing the shifts and holiday pay of employees because of their support for the Union.

5. Respondents violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discharging employees Beverly Riley and Leonard Dalasera because of their union activities or because of the union activities of other employees.

6. Respondents violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act:

a. By transferring personnel and work from its Butte, Montana lab to its Idaho Falls, Idaho facility without notice to the Union and without affording the Union an opportunity to bargain concerning the decision and the effects of such removal.

b. By unilaterally changing employees' terms and conditions of employment without first bargaining with the Union in good faith regarding those changes.

c. By engaging in a course of conduct designed to undermine the Union and to avoid reaching agreement with the Union, including dilatory communication and scheduling of meetings with the Union, failure to conduct bargaining in a businesslike fashion, making regressive proposals while failing and refusing to supply specific information concerning those proposals or current conditions of employment of unit employees.

International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, Local 25, AFL-CIO[1] and Emery Air Freight Corporation d/b/a Emery Worldwide. Case 1-CD-757

July 29, 1988

DECISION AND DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

By Chairman Stephens and Members Johansen and Babson

The charge in this Section 10(k) proceeding was filed October 1, 1985,[2] by Emery Air Freight Corporation d/b/a Emery Worldwide (the Company or Emery). The charge alleges that International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, Local 25 (Local 25) violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the National Labor Relations Act by engaging in proscribed activity with an object of forcing Emery to assign certain work to employees it represents rather than to employees of Visa International (Visa). The hearing was held on December 4 before Hearing Officer Thomas J. Morrison.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board affirms the hearing officer's rulings, finding them free from prejudicial error. On the entire record, the Board makes the following findings.

I. JURISDICTION

The Company is a Delaware corporation with an office and place of business in East Boston, Massachusetts, where it is engaged in the overnight airfreight forwarding of time-sensitive documents, packages, and freight. It annually derives gross revenues in excess of $50,000 from the transportation of freight from its facility in East Boston directly to points located outside the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. The parties stipulate, and we find, that the Company is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and that Local 25 is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE DISPUTE

A. Background and Facts of Dispute

Emery operates an overnight airfreight forwarding delivery service with facilities around the world, including an East Boston, Massachusetts facility at Logan Airport. For many years in the Boston area, Emery had all of its pickup and delivery work performed by independent drayage companies or by common carriers. At that time, Emery employed dockmen at the East Boston location. In October 1972, Local 25 was certified as the collective-bargaining representative of the dockmen employed at the East Boston location. In 1982, a change was made in Emery's operations and Emery began to use some of its dockmen as drivers, and they began doing pickup and delivery work in the Boston metropolitan area with independent drayage companies providing backup service there. Emery continued to use various drayage companies to perform pickup and delivery work throughout the rest of its catchment areas in the Commonwealth.[3]

Emery's East Boston facility services most of eastern Massachusetts. In addition, Emery operates separate facilities in Manchester, New Hampshire, and Portland, Maine. Pickup and delivery work for the Manchester and Portland facilities is performed exclusively by independent drayage companies.

Customers call Emery for a shipment to be picked up, and Emery arranges for the pickup. Who actually picks up the shipment depends primarily on where the customer is located. Once a piece of freight is picked up, it is brought to the East Boston facility, where it is loaded into containers and, each evening, forwarded by plane to Emery's "hub" facility in Dayton, Ohio. In Dayton, the freight is sorted by destination. Each morning, freight from all areas of the country which has a destination that is serviced out of East Boston is flown there. In East Boston, the freight is distributed for delivery. As with pickup work, who delivers the freight depends largely on the location of the recipient.

Prior to August 12, Emery had an agreement with Dave's Motor Transport (Dave's), an independent drayage company that, pursuant to the above agreement, provided pickup and delivery of freight for Emery in areas outside the Metropolitan Boston area, including the Lowell-Lawrence area. Local 25 also represents employees of Dave's. On August 12, after having engaged in several discussions with Dave's and other independent drayage companies, including Visa, Emery began using Visa's employees instead of Dave's employees to perform the pickup/delivery work in the Lowell-Lawrence area. There is no evidence that the employees of Visa are represented by any labor organization. Emery decided to make the change from Dave's to Visa for various reasons, including the price and efficiency of operations. Prior to the August 12 change, Visa had performed pickup and delivery work for Emery in New Hampshire and had indicated that it could perform similar work in the Lowell-Lawrence area at a very competitive price. Emery had discussed the need to cut costs and improve service several times with Dave's, but was unable to reach agreement regarding the Lowell-Lawrence freight. Furthermore, Emery had received customer complaints about the level of service provided by Dave's employees. As a result, the decision was made to use Visa for the pickup/delivery work in the Lowell-Lawrence area previously performed by Dave's. Emery continues to use Dave's, as well as other drayage firms, in areas outside Metropolitan Boston and to supplement its own Metropolitan Boston service.

[1] On November 1, 1987, the Teamsters International Union was readmitted to the AFL-CIO. Accordingly, the caption has been amended to reflect that change.

[2] All dates are 1985 unless otherwise specified.

[3] About this same time, the unit of employees which Local 25 represents was expanded, and Local 25 now represents all employees employed by Emery at the East Boston location, including drivers, dockmen, and carriers.

The relationship between Emery and the drayage companies is that of customer to suppliers. Emery, as the customer, purchases pickup and delivery services from these various companies. Emery pays an agreed-on price for these services. It is an arm's-length relationship. At Visa's suggestion, some Visa employees wear Emery uniforms and drive trucks similar to those used by Emery. Visa, however, is free to carry Emery's competitor's freight along with Emery's freight.

The current collective-bargaining agreement between Emery and Local 25 covering Emery's employees contains no restrictions on Emery's right to use independent drayage agents. Emery has always done this. The area of dispute, Lowell-Lawrence, has not been regularly served by Emery's employees. At the time of the hearing, Emery's employees did serve one select high volume customer in the area. Further, Emery's employees had, on earlier occasions, served one or two select high volume customers in the area. There is no evidence that the Emery employees' work for these few select high volume customers was affected by the August 12 change.

On August 12, Frank Hackett, a business agent for Local 25, called John Walters, Emery's East Boston service manager, to discuss Emery's change in drayage companies from Dave's to Visa. During this conversation, Hackett told Walters that the Union was going to take Emery "on" over the subcontracting, that Walters should look for informational pickets, and that Emery was going to have big trouble and problems with the changeover. Thereafter, on August 26, Hackett told Walters, during a meeting, that he was having grievances filed over the subcontracting, that Visa should expect informational pickets to be following them, and that Visa should get extra insurance on its employees because they might find "a container sitting on top of them." On September 19 and 24, Hackett repeated his earlier protests over Emery's change in its drayage assignment for the Lowell-Lawrence area.

On October 1, Emery changed its method of shipping freight to and from the Lowell-Lawrence area by changing the "tariff point" from East Boston, Massachusetts to Manchester, New Hampshire. Prior to October 1, freight bound for the Lowell-Lawrence area was picked up at the East Boston facility by individual delivery drivers from Dave's (prior to August 12) or Visa (after August 12). Since October 1, a single Visa shuttle truck picks up the freight and transports it to Visa's Hudson, New Hampshire facility where it is distributed to delivery drivers according to route.

B. Work in Dispute

The work in dispute involves the pickup and delivery of freight in the Lowell-Lawrence, Massachusetts area.[4]

C. The Contentions of the Parties

Local 25 argues that there is no jurisdictional dispute as contemplated in Section 8(b)(4)(D) and Section 10(k) of the Act. It contends the dispute involves its attempts either to recover work lost by Emery's employees whom it represents or to enforce the terms of its contract. It therefore maintains that the notice of hearing under Section 10(k) of the Act should be quashed.

The Employer contends that this is a jurisdictional dispute. It argues that Local 25 has claimed the right to perform work that Emery has assigned to employees of Visa and has taken unlawful action, an object of which is to force Emery to assign that work to members of Local 25. It maintains that this work has never been performed by Emery employees represented by Local 25. Accordingly, it argues Local 25 has no claim to the disputed work, and Emery is free to assign the work to whichever independent contractor it chooses. The Employer claims that Visa employees should be awarded the work based on, among other reasons, industry practice, Emery's past practice and preference, and the economy and efficiency of operations.

[4] The work in dispute does not include the pickup and delivery of freight for one select high volume customer served by Emery's employees at the time of the hearing or one or two select high volume customers that have been served by Emery's employees on occasion in the past.

D. Applicability of the Statute

Before the Board may proceed with a determination of the dispute pursuant to Section 10(k) of the Act, it must be satisfied that there is reasonable cause to believe that Section 8(b)(4)(D) has been violated and that the parties have not agreed on a method for the voluntary adjustment of the dispute. Section 8(b)(4)(D) makes it an unfair labor practice to take coercive action an object of which is to "for[ce] or requir[e] any employer to assign particular work to employees in a particular labor organization or in a particular trade, craft, or class rather than to employees in another labor organization or in another trade, craft, or class . . . ." In order to find reasonable cause to believe Section 8(b)(4)(D) has been violated, "there must be evidence that one group of employees has exerted improper pressure upon the Employer to compel it to assign certain work to that group of employees rather than to another group which also seeks the work." Auto Workers Local 957 (General Motors), 239 NLRB 365, 366 (1978).

As indicated above, on August 12 Emery entered into a contract with Visa for the pickup and delivery of freight in the Lowell-Lawrence area, thus "assigning" the work to Visa's employees. On the same day, August 12, Local 25 Business Agent Frank Hackett told Emery's East Boston service manager, John Walters, that Local 25 was going to take Emery "on" over the "subcontracting," that Walters should look for informational pickets, and that Emery was going to have "big trouble" with the changeover. Thereafter, Hackett made similar statements and threats to Walters on August 26 and September 19 and 24.

We find reasonable cause to believe that Local 25 has violated Section 8(b)(4)(D). There is evidence that on August 12, when Emery assigned the Lowell-Lawrence work to Visa's employees, Local 25 threatened to take action in order to pressure Emery to reassign the Lowell-Lawrence work from Visa's employees to Emery's employees.[5] Cf. Auto Workers Local 957, supra. Contrary to Local 25's contention, we do not find that Local 25's object was to preserve work for its members employed by Emery because, as of August 12, the date Local 25 began pressuring Emery, Emery employees had not lost any work.[6] Thus, we find reasonable cause to believe that a violation of Section 8(b)(4)(D) has occurred and that there exists no agreed-on method for voluntary adjustment of the dispute within the meaning of Section 10(k) of the Act. Accordingly, we find that the dispute is properly before the Board for determination.

Section 10(k) requires the Board to make an affirmative award of disputed work after considering various factors. NLRB v. Electrical Workers IBEW Local 1212 (Columbia Broadcasting), 364 U.S. 573 (1961). The Board has held that its determination in a jurisdictional dispute is an act of judgment based on common sense and experience, reached by balancing the factors involved in a particular case. Machinists Lodge 1743 (J. A. Jones Construction), 135 NLRB 1402 (1962).

The following factors are relevant in making the determination of this dispute.

1. Certification and collective-bargaining agreements

On October 16, 1972, the Board certified Local 25 as bargaining representative of "all full and regular part-time dockmen" employed at Emery's East Boston location.[7] The certification does not cover the work in dispute.

[5] Interestingly, Local 25 also represents the employees of Dave's, who may have lost work as a result of the August 12 change from Dave's to Visa. Nonetheless, although the alleged threat arguably might also be read to pertain to Dave's employees, Local 25's position throughout these proceedings has been that the dispute between Local 25 and Emery concerned lost work for Emery bargaining unit members.

[6] Local 25 argues that the work in dispute concerns work previously performed by Emery's dock employees which, as a result of the change in delivery operations, is presently being performed by Visa's employees. We do not agree. On August 12 Emery changed drayage subcontractors serving the Lowell-Lawrence area from Dave's to Visa. It was on August 12 that Local 25 first began protesting Emery's "subcontracting." Emery's August 12 action resulted in a change in the identity of the drayage subcontractor, but it did not result in a change in the way Emery employees performed their work. It was not until October 1, 7 weeks after Local 25 began pressuring Emery, that Emery changed its method of shipping freight to and from the Lowell-Lawrence area. This October 1 change may have resulted in the loss of some work previously performed by Emery employees. Since at the time Local 25 began pressuring Emery, however, no work had been lost by Emery's employees and no evidence shows that on August 12 Local 25 knew of the upcoming October 1 change in operations, we conclude that Local 25's protests concerned Emery's August 12 change to Visa.

Local 25 also argues that Emery violated the parties' bargaining agreement's prohibition against Emery's use of "any leasing device to a third party to evade [the] contract." However, nothing in the parties' agreement prohibits Emery from using independent drayage contractors to serve the Lowell-Lawrence area. Thus, we reject Local 25's contention that Emery violated the bargaining agreement by assigning the work in dispute to the employees of Visa.

Furthermore, although Visa's drivers would wear Emery uniforms and drive trucks with the Emery logo on them, this is insufficient to establish that Emery violated the contract's prohibition on the use of a "leasing device" to avoid the terms of the agreement. Emery has no control over the way Visa's employees perform their work, not all Visa employees wear Emery uniforms or drive trucks similar to Emery's, and Visa is free to handle Emery's competitors' freight. We note that Local 25 does not contend Emery and Visa are joint employers.

[7] Dave's employees are also represented by Local 25, although no Board certification was introduced into evidence. Visa's employees are not represented by any labor organization.

Emery and Local 25 are also parties to a collective-bargaining agreement. However, the agreement does not cover the pickup and delivery of freight in the Lowell-Lawrence area. Under these circumstances, we find that the factors of certification and collective-bargaining agreements do not favor an award of the disputed work to either group of employees.

2. Company preference and past practice

Emery prefers to use Visa's employees to perform the work in dispute. Emery has always used independent drayage contractors to serve the Lowell-Lawrence area and, prior to August 12, Emery's practice was to use Dave's employees (not Emery's). We find that the factor of company preference and past practice favors an award to the employees of Visa.

3. Industry practice

The evidence reveals that Emery's competitors use independent drayage contractors to pick up and deliver freight. The larger freight carriers, like Emery, use both independent drayage contractors and their own employees for pickup and delivery work. The smaller freight carriers use independent drayage contractors almost exclusively. No evidence was introduced showing what particular criteria the industry uses to determine which routes will be handled by a freight carrier's own employees and which will be handled by an independent drayage contractor's employees. Thus, contrary to Emery's contention, we conclude that the factor of industry practice does not favor an award of the work to either group of employees.

4. Economy and efficiency of operations

Use of Visa's employees to deliver freight to the Lowell-Lawrence area has resulted in early customer deliveries. Local 25 submitted no evidence regarding the economy and efficiency of operations of using Emery's employees. Accordingly, on the evidence before us, we find that the factor of economy and efficiency of operations favors an award of the disputed work to the employees of Visa.

Conclusions

After considering all the relevant factors, we conclude that the employees of Visa are entitled to perform the disputed work. We reach this conclusion relying on the factors of company preference and past practice and economy and efficiency of operations. The determination is limited to the controversy that gave rise to this proceeding.

DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

The National Labor Relations Board makes the following Determination of Dispute.

1. Employees of Visa International are entitled to perform the work of pickup and delivery of freight in the Lowell-Lawrence, Massachusetts area for Emery Air Freight d/b/a Emery Worldwide, East Boston, Massachusetts.

2. International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, Local 25, AFL-CIO is not entitled by means proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act to force Emery Worldwide to assign the disputed work to employees represented by it.

3. Within 10 days from this date, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, Local 25, AFL-CIO shall notify the Regional Director for Region 1 in writing whether it will refrain from forcing Emery Worldwide, by means proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D), to assign the disputed work in a manner inconsistent with this determination.

Cisco Trucking Company, Inc. and United Mine Workers of America. Case 9-CA-23231

July 28, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On April 15, 1987, Administrative Law Judge William F. Jacobs issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The judge found that by failing to request bargaining over the Cisco Trucking Company's (the Respondent) unilateral implementation of wage and benefit changes, United Mine Workers of America (the Union) waived its right to assert that the Respondent's conduct violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. We disagree for the reasons set forth below.

The Respondent, a West Virginia corporation, has been engaged in the business of coal hauling from various minesites in Kentucky and West Virginia as well as providing other mine-related services. Since 1974, the Respondent has recognized and bargained with the Union as its truckdrivers' exclusive bargaining agent. The last effective collective-bargaining agreement between the Respondent and the Union, the 1981 National Bituminous Coal Wage Agreement (NBCWA), expired September 30, 1984. The Union struck the Respondent the next day.

The first meeting between the Respondent and the Union following commencement of the strike occurred on November 1, 1984. Wilson Cisco, the Respondent's owner, offered to sign the 1984 NBCWA, but Union Attorney James Hampton counteroffered with an additional Supplemental Unemployment Benefits Program and severance pay provisions. Each side rejected the other's offer. During sessions on November 28, 1984, and January 28, 1985, Cisco again offered to sign the 1984 NBCWA but was rejected. Cisco did not offer to sign the 1984 NBCWA during subsequent meetings in 1985. Although the Respondent and the Union continued to formulate various proposals during several meetings in 1985, no agreement or impasse had been reached when the instant charge was filed on July 19, 1986.

On December 23, 1985, the Union made an unconditional offer to return to work. The Respondent did not operate during the strike or until March 3, 1986.[1] Cisco, however, did lease the Respondent's trucks to other companies and allowed the Respondent's drivers to operate those trucks.

On February 10, Hampton wrote a letter to the Respondent's attorney, Louis Dene, requesting information on any strike replacements. On February 19, Dene replied that the requested information would be forthcoming and that the Respondent wished to continue negotiations with the Union.

The Respondent and the Union met again on March 3. Before this meeting, the Respondent had received a tentative offer of a contract to haul coal from an inaccessible site in Glen Allen, West Virginia. Before Dene arrived for formal negotiations, Cisco informed Hampton about the potential coal haul and the necessity for building a road to gain access to the site. Cisco further explained that "red dog" would have to be hauled in to help build the road.[2] Cisco then asked Hampton if Cisco could use his striking unit employees to haul the red dog on a "per load" paid basis. Hampton replied by inquiring whether Cisco would recall his employees if he obtained a coal hauling contract. When Cisco answered in the affirmative, Hampton approved the temporary per-load agreement stating that it was important to get the truckdrivers back to work.

During formal negotiations on March 3, Hampton asked Cisco if he would sign the 1984 NBCWA. Cisco replied that he could not sign the 1984 NBCWA without a coal hauling contract. Hampton then inquired whether Cisco would sign any agreement without a coal hauling contract. Hampton was advised that he would receive an answer some time in the future.[3]

Following the March 3 negotiations, Cisco spoke to several of the truckdrivers and offered them the red dog per-load payment plan agreed to by Hampton. Several truckdrivers accepted the offer and red dog hauling to the Glen Allen site began in early March. The truckdrivers were hired as contract laborers and were not on the Respondent's payroll.

[1] All dates hereafter refer to 1986 unless otherwise indicated.

[2] Red dog is a substance used especially for paving in mining areas. As found by the judge, the Respondent's employees were never required to haul red dog under the 1981–1984 collective-bargaining agreement.

[3] Hampton sent a letter to Dene on March 5 memorializing the contents of the March 3 negotiations. In the letter, Hampton stated he was advised that the Respondent was not operating and had no coal haul; that in the event of the resumption of operations by the Respondent, employees would be recalled according to a seniority list provided to Hampton; and that the Respondent agreed to advise Hampton whether the Respondent would execute a new collective-bargaining agreement without its first obtaining a contract to haul coal.

Later in March, the Respondent was able to haul small amounts of coal out of the Glen Allen site while still hauling in red dog. In early April, some full loads of coal were being hauled out of the site and by mid-April, with the completion of the road, the Respondent was able to resume full-time coal hauling operations. On April 16, the Respondent put the truckdrivers back on its payroll, but continued to pay them on a per-load basis while failing to provide benefits required by the expired 1981 NBCWA. As the Glen Allen haul became unprofitable, the Respondent secured other coal hauling jobs but continued to pay by the load as a result of discussions it had directly with employees.[4] The Respondent ignored the 1981 NBCWA benefit provisions.

On April 28, Hampton wrote to Dene advising Dene that since March 3 Respondent's trucks had been seen hauling coal in the Union's jurisdictional area. On May 2, Dene replied that the Respondent was operating as an independent contractor and that its "former" employees were hauling coal and being paid by the load. On June 19, Hampton filed the instant charge.

It is clear from the record that the temporary per-load agreement on March 3 applied to the hauling of red dog only[5] and that, as the judge found, "[b]y May conditions had sufficiently changed whereby the Union could properly expect to sit down with Respondent and negotiate toward a new and permanent agreement." The judge further found that "Hampton did not request bargaining but instead filed the instant charge." The judge concluded that by failing to request bargaining the Union effectively waived its right to assert that the Respondent's unilateral actions violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act (citing U.S. Lingerie Corp., 170 NLRB 750 (1968), and Golden Bay Freight Lines, 267 NLRB 1073 (1983)). The judge also concluded that the continued pay-per-load agreement with the truckdrivers did not constitute individual bargaining in violation of the Act, because the Union could have also requested bargaining on this subject.

An employer has a statutory obligation to continue to follow the terms and conditions of employment governing the employer-employee relationship in an expired contract until it has bargained to impasse with the collective-bargaining representative of its employees, unless the union fails to timely request bargaining following the employer's notice of an intention to modify. NLRB v. Antonino's Restaurant, 648 F.2d 1206, 1214 (9th Cir. 1981); Hen House Market, 175 NLRB 596 (1969), enfd. 428 F.2d 133 (8th Cir. 1970). Even if an impasse is reached, a unilateral change cannot be made unless it is reasonably encompassed within the employer's pre-impasse proposal. Taft Broadcasting Co., 163 NLRB 475, 478 (1967), enfd. sub nom. Television Artists AFTRA v. NLRB, 395 F.2d 622 (D.C. Cir. 1968). There are circumstances, however, which the Board accepts as excusing or justifying unilateral action. These would include situations in which, after timely notice of proposed changes by the employer, the union waives or acquiesces, by inaction or otherwise, in the employer's action. U.S. Lingerie Corp., supra; Stone Boat Yard, 264 NLRB 981 (1982), enfd. 715 F.2d 441 (9th Cir. 1983), cert. denied 466 U.S. 937 (1984).

Of particular relevance here is the rule that the Union's failure to protest the unilateral change does not constitute "acquiescence" where the employer's decision has already been made and implemented, thus making any protest by the Union futile. Soule Glass & Glazing Co. v. NLRB, 652 F.2d 1055, 1084 (1st Cir. 1981); Caravelle Boat Co., 227 NLRB 1355, 1358 (1977). Such cases are distinguishable from those where the union receives timely notice of a change and fails to demand bargaining. U.S. Lingerie Corp., supra; Golden Bay Freight Lines, supra; Clarkwood Corp., 233 NLRB 1172 (1977); Charlie's Oil Co., 267 NLRB 764 (1983).

On April 16 when the Respondent resumed full-time coal hauling operations and placed the truckdrivers back on its payroll, the Respondent was obligated to apply the terms of the expired 1981 NBCWA to its employees. The Respondent continued to pay its drivers by the load, however, and did not accord the drivers the benefits provided by the expired contract. Since the March 3 temporary agreement, as found by the judge, applied only to the hauling of red dog, the Respondent effectively implemented unilateral changes in the truckdrivers' wages and benefits on April 16 when it ignored the 1981 NBCWA and implemented a per-load pay system without providing notice to or an opportunity to bargain with the Union.

[4] Cisco stated he would talk to the truckdrivers and agree on a price for each hauling job. Cisco set a hauling rate based on the per-ton price negotiated with a particular customer and the distance of each haul.

[5] The evidence shows that under this informal agreement with the Union, the Respondent hired the drivers as contract laborers to haul red dog and that there was no offer to recall them as employees until the Respondent was operational again as a coal hauler. In this regard, the drivers initially hauled no coal, and they began to haul coal only in nominal amounts as the road building progressed. It was not until April 16, when the Respondent resumed its business of hauling coal on a full-time basis, that the Respondent recalled the strikers as its employees. In these circumstances, we reject the Respondent's contention that the March 3 agreement represented the Union's acquiescence in the Respondent's use of its payment-per-load formula for normal coal hauling work.

The record indicates that the Respondent failed to give the Union any notice concerning the wage and benefit changes prior to April 16. Furthermore, there is no evidence that Hampton knew about the Respondent's coal hauling activities before April 16.[6] Because the Union never received any advance notice of the wage and benefit changes prior to their unilateral implementation, it could not have waived its bargaining rights. Gulf States Mfg. v. NLRB, 704 F.2d 1390, 1397 (5th Cir. 1983) ("It is . . . well established that a union cannot be held to have waived bargaining over a change that is presented to it as a fait accompli"). Contrary to the judge's apparent finding, the Union's failure to request bargaining after the changes were implemented did not constitute a waiver. Intersystems Design Corp., 278 NLRB 759 (1986).

Further, as indicated above, the record shows that the Respondent, after resuming full-time coal hauling operations in mid-April, discussed the coal hauling contracts with its employees and offered them wage rates on a per-load basis. In so doing, the Respondent dealt directly with its employees concerning wages and in derogation of the Union's status as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees.

Accordingly, we find that the Union did not waive its bargaining rights and that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) on and after April 16, 1986, by implementing unilateral changes in wages and benefits, and by dealing directly with employees.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. By failing to adhere to the terms and conditions of employment provided in its last collective-bargaining agreement without reaching either impasse or a new agreement with the Union, the Company has engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. By bypassing the Union and dealing directly with its employees in the unit by soliciting the employees to work at a wage rate less than that specified under the terms of its last collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, the Company has engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, we shall order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that the Respondent has failed to adhere to the terms and conditions of employment provided in its last collective-bargaining agreement with the Union without reaching impasse or signing a new agreement and has dealt directly with its unit employees by soliciting and engaging employees to continue working at a wage rate less than that specified under the terms of the last collective-bargaining agreement, we shall order that the Respondent restore the status quo ante by giving full force and effect to the provisions of its collective-bargaining agreement governing terms and conditions of employment, retroactive to April 16, 1986, and to make whole those unit employees who worked at a wage rate less than that specified under the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement, according to the rates specified in the collective-bargaining agreement. To the extent that the Respondent's failure to adhere to any other terms and conditions of employment provided in the collective-bargaining agreement was economically detrimental to the employees or to any trust fund established under the agreement, the Respondent shall be required to make such employees and trust funds whole for all losses suffered as a result of the Respondent's conduct. The amount of backpay due the employees shall be computed in the manner provided by the Board in Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 682 (1970), with interest on any amounts due paid in the manner prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded.[8] We shall leave to the compliance stage of the proceeding the determination of whether the Respondent must pay any additional amounts into the trust funds. See Merryweather Optical Co., 240 NLRB 121 (1979).[9] Finally, the Respondent shall be required to post the attached notice to employees at its offices and at any site where individuals performing unit work are employed.

[6] On cross-examination, Hampton testified that he could not recall the date he received the information that the Respondent was paying its truckdrivers as independent contractors to haul coal in the Pike County area.

[7] We deny the General Counsel's request for a visitatorial provision. Under the circumstances of this case, we find such a provision unnecessary. Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

[8] 283 NLRB 1173 (1987). Interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

[9] The Respondent shall also reimburse its employees for any expenses ensuing from its failure to make contributions to various funds established by the collective-bargaining agreement between the Union and the Company. Kraft Plumbing, 252 NLRB 891 fn. 2 (1980), enfd. 661 F.2d 940 (9th Cir. 1981).

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Cisco Trucking Company, Inc., Varney, West Virginia, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain collectively with United Mine Workers of America as the exclusive representative of its employees in the unit set forth below with respect to rates of pay, wages, and other terms and conditions of employment by failing to adhere to the terms and conditions of employment provided in its last collective-bargaining agreement with the Union and by bypassing and dealing directly with employees by soliciting them to and engaging them to work at a wage rate less than that specified under the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement. The unit is:

> All employees of the Respondent engaged in the production of coal, including removal of overburden and coal waste, preparation, processing and cleaning of coal and transportation of coal (except by waterway or rail not owned by the Respondent), repair and maintenance work normally performed at the mine site or at a central shop of the Respondent and maintenance of gob piles and mine roads, and work of the type customarily related to all of the above; excluding coal inspectors, weigh bosses, all office clerical employees, and all professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Restore the status quo ante by giving full force and effect to the provisions of the 1981-1984 collective-bargaining agreement with the Union governing terms and conditions of employment retroactive to April 16, 1986.

(b) Make whole those unit employees who worked at a wage rate less than that specified under the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement according to the rate specified in the collective-bargaining agreement, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the decision.

(c) To the extent that the Respondent's failure to give full force and effect to the provisions of the 1981–1984 collective-bargaining agreement was economically detrimental to employees or to any trust fund established under the agreement, make such individuals and trust funds whole for all losses suffered as a consequence of the Respondent's conduct, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the decision.

(d) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(e) Post at its facility in Varney, West Virginia, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[10] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 9, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(f) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice. Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize
To form, join, or assist any union
To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice
To act together for other mutual aid or protection
To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain collectively with United Mine Workers of America as the exclusive representative of our employees in the unit set forth below with respect to rates of pay, wages, and other terms and conditions of employment, by failing to adhere to the terms and conditions of employment provided in our collective-bargaining agreement with the Union and by bypassing the Union and dealing directly with employees by soliciting them and engaging them to work at a wage rate less than that specified under the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement. The unit is:

[10] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

> All our employees engaged in the production of coal, including removal of overburden and coal waste, preparation, processing and cleaning of coal, and transportation of coal (except by waterway or rail not owned by us), repair and maintenance work normally performed at the mine site or at a central shop of ours and maintenance of gob piles and mine roads, and work of the type customarily related to all of the above; excluding coal inspectors, weigh bosses, all office clerical employees, and all professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL restore the status quo ante by giving full force and effect to the provisions of the 1981–1984 collective-bargaining agreement retroactive to April 16, 1986.

WE WILL make whole, with interest, those unit employees who worked at a wage rate less than that specified under the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement according to the rate specified in that agreement.

WE WILL make whole, with interest, employees and any trust fund to which we were obligated to contribute on behalf of the employees for any losses they may have suffered as a result of our failure to adhere to the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WILLIAM F. JACOBS, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried before me on 14 October 1986 at Pikeville, Kentucky. The charge was filed 19 June 1986 by United Mine Workers of America (the Union). The complaint issued 1 August 1986 alleging that Cisco Trucking Company, Inc. (Respondent or the Company) violated Sections 8(a)(1) and (5) and 8(d) of the Act by failing to continue in full force and effect all of the terms and conditions of the 1981 collective-bargaining agreement; by failing to pay employees in the unit the wage rates set forth in the wage rate appendix of the 1981 collective-bargaining agreement; by failing to pay benefits required by the 1981 collective-bargaining agreement;[1] and bypassing the Union and dealing directly with unit employees regarding wages although the Union has been the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of those unit employees.[2] The answer,[3] duly filed, denies the commission of any unfair labor practices. The allegations contained in the amended complaint and the amended answer frame the issues.

All parties appeared at the hearing and were afforded full opportunity to be heard and present evidence and argument. The General Counsel and Respondent filed briefs. On the entire record, my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses and after giving due consideration to the briefs, I make the following

The Respondent has recognized the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of its drivers for many years. The Respondent and the Union have been signatory to a series of collective-bargaining agreements, most recently to the 1981–1984 National Bituminous Coal Wage Agreement (NBCWA), which expired 30 September 1984. During the life of this agreement Respondent paid its drivers the hourly wages and provided the fringe benefits required by the agreement.

With the expiration of the collective-bargaining agreement on 30 September 1984 the Union chose to strike a number of companies including the Respondent. During the strike a series of collective-bargaining sessions took place. Participants in these negotiations were James Hampton, attorney for the Union, and Louis Dene, attorney for several of the companies participating in the collective-bargaining process, including Respondent. Various officers of the Union and members of management of the participating companies also took part in the bargaining sessions including Wilson Cisco Jr., Respondent's owner and operator. Hampton was the only union representative to negotiate with Respondent during this period.

Bargaining during negotiations did not take the form of group bargaining. Although representatives of the various companies involved would meet with the Union at the same time and place, the bargaining was for individual contracts with each participating employer; the union representative, James Hampton, proceeding from one independent contractor to another, making proposals, and receiving counterproposals. Sometimes the collective-bargaining sessions would overlap, one party or the other agreeing to a proposal that had been made and discussed at a previous session. Sometimes bargaining was between the attorneys, Dene and Hampton, whereas on other occasions the Union's representative would deal directly with owners or other members of management.

[1] The complaint was amended at the hearing to include this allegation.

[2] Ibid.

[3] The answer was amended at the hearing to admit allegations concerning jurisdiction, supervision and agency, and unit description.

[4] The complaint and answer, as amended at the hearing, alleges and admits that the Board has jurisdiction and that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of the Act.

The first bargaining session following initiation of the work stoppage occurred on 1 November 1984. Although at the time, coal haulers were bidding jobs so low that they were pricing themselves out of the market, barely being able to meet expenses, Respondent offered to sign the new 1984 National Bituminous Coal Wage Agreement. The Union, however, refused Respondent's offer. The Union explained that, at the time, a third of its membership was idle and that the boom-and-bust nature of the industry required some additional protection for its people. It proposed, therefore, institution of a supplemental unemployment benefits program with severance pay provisions. These proposals were unacceptable to Respondent and no agreement was reached.

On 28 November 1984 the parties held their second negotiating session of the series. Again Respondent offered to sign the 1984 NBCWA, but the Union counterproposed additional holidays and improvements in the area of wages and hours. No agreement was reached.

On 25 January 1985[5] the parties held their fourth[6] negotiating session. Once again Respondent offered to sign the 1984 NBCWA with the proviso that the Union accept its offer immediately. Respondent took the position that if the Union again rejected its offer, it would subsequently want to bargain from scratch. The Union nevertheless rejected Respondent's offer and counterproposed a number of changes in the 1984 agreement. No agreement was reached.

The parties met to negotiate again on 20 March, 16 April, 20 May, and 7 October.[7] In accordance with the position taken by Respondent on 25 January, it offered specific individual proposals at each of these sessions along with counterproposals to the Union's demands and did not offer to sign the 1984 NBCWA as it had done previously. The Union offered its own proposals and counterproposals. No agreement was reached.

On 23 December, the Union, on behalf of the striking employees, offered to return to work. At the time the strike ended Respondent was not operating. In fact, Respondent hauled no coal from the beginning of the strike until its conclusion. It did, however, at times lease out its trucks to other companies and although Respondent's bargaining unit employees sometimes drove these trucks they were not on Respondent's payroll.

On 10 February 1986[8] Hampton wrote to Dene inquiring whether any of Respondent's unit employees had been permanently replaced and requesting information when and in what manner they were replaced if, in fact, they had been replaced. Hampton advised Dene that the information requested was necessary for the Union to adequately represent unit employees in collective bargaining and to protect their rights.

On 19 February Dene replied to Hampton promising to supply him with certain of the requested information following a scheduled 25 February meeting with various contractors whom he represented, including Respondent. Dene assured Hampton that the contractors he represented were prepared to meet individually with the Union and to continue to negotiate toward an agreement. He suggested several dates for the proposed meeting.

On 3 March Respondent and other companies met with the Union at the Western Steer Restaurant to continue negotiating toward their respective collective-bargaining agreements. As was the usual situation the various company representatives were scattered about the restaurant. Hampton arrived late, then became engaged in lengthy conversation with Dene at one table. Dene, as usual, was representing a number of different employers. Cisco was seated at another table in the back of the restaurant some distance from where Hampton and Dene were conversing, waiting for an opportunity to speak to Hampton.

About this time Cisco had received an offer from the Bethany Coal Company to haul coal from a rather inaccessible site. Any contract with Bethany would be dependent on Respondent's ability to build a road to the site over which to drive the trucks to haul the coal. During the initial roadbuilding period, no coal would be hauled and thereafter only partial loads would be hauled until the road was completed. It was this "promise" of a coal haul and the hope that it might eventually lead to a coal hauling contract about which Cisco wished to talk to Hampton. He wanted to get back to work and wanted clearance from the Union.

Finally, Hampton got up from the table where he had been talking to Dene and walked by where Cisco was sitting, apparently on his way to get a cup of coffee. Cisco called Hampton over and told him that he wanted to speak to him. Hampton came over. Cisco told him that he was trying and might be able to take a coal haul job at Glen Allen, West Virginia.[9] He described the job, including the necessity of hauling red dog[10] to build the road before actually being able to haul coal. Hampton asked Cisco whether he was going to call his men back if he succeeded in getting the coal haul contract. Cisco advised Hampton that he would call them back if he obtained a contract. Hampton asked Cisco what he intended to pay his employees. Cisco replied, referring to the early roadbuilding stages of the job, that he was going to pay them $20 to $25 per load. Hampton commented that he did not see anything wrong with that, that it was all right. Hampton added that his main concern was getting the men back to work.[11]

[5] All subsequent dates are in 1985 unless otherwise indicated.

[6] The third negotiating session scheduled for 5 January was rescheduled when Hampton was unable to attend.

[7] Wilson Cisco was unable to attend the 7 October meeting so Hampton requested Dene to reschedule another meeting with Cisco being present. The meeting was not, however, immediately rescheduled and Hampton did not then pursue the matter.

[8] All subsequent dates are in 1986 unless otherwise indicated.

[9] The Bethany Company minesite.

[10] A substance composed of reddish ashes, derived from burning piles of rejected coal, and used especially for paving in mine areas.

Following the short discussion between Hampton and Cisco described above, the two joined Dene in more formal negotiations toward a new contract. At these negotiations, the subject of employees being paid $20 to $25 per load never came up. Dene was not made aware of the earlier conversation between Cisco and Hampton until several months later.

At the formal negotiations on 3 March no specific proposals were made by either the Union or the Respondent. Though the Union had a $2-per-hour wage increase proposal on the table over and above the 1984 NBCWA, this was not discussed because Respondent had no coal-hauling contract at the time. When Hampton asked Dene and Cisco if Respondent was willing to sign a collective-bargaining agreement for 1984, Cisco replied that he did not, at the time, have a coalhauling contract that would enable him to pay the wages and benefits provided for by the 1984 NBCWA. Hampton then asked Dene and Cisco if Respondent would be willing to sign an agreement for 1984 if the Company did not obtain a coal hauling contract. They advised Hampton that they would have to let him know some time in the future. Because Respondent declined to sign an agreement at that time, absent a coal hauling agreement, Hampton felt it was fruitless to attempt further negotiations and none took place.[12]

Following the end of the strike the employees of Respondent and of other struck employers were instructed to return to work unconditionally, regardless of working conditions or wages. They were advised that after they returned to work the Union would negotiate a contract on their behalf.

As of 3 March Respondent employed no bargaining unit employees because it did not have a coal hauling contract.[13] The hiring of employees was not contemplated until the road to Glen Allen was built and it was possible to haul coal from that site.

As Cisco advised Hampton on 3 March, he was trying about that time to get a coal haul started at Glen Allen, West Virginia, for the Bethany Coal Company. There was no contract with Bethany at the time because before hauling any coal Respondent first had to build the road. For this purpose Cisco contacted the men who had been his employees before the strike and offered to pay them $20 to $25 per load to carry red dog to the new roadsite. He also made the same offer to three individuals who had never before worked for him. Under the old 1981–1984 contract, Respondent's employees were never required to haul red dog.

A number of individuals accepted Cisco's offer and began to haul red dog as contract laborers. Initially, they hauled no coal. Indeed, Cisco chose to pay these individuals as contract laborers because he was not sure whether the Company was going to be able to build a road successfully and obtain a coal hauling contract.

As contract laborers the drivers were paid fully what they earned with no taxes withheld. No workmen's compensation or unemployment was paid and no fringe benefits were granted. Unlike before the strike when Respondent paid it employees the hourly wage and fringe benefits provided for in the contract, the drivers hauling red dog in March were paid $20 to $25 per load and nothing more.

Later in March when the road was partly built Respondent was able to haul small amounts of coal out of the mine for which Bethany paid Respondent $3 per ton, then $3.25 to haul the coal to Logan, West Virginia. For the partial loads of coal as well as for the red dog, Respondent continued to pay the drivers $20 to $25 per load.

The road during this period was almost unusable, being knee deep in mud. Trucks could barely get in and out and some would get stuck even when empty. Thus, partial loads only were carried back and forth throughout the remainder of March for fear of damaging the equipment. Partial loads of red dog were carried in and partial loads of coal were carried out. It was not until April that the first full load of coal was hauled out of the mine.

On 5 March Hampton wrote a letter to Dene outlining his understanding of what had occurred at the formal negotiations conducted on 3 March. In relevant part, he advised Dene that he understood that the Respondent was not working at the time and had no contact with anyone to haul coal; and that if Respondent obtained work, Cisco would call back his old bargaining unit employees in accordance with an attached seniority list. The letter also noted that Dene had agreed to advise him whether Respondent would execute a collective-bargaining agreement without first obtaining a contract to haul coal. Dene did not reply to Hampton's letter.

By April some full loads of coal were being hauled out of Glen Allen. still, a load of red dog was being hauled in with each load of coal being hauled out, and this continued to the last of April. In each case the drivers continued to be paid by the load, whether it was for hauling a load of red dog in or a load of coal out.

By mid-April the red dog road to Glen Allen was about completed although thereafter, apparently, it was in constant need of repair. With the road's completion, Respondent was thereby enabled to haul out full loads of coal for Bethany. About 16 April Respondent rehired all of its former employees plus three new employees and put them all on its payroll. It began to pay the drivers as its own employees rather than as contract laborers. Although Respondent continued thereafter to pay the drivers on a per-load basis, it began, at that time, to deduct taxes from their wages and to make contributions to workmen's compensation.

[11] The content of this conversation is based on the credited testimony of Cisco and of Hubert Randy Farley, a witness thereto. Where Hampton's testimony differs from that of Cisco and Farley, his is not credited.

[12] Subsequently, Hampton and Cisco discussed further the possibility of executing a new collective-bargaining agreement. However, no agreement was reached.

[13] Joseph May, an employee of Respondent, testified that he returned to work for Respondent in February. Carol Cisco, Respondent's secretary and treasurer, testifying from company records, stated that he was rehired in March. It would appear that if May were driving one of Respondent's trucks in February he may have been doing so as an independent contractor under an arrangement agreed on by Mate Creek Coal and Cisco Trucking Company, Inc. The record is not complete on this point.

From mid-April Respondent continued to haul for Bethany from Glen Allen and for other companies from other sites to various locations. The coal companies continued to pay Respondent by the ton of coal hauled and it continued to pay its employees by the load. At some point in time, Respondent gave up hauling from the Glen Allen site because the difficulty of the haul was losing money for the Company. It continued, however, to haul for other companies and each time it obtained an agreement to haul for a particular company at a certain amount per ton, Cisco would discuss the haul with his drivers and in turn offer them a per-load dollar amount. The amount agreed on per haul would be between $20 and $50 depending on the per-ton figure offered by the coal company, the size of the load, and the distance of the haul. This system of remuneration continued through the date of the hearing.

On 28 April Hampton wrote to Dene advising him that since 3 March Respondent's trucks had been seen hauling coal in the Pike County area. Hampton asked Dene if this were, in fact, the case, and if so to advise him who was driving the trucks, for whom, and under what arrangements. He asked Dene to produce the coal hauling contracts. In addition Hampton noted that he had learned that Cisco was driving a truck for Mate Creek Trucking Company on an independent contractor basis and requested Dene to advise him if the truck that Cisco was driving was one of his own and to furnish documentation on the arrangement between the Respondent and Mate Creek.

Dene responded promptly on 2 May. He advised Hampton that Respondent's trucks had been hauling coal since about 18 February[14] and that by the date of the letter all the former employees who could be contacted were driving trucks for Respondent. He added that the drivers were being paid $25 per load hauled. He then confirmed that Cisco was operating as an independent contractor hauling for Mate Creek and that Mate was leasing the trucks from Respondent.

Hampton testified that the first notification he received from Cisco trucking that its drivers were being paid by the load was the letter he received from Dene dated 2 May.[15] Hampton's reaction to this notification was to file the charge in the instant case on 19 June. At no time after learning that Respondent was paying its drivers by the load did the Union request negotiations concerning this method of payment.

Conclusions

My analysis of the above-described events leads me to conclude that Respondent did not refuse to bargain with the Union in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act as alleged.

On 3 March Cisco advised Hampton that he was trying to obtain a coal haul job at Glen Allen and that to do so he would have to first build a road to the minesite. In reply to Hampton's questions, he told him that he intended to put the striking drivers back to work and pay them $20 to $25 per load. Hampton stated that he did not see anything wrong with that; that his main concern was getting the men back to work. Thus, when Respondent began to pay the drivers $20 to $25 per load shortly thereafter, this was not a unilateral change in wages and working conditions but rather the direct result of a bilateral aleatory, oral agreement whereby the new arrangement would be put in place pending Respondent's obtaining a hauling contract that would enable Cisco to sign a formal collective-bargaining agreement containing wages and benefits provided in the typical NBCWA. Indeed, when Dene, Hampton, and Cisco met later that day at the formal negotiating session, the informal "per load " agreement was not discussed because it was, of course, meant to be temporary in nature, a means by which both Respondent and the employees could get back to work. Inasmuch as Respondent had no coal hauling agreement at the time, no serious negotiations toward a permanent agreement took place during the formal session.

After he obtained permission from the Union to pay his drivers by the load, Cisco approached each of them and asked if he would be willing to work for $20 to $25 per load. This was not individual bargaining in violation of the Act but rather, an attempt to put into effect the agreement reached with the Union's representative. Indeed, because the Union and the Company had agreed on the new wage arrangement to pay by the haul was no guarantee that the drivers would be willing to work under these conditions. Cisco had to find out by speaking to them individually and obtaining their agreement. The unthinkable alternative would have been for Cisco not to tell them of the new arrangement and to surprise them at the end of the pay period with a paycheck reflecting a sum for less than they were expecting.

Hampton testified that Dene's 2 May letter was the first indication that he had from Respondent that it was paying its drivers by the load. By this time the situation had changed markedly from that which had existed back on 3 March when he agreed that a per-haul wage was all right with the Union. Since the earlier date Respondent had completed the red dog road to Glen Allen and was hauling full loads of coal from that minesite. Respondent had rehired most of its former employees, hired additional employees, and put them on its payroll. Respondent was by this time hauling for a number of coal companies and was clearly back in business.

By May conditions had sufficiently changed whereby the Union could properly expect to sit down with Respondent and negotiate toward a new and permanent agreement to take the place of the temporary "per load" agreement to which Hampton had consented on 3 March. However, Hampton did not request bargaining but instead filed the instant charge. The law under these circumstances is clear:

[14] Dene was apparently referring to the period of time during which Cisco, his son, and his former employees were driving Cisco's trucks but were not on Respondent's payroll.

[15] Hampton testified that he heard from a third party that Respondent was paying drivers by the load but could not say whether he obtained this information before or after he received the 2 May letter.

> A union cannot charge an employer with refusal to negotiate when it has made no attempt to bring the employer to the bargaining table. NLRB v. Columbia Enameling & Stamping Co., 306 U.S. 292. . . . Nor is a Union in a good position to charge an employer with bargaining in bad faith when the Union itself has exhibited little, if any, real desire to reach a bona fide contract benefiting the members of the bargaining unit which it, by law, is required to represent.[16]

Mere protesting or the filing of an unfair labor practice charge does not suffice or adequately take the place of a demand for bargaining over the issue in question.[17] I find that by failing to request bargaining over the issues involved, the Union effectively waived its right to assert that Respondent's conduct constitutes unilateral action in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.[18] Similarly, Respondent's continued practice of determining the amount of pay per haul based on the dollar-per-ton charge to the customer, the size of the load, and the distance of the haul is not individual bargaining in violation of the Act within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) but a mere mechanical device for determining wages to be paid per load. This device could also have been the subject of bargaining if the Union had so demanded. Because the Union did not avail itself of the opportunity to request bargaining on this subject, I find it has waived its rights regarding this matter also.[19]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Cisco Trucking Company, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent has not engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On January 6, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Walter J. Alprin issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The judge found the Respondent, as a member in good standing of a multiemployer bargaining association, was bound by the terms of the 1984–1986 agreement negotiated and signed on its behalf by the St. Paul Chapter, Painting and Decorating Contractor's Association (the Association). He further found a violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by the Respondent's denial of the Union's request to inspect the Respondent's records in accordance with the contract. The judge concluded, however, that because the Respondent already was bound to the 1984–1986 agreement by the Association, its refusal to execute a copy of the contract on the Union's request was not a violation of the Act. The General Counsel has excepted to this failure to find a violation.

It is an unfair labor practice for an employer to refuse to execute a collective-bargaining agreement negotiated on its behalf by a multiemployer association. H. J. Heinz Co. v. NLRB, 311 U.S. 514, 525–526 (1941); Strong Roofing & Insulating Co., 152 NLRB 9, 13 (1965), affd. 393 U.S. 357 (1969). Accordingly, we find the Respondent's refusal to execute a copy of the contract on the Union's request violated the Act, and we will order that the Respondent remedy its violation by signing the contract.[3]

We agree with the judge in finding that the Respondent was bound by the contract, and thus ordering the Respondent to permit the Union to inspect its records on request. The General Counsel has excepted to the judge's failure to additionally provide a make-whole remedy in the event the record inspection reveals a failure to abide by the contract. Because the judge found the Respondent to be bound by the terms and conditions of the contract, and because we have found above that the Respondent unlawfully failed to execute the agreed-upon contract, we deem it appropriate to order the Respondent to make employees whole, with interest,[4] for any failure to comply with the

[1] We correct the judge's inadvertent failure to find that the Union is the collective-bargaining representative for the Respondent's employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All journeymen and apprentice painters, decorators, paperhangers, drywall finishers and applicators, drywall sanders, using tools of the trade to apply or remove materials used for, or preparatory to decorating, protecting surfaces, coatings, and/or coverings employed by the employer members of the Association, including Respondent; excluding office clerical employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act, and all other employees.

The General Counsel has excepted to the judge's failure to provide for the mailing of the notice to employees. We find no merit to this exception. The General Counsel also has requested the inclusion of a visitatorial clause in the Order. Under the circumstances of this case, we find it unnecessary to include such a clause. Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

[2] We find it unnecessary to rely on the judge's reference to Torrington Construction Co., 235 NLRB 1540 fn. 2 (1978), as all the Union's requests to examine the Respondent's records occurred within the 10(b) period. Moreover, with respect to the alleged violation concerning the refusal to sign the collective-bargaining agreement, we find no event in 1984, or indeed at any time outside the 10(b) period, which would constitute clear notice to the Union that the Respondent was refusing to execute the agreement sufficient to render the limitation provisions in Sec. 10(b) a bar. See L. C. Cassidy & Son, Inc., 185 NLRB 920, 926 (1970).

[3] Contrary to our dissenting colleague, we find that the violation alleged in the complaint and litigated at the hearing was failure to execute the collective-bargaining agreement—not repudiation of the contract. Although the charge alleged repudiation, we find no reference to this issue in the complaint. In any event, based on our review of the record, we cannot agree the repudiation theory was fully litigated.

Further, we find our colleague's attempt to distinguish this case from Strong Roofing, supra, unpersuasive. First, the Respondent in this case has never claimed or conceded that it was already bound by the signature of the president of the multiemployer association and never argued therefore that it was not obligated to execute the contract. Second, in a departure from its own recent past practice, the multiemployer association here did advise the Union after the contract was negotiated that each individual employer would need to sign the contract on its own behalf. In this respect, this case is akin to Strong Roofing except that there the practice of individual members of the multiemployer association signing association-negotiated agreements was clear and longstanding. Third, in Strong Roofing, the Court noted broadly that "the Board is expressly invited by the Act to determine whether an employer has refused to bargain in good faith and thereby violated § 8(a)(5) by resisting 'the execution of a written contract incorporating any agreement reached if requested by either party.'" 393 U.S. 357 at 361 (citations omitted). Moreover, in H. J. Heinz, supra, in which the Court held that the refusal to sign a collective-bargaining agreement on request is an unfair labor practice, the Court underscored, likewise in broad language, the importance of the obligation to sign a contract, if requested, once agreement has been reached: "[E]xperience has shown that refusal to sign a written contract has been a not infrequent means of frustrating the bargaining process . . . . [T]he signed agreement has been regarded as the effective instrument of stabilizing labor relations and preventing, through collective bargaining, strikes and industrial strife." 311 U.S. 514, 523–524 (footnote omitted). Accordingly, we view our granting of the remedy sought by the General Counsel in this case as proper.

[4] In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977), or Merryweather Optical Co., 240 NLRB 1213 (1979), as appropriate.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Casci Decorators, Inc., St. Paul, Minnesota, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to permit Painters and Allied Trades Union, Local No. 61, AFL-CIO to inspect employee lists, payroll records, and timecards regarding all employee members of the bargaining unit, for the period between June 25, 1984, and April 30, 1986.

(b) Refusing, on request by the Union, to execute the 1984-1986 collective-bargaining agreement negotiated on its behalf by the St. Paul Chapter, Painting and Decorating Contractor's Association.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Provide Painters and Allied Trades Union, Local No. 61, AFL-CIO, on request, inspection of employee lists, payroll records, and timecards regarding all employee members of the bargaining unit for the period between June 25, 1984, and April 30, 1986.

(b) In the event of a failure to comply with the terms and conditions of the 1984-1986 collective-bargaining agreement, make employees whole for any losses they have suffered by reason of its failure, plus interest.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) On request by the Union, execute the 1984-1986 collective-bargaining agreement negotiated on its behalf by the St. Paul Chapter, Painting and Decorating Contractor's Association.

(e) Post at its facility in St. Paul, Minnesota, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[5] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 18, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(f) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

CHAIRMAN STEPHENS, concurring and dissenting.

I join my colleagues in adopting the judge's factual findings and his conclusion that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing to provide certain information to the Union. I also join them in granting the General Counsel's exception to the judge's failure to provide a make-whole remedy to cover any losses resulting from the Respondent's failure to comply with the collective-bargaining agreement. I would not, however, grant the General Counsel's exception regarding the judge's failure to find a violation of the Respondent's failure to execute the collective-bargaining agreement. Rather, I would predicate the make-whole remedy on what, in my view, was the violation actually litigated—the Respondent's repudiation of the agreement, quite apart from any obligation the Respondent might have had to add its signature to that of the president of its bargaining representative, the St. Paul Chapter, Decorating Contractor's Association.

The complaint in this case alleged that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by failing to recognize the Union as the unit employees' collective-bargaining representative and, in particular, by failing to comply with the Union's request that it execute the agreement reached on the Respondent's behalf by the Association and by failing to furnish the Union information it needed to determine whether contract terms, including pension provisions, were being complied with. At the hearing, however, apart from the refusal-to-provide-information allegation, the main issue actually litigated was whether the Respondent had any obligation to honor the 1984-1986 agreement at all or whether it had been privileged to repudiate it from the outset.

The Respondent contended that the execution of the agreement by the Association did not bind the Respondent to the agreement. The judge, however, properly rejected that argument, finding that the established practice had been for the agreement to be executed on the members' behalf through the signature of the Association's president. Thus, the Respondent's refusal to sign the agreement and the reason it has given for that refusal (i.e., its rejected claim that it had made a timely withdrawal from the Association before the agreement was negotiated) are simply manifestations of the Respondent's unlawful repudiation of the agreement and not a failure to provide a signature that the parties had agreed was legally significant.[1] Therefore, under the reasoning of the judge, which I would adopt, a signature by the Respondent on the now expired collective-bargaining agreement is a meaningless act. It is the Respondent's agreement to cease and desist from repudiating a properly executed and fully binding contract that is required to remedy the essential violation here.

[5] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

I would therefore deny the General Counsel's exception to the judge's failure to find an independent refusal-to-sign allegation, but I would conform the Conclusions of Law and the Order to the violations that the parties actually litigated and that the judge's factual findings support. As explained above, I would find that those violations include the Respondent's repudiation of a properly executed collective-bargaining agreement and, for that violation, I would grant a make-whole remedy for any losses resulting from the repudiation of the agreement.

[1] This case is therefore unlike NLRB v. Strong Roofing & Insulating Co., 393 U.S. 387 (1969), affg. 152 NLRB 9 (1965). There the evidence showed a practice under which members of the multiemployer association would separately sign copies of the association agreement after it was negotiated. 152 NLRB at 13.

Although the Respondent was first requested to sign the agreement in 1984, I find no merit in the Respondent's contention that the limitations provision in Sec. 10(b) is a bar. The Respondent sporadically submitted fringe benefit reports to the Union after the contract at issue here became effective and, as the evidence supporting the refusal-to-provide-information allegation shows, the Respondent sought to evade the Union's attempts to secure records to see whether the Respondent was in fact honoring the agreement. Therefore, it cannot be said that the Union was on notice more than 6 months before April 29, 1986, when it filed its charge, that the Respondent was taking the position that it was not bound by the agreement.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT refuse to permit Painters and Allied Trades Union, Local No. 61, AFL–CIO to inspect employee lists, payroll records, and timecards regarding all employee members of the bargaining unit, for the period between June 25, 1984, and April 30, 1986.

WE WILL NOT refuse, on request by the Union, to execute the 1984–1986 collective-bargaining agreement negotiated on our behalf by the St. Paul Chapter, Painting and Decorating Contractor's Association.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL provide Painters and Allied Trades Union, Local No. 61, AFL–CIO, on request, inspection of employee lists, payroll records, and timecards regarding all employee members of the bargaining unit, for the period between June 25, 1984, and April 30, 1986.

WE WILL, in the event of a failure to comply with the terms and conditions of the 1984–1986 collective-bargaining agreement, make employees whole for any losses they have suffered by reason of our failure, plus interest.

WE WILL, on request by the Union, execute the 1984—1986 collective-bargaining agreement negotiated on our behalf by the St. Paul Chapter, Painting and Decorating Contractor's Association.

CASCI DECORATORS, INC.

Robert V. Johnson, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Ronald J. Raich, Esq. (Peterson, Franke, Gray & Raich), of Roseville, Minnesota, for the Respondent.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WALTER J. ALPRIN, Administrative Law Judge. Painters and Allied Trades Union, Local No. 61, AFL–CIO (the Union) filed a charge on 29 April 1986[1] against Casci Decorators, Inc. (Respondent). Complaint issued 20 June, and hearing was held at Minneapolis, Minnesota, on 16 and 17 July. The ultimate issues of this matter are whether Respondent refused to execute a bargaining agreement entered into with the Union through an employers' association, and whether Respondent refused to provide the Union with information properly demanded by the Union, all in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act).

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses and consideration of the briefs submitted, I make the following

Findings of Fact

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is a painting and decorating contractor in St. Paul, Minnesota. There is neither allegation nor proof that Respondent individually met the jurisdictional requirements for this proceeding, but it is alleged that Respondent was for the period here involved a member of the St. Paul Chapter, Painting and Decorating Contractor's Association (Association) and that the Association has met the jurisdictional standards. Schletty-McCann, a painting and decorating contractor member of the Association, did business in Wisconsin during 1985 on a contract value at $350,000, had a volume of business in South Dakota of $100,000, and had purchases delivered to it or to a jobsite, from outside of Minnesota, of over $400,000. Hamernick Decorating is also a member of the Association and meets jurisdictional standards for this proceeding. All members of the Association thereby come within the jurisdiction of the Act. This decision will find that Respondent was a member of the Association, and hence is subject to the jurisdiction of the Act.

Respondent admits and I find that the Union is now and has at all material times been a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. BACKGROUND

A. Prior Dealings

The Association has for at least 20 years functioned as a multiemployer bargaining agent with the Union. The last two agreements were effective from 9 June 1981 to 30 April 1984, and from 25 June 1984 to 30 April 1986. The 1984–1986 agreement, which is the subject matter of this dispute, merely extended the 1981–1984 agreement with several changes not here relevant.

The last "long form" agreement was 1981–1984. The following provisions of that agreement are pertinent:

> Article II—Parties:
> Whenever the word "Association" is used herein it shall mean the St. Paul Chapter, Painting and Decorating Contractors Association and all of its members individually and collectively, whether now belonging to said Association or who may hereafter be admitted to membership.
>
> Article III—Recognition
> Section 1: The Association and the Union recognize that the Unit for collective bargaining, hereinafter referred to as the "Bargaining Unit" is: All . . . painters, decorators . . . who are employed to do such work by the present and future employer members of the Association.
> Section 2(a): [The Association][2] recognizes [the Union] as the bargaining agent of all the Employees employed by the Contractors herein wherever such employees may be employed.
> Section 2(b): [The Union] recognizes [the Association] as the representative of all its members present and future and all signators to this instrument[3] until its termination date for such purposes as may be necessary for the administration of this agreement.
> Section 3(a): Each employer agrees to . . . permit duly acredited representatives of the Union to visit his shop and office . . . for the purpose of inspecting lists of Employees, payroll records and timecards in order to determine whether the shop is being conducted in accordance with this Agreement.
> Article XXVIII Fringe Benefit Trust Funds
>
> (a) HEALTH AND WELFARE FUND—All employers covered by this Agreement shall contribute to the St. Paul Painting Industry Welfare Fund.
> (b) PENSION FUND—[Same Provision]
> (c) VACATION FUND—[Same Provision]
>
> Article XXX Duration of Agreement
> This Agreement shall be in full force and effect . . . [to] April 30, 1984, and shall continue from year to year thereafter unless written notice of desire to change, cancel or termination is served . . . not less than (6) nor more than (90) days prior to April 30, 1984 [or expiration date] of any subsequent contract year.

At the end of the agreement it is stated "In witness whereof the parties have hereunto set their hands and seals, this (blank) day of (blank), 19 (blank)." Space is provided thereafter for "Name of Employer (please print)" and address, phone, liability insurance and bond company and certificate numbers, whether "employer" is a sole proprietorship, partnership, or corporation, the printed names, residence, and phone numbers of partners or corporate officers and the State of incorporation.

The 1981–1984 agreement was signed "For Employer" by the Association president. The same form of signature had been used in at least the two prior agreements, from 1977–1978 and from 1978–1981. In the pertinent agreement, however, 1984–1986, none of the individual information of the prior agreement was called for, and only the signatures of the Union's business manager and of the Association president are called for or given.

Various letters and other documents exchanged during negotiations have been entered in the record. In February 1978, the Association noted reopening of negotiations between the Association "and its members and the" Union. In March 1978, the Association advised the Union "that per Article III, Section 3, Paragraphs (a) and (b) we do represent all signators," referring to Association members and to nonmembers who authorized the Association to negotiate on their behalf. An Association letter requested the Union to provide "a current list of all such signators with proof of bonds, Employment identification number and insurance" referring to nonmembers who had agreed with the Union to comply with the terms of the union agreement with the Association.

[2] Parenthetical provisions are all added or are substitutions.

[3] Oral testimony established that at times the Association nonmembers authorized the Association to be their bargaining agent and executed the agreements in addition to the execution by the Association on behalf of its members.

Minutes of the Association meeting of 17 January 1984 advised that: "Must let Union know by 2/1/84 if you wish to negotiate on your own or do not want to be part of bargaining. Get an attorney." Respondent also produced an undated letter, signed by Jesse Marks, the Association's financial secretary, that "effective May 1, 1984" the Association would not sign the new agreement on behalf of the members, but that each member would have to sign on his individual behalf. Marks testified that he prepared this document 10 days prior to the opening of the hearing, that it represented his best recollection of a letter signed and sent to the Union by the Association president prior to the opening of negotiations, and that he could find no copy of that actual letter in the Association files. The Association's president at that time, Draeger, had previously testified that neither he nor anyone else on behalf of the Association had advised the Union prior to 15 October 1984 that they desired the already negotiated agreement to be executed by the individual members for themselves. On that date, 15 October 1984, Draeger did send the Union a letter advising that he was signing the agreement "on behalf of the St. Paul Chapter PDCA Negotiating Committee with acceptance of the language as agreed and not acceptance for the St. Paul Chapter as a whole." The letter continued that "It has been decided, by our members, that each individual member should sign any agreement with [the Union] for themselves." That letter was after the 1984–1986 contract had been fully negotiated, but prior to negotiations for the next contract. In February 1986, the Association advised the Union that it would serve in future negotiating sessions only "as a negotiator solely in a representative capacity" and that the 16 listed employers, including Respondent, "in behalf of whom we negotiate have reserved the right to determine whether they wish to be bound or not to be bound . . . on an individual employer basis."

B. Respondent's Connection with the Association

Respondent was a member of the Association since at least 1974. During 1984, while the 1984–1986 agreement was negotiated, Respondent was a member of the Association, paying dues and submitting its monthly reports for the various funds. It further made monthly payments to the funds, ranging up to $806, on behalf of employees Lampman, Johnson, and Mikelsoo through 1985. The 1985 and 1986 classified telephone directory display listings of the Association identified Respondent as a member. Respondent never took any action to withdraw from the Association, and never directly notified the Union that it did not intend to be bound by any agreement negotiated by the Association unless it signed it separately. When Lampman was hired in 1985, he was told by Respondent that it operated a union shop. Respondent testified that since about 1984 it had begun using independent contractors, in addition to work by corporate officers. It still had one union employee shortly before the hearing, but he was not a member of the Charging Party local.

III. UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

On 4 November 1985, counsel for the Union sent Respondent a letter citing the appropriate authority of the 1984–1986 agreement, stating that "You will be contacted by Eugene C. Roberson, Certified Public Accountant, to arrange a time for him to inspect employee lists, payroll records, and time cards" in accordance with that provision of the contract. It is admitted that oral requests were also made on 13 January and 4 February 1986.[4] Respondent has refused to permit such inspection, and has consistently refused to execute the 1984–1986 agreement.

IV. DISCUSSION

Respondent paid its Association dues and assessments, and has made no attempt to disclaim membership in or disassociate itself from the Association. It clearly did not withdraw from Association membership or from multiemployer bargaining prior to negotiation of the 1984–1986 agreement. See Edward Cooper Painting, 273 NLRB 1870, 1877 (1985). It is therefore subject to the jurisdiction of the Act as conferred through the Association, discussed above.

Respondent is also clearly subject to the 1984–1986 agreement executed by the Association, effective 25 June 1984. The "letter" signed by Marks attempting to show that Respondent had withdrawn its authority from the Association is undoubtedly the most questionable piece of evidence I have ever seen. While I permitted the document to be entered as a notation of best recollection, it was not contemporary with the act, it was not even what it purported to be, i.e., a copy of a letter by Draeger to the Union, and was completely disavowed by the supposed author and sender, Draeger. There was not even an attempt to subpoena a supposed original copy of such a letter from the union files. Draeger testified that neither he nor anyone else on behalf of the Association had advised the Union prior to 15 October 1984 that they desired the already negotiated bargaining agreement to be executed by each member for himself. Board policy and case law is clearly that "an employer or union is free to withdraw from the multiemployer unit if it gives adequate written notice [footnote deleted] prior to the date set by the contract for notification, or to the agreed-upon date to begin the multiemployer negotiations and, in those cases where multiemployer negotiations have begun, the Board stated it would not permit, except on mutual consent, an abandonment of the unit upon which each side has committed itself to the other, absent unusual circumstances."[5] I find no unusual circumstances in this matter.

[4] Respondent's answer admitted only that the requests were for "payroll records." In view of the demand letter I find that the requests were all for the three types of records enumerated. The oral demands bring the allegations within the 6-month limitation period of Sec. 10(b) of the Act, since it represents a continuing demand. See Al Bryant, Inc., 260 NLRB 128, 135 (1982), citing Torrington Construction Co., 235 NLRB 1540 fn. 2 (1978).

Respondent is therefore bound by the terms of the 1984–1986 agreement, and was required to submit to the examination requested. Its failure to do so was a violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. Its refusal to execute a copy of the agreement, however, was not a violation. Being already bound to the agreement by the Association's execution on its behalf, Respondent was not required to execute it a second time.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Casci Decorators, Inc. of St. Paul, Minnesota, the Respondent, is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of the Act.

2. Painters and Allied Trades Union, Local No. 61, AFL–CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Casci Decorators, Inc. and Painters and Allied Trades Union, Local No. 61, AFL–CIO are parties to a collective-bargaining agreement effective from 25 June 1984 to 30 April 1986.

4. By failing and refusing to permit inspection of employee lists, payroll records, and timecards, Casci Decorators, Inc. violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

5. The aforesaid violation constitutes an unfair labor practice effecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act, to wit, permitting inspection of the records demanded for any period covered by the collective-bargaining agreement, up to 30 April 1986.

[Recommended Order omitted from publication.]

York Products, Inc., d/b/a Mastercraft Casket Company and Chester J. Golat et al. Case 18-CA-9923

July 29, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On September 30, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Michael O. Miller issued the attached decision. The Respondent and the General Counsel filed exceptions and supporting briefs.[1] The Respondent filed a response brief and a motion to strike the General Counsel's exceptions and brief.[2] The General Counsel filed a statement in opposition to the motion to strike.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions[3] and to adopt the recommended Order.[4]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, York Products, Inc., d/b/a Mastercraft Casket Company, Ladysmith, Wisconsin, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

James L. Fox, Esq., for the General Counsel
Donald W. Jones, Esq. (Hulston, Jones & Sullivan), of Springfield, Missouri, for the Respondent.
Chester J. Golat, of Ladysmith, Wisconsin, for the Charging Party.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

MICHAEL O. MILLER, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard in Ladysmith, Wisconsin, on 12 and 13 May 1987 based on an unfair labor practice charge filed by Chester J. Golat, et al., on 23 January 1987 and a complaint issued by the Regional Director for Region 18 of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board), on 27 March 1987. The complaint alleges that York Products, Inc., d/b/a Mastercraft Casket Company[1] (Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) by failing and refusing to recall employees from layoff because of their union activity; by blaming an earlier layoff on the employees' union activity; and by threatening loss of employment if the employees supported a union. Respondent's timely filed answer denies the commission of any unfair labor practices.

All parties were afforded full opportunity to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally, and to submit briefs. Briefs, which have been carefully considered, were submitted by the General Counsel and the Respondent.

Based on the entire record,[2] including my observations of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE RESPONDENT'S BUSINESS AND THE UNION'S LABOR ORGANIZATION STATUS—PRELIMINARY CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

Respondent, a Delaware corporation, is engaged at Ladysmith, Wisconsin in the manufacture, sale, and distribution of caskets. Jurisdiction is not in issue. The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find and conclude that Respondent is, and has been at all times material, an employer engaged in commerce and in operations affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find and conclude that General Teamsters Union, Local 662, affiliated with International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America (th Union) is, and has been at all material times, a labor or ganization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act

---

[1] The General Counsel and the Respondent except to the judge's findings concerning the seniority of the sewers who were recalled. As the judge noted in his decision, under the Respondent's seniority policy, an employee's seniority date is July 1 following his or her date of hire. Thus, although an individual may have started working prior to the time another employee was hired, he or she would not necessarily have greater seniority then the later hired person. Applying this policy, the judge's conclusions that Winter had more seniority than any of the sewers not recalled except Barber and that no sewer with less seniority than Yakovetz was recalled are correct. In addition, although Barber and Coats had the same seniority date, the judge did state correctly that Barber was "nominally more senior" than Coats by virtue of the fact that Barber was hired 17 days before Coats.

The General Counsel also requested that a visitatorial provision be granted. We deny this request as unnecessary. Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

[2] The Respondent's motion to strike the General Counsel's exceptions and brief is denied.

[3] Chairman Stephens would not find that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act through its plant manager's statement that he had laid off his wife and daughter-in-law because the Union had discovered that he was favoring his family. There is no suggestion that this action was taken because of the two women's sentiments either for or against the Union; and Chairman Stephens is unable to find that any employee would reasonably tend to be coerced in the exercise of Sec. 7 rights by the suggestion that favoritism towards managers' relatives might be discouraged or even eliminated once the Union learned of it.

[4] The parties submitted to the judge a stipulation to correct certain errors in the transcript. The judge's decision notes that the stipulation was received, but relies on the uncorrected testimony. We rely on the transcript as corrected, but find that the differences do not affect the outcome of this case.

[1] Respondent's name was amended at the hearing.

[2] The stipulation to correct the record submitted jointly by counsel the General Counsel and Respondent is received.

289 NLRB No. 157

II. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

Respondent, a Mastercraft Casket Company, began its operations about 1961. In 1984, Mastercraft was acquired by Amedco and, in turn, Amedco was acquired by Service Corporation International (SCI) on 26 September 1986. SCI is a publicly held corporation owning and operating about 300 funeral homes, cemeteries, and flower shops and had previously been one of Respondent's customers. Robert Betthauser, one of Mastercraft's founders, continued throughout its operation to be the chief executive officer and is presently the president of Mastercraft and vice president of manufacturing for York Products.

B. Union Activity

Respondent's employees are not represented by any labor organization. In February 1986,[3] however, a union organization campaign began. Among the employees involved from the start were Chester Golat, Harold Novak, Larry Kroening, Bernie Marshall, and Joe Smith. The first union meeting was held about 7 February, attended by 30 to 40 employees. A petition for an election was filed about 24 February and, following the execution of a consent agreement, an election was held on 18 April. All but two or three of Respondent's employees voted. The vote was 64 for no union, 38 for the Union.

While Respondent had campaigned against the Union, no objections to the conduct of the election were filed. However, on 16 April the Union filed an unfair labor practice charge that led to the 26 June issuance of a complaint alleging that Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) by laying off 27 employees between 21 March and 11 April and by otherwise engaging in conduct that interfered with, restrained, and coerced the employees. On 13 August, prior to a hearing, Respondent and the Union adjusted the allegations of the complaint. The employees who had been laid off received backpay, the charge was withdrawn, and the complaint was dismissed.[4] There has been no resumption of union activity since the election.

C. Evidence of Antiunion Animus and 8(a)(1) Allegations

Respondent concedes that it campaigned against the Union during the election campaign. It denies, however, that its campaigning overstepped statutory bounds. The General Counsel contends that there was extensive evidence of antiunion animus. Eight witnesses for the General Counsel testified that they heard James Ewer, the plant foreman, threaten that if the Union came in, the plant's doors would be shut. These witnesses claim to have heard it varying numbers of times. Thus, Susan Celske and Carol Braden heard him say it at least once, Mark Stranger heard it more than once, Joe Marshall heard it twice, and Mildred Yakovetz heard it at least four times. Chester Golat and Priscilla Barber recalled hearing him say it as often as three or four times per week and Harold Novak claimed to have heard it two or three times per day. James Ewer did not deny having said it; he admitted saying it to Golat in 1984 and further admitted the possibility that he may have said it sometime during 1986. Priscilla Barber also testified, without contradiction, that during the week of the election, Jim Ewer told her that after the plant shut down, Respondent would select the people they wanted to come back and production would get tougher. Even allowing for some exaggeration by Novak, Golat, and Barber with respect to the frequency of threats to close, I am convinced that James Ewer repeatedly told employees that the plant would close if the Union came in. He also threatened to eliminate union supporters during a layoff. James Ewer was opposed to the Union, even according to Foreman Ray Frafjord, and expressed his animus to the employees.

Shortly after the start of the union activity, Carol Braden heard Jim Ewer refer to Mildred Yakovetz and Priscilla Barber as troublemakers and say that Barbara Novak was working on the Union's behalf with her husband, Harold. Her testimony is uncontradicted.[5] She further testified that she heard Jim Ewer's wife, Florence, repeat what had been said to her by Jim, to the effect that if the Union got in, the Company would have big layoffs and switch people around to get rid of the troublemakers, naming Yakovetz and Barber. Florence Ewer denied saying this to Braden. I deem Braden's credible testimony in this regard both corroborative of, and corroborated by, Barber's uncontradicted testimony, described above.

The General Counsel's witnesses also attributed animus-laden statements to Rick Ewer, Jim Ewer's son. To the extent that Rick Ewer was purporting to speak on his own behalf, I find that those statements, while undenied, are entitled to little weight inasmuch as Rick Ewer, as an assistant foreman, did not possess supervisory authority.[6] That principle does not apply, however, when Rick Ewer purported to speak for others with supervisory authority. Thus, around the time of the March layoffs, Rick Ewer told Chester Golat and Joe Marshall that Betthauser had referred to Golat, Marshall, Harold Novak, and others as being "up a creek without a paddle in a boat that was sinking fast" because of their support for the Union. Golat's testimony with respect to this statement was corroborated by Marshall; Bethauser did not deny having make such a statement to Rick Ewer. In view of those facts and both Rick Ewer's role as an assistant foreman and his relationship to the plant foreman, which give his statements the likelihood of reliability, this testimony has probative worth even though it is hearsay. See K & S Circuits, 255 NLRB 1270, 1274 fn. 10 (1981), and RJR Communications, 248 NLRB 920, 921 (1980). On the other side of the coin, I note that during the same period, Rick Ewer also told Golat that if he took a voluntary layoff he would probably not be called back. Jim Ewer, hearing the statement, contradicted Rick and stated that he believed Golat would be recalled.

[3] All dates are 1986 unless otherwise specified.

[4] The General Counsel makes no contentions, and I make no conclusions, with respect to whether the March-April layoff was discriminatorily motivated.

[5] She also testified, without contradiction, that Ewer said that the Company would "try to unload [Mark Stranger] except that he had hurt his back and they thought he might sue him." She was unsure of the date, but placed this testimony about the inception of the union activity. However, Stranger's injury was sustained in June.

[6] Chester Golat allegedly observed Rick Ewer discharge an individual named Stanley Tims for returning late from an excused absence. Respondent's credible evidence indicates that there was no such employee. There had been an employee, Stanley Tipsin, who was fired by Rick Ewer but at his father's direction for insisting on taking unauthorized leave. The only other record evidence on the subject indicates that Rick Ewer attempted to direct the work of some employees, which direction was frequently ignored.

Several days before the 18 April election, Foremen Ray Frafjord told employee Joe Marshall that if he knew what was good for him, he would remove his union button and change his mind. This testimony is undenied. At the conclusion of the election on 18 April, Mark Stanger, who had been the Union's observer, allegedly heard Frafjord say, "You can kiss his ass goodbye." He did not hear his name mentioned. However, Priscilla Barber claims to have heard Frafjord say, "Stanger, your ass will be out the door when this union thing is over." Frafjord denies making any such statement. Noting the contradictions between Stanger and Barber and Frafjord's otherwise credible and candid testimony, I find the evidence that he made such a statement insufficient to sustain the General Counsel's burden.

In late or early July, Jim Ewer had a conversation at work with Florence, his wife, which Priscilla Barber overheard.[7] Ewer told his wife that "they are going to start thinning out---they are going to lay off and thin out the union people." In the same time period, he allegedly told Barber and two others employees that they would have to watch the capping table "because he had to lay off his wife and daughter-in-law because the damned union figured out that he was favoring his family." He repeated that "they would have to layoff and thin out the union people." Again, in mid-September, just before the September layoffs, Barber heard Jim Ewer tell Florence that he was going to clean house and throw out a few people.[8]

The General Counsel's complaint alleges Jim Ewer's July or August statement, blaming the Union's knowledge of his favoritism toward family members for the layoffs of his wife and daughter-in-law, as a violation of Section 8(a)(1). That complaint was expressly amended at the conclusion of the General Counsel's case, over Respondent's objection, to further allege as violative his late July/early August statements about using layoffs to thin out the union people. Notwithstanding those express allegations, neither Jim nor Florence Ewer contradicted Barber's testimony of the July/August statements. Barber's uncontradicted testimony, even if deemed uncorroborated, is sufficient evidence to sustain the General Counsel's burden of proof. Moreover, it was essentially corroborated by the similar statements Jim Ewer made before the election. I also find that Barber's testimony with respect to when these statements were made, late July or early August, is sufficiently definite to warrant the conclusion that they occurred after 22 July and within the 10(b) period. Accordingly, I find, as alleged in the complaint as amended, that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by these inherently threatening statements.

Jim Ewer denied making the statement that Barber attributed to him as having occurred in September and Florence Ewer had no recollection of him making any such statement at that time. Although the matter is not altogether free from doubt, I am constrained to reject the General Counsel's contention with respect to this allegation. Barber acknowleged that there was no mention of the Union in this latter statement and, while Ewer's earlier statements would justify the suspicion that he was again referring to union supporters, the testimony is too ambiguous to warrant a finding of a violation, particularly in light of the quality control program being instituted at that time (discussed infra) to which he could conceivably have been referring. Accordingly, I shall recommend that this allegation be dismissed.

Barber further testified that while she was visiting the plant in mid-October during the layoff (discussed infra), Florence Ewer said that Jim told her that when he had gone to Betthauser with a list of employees he wanted to recall, Betthauser had rebuffed him. Betthauser allegedly said that he Betthauser would do the recalls, recalling his "loyal" employees. The statements are denied by both Ewers and by Betthauser and I find the hearsay evidence too remote to carry any weight in light of those denials.

D. September 1986—Quality Control Program and Layoffs

As noted, Respondent's customers included funeral homes and casket distributors who are not affiliated with SCI. Because those customers did not want to give their casket business to a competitor, "the bottom fell out" of Respondent's business in September when SCI took over. The Company ran out of orders, and between 15 September and 6 October, laid off 81 employees. The majority were laid off on 29 September. The General Counsel does not contend that the layoff, as distinguished from the failure to recall certain employees, was unlawful.

Conptemporaneous with this downturn in orders, Respondent was directed by its parent corporation to institute an improved quality control program. Instructions to that effect were received on 11 August, with 31 August date set for reporting back. Additional directives were received from both Amedco and SCI in September and October. As a result, Respondent implemented a quality control program in about early September. Frafjord, formerly a supervisor in the KD (welding) department, was made quality control supervisor. Joan Ewer (Jim Ewer's daughter-in-law), Sharon Hayes, and Larry Kroening (an early union supporter) were selected to work as inspectors, checking and doing minor fix-up on the caskets as they were produced. Additionally, in October after layoffs Respondent changed its written policy on layoffs and recalls to emphasize qualifications over seniority in a department were laid off first and recalled last. "Employee with the least seniority" was changed to "employee who is at least qualified." The General Counsel makes no contention that the quality control program or the changes in the policy manual were subterfuges for the discriminatory action or otherwise unlawful.

[7] The 10(b) period began on 22 July and the General Counsel contends that this statement, if credited, should be found to violate Sec. 8(a)(1).

[8] On direct examination, Barber testified that Ewer had said that he was going to "clean house and thin out the union people." When recalled by Respondent, she acknowledged that he did not mention the Union in this September conversation.

At full capacity, with approximately 100 employees, Respondent can produce about 120 caskets per day. Its August shipments were at nearly that point. Shipments dropped to about 84 per day in September, 34 per day in October, and between 66 and 72 per day through February 1987. In March 1987 they dropped to about 53 per day.

E. The Recalls

On 13 and 14 October, Respondent recalled 50 employees. Between 20 October and February 1987, an additional 14 were recalled. According to Betthauser, the Company called the employees back by qualifications and seniority, by department. At the time the complaint issued, 27 March 1987, there were 17 laid-off employees who had not yet been recalled. Eight of them were alleged to be discriminatees: Chester Golat, Mark Singer, Priscilla Barber, Joseph Marshall, Mildred Yakovetz, Barbara Novak, Susan Celske, and Matthew Hall. Respondent recalled each of the eight in early April 1987, on being notified of the issuance of complaint, so as to limit its potential liability.

Included among those recalled in October were a number of individuals identified in the record as having been involved in the union activities to one degree or another. Joe Smith, Bernie Marshall, and Larry Kroening were active from the outset. Kroening, as noted, was made an inspector. Arlene Grey was promoted to leadperson. Frances Wojtyna and 20 to 30 others who had attended union meetings and/or voted for the Union were similarly recalled.

1. Paint department—Chester Golat and Joseph Marshall

Chester Golat began working for Respondent in June 1984,[9] in the paint department. For 4 months he worked as a stripper, for the next year as a primer, and thereafter, until his layoff, as the operator of a dual-action sander, a "DAer." In addition, he had loaded trucks, washed caskets, and done scuffing and capping. Jim Ewer testified that Golat was a versatile employee, one who had "helped me out a lot." In March 1986, Ewer had even written a letter of recommendation for Golat, at Golat's request, which was highly laudatory. He commented that Golat had an excellent attendance record, was dependable, conscientious, and adaptable.

Golat was one of the leaders of the union activity. He openly wore union buttons, he attended union meetings, and he passed out authorization cards. On at least one occasion, while displaying his union button, he questioned Betthauser about Respondent's encouragement of antiunion activity. Jim Ewer also observed Golat wearing a union button and Frafjord admitted discussing the union activities of Golat, Stanger, Barber, Yakovetz, Barbara Novak, Harold Novak, and others with Ewer. Betthauser had included Golat in his "sinking boat" statement, along with Joe Marshall and Harold Novak. Golat's support for the Union was known to Ray Frafjord and I find, contrary to their testimony, to Jim Ewer and Betthauser.

According to Betthauser's letter of 24 February 1987, setting forth Respondent's position on the charges (G.C. Exh. 3), Golat was not recalled earlier because, with lowered production needs, his DA job had been combined with that of the grinder, which job he had refused in March. In its subsequent statement setting forth its position (G.C. Exh. 9), Respondent further stated that had Golat not refused the grinder job in March 1986, he would have been recalled ahead of Jeff Papiernik.[10] Respondent contended that when the grinder, Harold Novak, quit on 19 March Ewer had offered that job to Golat and Golat refused. The job was then given to Jeff Papiernik. Ewer's testimony is corroborated by a note to the same effect in Golat's personnel file.

Golat and Novak, however, testified that they had trained Papiernik on the grinder job before Novak announced his intention to quit. According to Golat's specific and credible testimony,[11] he was working on the DA sander on 19 March and, because he was helping train Papiernik, was behind in his own work. At that time, Ewer asked him if he "wanted to grind a while." He replied "No. I'm behind here." He did not understand Ewer's statement to be an offer of a change in his regular job duties.

Jeff Papiernik began working in Respondent's paint department in September 1984; his seniority date was thus 1 July 1985, a year after Golat's. Nonetheless, he was recalled from layoff on 13 October and thereafter did both grinding (which Golat had taught him) and DA work. In addition, some DA work was done during this period by Max LaPorte. LaPorte had been hired in July to work part-time on the loading dock. He did not become a full-time employee until 8 September (and thus did not even have a seniority date). LaPorte had been laid off on 29 September and was recalled on 13 October. Thereafter, he loaded and unloaded trucks and helped Papiernik on the grinder and the DA sander. Respondent contended that LaPorte had been recalled ahead of those with greater seniority because he was "very versatile" and "best qualified." In light of his limited experience, especially when compared with an employee like Golat, I find this explanation to be, as claimed by the General Counsel, "demonstrable nonsense."

[9] Under Respondent's seniority policy, an employee's seniority date is 1 July following his or her date of hire. Golat's seniority date was therefore 1 July 1984.

[10] In light of these written position statements, Ewer's testimony, and the letter of recommendation, I find that Respondent's contention on brief that Golat was not a highly regarded employee, with references to several adverse notations in his personnel file, to be mere afterthoughts entitled to weight only as evidence of a shifting position.

[11] Noting, among other things, Ewer's denial of knowledge of Golat's support for the Union and his subsequent admission that he saw Golat wearing a union button and Frafjord's candid admission that he discussed Golat's union support with Ewer, I find Ewer to be a less than fully credible witness.

Additionally, the record reflects that Brian Srp, who had only begun his employment in June, was recalled from layoff on 13 October and did grinding. He had done this work before the layoff and Respondent contended that he was the most qualified to do it. In November, during the layoff, Respondent hired a new employee, Earl Main, who was assigned to the maintenance department; he did various simple jobs such as installing handles on caskets. Two employees who quit during the layoff, Bruce Thomas and Delores Smith, were hired to do grinding and scuffing respectively while Golat, Marshall, and the others were still on layoff.

Joseph Marshall began working as a metal brusher in Respondent's paint department on 30 December 1981. He also loaded and unloaded trucks, washed caskets, installed beds and springs, operated the DA sander, and did both grinding and sanding. He had not been laid off prior to 29 September even when others in the plant had been and, before becoming involved in union activity, had frequently been called in for overtime work. Jim Ewer considered him to be an employee to whom an assignment could be given with confidence that it would be completed. Ewer testified that he "had nothing against him." His work was never criticized.

During the union campaign, Marshall talked up the Union among the employees who worked in the basement of the plant, he signed an authorization card and he attended union meetings. He also wore a union button; both Frafjord commented negatively about it. He was also one of the employees whom Betthauser included in the "sinking boat" statement as repeated by Rick Ewer to Golat.

Marshall was laid off on 29 September. Recalled to the paint department before he was offered (and declined) recall in April 1987 (in addition to Papiernik, Srp, Main, Thomas, and LaPorte, discussed above) were Joe Smith, Rick Ewer, Sharon Heath, Don Hunt, and Andrew Nelson. According to Respondent's initial statement of position, Marshall was not recalled because he was a very slow worker who was holding up production. In its subsequent statement, there was no mention of him being a slow worker. There, it was asserted that of the three people who could do the metal brushing job, including Marshall, two were recalled. One was Joe Smith who had substantially greater seniority than Marshall (and who has been identified in this record as a union supporter). The other was Rick Ewer, who, although he had less seniority, was an assistant foreman. With respect to the others, Betthauser testified that Sharon Heath had greater seniority than Marshall and was recalled to do touchup priming, scuffing, and inspecting; Don Hunt was called back to wash caskets, the job he had been doing for a number of years; and Andrew Nelson was similarly called back to do the priming work, which was his job before the layoff. Both Nelson and Hunt were less senior than Marshall but were the best qualified to do the job assigned them, according to Betthauser.

2. Mark Stanger

Mark Stanger was hired in September 1981 and was primarily a dockworker under the supervision of Delbert Thomas, foreman of shipping, receiving, maintenance, and trucking. Prior to June, the work he had done most was loading caskets; he had also installed springs and gaskets. In June, he sustained an injury and was placed on light duty. As his doctor restricted him from lifting more than 25 pounds, he was assigned to touchup work and he continued to do that job until the layoff. The General Counsel concedes that Stanger never gave the Company any written release from his lifting restriction. It appears that his work on the dock was taken over, at least in part, by Bernie Marshall.

Stanger was involved in the union activity from the beginning. He made the initial call to the Union's election observer. His union activity was known to at least Ewer and Frafjord.

Respondent asserts, and the General Counsel does not dispute, that following the layoff the touchup job was combined with the painter's. Stanger was not qualified to perform the combined job. Paul Dubiel and Bernie Marshall, both painters and loaders before the layoff, were recalled to do the combined job. Dubiel and Marshall both have less seniority than Stanger. Marshall, it should be noted, was heavily involved in the union activity.

The General Counsel does not contend that Stanger should have been recalled in place of Dubiel or Marshall. Rather, the General Counsel argues that less senior people were recalled to work in jobs that Stanger had done before his layoff. The only one suggested was Richard Kroening. Kroening was hired in August and company records show that he was listed as "dockworker, maintenance, gaskets and hardware" in the hardware (HD) department. The record does not show what Richard Kroening was doing during the period of Stanger's layoff. However, when Stanger was recalled in April, he worked for 1 day on touchup and then replaced Kroening on the job of installing springs and gaskets.

In addition to noting the weight restriction on Stanger's work, Respondent argues that his extensive tardiness record was a factor in the decision not to recall him. He had received a written warning for tardiness in February and his attendance record indicates that he was late for work virtually every day from June until he was laid off. There is no indication that he was given any further warning or discipline for his continued tardiness, which may have been occasioned by the fact that he was a farmer in addition to working for Respondent.

3. FT department—Sewers Priscilla Barber, Mildred "Bernie" Yakovetz, Barbara Novak, and Susan Celske

Recalled from layoff were sewers Dorothy Jenness, Victoria Hoeft, Kay Franzen, Pamela Bosteda, Arlene Grey, Harriet Reinaas, and Ruth Coats. All these except Coats had more seniority than any of the four sewers, named above, who were not recalled. Coats was hired 2 weeks after Barber (19 May 1983 vs. 2 May 1983) and before Yakovetz (6 August 1984), Novak (21 March 1985) and Celske (22 July 1985). Also recalled to the FT department, which included sewing, were Kathy Hoeft and Wendy Ralston. Kathy Hoeft, hired 31 August 1984, returned to do springs and gaskets, which had been her job before the layoff; she also did some sewing after her recall. Sewing was included in her job description and she had done some sewing before the layoff. Ralston, hired 13 August 1986, was a cap assembler and tacker and that is the job she did on her recall. In January 1987, after Jenness was injured, Respondent recalled Harriett as a sewer. Winter had more seniority (5 November 1984) than any of the sewers not recalled except Barber.

Betthauser and Jim Ewer denied knowledge that Barber, Yakovetz, Novak, and Celske had supported the Union. For the reasons previously stated, particularly the animus statements attributed to Ewer naming some of these individuals, and for the additional reasons set forth below, I do not credit their denials.

Priscilla Barber had attended all the union meetings, signed an authorization card, and talked in favor of the Union among the employees during their breaks. In preparation for the hearing scheduled in the prior case she had spoken with Respondent's counsel and had revealed her support and her vote for the Union.

In April, Bonnie Timmers, a relative of Joan Ewer, Jim Ewer's daughter-in-law, and a former friend of Barber's, allegedly told Joan and/or Florence Ewer that Priscilla Barber had said that when she got ready to quit, she would feign an injury at work and collect workman's compensation as she had allegedly done at her prior place of employment. Respondent never questioned Barber about this and never took any action to protect itself against an unwarranted claim or suit by Barber. If they had questioned her, they would have had her denial, as she denied it on the witness stand, and they would have learned that there was an ongoing property dispute between Barber's family and Timmers', rendering Timmers less than an unbiased reporter. Notwithstanding the uncorroborated nature of this hearsay, Respondent initially asserted this information as the sole reason why it did not recall Barber. Subsequently, Respondent added that Barber had less seniority than all of those called back except Coats and claimed that Coats had been working on a special project, sewing sets on cardboard. Respondent claimed that Coats was the only one doing this special project, which had been assigned to her because she had a new sewing machine. Barber credibly testified that all the sewers worked on this project and that their machines were fully capable of doing that work. Respondent considered Barber's work to be satisfactory and made no contention that it failed to recall her because of her job performance.

During the winter, Barber and her husband went to Arizona where he sought temporary work. Respondent learned of this when someone called her home and spoke with her daughter about an insurance matter. When Jenness was injured, Respondent made no effort to contact Barber to be her replacement, allegedly believing that she was unavailable for work. Harriet Winter was called back in January 1987 to replace Jenness. Barber testified that she was available to return and would have done so had they contacted her. Contact, she said, could have been made through her daughter.

Mildred "Bernie" Yakovetz had attended union meetings, signed a union authorization card, talked about the Union with her fellow employees, been named as an alleged discriminatee in the prior case, received backpay from the settlement of that case, and had been interviewed by Respondent's attorney in preparation for the earlier scheduled hearing. She was not a leader of the campaign but her feelings toward the Union were known and, as shown above, were not appreciated.

Respondent initially stated that Yakovetz was not recalled because her job had been combined with another and because of poor quality workmanship. In its subsequent statement, Respondent made no mention of the combining of Yakovetz' job with any others; it relied on her seniority and job performance. No specific evidence was ever introduced as to what other job Yakovetz may have been combined with and, when she returned to work in April, she saw no evidence of job combination.

According to Jim Ewer, Yakovetz was a fast sewer but she made a lot of mistakes requiring that her work be redone. His testimony is corroborated by two file notations, showing that work was returned to her on 29 May and 10 June. Yakovetz admitted that she made some mistakes in her sewing but volunteered that she did not do so anymore than anyone else. She also testified that before the layoff her leadlady, Arlene Grey, had told her that she would be recalled quickly because she was one of the best sewers.

Yakovetz was recalled on 6 April, worked 1 week, and since a plant shutdown of 1 week, has not been recalled. The General Counsel contends that there is a continuing discrimination against her.

Barbara Novak is the wife of Harold Novak, one of the principal union organizers, and this relationship was noted adversely by Respondent. She attended two union meetings and was observed at one of them, along with about 30 others, by Florence Ewers. She signed an authorization card, distributed two others, and received backpay as an alleged discriminatee in the ULP case, which was settled.

Respondent claimed in its position statements that she was not recalled because she had the least seniority among the sewers and her job had been combined with another. In his testimony, Ewer stated that she was a slow sewer; his notes on her work performance confirmed this. Yakovetz also corroborated it; she had heard Ewer criticize Novak's work pace. Novak admitted that she was not fast, but denied that she was the slowest.

Novak was recalled on 6 April, worked for a short while, and was then laid off again. She has not yet been recalled and, like Yakovetz, is claimed to be a victim of continuing discrimination.

Susan Celske, like Yakovetz, had attended some union meetings, had talked about the Union in the shop, and had been named as a discriminatee and received backpay as a result of the earlier settlement. Also, like Yakovetz, she was laid off again following her recall.

Respondent's position statements assert that she was not recalled because her job was combined with another and because she had the least seniority. In his testimony, Ewer claimed that she was a slow sewer, that she had been tried on several jobs on which she either could not keep up or complained about the work. His testimony is supported by file notations made in March and August.

4. Welding department—Matthew Hall

Matthew Hall did not testify in this proceeding. According to Golat, Hall was very vocal in his support of the Union and wore a union button. At one point, early in the campaign, when Jim Ewer was telling employees that they did not need a union, Hall replied that if it were not for people like Ewer in the plant, they would not need one. Ewer admitted that he was aware of Hall's strong support for the Union.

Hall was an automatic head welder. According to Respondent's initial statement of position, Hall was not recalled from layoff because his job had been combined with another and because he had moved out the area.[12] Subsequently, Respondent expanded on the first reason, pointing out that Hall's skills were limited to automatic welding; he could not do other types of welding. The extent of his experience was to put lids on, they were welded automatically, and he installed hinges. The automatic welder position, Respondent stated, was combined with the corner and finish welder positions. To perform this work, Respondent recalled Everett "Rusty" Junk, an employee whose seniority dates from 1971. Ewer further testified that Hall suffered from a hand tremor, causing him to be nicknamed "Shakey." This tremor prevented him from doing other work in Respondent's plant.

The General Counsel did not dispute the testimony concerning Respondent's reasons for not recalling Hall. Neither did the General Counsel suggest the name of any employee who was recalled in lieu of Hall.

5. Analysis and conclusions regarding the alleged discrimination

In Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083, 1089 (1980), enfd. 662 F.2d 899 ((1st Cir. 1981),[13] the Board set forth the following causation test to be applied in all discrimination cases turning on employee motivation:

> First, we shall require that the General Counsel make a prima facie showing sufficient to support the inference that protected conduct was a "motivating factor" in the employer's decision. Once this is established, the burden will shift to the employer to demonstrate that the same action would have taken place even in the absence of the protected conduct.

Resolution of the 8(a)(3) allegations turns on motivation; accordingly, Wright Line provides the analytical framework for the discussion that follows.

The General Counsel has established that, to a greater or lesser extent, each of the alleged discriminatees engaged in union activity, that Respondent knew of that activity both generally and with respect to each of the alleged discriminatees, and that its supervisors dissembled ignorance of that knowledge. The attempt to conceal its knowledge of the union activity warrants an inference that it was seeking also to conceal unlawful motivation. Shattuck Denn Mining Corp. v. NLRB, 362 F.2d 466, 470 (9th Cir. 1966).

Unquestionably, it has also been established that Respondent harbored animus against union activists in general and the record reveals that its animus was specifically directed at Golat, Marshall, Stanger, Yakovetz, and Barber, and possibly others. Significantly, the record even reveals Respondent's intention to use layoffs as a means of ridding itself of prounion employees.

Finally, the General Counsel has shown that Respondent put forth pretextual or shifting reasons for its failure to recall some of the employees. The assertion of false or shifting reasons for its actions is strong evidence that its actions were unlawfully motivated. Delta Gas, 282 NLRB 1315 (1987); Swift & Co., 250 NLRB 1223, 1225 (1980). I consider as patently pretextual Respondent's claim that La Porte was called back before Golat because he was a "very versatile employee." He had not worked there long enough to become versatile. Moreover, Golat was expressly referred to by Jim Ewer as a versatile and adaptable employee and had worked there long enough to have earned that credit. It is thoroughly implausible that Respondent would have recalled a very short-term employee because of his alleged versatility in place of a versatile and well-regarded long-term employee unless it had other motivations. In a similiar vein, one must view Respondent's contention that Golat was not a highly regarded employee; as noted, that contention was a mere afterthought, contradicted by other evidence. Likewise, the contention that Joe Marshall was a slow worker, which was clearly contradicted by Ewer's own testimony, and was advanced by Respondent and then not pursued.

Clearly pretextual, also, is Respondent's alleged reliance on the double hearsay statement attributed to Barber by Florence or Joan Ewer concerning her intended abuse of a workman's compensation claim, without even a perfunctory investigation. If Respondent had placed sufficient credence in this statement to have delayed Barber's recall from layoff because of it, it would have been sufficiently concerned to have confronted her about it when the allegation first surfaced or to have taken immediate remedial action. I find it totally implausible that an employer would believe that an employee intended to defraud it through an abuse of the workman's compensation laws and do nothing more than rely on such knowledge to delay the recall of that employee from a layoff. Its failure to do more, to even question the employee about it, shows pretext and makes clear its motivation.[14] Kidde, Inc., 284 NLRB 78 (1987); Brookshire Grocery Co., 282 NLRB 1273 (1987).

The General Counsel having established a strong prima facie case, the burden shifts to Respondent to show that it would not have recalled these employees even if they had not been identified with the Union. Much of its defense has, of course, been considered and rejected in the foregoing discussion; in pretext cases there is seldom a clear line between the General Counsel's burden and Respondent's.

[12] This second reason was apparently "make weight." The only evidence that Hall moved comes from the fact that his letter of recall from the layoff, dated 31 March 1987, was returned undelivered. There is no evidence that Respondent knew of his move at any earlier time when other employees were being recalled.

[13] The Wright Line test was approved by the Supreme Court in NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983).

[14] Additionally, I note that while Respondent contended that the jobs of sewers Yakovetz, Novak, and Celske had been combined with other jobs, it never made clear what other jobs, if any, they had been combined with. Regarding Matthew Hall, I note that Respondent threw in his change of address as a reason for not recalling him although there was no evidence that it knew of that change at any time prior to the turn of the 31 March recall letter.

Considering Respondent's arguments and evidence, I find that Respondent has failed to satisfy that burden with respect to Golat, Marshall, and Barber. Thus, Golat was a versatile and respected employee whom Respondent had falsely attempted to portray otherwise. He had experience on a number of different jobs, including grinding, scuffing, and loading, and could have been recalled ahead of Papiernik, Srp, La Porte, Thomas, and Smith and before Main was hired. Even assuming that Respondent honestly believed that Golat had declined the grinding job in March when Novak quit, I would find that he should have been offered the combined grinding/DA job ahead of Papiernik. It is one thing to decline a job transfer when one is fully occupied with a preferred job; it is quite another to be offered that job in combination with the preferred job when the alternative is layoff. Respondent did not follow its stated policy of recalling the employee who was both most qualified and most senior when it preferred Papiernik, Srp, LaPorte, Thomas, and Main over Golat.

Virtually all that has been said above concerning Golat applies with equal force to Joe Marshall. He had experience in grinding and loading and was considered a versatile and valuable employee, one who could be counted on, before he became involved in union activity. Respondent falsely attempted to portray him otherwise and then dropped that position. He could have, and should have, been recalled before Papiernik, Srp, or La-Porte and before Respondent hired Main to do simple tasks that could have as easily been assigned to Marshall.

A more difficult case is presented in Priscilla Barber. She was only nominally more senior than Ruth Coats, the only sewer recalled with less seniority. However, Respondent's reliance on the alleged workman's compensation matter is so blatantly pretextual that I must infer unlawful motivation. In this regard I have also considered that Barber was fully capable of doing the "special project" that Respondent claimed was Coats' assignment and, in fact, had done it. The "special project" was no justification for recalling Coats ahead of Barber.

Contrary to the situations presented by Golat, Marshall, and Barber, I do find that Respondent has met its burden of proof regarding Stanger, Yakovetz, Novak, Celske, and Hall. Stanger was classified as a dockworker. However, he could not be recalled to that position because Respondent understood him to be under a weight-lifting restriction. It was Stanger's obligation to secure a release from that restriction and he had not done so. Bernie Marshall, a prounion employee with greater seniority, was apparently recalled to the dockworker position, apparently in conjunction with other work. Richard Kroening, an employee with less seniority, was recalled to the maintenance department but apparently did some work that Stanger may have been capable of doing even under his weight restriction. For a light-duty assignment, Stanger had been giving touchup. The touchup job was combined with painting following the layoff and he was not qualified for the combined job. Additionally, Respondent introduced uncontradicted evidence of excessive tardiness by Stanger, a legitimate consideration when determining whom to recall.[15] Considering the lack of work for him within the weight-lifting restriction and his tardiness, I am convinced that Respondent would not have recalled Mark Stanger even if he had not been known as an employee who favored the Union.

The General Counsel did not dispute Respondent's adoption of a policy calling for recall by qualification and seniority within departments. In the sewing department, no sewers with less seniority than Yakovetz, Novak, and Celske were called. Two employees, Kathy Hoeft and Wendy Ralston, were recalled but they had jobs other than sewing and did not sew as their principal assignments following recall. I find that Yakovetz, Novak, and Celske were properly recalled within the terms of Respondent's written policy. There was no discrimination in Respondent's failure to recall Yakovetz, Novak, and Celske earlier.

Similarly, there is no evidence that anyone was recalled to a position that, by seniority or qualification, should have been Matthew Hall's. Absent such evidence, I can find no discrimination.

Accordingly, I shall recommend that Respondent be found to have violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by its failure to recall Chester Golat, Joe Marshall, and Priscilla Barber.[16] I shall further recommend that the allegations of discrimination against Mark Stanger, Mildred Yakovetz, Barbara Novak, Susan Celske, and Matthew Hall be dismissed.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that Respondent unlawfully failed and refused to recall Chester Golat, Joe Marshall, and Priscilla Barber from layoff unitl 6 April 1987, I recommend that Respondent be required to make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits they may have suffered as a result of the discrimination against them, with interest to be computed in the manner prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded.[17]

[15] Even in the absence of evidence concerning the absenteeism records of other employees, Stanger's was obviously bad enough to cause concern.

[16] In so finding, I have not failed to consider that Respondent did recall and even promote some people who were known to it as union supporters. An employer need not discriminate against all known union supporters in order to effectively discourage union activity by discriminating against some. Uptilt, Inc., 276 NLRB 583, 589 (1984).

[17] 283 NLRB 1173 (1987). Interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

The General Counsel has requested a visitatorial clause authorizing the Board, for compliance purposes, to obtain discovery from the Respondent under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure subject to the supervision of the United States court of appeals enforcing this Order. Under the circumstances of this case, I find it unnecessary to include such a clause. See BMD Sportswear Corp., 283 NLRB 142 fn. 3 (1987).

Conclusions of Law

1. By threatening to terminate or thin out employees because of their union membership, activities, or desires and by blaming the Union for the layoff of other employees, Respondent has interfered with, restrained, and coerced its employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed them under Section 7, thereby violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

2. By discriminatorily failing to recall employees from layoff because of their membership in or support for the Union, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

3. The unfair labor practices enumerated above are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

4. Respondent has not engaged in any unfair labor practices not specifically found.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[18]

ORDER

The Respondent, York Products, Inc. d/b/a Mastercraft Casket Company, Ladysmith, Wisconsin, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Threatening its employees with termination because of their union membership, activities, or desires.

(b) Blaming the Union for the layoff of employees.

(c) Discriminatorily refusing and failing to recall employees from layoff because of their union membership, activities, or desires or other union or protected concerted activities.

(d) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed under Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Make Chester Golat, Joseph Marshall, and Priscilla Barber whole for any loss of earnings and benefits they may have suffered as a result of the discrimination against them in the manner provided in the remedy section of this decision.

(b) Post at its Ladysmith, Wisconsin plant copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[19] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 18, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

It is further recommended that the complaint be dismissed insofar as it alleges violations not specifically found herein.

APPENDIX

Notice To Employees
Posted by Order of the
National Labor Relations Board
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

We will not threaten to terminate or thin out employees because of their union activities, membership, or desires.

We will not blame the Union for the layoff of employees.

We will not discriminatorily fail or refuse to recall employees from layoff because of their union activities, membership, or desires.

We will not in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

We will make Chester Golat, Joseph Marshall, and Priscilla Barber whole for any loss of earnings and benefits they may have suffered as a result of the discrimination against them, with interest.

DECISION, ORDER, AND DIRECTION OF SECOND ELECTION

By Chairman Stephens and Members Johansen and Cracraft

On November 25, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Gordon J. Myatt issued the attached decision. The General Counsel and the Charging Party filed exceptions and the General Counsel filed a supporting brief. The Respondent filed a brief in opposition to the General Counsel's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions as modified and to issue an Order and Direction of Second Election.

The judge found that the Respondent's plant manager, George Hess, "did tell the employees that if they felt threatened or harassed by calls or visits at home from union representatives or employee supporters of the union, they should give statements to management." In making this finding the judge relied on the credited testimony of the Respondent's assistant plant manager, Duplessis, and acting plant manager, Cannon. The judge also found that Hess did not ask for a show of hands of people who had been harassed and did not threaten to fire any employees suspected of initiating such contacts on behalf of the Union. Based on these findings, the judge concluded that Hess' statement was not coercive and did not violate the employees' Section 7 rights. Counsel for the General Counsel excepted to this finding, claiming that the testimony of Duplessis and Cannon establishes an 8(a)(1) violation.[2] We agree.

In finding that Hess' statement is unlawful, we rely on a revised version of that statement because the judge's finding that Hess told employees to let management know if they felt "threatened or harassed" misstates the testimony on which he relies. Neither Duplessis nor Cannon testified that Hess used the word threatened.[3] Instead, Duplessis' testimony is as follows: "he [Hess] said that if anyone was harassed by the Union or by fellow employees to contact management and they would take care of it." Duplessis further testified that Hess did not explain what he meant by "take care of it" or by "harassed." Cannon testified that Hess said "that Mr. Hawkins wanted to know if any employee . . . felt that they were being harassed either by the Union or fellow employees." Thus, based on their combined testimony, we find that, in essence, Hess told the employees that if they felt "harassed" by supporters of the Union they should inform management, who would then "take care of it."[4]

The Board has found similar statements unlawful because they have the potential dual effect of encouraging employees to identify union supporters based on the employees' subjective view of harassment and discouraging employees from engaging in protected activities.[5]

The Respondent claims that the Union's supporters identified themselves by striking, that Hess never attempted to determine who was making the harassing statements, that he never threatened to fire or discipline union supporters and, consequently, that the statements had no chilling effect on the employees' exercise of their Section 7 rights.

Contrary to the Respondent's assertions, however, the judge merely found that Hess had not asked for a show of hands by the employees who had been "harassed." There was no finding that the identity of the union supporters or employees contacting their fellow employees would not be revealed. With respect to the identity of the union supporters already being known, it is true that the strikers identified themselves as union supporters, but the strike occurred 3 days after Hess made his March 21 statement. Also, the vote tally itself shows that there were more union supporters among the employees (seven) than there were strik-

[1] The General Counsel and the Charging Party have excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] The General Counsel and the Charging Party also excepted, inter alia, to the judge's failure to find that the Respondent implicitly had promised employee Lujan a raise if he ceased his union activities. The circumstances of the Respondent's meeting with Lujan, as established by the credited testimony, do not justify finding such an implicit promise, however. Thus, Lujan had requested the meeting, it was scheduled only a couple of days after the request was made, and Lujan was the one who brought up the issue of money by mentioning that he had not received a raise in several years.

[3] Even if Hess had used the word threatened in combination with the word harassed, the statement still would have been unlawful. See Anja Engineering Corp., 256 NLRB 1083, 1093 (1981), reversed on other grounds 685 F.2d 292 (9th Cir. 1982). Member Cracraft finds it unnecessary to reach this finding.

[4] The credited testimony does not reveal that Hess' March 21, 1986 statements on this subject were in response to employees' questions. Duplessis testified that to the best of her recollection Hess just brought up the issue of harassment, whereas Cannon stated he could not say for sure if Hess or someone else raised the topic.

ers (five). Thus, the strike did not identify all the Union's supporters. Besides, the tally may not represent an accurate reflection of the Union's support when Hess' statement was made. Indeed, the statement may well have had the tendency of inhibiting continued and future support for the Union among the employees. In this regard, although the judge found that Hess had not threatened to fire any employees who contacted their fellow employees to advocate support of the Union, the open-ended nature of Hess' statement—"harassed" employees should let management know so they could "take care of it"—announces the Respondent's intent to take unspecified action to stop the subjectively offensive activity without regard to whether or not the reported activity was protected by the Act.[6]

In light of these circumstances, Hess' statement reasonably could have interfered with, coerced, and restrained employees in the exercise of their Section 7 rights and violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.[7]

The judge found that the objections to the election were based on the same events alleged to be in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and recommended overruling the objections and certifying the election results as he found no 8(a)(1) violation. We have found, however, that Hess' statement violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. This unlawful statement was made during the election period and was communicated directly to all the Respondent's unit employees.

This statement, therefore, was likely to have had an impact on the results of the election. Accordingly, we shall order that the election held April 1, 1986, be set aside and a second election conducted.

AMENDED CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

Delete paragraph 5(g) from the judge's Conclusions of Law and insert the following as paragraph 3 and renumber the current paragraph 3 and all subsequent paragraphs.

"3. The Respondent, by telling its employees that if they felt "harassed" by supporters of the Union they should inform management who would "take care of it," has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act."

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, we shall order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Hawkins-Hawkins Co., Inc., Berkeley, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Notifying employees that they should inform management if they have been "harassed" by union supporters so that management can "take care of it" or otherwise inviting and encouraging employees to identify union supporters or discouraging employee involvement in protected activity.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Post at its facility in Berkeley, California, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[8] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 32, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the election conducted in Case 32-RC-2337 on April 1, 1986, is set aside and that a new election be conducted as directed below.

[Direction of Second Election omitted from publication.]

[7] The Respondent also claims that because the employees had already secured their right to have an election Hess' statement had no impact on their Sec. 7 rights. Sec. 7 rights, however, do not dissolve with the filing of a petition. Here, Hess' statement came during the critical campaign period when the Union's supporters presumably would have been contacting employees in an attempt to convince them to vote for the Union. Member Johansen notes that there was no exception to the judge's findings and conclusions relating to the Respondent's comments on the treatment of any strikers.

[8] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

APPENDIX

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

GORDON J. MYATT, Administrative Law Judge. On a charge filed by International Molders and Allied Workers, Local 164, AFL-CIO (the Union) against Hawkins-Hawkins Co., Inc. (the Respondent), the Regional Director for Region 32 issued a complaint and notice of hearing on 30 June 1986.[1] The complaint was subsequently amended on several occasions and further amended at the hearing. The gravamen of the complaint is that during the Union's attempt to organize and represent Respondent's employees Respondent's agents and supervisors engaged in various acts of conduct that violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act).

More specifically, the complaint alleged that Respondent, acting through its agents and supervisors (1) promised an employee benefits if he ceased his activities in support of the Union; (2) threatened an employee with termination if he did not cease his activities on behalf of the Union; (3) told employees that (a) the Union would never be successful in organizing the employees, (b) Respondent would shut down its operation if the Union was successful in organizing the employees, (c) employees would be terminated if they engaged in a strike, (d) Respondent would never negotiate with the Union, (e) employees were prohibited from talking about the Union at any time on Respondent's property, (f) Respondent would terminate any employee suspected of encouraging other employees to join or support the Union, and (g) employees were to inform Respondent if the Union or employee supporters of the Union contacted them at their homes.

In addition, the Union filed a representation petition in Case 32-RC-2337 on 17 March. An election was held pursuant to a Stipulation for Certification on Consent Election Agreement on 1 April in the following unit of Respondent's employees:

> All full-time and regular part-time production, maintenance, janitorial, shipping, receiving employees and plant clerical employees, employed by the employer at its 1255 Eastshore Highway, Berkeley, California location; excluding all office clerical employees, sales employees, guards, and supervisors within the meaning of the Act.

The official tally of ballots revealed that of approximately 32 eligible voters, 7 voted for and 22 voted against representation by the Union. The Union filed timely objections to the election, and the Regional Director determined the alleged objectionable conduct was substantially similar to the conduct asserted to constitute the unfair labor practices alleged in the complaint. The Regional Director thereupon consolidated both matters for hearing.

A hearing was held in this consolidated matter on 12, 13, and 14 November 1986 in Oakland, California. All parties were represented by counsel and afforded full opportunity to examine and cross-examine witnesses and to present material and relevant evidence on the issues. Briefs were submitted by the parties and have been duly considered.

On the entire record in this matter, and from my observation of the witnesses while testifying, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent, Hawkins-Hawkins Co., Inc., is a California corporation engaged in the manufacturing and distribution of traffic safety devices. Respondent maintains an office and principal place of business in Berkeley, California. During the course of its business operations in the 12 months preceding the issuance of the complaint, Respondent sold and shipped goods or provided services valued in excess of $50,000 directly to customers located outside the State of California. The pleadings admit, and I find, Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The pleadings admit, and I find, that International Molders and Allied Workers, Local 164, AFL-CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

---

[1] All dates refer to 1986 unless otherwise indicated.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

Most of the testimony relating to factual matters in this case is conflicting and in serious dispute. There are a few matters, however, about which there is no dispute and they are set forth first in this decision for ease of recital.

A. The Undisputed Facts

1. Lujan's employment history with Respondent

The evidence establishes that Paul Lujan had been employed by Respondent as a custom signmaker for approximately 3 years. At the time of the hearing in this case, Lujan was on disability and not working. He had been on disability status since 14 July 1986.[2] In 1985, Lujan was working in the pasteup department. Sometime in November of that year Mike Cannon, Respondent's plant manager, promoted Lujan to the position of leadman in the pasteup department to replace the foreman who was leaving.[3] Although Lujan was promoted to leadman, he did not receive a pay raise with the promotion. Although the precise time is not clear in the record, Lujan apparently went on vacation during the latter part of February 1986. When he returned on 4 March, Lujan was informed by Cannon that he was no longer the leadman in pasteup because Respondent had hired someone from the outside as foreman of that department.

2. Manuel Magana's employment with Respondent

Manuel Magana was the foreman of Respondent's metal shop.[4] The unrefuted testimony of Cannon discloses that Magana had an uncommon fear about being fired from his job. Cannon stated that in January and February Magana constantly asked if he were in danger of being fired. Despite repeated assurances from Cannon that this was not the case, Magana persisted in expressing fear that his job was in jeopardy. Because of what he considered to be an unwarranted fear on the part of Magana, Cannon arranged a meeting between himself, Magana, and Paul Black, Respondent's personnel director. The meeting occurred sometime in February. According to Cannon's unrefuted testimony, Black reassured Magana that he was in no danger of losing his job with Respondent. Black did express criticism, however, of Magana's job performance in the machine shop. Black felt Magana was not performing sufficient maintenance on the machinery and was thereby causing Respondent to incur more expense for outside repairs to the equipment. Despite this criticism, Black assured Magana that his job was not in jeopardy, and all he had to do was to continue to perform his work. Nonetheless, Magana continued to ask that he be informed about the date when he would be fired so that he could start looking for another job. Magana remained in Respondent's employ as foreman of the metal shop until mid-April 1986 when he voluntarily quit.

3. The organizing activity and the Board-conducted election

Although the precise time is not clear in the record, it is undisputed that while Lujan was on vacation during the latter part of February he contacted a representative of the Union about organizing Respondent's employees. Shortly after Lujan returned to work, he and Magana began soliciting employees and passing out literature on behalf of the Union in the plant during their working hours, as well as before and after work. They also visited employees at their homes on behalf of the Union. Several meetings were held with groups of employees by representatives of the Union and both Lujan and Magana were active participants in these meetings. It is also undisputed that the union activities of Lujan and Magana were openly conducted and generally known throughout the plant.

A Board-conducted election was held on 1 April and Lujan was an observer for the Union. The official tally shows that of approximately 32 eligible voters, 7 votes were cast for the Union, 22 were cast against union representation, and 2 ballots were challenged. The Union filed timely objections that the Regional Director consolidated with the unfair labor practice complaint for a hearing. (See G.C. Exhs. 2(a)–(h) and 3(a).)

B. The Disputed Events

1. The meeting between members of management and Lujan on 19 March

On 19 March there was a meeting in Cannon's office between Lujan and certain management officials. Depending on which witness was testifying, there were almost as many versions of this meeting as there were witnesses testifying about the event.

Lujan testified he was informed by Gene "DeCarlo," Respondent's labor consultant that Cannon wanted to speak with Lujan in his office.[5] Lujan further testified he had not requested a meeting with Cannon. Lujan stated when he entered the office, Cannon, Carlomagno, and Marie Duplessis were there. Duplessis was Cannon's assistant at the time. According to Lujan, he asked if he could have a witness present and Cannon agreed. Lujan stated he then went into the plant and had Magana come to the meeting as a witness.

Lujan testified that Cannon opened the discussion by saying he wanted to talk about any problems Lujan might have working with the new foreman in the pasteup department. Cannon told Lujan he wanted to make certain that any problems would be smoothed out, and he expected Lujan to give 100 percent to his job. At this point, according to Lujan, Carlomagno stated he had been hired to smooth out any problems the employees might have with Respondent and they could be worked out without a union.

[2] Lujan testified his disability was due to job stress, depression, and high levels of anxiety.

[3] Throughout the testimony the job titles "leadman" and "foreman" were used interchangeably. It is clear from the record, however, that neither position is a supervisory one in Respondent's operation and the holders of these jobs are unit employees.

[4] The parties stipulated Magana was not a supervisor within the statutory sense but, rather, was a unit employee.

[5] The correct name of Respondent's labor consultant was Gene Carlomagno. Lujan, however, understood his surname to be "DeCarlo" and referred to Carlomagno by that name throughout his testimony.

Lujan also testified that Magana then mentioned he suspected he was being "setup" for a layoff. Magana stated he had spoken about this to Black, and Black indicated that such a possibility did exist. Lujan testified that both Cannon and Carlomagno denied any knowledge of a pending layoff. Lujan then mentioned that he had seen a layoff list and his name and that of another employee, Albertson, were on it.[6]

According to Lujan, Cannon said he wanted to get Lujan a raise, "if Lujan would stop influencing the employees." Lujan testified he asked if Cannon were referring to his support of the Union and Cannon nodded his head affirmatively. Lujan stated he told Cannon that he could not live with himself and he could not "sell out" the other employees. He stated, however, that he would drop the union matter if Respondent would sign a contract directly with employees without the Union. Lujan further testified that Cannon said he would check into the matters brought up during the meeting as well as the subject of Lujan's raise and would get back to the employee.

Magana's version of the meeting in Cannon's office on 19 March differed in some respects from that of Lujan. According to Magana, when Lujan returned from vacation in February the employee complained about his demotion in the pasteup department. Magana advised Lujan to discuss the matter with Cannon and, according to Magana, the meeting was held in Cannon's office a few days later.

Magana testified that shortly before the meeting Cannon asked him to call Lujan into the office. When Magana did so, Lujan asked Magana to attend the meeting as his witness. Magana stated that Cannon initiated the discussion by asking Lujan what would it take to get Lujan to do his job. Lujan protested that he was doing his work. Cannon then said he wanted things to run smoothly and Lujan asked if Cannon meant he wanted the employee to stop his activities on behalf of the Union.[7] Magana testified that Cannon nodded his head affirmatively in response to Lujan's question. According to Magana, Lujan replied he could not live with himself if he did what Cannon requested. Magana stated Cannon then became angry and walked away. Magana also stated that Carlomagno said during the discussion that Lujan and Magana should not be doing what they were doing on behalf of the Union because there were no jobs available.

Magana further testified that Cannon spoke with him several minutes before the meeting with Lujan. According to Magana's testimony, Cannon said he wanted to give Lujan a raise and "maybe that way he [Lujan] would stop organizing the Union." Magana testified he had seen a paper on Cannon's desk with Lujan's name on it and an amount of $1 or $1.50 beside the name. Magana testified he saw the paper on Cannon's desk before and after the meeting with Lujan. Magana stated, however, that Cannon never mentioned the raise to Lujan during the meeting nor did he refer to the paper that, according to Magana, was turned face down on Cannon's desk. Magana said he told Lujan about Cannon's proposed raise after the meeting in the office was concluded.

Cannon and Duplessis were the other witnesses who testified regarding the meeting on 19 March.[8] Cannon stated that when Lujan returned from vacation he met with Lujan and informed the employee that Respondent had hired a foreman for the pasteup department. Cannon asked Lujan's cooperation in working with the new foreman and testified that Lujan appeared to accept the arrangement. Approximately a week later, according to Cannon, Lujan asked Cannon to set up a meeting with Norman Hawkins, Respondent's owner, to discuss the reason why Lujan was not given the job as foreman. When Cannon brought the matter to Hawkins' attention, Hawkins designated Carlomagno to act as his representative in meeting with Lujan.

Cannon testified he arranged to have the meeting in his office. Cannon stated that Carlomagno and Duplessis were present during the meeting but that Magana was not. Cannon said that since Carlomagno was representing Hawkins he opened the meeting by asking Lujan two questions and then left the discussion to Carlomagno and the employee. Cannon asked Lujan what specifically was bothering him and what it would take for Lujan to become a productive employee again. According to Cannon, Lujan stated that he felt he should have been selected foreman of the pasteup department. Carlomagno then informed Lujan that Hawkins made the decision and it was final. Cannon further testified that Carlomagno observed the union button that Lujan was wearing and stated that he did not feel Respondent needed a union to solve its problems. Lujan at this point complained that he had not received a pay increase for over 2 years and Carlomagno expressed surprise at this. Carlomagno then told Cannon to recommend a raise for Lujan. Cannon testified that he merely looked at Carlomagno but did not take any steps to follow through on Carlomagno's suggestion. Cannon stated he did this because Norman Hawkins was the only person who could grant or approve a raise for any employee. Cannon denied he told Lujan to stop organizing or attempting to influence the employees to support the Union. Other than Carlomagno's statement that he did not think a union was needed to solve the problems at Respondent's plant, Cannon stated there was no discussion whatsoever concerning Lujan's union activities. Cannon further testified there was no mention at all during the meeting about the existence of a layoff list that included Lujan's name.

Duplessis acknowledged she attended the meeting involving Lujan on 19 March. Duplessis stated Magana was not at the meeting and only she, Cannon, Carlo-

[6] Albertson was also a supporter of the Union and participated in a strike that occurred on 24 March. Lujan stated that Cannon continued to deny that a layoff list existed.

[7] On cross-examination, Magana added that Cannon said he wanted Lujan to stop organizing the Union after saying he wanted things to run smoothly.

[8] Carlomagno was not called as a witness in these proceedings.

magno, and Lujan were present during the entire discussion. According to Duplessis, Lujan wanted to know why he was replaced as leadman and a foreman was hired to run the pasteup department. She stated Carlomagno responded to the employee and said the newly hired foreman had more experience than Lujan. Duplessis further stated that Lujan mentioned that it was the second time he had been "bumped" from consideration for a lead position and that he had not received a raise in a long time. At this point, according to Duplessis, Carlomagno instructed Cannon to put in a request for a pay increase for Lujan. Unlike Cannon's testimony, however, Duplessis stated that Cannon then started filling out a form requesting a wage increase for Lujan. Duplessis also testified there was no mention of Lujan's union activities during the course of the meeting, nor was Lujan told he would receive a raise if he stopped attempting to influence the employees to support the Union.

Contrary to the testimony of Cannon, Duplessis stated there was discussion during the meeting of a layoff list. Duplessis testified that on several occasions before the meeting, Lujan questioned her about the existence of a layoff list and she could not understand his concerns because she had no knowledge of such a list. Duplessis stated that Lujan again mentioned the existence of a layoff list at the meeting on 19 March and she and Cannon were puzzled by his question. Duplessis testified she and Cannon later determined Lujan was referring to a list that had been compiled during the preceding year when Respondent had occasion to lay off employees because business was slow. According to Duplessis, this list was setup by departments showing each employee's name, telephone number, and date of hire. She stated that after the layoffs Cannon decided that the list would prove useful as a personnel document that would enable Respondent's management to contact any of the employees when they did not show up for work or for other reasons. For this reason, Cannon instructed Duplessis to retain the list in the personnel file.[9]

2. The first meeting between Hess and the unit employees

George Hess was the secretary-treasurer of Respondent and was responsible for Respondent's accounting, tax reports, and financial information. Hess also had an outside business practice in which he served other clients on tax matters. Hess' unrefuted testimony indicates that he devoted approximately 50 percent of his working time to Respondent's business.

Lujan testified Hess held a meeting with the unit employees on 21 March. Lujan stated both Cannon and Duplessis attended the meeting along with the unit employees. Lujan testified the meeting was held at 10:40 a.m. When questioned on cross-examination and shown his timecard, which indicated Lujan did not report to work until the afternoon on that date, Lujan steadfastly maintained that he came to work at 7 a.m. that day and punched out at 4 p.m.[10] It was not until he had completed his testimony and then was later recalled as a witness by the General Counsel that Lujan acknowledged he took Magana to the hospital on the morning of 21 March and did not return to the plant until 2:30 that afternoon. Lujan further acknowledged that he filled out a sick leave request for 6 hours of sick leave to cover the time he missed that morning. (See R. Exh. 2.) The timecard indicated his request for sick leave on 21 March was denied. Based on this evidence, Lujan, when recalled, testified that the meeting Hess held with the employees occurred in the afternoon after he returned to the plant.

Concerning the meeting, Lujan recalled that Hess told the employees Respondent had received a petition for an election filed by the Union with the NLRB. Lujan stated Hess appeared angry and upset. According to Lujan, Hess read from the Board's statement accompanying the petition regarding the rights of the employees during a pending election petition. Lujan further stated Hess informed the employees the last time a union attempted to organize the plant he made certain the effort did not succeed. Lujan testified Hess said he was tough and would shut down the plant and that was why the Union would not be successful this time either. Lujan recalled that Hess said Respondent did not have to negotiate wth the Union and if it did, negotiations would take up to 6 years. Lujan stated Hess told the employees that it would take a long time before the employees "got anything out of the Union." According to Lujan, Hess went on to tell the employees it was illegal for union supporters to talk to or solicit employees on company property or on company time.[11] Lujan further testified that Hess told employees he wanted to know which employees were going to the homes of other employees soliciting on behalf of the Union. According to Lujan, Hess stated that if he found out which employees were doing this those employees would be fired. Finally, Lujan testified Hess told the employees he was aware that some of the employees were planning to engage in a strike the following Monday. Hess said he would give the striking employees 5 minutes to return to work after the buzzer sounded, and if they did not return they would be fired.

Charles Kelley, a former welder for Respondent, also testified about a meeting Hess had with the employees.[12] Although Kelley testified he only attended one meeting conducted by Hess, his testimony seemed to embrace statements alleged to have been made by Hess at two separate meetings with the employees. According to Kelley, the meeting he attended took place on the day some of the employees were on strike in support of the Union's organizing effort. Kelley stated that neither Lujan nor Magana was at the meeting because they were on the picket line. Kelley further testified that Cannon, Duplessis, Carlomagno, and John Hawkins were the management people attending the meeting.[13]

[9] Duplessis testified that when she discovered the document, she went to Lujan and informed him that it was merely a list of all employees by department including employees who previously had been laid off.

[10] Lujan's timecard showed that the employee did not punch until 2:30 p.m. on 21 March and that he punched out at 4 p.m. (See R. Exh. 1.)

[11] On cross-examination, Lujan acknowledged that in the affidavit he gave to the Board agent investigating the case he stated that during this meeting Hess did not use the word "illegal" but rather said it was "unfair" for employees to talk about or solicit for the Union on company time or company property.

[12] At the time of the hearing, Kelley was no longer an employee of Respondent. Kelley voluntarily quit his job with Respondent on 11 September 1986.

Kelley stated Hess said if anyone went on strike and did not return in 5 minutes after they were supposed to be working, they would be fired. On cross-examination, however, Kelley recalled that Hess said Respondent could hire temporary employees to keep the Company going during a strike. Kelley further testified that Hess asked employees to raise their hands if they had been contacted at home, either by telephone or by visits, by union supporters or representatives. Hess urged these employees, according to Kelley, to go to the office and give statements about what occurred and promised that the statements would be sealed to protect their confidentiality. Kelley recalled that Hess also told the employees anyone supporting the Union could not solicit or talk about the Union on company time or property. If they did, they would be fired. According to Kelley, Hess did not tell the employees that they could discuss the Union during their lunch or breaktime.

Regarding the Union's organizing effort, Kelley testified Hess told the employees that the Union had tried to organize the plant in the past and failed because Respondent took care of its employees. Hess said Respondent would continue to do so. Hess also told the employees, according to Kelley, that there was no guarantee the Union would get what it wanted from Respondent because he was "a tough s.o.b. and any negotiations would be long and drawn out."

Daniel Gale, a screen printer and current employee of Respondent, also gave testimony regarding Hess' meetings, with the employees. Gale stated at the first meeting on 21 March that Hess told the employees that if anyone went on strike and did not return to work within 15 minutes after being ordered to do so they would be replaced in order to keep the plant running. Gale later changed his testimony regarding this statement and said Hess stated if the employees went on strike and did not return in 15 minutes they would be let go for leaving their posts. On cross-examination on this point, Gale added that Hess never told the employees that striking employees would be fired or terminated. Gale further testified that Hess told the employees at this meeting that they were "to keep all union activity off the clock and not to talk about the union stuff on company time." Gale stated during his testimony that Hess never mentioned anything to the employees about soliciting for the Union during lunchtime or breaktime. When further questioned about this statement by the General Counsel, Gale acknowledged that in the affidavit he gave the Board agent he said Hess told the employees it was all right to talk about the Union at lunchtime but not during breaktime because that was company time. On cross-examination, however, Gale testified Hess told the employees there was to be "no talking about the Union, either pro or con, during work hours" and Gale interpreted this to mean breaktime because all breaks were on company time.

Gale further testified that Hess told the employees if they were contacted at home about the Union and felt threatened they should let management know. Again, Gale acknowledged when questioned by the General Counsel that he did not include the expression "and felt threatened" in his statement in the affidavit regarding employees being contacted at home.[14] Gale denied on the stand that Hess said he would fire union supporters who contacted other employees at their homes about the Union. Finally, Gale testified Hess said if the Union got in negotiations would be long and could take up to a year because he was a tough negotiator.

The testimony by the witnesses presented by Respondent regarding the first Hess meeting was as conflicting in some respects as that given by the witnesses presented in the General Counsel's case. Hess testified he called the meeting on 21 March after the afternoon break because Respondent had received a formal copy of the Union's petition from the NLRB Regional Office earlier that morning.[15]

Hess stated he read the copy of the election petition, the Regional Director's letter, and the Board's formal notice setting forth the rights of the parties to the employees at the meeting. After this, according to Hess, he told the employees he was a "damn tough negotiator." Hess denied ever telling the employees Respondent would not negotiate with the Union or that Respondent would shut the plant down if the Union won the election. Hess stated that during the meeting employee Solomon Isom asked what would happen if employees went out on strike. According to Hess, he responded that Respondent could replace striking employees with temporary employees. Hess denied having any knowledge at the time that some employees were contemplating a strike. He stated he did not learn of a proposed strike until after the meeting ended and Duplessis notified him that one was scheduled for the following Monday. Hess further recalled that he told the employees there had been other unsuccessful attempts to organize Respondent's employees in 1972 and 1974. He stated he did not think the current union organizing campaign would be successful because he did not know if the Union had support of 30 percent of the employees. He stated this would have to be determined through the Board's election process.

Hess denied he asked employees to raise their hands if they had been contacted at home by union representatives or supporters. He also denied requesting employees who had been contacted to notify him of the facts surrounding the contact. Finally, Hess denied he ever told the employees they could not solicit on behalf of the [14] When questioned about the inconsistencies between his testimony and the statements contained in his affidavit, Gale stated he notified counsel for the General Counsel the week before the trial that he wanted to change portions of the affidavit but received no response.

[15] The unrefuted testimony indicates the union representatives came to Respondent's plant on 19 March and left a copy of the election petition. Thus, Respondent was aware, at least by that date, of the Union's organizing campaign. After receiving the copy of the petition from the Union, Hess contacted Respondent's attorneys and, before the meeting on 21 March, was given a letter listing the things Respondent could and could not do during a union organizing campaign.

Union on Respondent's property or that employees supporting the Union would be fired by Respondent. He stated he never used the words "fired" or "terminated" during his meeting with the employees.

John Hawkins testified Hess read extensively from the papers received from the Board and then employees asked questions. Hawkins recalled an employee asking what would happen if employees went on strike. According to Hawkins, Hess replied the striking employees would be asked to return to work and if they refused Respondent could replace them to keep the plant running. Hess told the employees the petition had to go through the Board's process. Hawkins stated Hess told the employees he was a tough negotiator and negotiations would take a long time with no certainty as to what would end up being negotiated. Hawkins further recalled that an employee asked when employees could solicit in the plant for the Union and another employee, rather than Hess, responded to the question. The answer was that employees could solicit on their own time. Hawkins denied Hess said union supporters would be fired. Rather, Hawkins testified Hess told the employees it was against the NLRB rules to fire employees for supporting the Union. Finally, Hawkins denied Hess asked employees to identify themselves if they had been contacted at home by the Union by raising their hands or to inform management about the circumstances surrounding such contacts.

Duplessis testified that Hess was aggressive and forceful during his meeting with the employees. She stated that she felt Hess could have been "more tactful." According to Duplessis, Hess read to the employees the notice received from the Board. She stated Hess told the employees he did not think the Union would be successful in this organizing attempt because past efforts to organize Respondent's employees had failed. Duplessis recalled Hess stating that if the employees went on strike they would be replaced. Duplessis denied Hess told the employees that they would be fired for striking or supporting the Union. Duplessis further recalled that Hess told the employees the negotiations would take a long time. She stated Hess told the employees that they were not to stop their work to talk about the Union. Contrary to the testimony of Hess and Hawkins, Duplessis testified that Hess also told the employees if they were harassed by the Union or fellow employees to inform management of this fact. However, Duplessis denied that Hess asked for a show of hands from the employees who had been contacted at home by the union representatives or supporters.

Cannon testified that during the first Hess meeting with the employees Hess stated there was a possibility of a strike occurring at the plant on the following Monday. According to Cannon, Hess stated that if there were a strike, the striking employees could be replaced. Cannon denied that Hess said employees supporting the Union would be disciplined or fired. Cannon recalled that Hess told the employees that if they had been contacted at home by union representatives or supporters and felt they were being harassed they should inform management. Cannon denied Hess asked employees to raise their hands if such contact had been made. According to Cannon, Hess did not make any comment about employees engaging in union activities on company time and property. Finally, Cannon stated Hess told the employees that if the Union won the election there would be lengthy negotiations because he was a hard negotiator.

Several employees testified on Respondent's behalf regarding Hess' meeting with the employees. Clarance Jones, a general handyman for Respondent, stated that Hess read to the employees their rights contained in the NLRB documents. Jones recalled that in response to an employee's question about strikes Hess told the employees management would give the striking employees a chance to return to work and if they did not then management could hire temporary replacements. According to Jones, Hess stated that only "taxes and death were guaranteed and all else was negotiable." Jones testified that Hess said the Union could not guarantee wages and that they had to be negotiated. Jones further testified that Hess informed the employees they could only discuss the Union on their own time and not on company time. Jones had no recollection of Hess stating that Respondent would shut the plant down if the Union won the election. Jones stated he never heard Hess use the words "shut down" or "close down." Jones denied that Hess asked for a show of hands from the employees if they had been contacted by the union supporters at home.

Emmett Littlejohn, a machinist who became a foreman approximately 2 months before the strike commenced, also testified about the meetings between Hess and the employees. According to Littlejohn, Hess read from documents regarding the employees' rights. When asked about the possibility of a strike, Littlejohn recalled that Hess told the employees anyone picketing would be given a certain time within which to return to work and if they refused to do so Respondent would get someone to fill their positions. Littlejohn testified that Hess did not use the words "fired," "terminated," or "replaced" during the meeting with the employees.

The final employee testifying about Hess' meetings during the organizing campaign was Solomon Isom. Isom was an alodine operator in charge of the refurbishing department. Isom testified Hess mentioned there was a great possibility of a strike. Isom asked if any striking employee were out for more than 15 minutes would that employee be terminated. According to Isom, Hess replied that employees would not be terminated if they went on strike, but they would be replaced. Isom further testified that Hess did not state during the meeting that Respondent would shut the plant down if the Union were successful in the election. Hess stated, however, that he would be a tough negotiator. According to Isom, Hess also told the employees that they could discuss the Union on breaktimes, lunchtimes, and after work but not during production on company time. Isom denied that Hess asked employees who had been contacted at home by union representatives or supporters to raise their hands. Isom also denied that Hess made any threats to terminate employees who supported the Union.

3. The second meeting between Hess and the employees on 25 March

On 24 March, Lujan, Magana, and several other employees went on strike to show their support for the Union's organizing effort.[16] They began picketing Respondent's facility. Hess testified that he went to the Board's Regional Office on 25 March to arrange for an expedited election because of the disruption caused by the strike. An election agreement was reached and a strike settlement was arranged at this meeting. Hess then returned to the plant and held another meeting with the employees after their break that same afternoon.[17]

Gale recalled Hess read a letter informing the employees there would be an election on 1 April. Hess also told the employees, according to Gale, that the striking employees would return to work and instructed the nonstriking employees to treat the returning strikers as if nothing had happened.

Hess testified that after working out the arrangements for the election and the strike settlement he met with the employees to inform them about the agreement to end the strike. Hess stated that he read from some notes he made at the Board's Regional Office during the settlement arrangements. Hess denied he told the employees during the course of the meeting that the Union would be unsuccessful in the election or that Respondent would close the plant if the Union won the election. He also denied telling the employees that the striking employees and the union supporters would be terminated. Hess was unable to recall whether he mentioned when employees could solicit on behalf of the Union or discuss union matters on company property. Hess stated he said nothing at this meeting about employees being contacted at home by union representatives or supporters.

J. Hawkins testified that the meeting on 25 March was a short one. Hawkins said Hess read from the strike settlement and election agreements. Hawkins said Hess stated a number of employees asserted they had been harassed by the strikers and protested against the strikers returning to their jobs. Hess at this point, according to Hawkins, stressed that everyone including the strikers should go back to work and focus on their jobs.

Duplessis testified that the meeting on 25 March was brief. She stated Hess told the employees an election would be held and the striking employees were going to return to work. According to Duplessis, Hess also told the employees not to stop their work to discuss the Union. Duplessis stated that Hess said if the employees felt they were being harassed by the Union or other employees they should let management know. She testified that Hess stated if the employees did not feel safe in verbally informing management of any harassment they could put it in writing. Duplessis denied Hess ever told the employees the union supporters would be disciplined or fired.

Cannon also recalled that the second meeting was brief. According to Cannon, Hess read from some documents about the process to be followed for the election and the strike settlement. Cannon denied that Hess made any statements about closing the plant if the Union won the election or disciplining any employees for supporting the Union.

Jones recalled that Hess told the employees at the second meeting that if they wanted a union they should get one that did not use intimidation or engage in "scare tactics." Several employees, according to Jones, complained about being harassed by the strikers. Hess told the employees that anyone who felt harassed or pushed around by the union supporters should let management know so that the NLRB could be contacted. Jones testified Hess told the employees there was going to be a quick election and the strikers would be returning to their jobs. According to Jones, Hess stated that the nonstriking employees should not take any action against the strikers. Jones denied that Hess said anything at this meeting about shutting the plant down if the Union won the election or firing employees who supported the Union. He also denied that Hess said it was illegal for employees to contact other employees at home about the Union.

Littlejohn's testimony regarding the second meeting by Hess was very sketchy. According to Littlejohn this meeting took place in Cannon's office.[18] Littlejohn testified that Hess said nothing about shutting down the plant or about firing or disciplining union supporters. Littlejohn was unable to recall whether Hess made any statements at the meeting about employees engaging in union activity in the plant on company time.

Isom testified that Hess read from some documents at the second meeting advising the employees there would be an election. According to Isom, the second meeting was very short. He stated Hess informed the employees that the striking employees were going to return to their jobs. Isom denied that Hess made any threats at this meeting to discipline or terminate the striking employees or any employees supporting the Union.

4. The incidents involving Magana

Magana testified regarding several incidents that occurred at the plant that he attributed to his active role in support of the Union. According to Magana, sometime in mid-March he was confronted by Cannon and Duplessis in the plant.[19] Magana testified Cannon and Duplessis came up to him and Cannon told him to stop organizing for the Union or Norman Hawkins was going to fire the employee. Magana stated Cannon said he could not cover up for Magana anymore. Magana further testified that he replied that he was going to continue his activity in support of the Union. Magana stated that following the conversation with Cannon he became lightheaded and started shaking and had difficulty breathing. Magana testified he had to leave the job at 10 a.m. that morning to go to the hospital for emergency treatment.[20] [16] The other employees joining Lujan and Magana on strike were Jose Sato, Jim Albertson, and Gary Silva. All these employees returned to work on 26 March pursuant to a strike settlement agreement.

---

[17] Although a strike settlement had been arranged, the picketing continued until the end of the shift on 25 March. The striking employees returned to work the following morning.

[18] Littlejohn was the only person to testify that any of the meetings were held in Cannon's office. All other witnesses testified the meetings were held in the lunchroom after the breaks.

[19] The record establishes that the incident described by Magana took place on 21 March, the date of Hess' first meeting with the employees.

Cannon testified employees Littlejohn and Reboh[21] complained to him that Magana interrupted them during working time to talk about the Union. According to Cannon, this occurred sometime after the strike had ended. As a result, Cannon spoke to Norman Hawkins and Respondent's attorney about the matter. On their advice Cannon stated he told Magana he was not to discuss the Union with employees during working time. Cannon testified he further told Magana he could only talk about the Union with other employees during breaks, lunchtime, and before and after work. Cannon stated Magana became upset and angry during the conversation. Cannon then told Magana if he continued to pull employees off the machines and interrupt the flow of work to discuss the Union Magana would be sent home without pay. Cannon further testified that Magana came up to him approximately an hour later and apologized for his behavior.[22]

Duplessis recalled more specifically the incident that led to Magana's leaving the plant to go to the hospital on 21 March. Duplessis stated she and Cannon observed Magana filling out customers' names on "move tickets" in various departments of the plant other than his own department.[23] Duplessis testified this was unusual because Magana was only responsible for placing move tickets on jobs ready to leave his own department. She and Cannon concluded that Magana was placing the customers' names on the move tickets in other areas so he could secure the names of Respondent's customers and supply that information to the Union. According to Duplessis, she and Cannon went up to Magana and Cannon asked the employee why he was putting the customers' names on the tickets. Duplessis stated Magana then became very "upset and fidgety." Magana told Cannon he was not feeling well and had to leave the plant to go to the hospital. Duplessis further testified that during the organizing campaign she had several occasions to caution Magana not to let his union activities interrupt his work.

Magana next testified that Respondent's management employees were following him around the plant and using walkie-talkies to spy on his union activities. According to Magana, John Hawkins, Cannon, and Reboh would follow him around the shop conversing on their walkie-talkie units. Magana admitted he never overheard any of their conversations on the walkie-talkie units. Magana further admitted that as foreman of the metal shop he too had been provided with a walkie-talkie unit to be used in running his department. Nonetheless, Magana maintained that the others were using the equipment to spy on his activities.

John Hawkins testified he was the management official responsible for the introduction of the use of the walkie-talkies in the plant. He stated he bought two units in mid-February as a test to improve in-plant communications, especially in the production area. Hawkins gave one unit to Cannon and he kept the other. Over the next 6 weeks Hawkins purchased four additional units and provided them to the foremen and leadmen of various departments, including Magana. According to Hawkins, the use of the walkie-talkie equipment never proved successful because the machinery in the plant interfered with the voice transmissions over the units. Hawkins denied that the walkie-talkie equipment was ever used to spy on Magana or any of his union activities.

The final incident recited by Magana involved a conversation he testified he overheard between Hess and Black. Approximately a week after he left the plant to go to the hospital, according to Magana, he had occasion to walk behind Hess and Black in the plant and followed them into the office area. Magana testified he overheard Hess tell Black that Respondent would have to get rid of Magana because he was organizing a union. Magana stated he then turned and left the office area.

Hess denied ever telling Black that Respondent would have to get rid of Magana because the employee was active in the union organizing effort. Hess further testified that approximately 6 months before the union activity taking place in the plant Black expressed critical opinions about Magana's job performance and his ability to do the work. Hess stated he admonished Black and told the personnel director it was not his responsibility to evaluate Magana's job performance.

IV. CONCLUSION OF FINDINGS

It is apparent from the detailed recital of the testimony that the controlling issues of this case rest primarily on a determination of the credibility of the witnesses presented by the parties. This is a task made all the more difficult in this case because, in many material respects, there is conflict between the testimony of witnesses not only on opposing sides but also between witnesses testifying for the same party. In sifting through this maze of contradictions and relying on my close observation of the witnesses while testifying, I find certain distinctive factors that I deem critical in my assessment of the reliability of the testimony.

First I find the testimony of Lujan to be filled with distortions and exaggerations that I conclude were deliberately intended to create a scenario of unlawful conduct on the part of Respondent's management officials. For example, when testifying about his meeting in Cannon's office on 19 March, Lujan stated Cannon mentioned a raise and indicated the raise was conditioned on Lujan's cessation of his union activities. Magana, on the other hand, who purportedly attended this meeting, testified there was no mention of a raise for Lujan during the meeting. Indeed, Magana stated he did not inform Lujan until after the meeting had been concluded that Cannon proposed to give the employee a raise in order to stop his union activities. The circumstances surrounding Lujan's testimony about the time of the first Hess meeting with the employees is another example of the unreliability of his testimony. Lujan testified that Hess met with the employees at 10:40 a.m. on 21 March. Lujan steadfastly maintained the meeting occurred in the morning even when he was shown his timecard which established that he did not punch in for work until 2:30 that afternoon. It was only after he completed his testimony, on both direct and cross-examination, and was subsequently recalled that Lujan was prepared to admit he did not report to work until the afternoon of that day. In my judgment, Lujan's failure to recall that he did not appear at the plant until the afternoon of 21 March was not the result of a faulty memory. Rather, I find it to be an additional example of his willingness to distort the facts. I further find it is highly unlikely he would have forgotten that he accompanied Magana, the other principal union adherent in the plant, to the hospital after Magana's confrontation with Cannon and Duplessis that morning.

[20] The statement Magana gave the Board agent indicates that he became "upset" because "he knew Cannon was going to fire him." This statement further indicates Magana's fear in this regard was based on his belief that Cannon blamed him for a machine breakdown that occurred 2 months earlier.

[21] Reboh was the leadman in the screening department.

[22] According to Cannon, Duplessis was with him at the time he had this discussion with Magana in the plant.

[23] Move tickets are apparently tags placed on job orders to indicate the job is to be moved to another department. It is unclear from the testimony whether customers' names are normally placed on the move tickets when they are attached to the job order.

Second, I find the testimony of Magana to be for the most part wholly unreliable. This witness appeared to me to be extremely unstable during his testimony. The unrefuted testimony demonstrates that Magana was obsessed with the thought that Respondent's management was searching for reasons to fire him. The testimony also indicates that this preoccupation with the fear of being discharged occurred well in advance of the advent of any union activity at the plant. Observing this witness, I find this obsessive thought not only colored Magana's perception of events that occurred during the organizing campaign but also caused him to weave out of whole cloth incidents involving him and members of management during the campaign.

Next I find the testimony of Kelley to be confusing and lacking in veracity in many respects. Kelley stated he only attended one meeting conducted by Hess, but his testimony about the meetings appeared to be a composite of both meetings. This raises a substantial question of whether he was recounting what he actually heard and saw or whether he was testifying about matters that he had been told had occurred. Therefore, unless corroborated by other credited testimony I find Kelley's testimony to be unreliable.

Similarly, I also find the testimony of Gale to be wanting in many respects. On the stand, Gale sought to contradict or change many critical statements that he had given in his sworn affidavit to the Board agent investigating this matter. I find his explanation for doing so to be totally unconvincing. Based on my observation of Gale while testifying, I find that his testimony is not to be credited unless corroborated by other credible testimony.

My critical analysis of the testimony of the witnesses is not limited, however, to those presented by the General Counsel and Charging Party. Hess, for example, appeared to attempt to so circumscribe his testimony that he seemed unwilling to reveal an accurate and forthright account of the events in which he was involved. Hess denied telling the employees at the first meeting they should inform management if they felt they were being harassed by union representatives or employee supporters of the Union. However, the testimony of the other witnesses on behalf of Respondent regarding this meeting demonstrates that he did make such a statement to the employees. During his testimony Hess also denied having any knowledge of a contemplated strike when he spoke to the employees at the first meeting. The testimony of Cannon and Isom, however, discloses that Hess told the employees at the first meeting there was a possibility of a strike the following Monday. For these reasons, I find the testimony of Hess was not completely candid or forthright and I take this into account in weighing the credibility of his testimony.

Finally, I find Cannon's testimony to contain certain critical omissions and denials that I do not deem to be the result of faulty memory. For example, Cannon denied that he prepared a wage increase request for Lujan when Carlomagno instructed him to do so. Duplessis, on the other hand, forthrightly recalled that Cannon began filling out a form for a wage increase request for Lujan after Carlomagno's suggestion. Next, Cannon specifically denied Lujan brought up the subject of a layoff list during that meeting, and again, Duplessis acknowledged this was mentioned by Lujan at the meeting. I find, therefore, that Cannon's testimony was less than candid in certain respects and consider this assessing the reliability of his testimony in general.

With the above in mind, I make the following findings concerning the specific matters alleged in the complaint.

A. The Meeting with Lujan on 19 March

In my judgment, the most reliable account of this event is found in the testimony of Duplessis. I find the testimony of this witness to be candid and forthright. My impression of Duplessis was that she was relating a truthful and accurate account of the events as she was able to recall them; even when this caused her testimony to differ from the testimony of other witnesses for Respondent. Therefore, based on Duplessis' testimony and the portions of Cannon's testimony to which I give credence,[24] I find that Lujan attended this meeting alone and Magana was never present. I also find that Cannon never offered Lujan a wage increase conditioned on the employee's abandonment of his union activities but, rather, that a raise was only proposed by Carlomagno when Lujan complained that he had not received one in several years. I further find that Cannon proceeded to fill out a wage increase request for Lujan at Carlomagno's suggestion while the meeting was in progress.[25] Based on the credited testimony, I further find there was no mention at this meeting of Lujan's activities on behalf of the Union. Rather, I find that when Carlomagno observed Lujan wearing a union button he stated a union was not needed to resolve the problems in the plant. In these circumstances, I find this statement by Carlomagno to be a noncoercive expression of opinion permitted by Section 8(c) of the Act. Hearst Corp., 281 NLRB 764 (1986).

[24] Although I have found portions of Cannon's testimony to be unreliable, I do not discredit his testimony in all respects. NLRB v. Universal Camera Corp., 179 F.2d 749 (2d Cir. 1950); Herrick & Smith, 275 NLRB 398 (1985).

[25] To this extent I do not credit Cannon's testimony that he never filled out such a form at the meeting. The record does establish, however, that any decision to grant an employee a wage increase rested solely with Hawkins despite any recommendations from lesser management officials.

In light of the above analysis of the credited testimony, I find that during the meeting on 19 March Respondent's officials did not promise Lujan a raise if he ceased his activities in support of the Union. I further find that Respondent's officials at this meeting did not engage in any other conduct that violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Accordingly, this allegation of the complaint shall be dismissed.

B. The First Hess Meeting on 21 March

In resolving the conflicting testimony regarding the statements made by Hess at this meeting, I rely heavily on the testimony of Duplessis, Isom, Jones, and Littlejohn in addition to the portions of the testimony of other witnesses, which I credit. As noted, I find Duplessis to be a credible witness and I likewise find the testimony of the above employee witnesses to also be reliable. In so doing, I am not unmindful that each of the employee witnesses worked during the strike but I do not find this to be a factor that militates against their veracity. Observing the demeanor of each of these employee witnesses, I find they testified in a candid and straightforward manner and gave the impression of giving a truthful account of the meetings as they recalled them.

On the basis of these determinations, I find, contrary to the testimony of John Hawkins, that Hess addressed the employees in an aggressive and forceful manner. Indeed, as Duplessis observed, Hess was less than "tactful" in addressing the employees. This alone does not constitute a violation of the Act. There is no requirement under the Act that an employer be tactful or impassive during a union organizing campaign. The lack of these characteristics only becomes important in assessing whether an employer's statements to the employees tend to, or do in fact, coerce, restrain, or interfere with their Section 7 rights.

Turning to the statements made by Hess at this meeting, I find the credited testimony establishes that after reading the contents of the Union's petition and the Board's documents accompanying the petition, Hess told the employees that unions had tied unsuccessfully in the past to organize Respondent's employees and he did not think the Union would be successful on this occasion. Contrary to the testimony of Lujan, I do not find that Hess threatened to shut the plant down if the Union was successful in its organizing campaign. I view this statement by Lujan as another example of his willingness to exaggerate and distort in order to bolster the allegation that the Respondent engaged in unlawful conduct. I further find from the credited testimony of the employee witnesses as well as Duplessis, Hess, and Cannon that Hess did not tell the employees that Respondent would not negotiate with the Union if it gained representative status. Rather, I find that Hess informed the employees that everything would be negotiable in those circumstances. Indeed, as employee Jones testified, Hess said "only death and taxes were guaranteed and everything else was negotiable." I further find that Hess told the employees the negotiations would be lengthy because he was a "damn tough negotiator." Statements of this nature, even when uttered in a forceful or aggressive fashion, are not coercive. These statements by Hess did not constitute a threat that the employees would lose existing benefits or a threat that Respondent would not bargain in good faith with the Union if it won the election. To the contrary, I find Hess was informing the employees, although perhaps not tactfully, about the bargaining process and that he was prepared to engage in hard bargaining on behalf of the Respondent should the Union become the representative of the employees. Standard Products Co., 281 NLRB 141 (1986); Clark Equipment Co., 278 NLRB 498 (1986); Thriftway Supermarket, 276 NLRB 1450, 1451 (1985). See also Histacount Corp., 278 NLRB 681 (1986).

I do not credit Hess' testimony that he did not state there was a possibility of a strike the following Monday. However, neither do I credit the testimony of Lujan and Kelley to the effect that Hess said strikers would be given 5 minutes to return and if they did not they would be fired.[26] Rather, I credit the testimony of the other witnesses that Hess' comments about the treatment of striking employees was in response to a question raised by employee Isom. I find Hess stated Respondent would replace the striking employees to keep the business operating. It is of no consequence whether Hess said the strikers would be "replaced" or whether he said Respondent "would hire temporary replacements." It is settled Board law that economic strikers may be permanently replaced although they retain certain rights regarding reinstatement on unconditional offers to return to work. Laidlaw Corp., 171 NLRB 1366 (1968), enfd. 414 F.2d 99 (7th Cir. 1969), cert. denied 397 U.S. 920 (1969). See also NLRB v. Fleetwood Trailer Co., 389 U.S. 375 (1967). Nor does the fact that Hess said nothing about the rights of strikers who might be replaced convert his otherwise lawful comments into unlawful threats. In analyzing similar statements, the Board has said they merely describe "an employer's legal prerogative" and do not contravene any of the rights conferred on the employees by Laidlaw. Eagle Comtronics, 263 NLRB 515 (1982). Cf. National Micronetics, 277 NLRB 993, 995 (1985). Therefore, on the basis of the credited testimony I find Hess did not threaten to terminate employees if they engaged in a strike in support of the Union's organizing effort.

Next, I find, contrary to the testimony of Hess and Hawkins, that Hess did bring up the subject of employees being contacted at home by union representatives or employee union supporters. This finding is not based on the testimony of Lujan nor that of Kelley, which I discredit, but is based on the testimony of Duplessis and those portions of Cannon's testimony that I find reliable. Thus, I find Hess did tell the employees that if they felt threatened or harassed by calls or visits at home from union representatives or employee supporters of the Union, they should give statements to management. I do not find, however, that Hess asked for a show of hands from the employees when making this statement. Nor do I find that he threatened to fire any employees suspected of making such contacts on behalf of the Union. In these circumstances, I find Hess' request for employees who felt threatened or harassed to give statements to management to be noncoercive and not in violation of the Section 7 rights of the employees.

[26] I find the shifting testimony of Gale to be completely untrustworthy on this point and place no reliance on his testimony regarding Hess' comments about strikers.

Finally, the most difficult aspect of the allegations is the verbal no-solicitation rule established by Hess during the 21 March speech to the employees. I credit that portion of Hawkins' testimony that an employee posed the question at the meeting regarding when employees could solicit for the Union in the plant and that another employee responded it was limited to the employees' own time. However, I also find from the credited testimony that Hess too responded on this subject.

I completely discredit the testimony of Lujan and Kelley that Hess told the employees they could not talk about or solicit for the Union on "company time or company property." Hess, on the other hand, merely summarily denied he forbade employee discussion about the Union on company property. Gale's testimony on this point was simply confusing and conflicting. Gale stated on the stand that Hess never mentioned anything about employees soliciting for the Union during lunchtime or breaktime, but acknowledged that in his affidavit he stated Hess said it was permissible to discuss the Union during lunchtime but not during breaks because the latter was company time. Gale subsequently changed his testimony to indicate Hess stated there would be "no talking about the Union during working hours" and Gale interpreted that to mean not during breaktime because breaks were paid for by the Company. Duplessis, on the other hand, said Hess told the employees they were not to stop their work to discuss the Union. Jones recalled that such activity was limited by Hess to the employees' "own time" and was not to be on "company time." Finally, employee Isom recalled Hess said employees were free to discuss the Union during breaks, lunchtime, and before and after work.

Because these varied recollections of Hess' statements regarding when employees could solicit or discuss the Union in the plant, it is virtually impossible to determine precisely what was said on this subject at the meeting. However, because of my finding that the testimony of Duplessis, Jones, and Isom is the most reliable presented in this case, I find that at the outer limits Hess told the employees they were to confine their discussion of the Union to their "own time." I further find that Hess' statements in this regard were in response to an employee's question during the meeting regarding when such activity could take place. Based on the testimony found to be reliable here, I find that Hess further refined the statement by telling the employees they were not to interrupt their work to discuss the Union and that they were free to engage in discussions about the Union during breaks, lunchtime, and before and after work. In this context, I find the verbal no-solicitation rule enunciated by Hess at the meeting met the standards set forth by the Board in Our Way, 268 NLRB 394 (1983). The verbal prohibition on union solicitation during working time defined with "sufficient clarity that employees [could] solicit on their own time." Our Way, supra. Nor does the fact that Hess' comments in this regard were limited to union solicitations compel a different conclusion under the circumstances presented here. The discussion about when union solicitations were permissible was initiated by a question from an employee during the meeting and was confined solely to that type of solicitation in the plant. Solicitations for other purposes were not mentioned or discussed either by the employees or Hess. There is no evidence in the record concerning solicitations for other purposes. In these circumstances, I find no reason to conclude that Respondent's prohibition on solicitations was invalid because it singled out union activities. In so doing, I am not unmindful of the Board's holding in Montgomery Ward & Co.,[27] and the line of cases that followed that decision.[28] However, I deem the facts in the instant case to be distinguishable from those contained in the above cases because the discussion on union solicitation here was employee initiated and was confined solely to that type of solicitation. Therefore, I find the rationale of Montgomery Ward does not apply here. Accordingly, I find Hess' prohibition on union solicitation in the plant was not invalid and did not violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

C. The Second Hess Meeting

By the accounts of all the witnesses, the second meeting Hess had with the employees on 25 March was a brief one. Based on my previous findings concerning the reliability of the testimony of the various witnesses, I find Hess said nothing at this meeting that contravened the Section 7 rights of the employees. Rather, I find Hess informed the employees about the strike settlement arrangements and told them an election would be conducted by the NLRB. Hess also told the employees that the striking employees would be returned to their jobs and that everyone should focus on their work as if the strike had not occurred. In this regard, I also find that when some of the nonstriking employees complained about being harassed by the strikers, Hess told the employees to report any incident of harassment by union supporters or union representatives to management either verbally or in writing. Finally, I find Hess did not threaten to shut down the plant if the Union won the election nor did he threaten to discharge or discipline employees for supporting the Union. Accordingly, I find the credited testimony in the record establishes that Respondent did not engage in any conduct that violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act during the second meeting Hess had with the employees on 25 March.

D. Other Alleged 8(a)(1) Violations

The remaining allegations of the complaint relate to incidents purportedly involving Magana. As previously noted, I find Magana to be a totally unstable witness who is prone to create scenarios where none in fact existed and whose testimony was completely untrustworthy. Based on this observation, I find Cannon did not tell Magana on 21 March that the employee would be fired if he did not stop his union activities. Rather, I credit the testimony of Duplessis regarding this incident and find that Cannon questioned Magana on that date about the reason the employee was placing customers' names on the move tickets in areas outside his own department. I further find that when Magana was questioned by Cannon, the employee became so upset that he had to leave the plant and go to the hospital.

[28] Cerock Wire & Cable, 274 NLRB 888 (1985); Premier Maintenance, 282 NLRB 10 (1986).

I also find that Magana's claim that he was being spied on by members of management using walkie-talkies in the plant to be totally incredible and unworthy of belief. In my judgment Magana's obsessive fear of being fired caused him to read ill-fated consequences into every situation, however innocent. I find this to be all the more true in this case because Magana himself was supplied with a walkie-talkie as part of his working equipment.

Finally, I totally disbelieve Magana's testimony that he followed Hess and Black into the office area and overheard Hess state that Respondent had to fire Magana because of his union activities. In my judgment, this is merely another example of Magana's compulsion to fabricate scenarios reflecting his fear of being fired and, in this instance, assigning his union activities as the contributing cause. Accordingly, I credit Hess' denial that any such statement was ever made.

In sum, I find the credited testimony in this case fails to establish that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act in any manner. Therefore, I find that the complaint in this case must be dismissed in its entirety.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent, Hawkins-Hawkins Co., Inc., is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. International Molders and Allied Workers, Local 164, AFL-CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent did not promise an employee benefits if the employee ceased his union activities and, thus, did not violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. Respondent did not threaten to terminate an employee if the employee did not cease his union activities and, thus, did not violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

5. Respondent did not tell its employees (a) that the Union would never be successful in its organizing effort, (b) that Respondent would shut down its plant if the Union succeeded in organizing the employees, (c) that employees would be terminated if they engaged in a strike, (d) that it would never negotiate with the Union, (e) that employees were prohibited from soliciting for or discussing the Union at any time on company property, (f) that it would terminate employees suspected of encouraging employees to join or assist the Union, and (g) that employees were to inform Respondent if they were contacted at home by union representatives or supporters. Thus, Respondent did not engage in conduct that violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On March 12, 1985, the National Labor Relations Board issued a Decision and Order in Cases 1-CA-19731, 1-CA-19797, 1-CA-19903, 1-CA-20007, 1-CA-20157, 1-CA-20218, 1-CA-20442, and 1-CA-20521[1] ordering the Respondents, inter alia, to make whole various discriminatees for any loss of pay suffered as a result of the Respondents' unfair labor practices. On April 30, 1985, the Board issued an Order adopting, in the absence of exceptions, the decision of the judge in Case 1-CA-21438 directing the Respondents to make whole one of the discriminatees for losses resulting from the Respondents' discrimination against her. On July 10 and September 18, 1985, the United States Court of Appeals for the First Circuit entered its judgments, enforcing in full the provisions of the Board's Orders. A controversy having arisen over the amount of backpay due the discriminatees, the Acting Regional Director for Region 1, on March 27, 1986, issued a backpay specification and notice of hearing. Subsequently, Respondent Sisselman filed letters containing answers to the specification on behalf of himself and Respondent Workroom for Designers, Inc.

By letter dated December 19, 1986, the Region's compliance officer informed Sisselman that his answers did not conform to the requirements of Sections 102.52 through 102.59 of the Boards Rules and Regulations governing backpay proceedings. In particular, the letter directed Sisselman's attention to Section 102.54 concerning the contents of an answer to a specification. It stated that the answers lacked the specificity required, for example, as the answers neither admitted nor denied the gross backpay formula or proposed an alternative. It additionally stated that the Respondents neither admitted nor denied the interim earnings claimed for the discriminatees or offered any other facts concerning interim earnings. Finally, it sought to remind the Respondents that the backpay hearing was not an opportunity to relitigate the unfair labor practice case. The Respondents were given until the close of business on December 30, 1986, to file an amended answer. Sisselman, in letters dated December 23 and 30, 1986, responded that his answers were as specific as he could make them, contending that the Board had subpoenaed and had possession of all his records, thereby denying him access to them. In response, by letter of January 8, 1987, counsel for the General Counsel reminded Sisselman that, with only three exceptions, his records, which were earlier subpoenaed by a special master appointed by the U.S. district court, were still in the custody of the court and remained available for his inspection. Sisselman was also reminded that three of his payroll records were released by the district court to the Regional Office for the purpose of preparing the backpay specification and were also available for his inspection. Sisselman was given an extension of time for filing an amended answer. Sisselman did not do so.

Thereafter, on April 23, 1987, the General Counsel filed with the Board a Motion to Strike Answer and Motion for Summary Judgment. The General Counsel argued that the Respondents' answers are totally deficient because they are not sworn to and fail to specifically address the allegations in the backpay specification as required by Section 102.54(b) and (c) of the Board's Rules and Regulations. The General Counsel moved that the Respondents' answers be stricken in their entirety and that summary judgment be granted as to all matters contained in the backpay specification. Alternatively, the General Counsel moved that the Respondents' answers be stricken and that summary judgment be granted as to the gross backpay calculations and as to those discriminatees concerning whom no valid issue regarding interim earnings has been raised. On April 30, 1987, the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice to Show Cause why the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment should not be granted. By letter of May 4, 1987, the Respondents filed a response to the Notice to Show Cause contending that the Board's further litigation of this proceeding is futile, essentially based on the previously asserted inability to pay.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.On the entire record in this proceeding, the Board makes the following

Ruling on the Motion for Summary Judgment

Section 102.54(b) and (c) of the Board's Rules and Regulations states, in pertinent part, that:

[1] 274 NLRB 840.

> (b) Contents of the answer to specification.— The answer to the specification shall be in writing, the original being signed and sworn to by the respondent or by a duly authorized agent with appropriate power of attorney affixed, and shall contain the post office address of the respondent. The respondent shall specifically admit, deny, or explain each and every allegation of the specification, unless the respondent is without knowledge, in which case the respondent shall so state, such statement operating as a denial. Denials shall fairly meet the substance of the allegations of the specification denied. When a respondent intends to deny only a part of an allegation, the respondent shall specify so much of it as is true and shall deny only the remainder. As to all matters within the knowledge of the respondent, including but not limited to the various factors entering into the computation of gross backpay, a general denial shall not suffice. As to such matters, if the respondent disputes either the accuracy of the figures in the specification or the premises on which they are based, he shall specifically state the basis for his disagreement, setting forth in detail his position as to the applicable premises and furnishing the appropriate supporting figures.
> (c) Effect of failure to answer or to plead specifically and in detail to the specification.—. . . If the respondent files an answer to the specification but fails to deny any allegation of the specification in the manner required by subsection (b) of this section, and the failure so to deny is not adequately explained, such allegation shall be deemed to be admitted to be true, and may be so found by the Board without the taking of evidence supporting such allegation, and the respondent shall be precluded from introducing any evidence controverting said allegation.

The General Counsel argues in support of her motion to strike the answers in their entirety that the Respondents' answers are not sworn to as required by Section 102.54(b) of the Board's Rules. As quoted above, that section states that an answer to a backpay specification shall be sworn to by a respondent or a duly authorized agent. The Board has recently emphasized that a pleading that substantially fails to conform to the Board's procedural rules will normally be stricken in its entirety.[2] However, we decline to strike the answers based on the Respondents' failure to have the answers sworn to under the particular circumstances presented. When Sisselman, who was proceeding pro se, was informed by the compliance officer by letter of December 19, 1986, that his answers did not conform to the requirements of Section 102.54(b), the letter then specified certain deficiencies as to the contents of the answers. These specified deficiencies did not include the failure of the answers to be sworn to. Thus, under the particular circumstance here, we find that Sisselman may reasonably have been led to believe that this procedural deficiency would not lead to the striking of his answers. Therefore, we decline to strike the answers in their entirety on that ground.[3] Moreover, although the Respondents' answers, as the General Counsel argues, are unnumbered and fail to explicitly admit, deny, or explain the allegations made, we find that his answers are sufficiently specific to fairly meet the substance of certain of the allegations of the specification and, thus, we deny the General Counsel's motion to strike them in their entirety.

At the outset, however, we must reject two general arguments made by the Respondents. Regarding the assertions as to the financial inability to satisfy the backpay order, it is well settled that the issue in a backpay proceeding is the amount due and not a respondent's ability to pay.[4] With respect to Sisselman's claimed inability to obtain records that would enable him to prepare more detailed answers, Sisselman's letters to the Region clearly indicated that he was aware that the Board had subpoenaed his records and that some of them were in the possession of the district court. Moreover, counsel for the General Counsel, by letter dated January 8, 1987, in response to Sisselman's letters to the Region's compliance officer, reminded Sisselman of the location of his records and that they were available for his inspection. There is no indication that Sisselman has ever attempted to inspect his records, and he has offered no explanation of his failure to do so. Thus, we reject the Respondents' contention that the failure to provide answers containing specific denials, as required by the Board's Rules, was justified because Sisselman's records were not in his possession.[5]

Further, notwithstanding our acceptance of these answers, we agree with the General Counsel that, with limited exceptions, the answers to the backpay specification are deficient insofar as they do not conform to the Board's requirements as to those compliance matters within the Respondents' knowledge. The answers do not specifically dispute the general accuracy of the gross backpay due. Section 102.54(b) specifies that a respondent's answer concerning all matters within its knowledge, including the various factors entering into the computation of gross backpay, must be specifically drawn and that a general denial about those matters will not suffice. Accordingly, as the Respondents have not specifically denied the allegations pertaining to the general computation of gross backpay, nor adequately explained the failure to do so, we strike the answers to the extent that they can be construed as addressing those general allegations of the backpay specification and deem those general allegations to be admitted as true.

However, with respect to the backpay due certain individual discriminatees, we find the answers are sufficiently specific to call into question the backpay period used to compute the gross backpay due these discriminatees, and thus sufficient to deny the General Counsel's motion with respect to these individuals. In this regard, the Respondents allege that the following specifically named discriminatees either refused or did not respond to the Respondents' offer of reinstatement or, alternatively, accepted such an offer and subsequently quit:[6] David Amlaw, Hannah Bontempo, Catherine Carlo, Christina Chrostowski, Gloria Civello, Donna Crawford, Leola Demary, John Descensi, Irma Dinicola, Linda Garneau, Sherry Briggs Gardner, Marie Moore Hebert, Charles Holmes, Valerie Johnson, Regima Lysecka, Rose Marchetti, Teresa McCormack, Deborah McGivern, William Paradysz, Donna Passons, Linda Peaslee, Yolanda Potter,[7] Kathleen Sabin, Ruth Sabin, Marion Smith, Ronald Smith, Thomas Spargo, Catherine Troiano, and Deborah Wood.

Similarly, we find the Respondents' answers sufficiently specific to raise issues covering employee[8] or job availability[9] with respect to the following named discriminatees: employee availability—Steffan Ashley, Leroy Barnes, Daniel Corrado, David Heath, Marie Moore Hebert, Deborah McGivern, and Connie Ruperto; job availability—Olive Bailey, Maria Blefari, Ann DeMarsico, Chong Gray, Jack Haskell, Rosa Palano, and Guiseppina Polce. Thus, with respect to the gross backpay formula used with respect to the above-named individuals, we deny the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment and shall direct a hearing limited to (1) determining if these employees received a valid offer of reinstatement, which they did not accept or accepted such an offer and thereafter quit the Respondents' employ; and/or (2) determining if these employees were available for employment or if jobs were available to them during all or part of the backpay period, as appropriate.[10]

Finally, the Respondents essentially argue that certain named discriminatees received interim earnings affecting their backpay entitlement beyond the amounts set forth as interim earnings in Appendix A of the backpay specification. Such claims are sufficient to warrant a hearing on those matters.[11] Accordingly, we shall order a hearing limited to determining the amounts of interim earnings of the following individuals: Leroy Barnes, Daniel Corrado, Patricia Gage, Ruth Sabin, and Marion Smith.

With respect to the remaining discriminatees, we find that the Respondents' answers raise no valid issues. We therefore deem every allegation as to those discriminatees to be admitted as true and, thus, grant the General Counsel's motion as to these individuals. In this regard, the answers do not raise any valid claims as to the allegations contained in the backpay specification regarding Candace Cook, Kevin Fowler, Dianna Grace, Kathleen Hoffman, Stella Hoffman, Thelma Leveille, Steve Mathes, Gregory Smith, Michael Soules, and Bernadette Williams. Further, it is well settled that matters litigated in the unfair labor practice proceeding cannot be relitigated under the guise of avoiding backpay.[12] With respect to the following discriminatees, the only claims made by Respondent Sisselman were litigated in the underlying proceeding: Susan Barnes,[13] Josephine Daley, George Fiehrer, Juanita Fortune, Rose Galvagni, Anita Burnham Girard, Bernadette Holmes, Diane Andrzejewski Hostetter, Ann Marie Jamros, Walter Manning, Rose Noto, Laura Pike, Robert Sabin, Rose Sayers, and Louise Whelan.

[6] See United Hydraulic Services, 282 NLRB 645 (1987), in which the Board denied a Motion for Summary Judgment because the answer alleged that an offer of reinstatement was made to a discriminatee.

[7] With respect to this discriminatee, the Respondents also argue that she received pension benefits. Pension benefits, which are, in effect, delayed compensation for earlier employment, are not earnings and thus do not affect the Respondents' backpay liability. F & W Oldsmobile, 272 NLRB 1150, 1152 (1984). We therefore reject the Respondents' argument in this regard.

[8] See, e.g., Big Three Industrial Gas, 263 NLRB 1189, 1200 (1982) (disallowance of backpay for periods of unavailability because of illness is proper under certain circumstances).

[9] See Victoria Medical Group, 274 NLRB 1006, 1008 (1985), overruled on other grounds in Scotch & Sirloin, supra at fn. 5 (issue of job availability during the backpay period is a valid matter for litigation at the compliance stage, therefore Motion for Summary Judgment denied where issue is raised).

[10] We emphasize, however, that at any hearing on such matters the burden is on the Respondents to establish facts that would negate or mitigate their backpay liability. See, e.g., Niagara Falls Sightseeing, 279 NLRB 35 (1986); and Overseas Motors, 277 NLRB 552, 559 (1985).

[11] See generally Lobster Trap, supra; United Hydraulic Services, supra.

[12] See, e.g., Scotch & Sirloin, supra at fn. 7, and Overseas Motors, 277 NLRB 552, 554, 557 (1985).

[13] With respect to discriminatee Barnes, as well as Walter Manning and Laura Pike, the Respondents claim that they have received unemployment compensation. It is well settled that unemployment compensation is not an offset to backpay. See, e.g., Howard R. Singer Legal Services, 278 NLRB 902, 904 (1986). We therefore reject the argument in this regard.

ORDER

IT IS ORDERED that the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment is granted as to all allegations in the backpay specification with respect to the following discriminatees and that pursuant to Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, the National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondents, Workroom for Designers, Inc. and Sidney H. Sisselman, Pittsfield, Massachusetts, their officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall make whole the following discriminatees, by payment of the amounts set forth in the backpay specification,[14] plus interest thereon to be computed in the manner prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded,[15] until payment of all backpay is made, less tax withholdings required by Federal and state laws:

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On January 18, 1984, Administrative Law Judge Hutton S. Brandon issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, conclusions, and remedy[1] only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The complaint alleged and the judge found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5), (3), and (1) by unilaterally ceasing to pay medical insurance premiums for employees receiving disability payments during a strike. We disagree with the judge that by this conduct the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1).

These are the pertinent stipulated and credited facts. Following 2 months of unsuccessful contract negotiations with the Respondent, and on the expiration of the existing collective-bargaining agreement, on July 1, 1983, the Union went on strike. The Union, within the preceding few days, had contacted the Respondent about continuing medical insurance coverage for the striking employees with the strikers paying their own premiums.[2] According to credited and uncontradicted testimony, the Union's inquiries were limited to the employees on strike. The Union sought a similar arrangement to one reached during a 1977 strike when the Respondent had permitted striking employees to pay their own premiums and had continued to pay premiums for employees already on disability. The Respondent agreed to permit the strikers to pay their own premiums, and on July 4 sent a letter to all unit employees advising them of the arrangement for the duration of the strike and instructing them to forward their premiums by July 15.

On the morning of July 5, the Respondent's vice president, Frank Haver, called the Union's local president, Matthew Lee, and read him the letter. They met later that day to work out the details of the new premium arrangement. Other union representatives were present, as was Clarence Scogin, an insurance broker, present at the Union's request. The attendees discussed whether the premiums would be paid by a single check from the credit union or individually by the strikers. During this meeting, Scogin asked the Respondent about the coverage of employees already on disability. Haver responded that they would be covered for the specific illness for which they were currently collecting disability payments, but for any unrelated illness they, too, would have to pay their own premiums. Scogin questioned the legality of such a position. Haver replied that he did not know of any legal problems, but if there were, they would be straightened out "down the road."

That concluded the discussion by the parties of the premiums for the disabled employees, and when, on 15 July, the premium payments were forwarded to the Respondent, they included payments on behalf of four or five employees on disability at the beginning of the strike.

With respect to the allegation that by this conduct the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5), the judge first noted that, pursuant to well-settled law, disability payments are a term and condition that survive the expiration of the collective-bargaining agreement and are a mandatory subject of bargaining that an employer cannot alter without providing the union an opportunity to bargain. The judge found that under article 17 of the expired agreement company-paid health insurance was to continue for disabled employees during the period when accident and sickness benefits were being paid. He determined that the health premium payments were, therefore, part of the overall disability benefit, and thus also a mandatory subject of bargaining. He then concluded that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) by failing in its duty to provide the Union with an opportunity to bargain on the cessation of premiums paid by the Respondent for the employees on disability.

Thus, the judge found neither the July 4 letter to employees, which referred to "present circumstances,"[3] nor the Respondent's conversations before July 5 with the Union about continuing premiums for the striking employees gave clear notice to the Union that the company-paid premiums for the employees on disability would stop during the strike. Further, he found that the Respondent's position was not open to negotiation at the July 5 meeting when it informed the Union that disabled employees were also affected. The judge found this closed attitude to negotiation was evidenced by Haver's reply to Scogin that any legal problem would be addressed later and Haver's admission that the Respondent had made its decision on this issue on July 3, before informing the employees on July 4. That the Respondent informed the employees before it told the Union further convinced the judge that the change was a fait accompli, concerning which the Union did not have a realistic chance to bargain. On the basis of these factors, including the period of only 10 days between the announcement and the due date of the premiums, the judge concluded that the Respondent failed to give the Union a meaningful opportunity to bargain and, therefore, violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1).

In its exceptions, the Respondent contends, inter alia, that the Union had ample opportunity to request bargaining but failed to do so. We agree and on this basis dismiss the 8(a)(5) allegation.

It is uncontroverted that at the July 5 meeting the Respondent unmistakably informed the Union that it would not be paying premiums during the strike for those employees receiving disability payments. This was 10 days before the employee-paid premiums were due to be received by the Respondent. It is well settled that "[W]hen an employer notifies a union of proposed changes in terms and conditions of employment, it is incumbent upon the union to act with due diligence in requesting bargaining."[4] Here, the Respondent provided the Union with at least 10 days' notice of the change. The Board has on occasion found as little as 2 days' notice adequate; it has frequently found notice ranging from 4 to 8 days sufficient.[5] Therefore, we cannot agree with the judge that 10 days did not provide a meaningful opportunity to bargain.

Further, we do not agree with the judge that the July 3 decision about the employees on disability or the July 4 letter prove that the premium change was a fait accompli, which the Respondent was unwilling to discuss further. In cases where an employer has made a decision and announced it to the employees in a similar time period before its effective date, the Board has found the bargaining representative must do more than merely protest the change; it must meet its obligation to request bargaining.[6] As those cases hold, any less diligence amounts to a waiver by the bargaining representative of its right to bargain.[7]

Neither do we agree with the judge that Vice President Haver's reply to insurance consultant Scogin that any legal problems with the premiums payment change would be taken care of later indicated an unwillingness to discuss the issue. Haver was answering a specific question, significantly not a request for bargaining, and did not foreclose further discussion at that time or later.

Based on all the above, we find the Union had timely notice of the change in a term and condition of employment and did not take advantage of it to request bargaining. The Union thereby waived its right to bargain. We, therefore, dismiss the allegation that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by discontinuing the insurance premiums during the strike for the employees receiving disability benefits.[8]

However, we agree with the judge that by this same conduct the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1). The judge, applying the then-controlling precedent in Emerson Electric Co., 240

[6] Clarkwood Corp., supra; Medicenter, Mid-South Hospital, supra. Cf. Owens-Corning Fiberglas Corp., 282 NLRB 609 fn. 1 (1987) (the Board, in finding that the employer's announcement 6 days before the implementation of changes in an employee purchase plan did not provide the union with a meaningful opportunity to bargain, relied on the fact that at the same time as the announcement the employer stated that nothing could be done about the changes); Michigan Ladder Co., 286 NLRB 21 fn. 4 (1987) (the Board found that an employer's March 26 announcement of subcontracting to begin April 1 did not provide the union with a meaningful opportunity to bargain as it was presented as a fait accompli; Member Johansen and then-Member Stephens additionally noted that the employer not only concealed and misrepresented the details of an arrangement already worked out with the subcontractor, but agreed to put it into effect while the union was "still in the dark"); Ciba-Geigy Pharmaceuticals, 264 NLRB 1013, 1017–1018 (1982), enfd. 722 F.2d 1120 (3d Cir. 1983) (union found deprived of meaningful opportunity to bargain where it responded to employer's announcement of a new attendance program to be implemented 10 days later by requesting information about the details of the program and where employer actually began implementing the program before the announced date and before furnishing the requested information to the union).

We also note that the July 4 letter to employees would not reasonably have conveyed to them a fixed intention regarding the payment of premiums by disabled employees because, as the judge noted, the July 4 letter was sufficiently unclear that the Union sought clarification at the July 5 meeting concerning what the Respondent was proposing to do.

[7] The Board's decision in Sherwin-Williams Co., 260 NLRB 1321, 1324 (1982), enf. denied 714 F.2d 1095 (11th Cir. 1983), relied on by the judge, is distinguishable. There, the Board, in concluding that the union had no opportunity to bargain, relied on its finding that the union did not have notice of a change until after it was effectuated.

[8] Member Johansen finds it unnecessary to determine whether the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(5) because he agrees that this same conduct did violate Sec. 8(a)(3).

NLRB 1143 (1979), enfd. as modified 650 F.2d 463 (3d Cir. 1981), cert. denied 455 U.S. 939 (1982), found that the withdrawal of the health insurance premiums for the employees receiving disability benefits was unlawfully discriminatory and, accordingly, violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1). In Texaco, Inc., 285 NLRB 241 (1987), the Board overruled the Emerson Electric theory of violation. Accordingly, we apply the test of discrimination set forth in Texaco and, for the reasons explained below, agree with the judge's conclusion that the Respondent's treatment of the employees receiving disability payments amounted to a violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1).

Texaco sets forth the following test. The General Counsel has the prima facie burden of proving some adverse effect of the benefit denial on employees, i.e., by showing that the benefit was accrued and that it was withheld on the apparent basis of the strike. The Respondent must meet any such prima facie showing with proof of a legitimate and substantial business justification, i.e., proving a clear and unmistakable waiver by the bargaining representative of the employees' statutory right to be free of the discrimination or coercion, or demonstrating reliance on a nondiscriminatory contract interpretation that is "reasonable and . . . arguably correct."[9] Further, even if the Respondent proves such a business justification, Texaco requires an 8(a)(3) finding if the conduct is proven "inherently destructive" of important employee rights or motivated by antiunion intent.[10]

Applying this test, we find that the General Counsel has met her prima facie burden of proving an adverse effect. It is undisputed that the premium payments were discontinued at the beginning of the strike and for the duration of the strike. Further, applying the guidelines and examples set forth in Texaco for determining when a benefit is accrued, we find that premium payments for those employees on disability were an accrued benefit.

Texaco held that a benefit is accrued when it is "due and payable on the date on which the employer denied [it]."[11] Further, Texaco provides that proof of accrual will be made on a case-by-case basis on relevant consideration of the collective-bargaining agreement, benefit plan, and past practice. In Texaco, the Board found accident and sickness (A&S) benefits were accrued because they were "due and payable based on past performance with no further work required for continuing receipt."[12] Similarly, the Board found an employee's monthly pension credit was accrued "in the sense that his accrued A&S benefit earned him the equivalent of full pay for the requisite number of days to qualify for monthly pension credit."[13]

We find the health insurance premium payments for the employees receiving disability payments in the instant case to be analogous to the employee's monthly pension credit in Texaco. Thus, the Respondent concedes that the disability payments were an accrued benefit (and that they were continued during the strike). Looking to the language of the contract, as Texaco directs, the receipt of health insurance premium payments for employees receiving disability payments was contingent only on the continued receipt of the disability payments.[14] Article 17 of the expired collective-bargaining agreement provides:

> The Group Insurance terminates on any employee when his active employment terminates except that it continues during the period accident and sickness benefits are paid.

As in Texaco where, by the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement, the employee's accrued A&S benefit earned him the equivalent of full pay for the number of days needed to qualify for his monthly pension credit, here the employees' accrued disability payments, by the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement, earned them payment of health insurance premiums for the same time period. The past practice of the Respondent continuing the premium payments for the disability employees during a strike further supports our finding that the premium payments under these circumstances were an accrued benefit.[15]

Turning to the Respondent's defense, we find that the Respondent has failed to prove a legitimate and substantial business justification. The Respondent makes no argument here that the Union expressly waived the right of the disabled employees to company-paid health insurance premiums during a strike.

The Respondent does argue that it relied on a nondiscriminatory contractual interpretation in suspending the benefits. It points to the language in article 17 providing that "the Group Insurance terminates on any employee when his active employment terminates." It argues that "active employment" is a prerequisite for the continuation of benefits, and that the article 17 provision that "active employment" continues during the period disability benefits are paid simply means that disabled employees receiving disability benefits will be deemed "active" during the term of the contract. Therefore, according to the Respondent's argument, once the contract expired, this article was no longer effective; the disabled employees were no longer deemed "active"; and the Respondent was not obliged to continue their premiums.

[14] The judge and the Respondent are in error in describing active status as a requirement for the premiums being provided by the Respondent.

[15] Our holding here is limited to circumstances where the payment of prospective health insurance premiums is linked, by the collective-bargaining agreement, to disability benefits in such a way as to become incidental to and part of the overall disability benefits.

First, there is no evidence this argument by the Respondent is more than a post hoc rationalization. When the Respondent announced the cessation of premium payments for all unit employees on July 4, it was in terms of the strike and pursuant to the union-initiated discussions about allowing employees on strike to pay their own premiums during the strike. No mention was made of the contract nor did the Respondent at the July 5 meeting claim the cessation was based on its interpretation of the contract. In fact, it provided the Union with no explanation for stopping premium payments for the disabled employees.

Further, even assuming that the Respondent relied on article 17 of its contract in deciding to suspend the premiums, we find the suggested interpretation is both unreasonable and not arguably correct. That article provides, "The Group Insurance terminates on any employee when his active employment terminates except that it continues during the period accident and sickness benefits are paid." (Emphasis added.) Thus, according to the plain language of the contract, the continued payment of health insurance for employers receiving disability benefits is an exception to the requirement that the payment of health insurance terminates when active employment terminates and sets disabled employees apart from any requirement of active employment.

The Respondent additionally asserts that the cessation of premium payments for disabled employees was economically motivated. It claims that it had been suffering substantial business losses, in the range of approximately $400,000 per month, since March 1982. The insurance premiums that amounted to approximately $100,000 per month for the unit employees ($331.27 per employee), according to the Respondent's claim, would comprise a significant savings. This assertion, never mentioned in its dealings with the Union, was also post hoc. Further, the Respondent's three-part proposal during contract negotiations belies a financial motive in discontinuing the disabled employees' premiums. This proposal did not cut off premium payments altogether but gave the Union three options: (1) essentially the same coverage but without Vulcan or vision coverage, with the Respondent paying $275 of each employee's premium per month; (2) slightly revised benefits (also no Vulcan or vision coverage) with the Respondent paying no premiums the first year, but $275 and $310, respectively, for the second and the third years; and (3) the same coverage as salaried employees were currently receiving with the same percentage of premiums paid by the Respondent. Thus, even assuming economic motivation of the sort alleged by the Respondent here could be a substantial business justification, the Respondent has failed to establish such motivation.

The Respondent, having failed to prove a legitimate and substantial business justification for discontinuing the health insurance premium payments for the disabled employees,[16] we agree with the judge that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) by suspending these premium payments.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Jim Walter Resources, Inc., Birmingham, Alabama, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discriminating against its employees receiving disability benefits by discontinuing group insurance premium payments for such employees when other of its employees engage in a strike.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Reinstate the practice of paying group health insurance premiums for employees receiving disability benefits, and make whole, with interest, those employees on disability including William R. Foster, James Crisler, and Roy Owen for any loss they may have incurred as a result of the Respondent's action.

(b) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(c) Post at its Birmingham, Alabama facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[17] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 10, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

[16] It is, accordingly, unnecessary to address whether the Respondent's conduct was "inherently destructive" of employee rights. Texaco, supra.

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

---

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT discriminate against our employees receiving disability benefits by discontinuing payment of group insurance premiums for such employees when other of our employees are engaged in a strike.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL reinstate the payment of group health insurance premiums for employees receiving disability benefits and, WE WILL make whole, with interest, any such employees including William R. Foster, James Crisler, and Roy Owen for losses they may have suffered as a result of our discriminatory discontinuation of payment of their premiums.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

HUTTON S. BRANDON, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried at Birmingham, Alabama, on November 1, 1983.[1] The charge was filed on August 2 (amended August 24), and the complaint and notice of hearing was issued on September 1. The issues are whether Jim Walter Resources, Inc. (Respondents or the Company) violated Section 8(a)(5), (3), and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) by unilaterally, without notice to or consultation with, the United Steelworkers of America, AFL-CIO-CLC (the Union), ceased to pay medical insurance premiums for certain of its employees due them under an expired collective-bargaining agreement, all because other of the Company's employees ceased work concertedly and engaged in a lawful strike against the Company.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel and the Company, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Company is an Alabama corporation with an office and place of business located in Birmingham, Alabama, where it is engaged in the manufacture of coke, pig iron, mineral wools, and chemicals. During the calendar year preceding issuance of complaint, the Company sold and shipped from its Birmingham, Alabama facility goods valued in excess of $50,000 directly to customers located outside the State of Alabama. The Company admits, and I find, that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act. The complaint alleges, and the Company by its answer to the complaint also admits, that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

The material facts in this case are not largely disputed. In fact, the parties entered into a joint stipulation setting forth substantially all the significant facts. The joint stipulation, in significant part, is as follows:

> 2. At all times material herein, the Union has been, and is, the recognized bargaining representative of the employees in the unit described in paragraph 6 of the Complaint and Notice of Hearing, for the purposes of collective bargaining and, by virtue of Section 9(a) of the National Labor Relations Act (herein call the Act), has been, and is, the exclusive representative of all the employees in said unit for the purposes of collective bargaining.
> 3. Respondent and the Union were parties to a collective bargaining agreement covering the employees of Respondent in the unit described in paragraph 6 of the Complaint and Notice of Hearing, which collective bargaining agreement was in effect for the period July 1, 1980 to June 30, 1983 inclusive, on which date said collective bargaining agreement expired by its own terms.

. . . .

5. On or about May 1, 1983, Respondent and the Union commenced negotiations concerning a new collective bargaining agreement.

6. There is no issue as to whether the requirements of [Section] 8(d) of the Act have been met.

7. During the course of negotiations, Respondent and the Union exchanged various proposals, including proposals concerning medical and other insurance benefits for employees. At no time prior to July 1, 1983, did Respondent propose in said negotiations to completely eliminate medical insurance benefits for employees or propose that employees pay the full premium for medical insurance in any proposed collective bargaining agreement.

8. On or about July 1, 1983, the collective bargaining agreement described in paragraph 3 expired and employees of Respondent in the above described bargaining unit ceased work concertedly and engaged in a lawful economic strike.

9. On or about July 1, 1983, upon expiration of the collective bargaining agreement described in paragraph 3 and upon commencement of the strike described in paragraph 7, Respondent and the Union discussed whether employees in the unit would be allowed to continue medical insurance coverage as previously provided in the collective bargaining agreement described in paragraph 3 during the period prior to agreement on a new collective bargaining agreement.

10. On or about July 3, Respondent offered to the Union to allow employees in the unit to continue medical insurance coverage as previously provided in the collective bargaining agreement, but at the employees' own cost. Respondent further informed the Union that, in order to continue such insurance coverage, an employee would be required to provide Respondent with an individual check no later than July 15, 1983, said check to be in an amount equal to the regular monthly premium charged for such insurance coverage. The Union requested that each employee not be required to pay his respective monthly premiums separately and requested that alternative methods of payment be considered.

11. On or about July 15, 1983, the Respondents and the Union agreed to an alternative method whereby individual employees in the unit could pay their individual monthly insurance premiums and continue in effect medical coverage pending negotiations of a new collective bargaining [agreement]. Respondent agreed that it would accept individual checks from the Sloss Federal Credit Union payable jointly to the Respondent and to the designated individual employee in the unit and endorsed by the individual employee in question.

12. On or about July 4, 1983, by letter, Respondent notified all employees in the above described bargaining unit of the cessation of medical insurance coverage and of the method by which individual employees could keep in force their medical insurance coverage. A copy of said letter is appended hereto as Joint Exhibit 2.

13. On or about January 25, 1983, Charging Party William R. Foster, employed by Respondent at the time, sustained an on-the-job injury to his right elbow. Foster returned to work and continued to work for Respondent until on or about June 30, 1983, when he underwent surgery on his elbow. Foster was released to return to work by his physician, Dr. Edward Bromberg, on August 1, 1983. During the period of his disability, Foster received weekly disability payments from Respondent.

14. On or about July 7, 1983, Foster received a copy of Joint Exhibit 2. Consequently, Foster paid his own medical premium pursuant to the instructions contained in Joint Exhibit 2, for the month of July, 1983.

15. On or about August 1, 1983, upon being released to return to work, Foster did not return to work at Respondent's facility, but rather notified Respondent, by letter, that as of August 1, 1983, he was electing to join the Union in their strike against Respondent. At no time prior to his release to return to work did Foster affirmatively communicate to Respondent that he had joined the strike.

16. On or about May 23, 1983, employee James Crisler sustained an on-the-job injury, receiving a burn to his foot. Crisler was treated on that date and returned to work on May 24, 1983. Due to complications that resulted from his injury, Crisler was hospitalized on or about May 24, 1983, for a period of 24 days. He was released to return to work on or about October 16, 1983. During the period of his disability Crisler received disability payments from Respondent in the amount of $180.00 per week.

17. Between May 24 and July 1, 1983, Crisler continued receiving medical insurance coverage as provided in the collective bargaining agreement described in paragraphs 3 and 4 above. On or about July 7, 1983, Crisler received a copy of Joint Exhibit 2. Consequently, Crisler paid his own medical insurance premiums pursuant to instructions contained in Joint Exhibit 2, from on or about July 1, 1983, up to and including the date he was released to return to work on or about October 16, 1983. Upon his release to return work, Crisler did not return to work, but rather joined the strike already in progress at Respondent's facility. At no time prior to his release to return to work did Crisler affirmatively communicate to Respondent that he had joined the strike.

18. Employee Roy Owen has been disabled from work since on or about February, 1983. From the time of his disability to the present, Owen has received disability payments in the amount of $180.00 per week from Respondent. Until July 1, 1983, Owen continued to receive medical insurance coverage as provided in the collective bargaining > agreement desccribed in paragraphs 3 and 4, above. On or about the second week of July, 1983, Owen had a conversation with Respondent's Vice President for Employee Relations, F. E. Haver, who informed Owen that unless he paid his own medical insurance premiums, he would no longer be covered by Respondent's medical insurance plan. Consequently, Owen has personally paid medical insurance premiums in order to maintain said medical insurance coverage. At no time between the commencement of the strike on or about July 1, 1983 and the present, has Owen affirmatively communicated to Respondent that he had joined the strike.

> 19. In addition to employees Foster, Crisler and Owen, there were other employees in the bargaining unit who were off work on sickness and accident disability as of July 1, 1983. These employees have continued to receive sickness and accident disability benefits, to the extent entitled to such benefits, but have not continued to receive prospective medical coverage except as by the method provided in Joint Exhibit 2.

The collective-bargaining unit, which is referred to in paragraph 3 of the stipulation, is as follows:

> All production and maintenance employees employed by Respondent at its by-products plant, energy department, Mary Lee department, blast furnace, slag plant, mineral wool, vehicle maintenance department and chemical plant, but excluding all foremen, salaried clerks, technical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

In view of the collective-bargaining history between the parties referred to in the stipulation, and because Respondent's answer to the complaint admits that the above unit is appropriate, I find the unit to be an appropriate one for the purposes of collective bargaining.

The expired collective-bargaining agreement, which was received in evidence, contains the following pertinent provision at article 17, captioned "Group Insurance":

> The Company agrees to continue Provident Life & Accident Insurance Company group policy No. 5414 with the Company being the policy holder and paying the entire cost of the insurance.
>
> . . . .
> The Group Insurance terminates on any employee when his active employment terminates except that it continues during the period accident and sickness benefits are paid.

Joint Exhibit 2, which was referred to above in the stipulation between the parties, was a letter from the Company dated July 4, 1983, that was mailed to all the unit employees including those on disability. That letter addressed the concerns of the striking employees about the status of their insurance benefits. The letter stated:

> Your Company is equally concerned and realizes that without such protection, you and your family could be subjected to serious financial liability. The Company wiil, therefore, make the necessary arrangements which will permit you to continue your life, hospital, surgical, and dental insurance until further notice.

The letter then announced:

> Under the present circumstances you, of course, realize that the Company is not willing to continue paying the cost of your insurance. Should you decide to continue your insurance, you may do so; however, you must pay the full cost which, in the past has been paid for you by the Company.

The letter then proceeded to explain the cost of the insurance and described the arrangements for payments and the due date for payments. Also, the letter supplied telephone numbers that employees might utilize to ask questions of the Company concerning the insurance matter. However, the letter made no specific reference to premium payments for employees who were on disability due to a job-related injury at the beginning of the strike.

Both sides relied on oral testimony to "flesh out" the written stipulation. Clayton Robinson, financial secretary for Local Union 12014, and Matthew Lee, president for the Local Union, testified for the General Counsel while Frank Haver, the Company's vice president for employee relations, testified on behalf of the Company. There appears to be little conflict in the testimony between the witnesses that related to efforts by the Union to secure health insurance coverage for the bargaining unit employees during the course of the strike, which was continuing at the time of the hearing. To the extent of any differences between the testimony of the witnesses, I find the testimony of Haver more reliable and credible except when specifically noted otherwise. Haver impressed me as having a clearer recall concerning details and dates regarding his contracts with union officials and the content of his remarks to them.

Haver, in his testimony, acknowledged requests by both Lee and Robinson regarding the Union's desire to continue health insurance coverage of the strikers following the beginning of the strike with the strikers paying their own individual premiums. Haver's response to each was that he would check into the matter. The Company's position on the subject was subsequently arrived at and set forth in the letter to employees dated July 4. Haver testified that to be sure that the Union received the information contained in the July 4 letter, Haver called Lee on the morning of July 5 and read the letter to him. At Lee's request Haver met with Lee at a local credit union on or about July 5 to discuss arrangements for striking employees to pay their own insurance premiums. Other attendees at the meeting for the Union were John Griffith, an International representative, committeemen Willie Bush and Harry Griffith, and Clarence Scogin, an insurance broker who was present at the Union's request. Haver also identified Robinson as being there but was less clear about the presence of an International representative named Billy McColeman.[3] In any event, discussions were held regarding whether the credit union could issue a single check to the Company for the strikers' insurance coverage. Haver rejected this proposal insisting that the individual strikers had to pay their respective premiums to ensure that there would be no confusion concerning which employees were actually covered. Haver conceded that during the discussion Scogin raised the issue of coverage of people already off on disability. Haver responded that benefits would not be shut off for those people collecting disability for medical benefits because of an existing medical problem. More specifically, Haver said he advised union officials that employees who were getting disability would continue to get it so long as they were out for the specific illness that caused the disability, and that if they were hospitalized for a specific disability that occurred before June 30, they would still be covered. However, he related that for any unrelated-type illness, the employees would have to pay the premium for that because it was, in effect, new coverage as far as the Company was concerned. Haver conceded in his testimony that Scogin raised the question of whether that was legal, and Haver replied that he did not know, but if there were something illegal about it, they would straighten it out "down the road."

The meeting ended without a specific resolution with respect to how the insurance premiums were to be paid. Nevertheless, as the joint stipulation shows, on July 15, payment of the premiums for July coverage was made in an acceptable manner to the Company. Haver admitted that the premium payments included payments for about four or five employees who were off on disability at the beginning of the strike.

III. ARGUMENTS AND CONCLUSIONS

Based on the facts set forth in the written stipulation and the other facts set forth above, the General Counsel argues that employees on disability were entitled under the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement, article 17, to have their health insurance premiums paid by the Company during the period of their disability. That obligation on the part of the Company, according to the General Counsel, survived the expiration of the collective-bargaining agreement on June 30. Although Respondent and the Union had bargained over health insurance coverage during negotiations regarding a new contract, the Company had not proposed elimination of premium payments for health insurance for employees on disability. There was, therefore, no impasse on the point, and the Company's refusal to pay premiums for employees on disability at the commencement of the strike constituted, the General Counsel argues, a unilateral alteration of the terms and conditions that existed under the preceding contract and thus constituted an unlawful refusal to bargain with the Union in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

The General Counsel concedes that the Company was not obligated by law to continue to make the health insurance premium payments for employees who were on strike. However, the General Counsel argues that the employees who were on disability at the beginning of the strike and who otherwise would have been entitled to have their insurance premiums paid for them because they were on disability were discriminated against in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by the Company. There was no evidence presented that such employees on disability joined or supported the strike before the time that the Company decided to cease premium payments for them. The Company, the General Counsel in effect argues, lumped the employees on disability in with the other employees who were on strike in making its decision to cease premium payments for all employees because of the strike. They penalized the employees who were on disability when the strike began because it put them in a position of having to disavow their support for the strike to have their health insurance premiums paid by Respondent under the provisions of article 17 of the agreement. The General Counsel, citing Emerson Electric Co., 246 NLRB 1143 (1979), enfd. as modified 650 F.2d 463 (3d Cir. 1981), cert. denied 455 U.S. 939 (1982), asserts that the Company could not put employees on disability in a position where they would have to disavow the strike to keep receiving insurance coverage.

The Company contends initially concerning the 8(a)(5) allegation that it made no unilateral change in working conditions. This argument is based essentially on the proposition that the Company was privileged to terminate premium payments for the prospective insurance benefits for disabled employees because, in effect, their status as "active" employees derived from the collective-bargaining agreement and expired with the termination of that agreement. Even assuming, arguendo, that it did make a change in the employees' conditions of employment by requiring employees on disability to make their own premium payments, the Company argues that it did not violate Secction 8(a)(5) of the Act because the Union had notice of the change and failed to request to bargain about the matter. In support of this contention, Respondent cites NLRB v. Sherwin-Williams Co., 714 F.2d 1095 (11th Cir. 1983); NLRB v. J. P. Stevens & Co., 538 F.2d 1152 (5th Cir. 1976); and S & W Motor Lines, 236 NLRB 938 (1978). On the facts here, the Company asserts that the Union was aware on July 4 that Respondent would not pay the insurance premiums for employees on disability, but did not seek to bargain on the subject even though it had at least 10 days before the premiums were due. Thus, the Union had notice and an opportunity to bargain on the Company's action, but failed to do so and thus acquiesced in it.

Regarding the 8(a)(3) allegation, the Company urges that no evidence was shown to establish that Respondent intended to discriminate against employees as a result of the strike. In short, there was no evidence of union animus by the Company. Further, it is urged that the Company's actions were not inherently destructive of employee rights. In this connection, the Company contends that premium payments for prospective insurance coverage was not an accrued benefit under the collective-bargaining agreement. Denial of a prospective benefit, so the argument proceeds, is analogous to nonpayment of wages during a strike, which the Company may not be required to pay. Under the collective-bargaining agreement, payment of the premium is hinged on the employee's continued "active" status during the term of the agreement. Such payments would cease in any event when an employee on disability notifies the employer that he quits. Receipt of disability benefits, on the other hand, was pursuant to agreement between the insurance carrier and the employee and continued regardless of whether the employee receiving the disability benefits continued as an employee. The Company concedes that the disability payments are an accrued benefit. Since the Company concludes that the prospective insurance coverage for disabled employees was not an accrued benefit, its failure to pay the premium for such employees was not inherently destructive of employee rights, and the Company's action in this regard did not discriminate against employees because of the strike.

[3] Lee also placed Robinson at the meeting. However, Robinson, in his testimony, denied that he was present at this meeting. The denial was emphatic and convincing. Accordingly, I find that Haver and Lee were mistaken regarding Robinson's presence at the meeting.

It is well established that an employer violates Section 8(a)(5) of the Act when it institutes changes in conditions of employment without first consulting the employee collective-bargaining representative and giving it an opportunity to bargain on the changes. NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736 (1962). Further, any changes that constitute modification of a collective-bargaining agreement without the consent of the union violates the employer's bargaining obligation. ITT McDonnel & Miller, 267 NLRB 1093 (1983). The Board has authority to construe collective-bargaining agreements and resolve ambiguities to determine whether an employer's action constitutes a unilateral change. NLRB v. Strong Roofing & Insulating Co., 393 U.S. 357 (1969); NLRB v. C & C Plywood Corp., 385 U.S. 421 (1967).

It has long been held that health and welfare plans as well as pension plans under an expired collective-bargaining agreement constitute aspects of employee wages and terms and conditions of employment that survive the expiration of the agreement and cannot be altered without bargaining. See Hen House Market No. 3, 175 NLRB 596 (1969), enfd. 428 F.2d 133 (8th Cir. 1970). Disability plans providing for accident and sick benefits have also been held to be mandatory subjects of bargaining under Section 8(d) of the Act so as to preclude employer unilateral action thereon. McDonnell Douglas Corp., 224 NLRB 881 (1976).

Under article 17 of the expired agreement in the instant case, company-paid group health insurance was to continue for disabled employees during the period when accident and sickness benefits were being paid. There is nothing in the agreement that limits the provision to the term of the agreement, and the Company apparently recognizes this since it conceded that the disability benefits were accrued and payable after termination of the agreement and even after "active" employment ends due to the disabled employee's resignation. Payment of the premium for prospective insurance coverage was clearly incidental to, and part of, the overall disability benefit provided under the agreement. That benefit clearly related to terms and conditions of employment and was, I conclude, a mandatory subject of bargaining. Discontinuance of the insurance premium payment for disabled employees even after expiration of the expired agreement without giving the Union an opportunity to bargain on the subject would therefore violate Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. See Sherwin-Williams, supra. The question presented here then is whether the Union had an opportunity to bargain regarding the Company's cessation of the group insurance for the disabled employees.

It is clear that the Union was not advised before July 5 that the Company did not intend to continue premium payments for group health insurance for those on disability at the beginning of the strike.

Although the Company's July 4 letter was sent to all unit employees, there was nothing in the letter to lead disabled employees to believe that they would have to undertake payment of their own premiums while on disability. Disabled employees were entitled to the belief that the "present circumstances" referred to in the letter pertained to the strike, and since they were not withholding their services to the Company due to the strike, those "circumstances" were not applicable to them. They were further entitled to this belief on the basis of the Company's past action, for the undisputed and thus credited testimony of Lee establishes that at least on one prior occasion, during a contract renewal strike in 1977, the Company had continued to pay the premium for disabled employees during the strike. Accordingly, the letters, I conclude, were not sufficient to put the Union on notice that the refusal to pay the premiums was applicable to disabled employees. Moreover, I find nothing in the inquiries of Lee and Robinson to Haver before the strike, or Haver's responses thereto, that would reasonably serve to put the Union on notice that the Company intended to cease premium payments for disabled employees on commencement of the strike.

It was only at the meeting at the credit union with the union officials on July 5 that Haver made clear that the Company would not make premium payments for group insurance for the disabled employees. Haver's response to the question of legality raised by Scogin at the July 5 meeting was simply to dismiss the issue as something that would be subsequently "straightened out down the road." There was, under these circumstances, I conclude, no real opportunity to bargain about the matter and Haver's brief reply to Scogin's question served to indicate that the matter was not one that Haver was willing to discuss further at that time. Moreover, the Company's decision in this regard was not open to negotiations, as confirmed by Haver's admission that the determination not to pay the premiums for disabled employees was reached on or about July 3, and the Company's contention that the letter dated July 4 to employees on the subject was specifically designed to include disabled employees among those required to pay their own premiums during the strike. Thus, the decision in this regard was announced to employees before it was even made emphatically clear to the Union on July 5 that disabled employees were also to pay their own premiums. Under these circumstances, it is quite clear that the Company's letter of July 4 was simply an announcement of a fait accompli with, I conclude, no realistic opportunity to the Union to negotiate on the subject.

Respondent relies on Sherwin-Williams, supra, in arguing that the facts here establish an opportunity on the part of the Union to bargain concerning the termination of premium payments for the employees on disability during the strike. In the cited case, the Board had held that the employer there had violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by unilaterally changing employee benefits by withholding holiday pay from one of its employees during the course of a strike. The evidence there reflected that on the day following the expiration of the collective-bargaining agreement and on the first day of the strike, the employer notified the union of a cessation of all benefits provided under the expired contract, including apparently the provision that granted holiday pay to employees absent due to disability resulting from an industrial accident. The union protested the employer's announcement in this regard, but the employer adhered to its position. The Board found that the only evidence that the first notice the union actually had of the holiday pay being discontinued for disabled employees was after the fact, and that the union was not afforded an opportunity to negotiate the subject matter before respondent made the change. The Board stated that there was no precedent standing for the proposition that an employer with an outstanding bargaining obligation could unilaterally alter or change an existing benefit that is regarded as a mandatory subject of bargaining without prior notice or bargaining. The court refused to enforce the Board's order and found that the union had an opportunity to bargain on the subject of the holiday pay cessation not only on the day that the employer announced termination of the contract benefits, but also in subsequent bargaining sessions but that, for whatever reason, the union chose not to voice its concern about the termination of benefits. More specifically, the court held that after notifying the union of its withdrawal of benefits under the expired contract, the union had ample opportunity over a period of 2-1/2 months to bargain with the employer regarding the withdrawal of benefits. The court's decision in Sherwin-Williams is indisputably the law of that case. With all due respect, however, to the court's decision, the Board's decision in Sherwin-Williams is reflective of its position in cases of like nature. I am bound by the Board's precedent. See Lenz Co., 153 NLRB 1399 (1965); Iowa Beef Packers, 144 NLRB 615, 616 (1963); and Insurance Agents (Prudential Insurance), 119 NLRB 768, 773 (1957), revd. on other grounds 361 U.S. 477 (1960). In any event, I believe that the instant case may be distinguished from the Sherwin-Williams case, for here Haver's response to Scogin's protest about the legality of the Company's action reveals Haver's and thus the Company's lack of concern about the legality of its actions and demonstrated to the Union that the issue was not one that was subject to bargaining. Moreover, unlike the situation in Sherwin-Williams, the Union here only had 10 days between the date of the Company's announcement that it would not pay the premiums of disabled employees and the date such employees were compelled to pay their own premiums. This was clearly insufficient opportunity for the Union to bargain on the subject, particularly in light of Haver's expressed intention to consider the legality of the Company's action only at some indefinite time "down the road."

For the same reason, the instant case is distinguishable from J. P. Stevens, supra, and S & W Motor Lines, supra, relied on by Respondent. Here Haver's response to the issue of the legality of the Company's action, even if not considered as an outright refusal to bargain on the premium payments, effectively deferred bargaining on the matter, and the Union was not subsequently advised by the Company of a willingness to discuss the subject before the premium payments were due.

Considering the foregoing and the record as a whole, I conclude as argued by the General Counsel, that the Company's announcement that it would not pay the premiums for disabled employees at the beginning of the strike, though there was no evidence presented reflecting that such disabled employees had joined the strike, constituted a unilateral action in derogation of its obligation to notify the Union and give it a meaningful opportunity to bargain on the matter. I, therefore, find, as argued by the General Counsel, that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act in this regard.

The allegation of an 8(a)(3) violation by the Company becomes largely academic in view of the remedy provided hereinafter for the 8(a)(5) violation found above. However, a conclusion concerning the allegation is necessary should the Board conclude that the 8(a)(5) finding is erroneous. In considering the 8(a)(3) violation, it is first apparent, as the Company argues, that there is no evidence of specific union animus in the Company's termination of the premium payments of the disabled employees. Nevertheless, it is clear that termination of the premium payments for such employees was discriminatory with respect to them because it was part and parcel of the Company's decision not to pay the premium for the strikers.[3] In effect, the Company lumped the disabled employees with the strikers. Although the Company was not required to pay premiums for the strikers, its refusal to pay premiums for the disabled employees was directly related to the occurrence of the strike and penalized the disabled employees during the period of their disability although it was not shown that they were withholding their services from the Company because of the strike rather than their respective disabilities.

The Supreme Court has held that if it can be reasonably concluded that an employer's discriminatory conduct is "inherently destructive" of important employees rights, no proof of antiunion motivation is needed, and the Board can find an unfair labor practice even if the employer introduces evidence that the conduct was motivated by business considerations. NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, 388 U.S. 26, 32 (1967). I conclude that the instant case is one in which the "inherently destructive" principle applies. It is quite clear from the record that the Company viewed the disability benefits payable under the expired agreement as accrued benefits for it did not terminate such benefits at either the expiration of the agreement or the commencement of the strike. Payment of the health insurance premium for disabled employees was clearly incidental to the employees eligibility for, and receipt of, disability payments. Payment of the premium was conditioned only on the disabled employees "active" status. A disabled employee's "active" status is not effected by the occurrence of a strike during the period of his disability. So long as the disabled employee retained employment status he was entitled to have his premium payment made for him by the Company. Indeed, even the Company during the 1977 strike apparently viewed the premium payment as an accrued benefit since it continued such payments for disabled employees during that strike. Accordingly, I conclude that the payment of group health insurance premiums for disabled employees was an accrued benefit under the expired agreement. Such payments constituted an element of the disability benefits that was clearly analogous to payment for past work performed. There is no evidence that they were in any way dependent on future services and, insofar as this record shows, they were due and payable for the disabled employees so long as they continued in their disability and remained employees.

[3] The Company does not contend, and the evidence does not otherwise establish, that the Company would have discontinued premium payments for all its employees had there been no strike. Certainly, under the authority cited, the Company could not unilaterally have ceased such payments. Only the occurrence of the strike and its effect on the "active" employment status of the strikers excused the Company's refusal to pay their premiums.

In Emerson Electric, supra, the Third Circuit Court of Appeals held that termination of accrued disability benefits to employees before any showing that they affirmatively supported a strike evinces an intent on the part of the employer to discourage employees from exercising their Section 7 rights by coercing them to refrain from supporting a strike and retaliates against them in a discriminatory manner for their presumed, but not established, support of the strike. Such discrimination, according to the court, lasts for the duration of the employee's disability. The principles set forth by the court in Emerson Electric were followed by the Board in Conoco, Inc., 265 NLRB 819 (1982). More recently in Texaco, Inc. v. NLRB, 700 F.2d 1039 (5th Cir. 1983), the court enforced a Board order finding a violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act in Texaco, Inc., 259 NLRB 1217 (1982), followed the principles of Emerson Electric to the extent of deciding the "core question" whether an employer could in effect force a disabled worker to join a strike, absent disavowal, by canceling accident and sick benefits that would otherwise be available to the employee. The court held that the employer could not lawfully do so, and reached this conclusion without regard to whether the benefits were accrued.

On the record in the instant case, I have concluded that the premium payment for disabled employees was an accrued benefit like the disability benefits to which such payment was incidental. The Company's refusal to pay that benefit was, I find, because its employees engaged in a strike, and the Company presumed that the disabled employees supported the strike, thereby effecting their "active" status under the terms of the expired agreement. The net effect was discrimination against one group of employees because another group engaged in activity protected under the Act, a strike. I conclude that the Company's action in this regard was inherently destructive of employee rights under the Act and, therefore, violative of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent Jim Walter Resources, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union, United Steelworkers of America, AFL-CIO-CLC, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The Union is the collective-bargaining representative of a majority of Respondent's employees in the following appropriate unit, which unit is appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All production and maintenance employees employed by Respondent at its by-products plant, energy plant, Mary Lee department, blast furnace, slag plant, mineral wool, vehicle maintenance and chemical plant, but excluding all foremen, salaried clerks, technical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

4. By discontinuing group insurance premium payments for its employees, including William R. Foster, James Crisler, and Roy Owen, on July 1, 1983, as a result of the strike occurring on that date while such employees were receiving disability benefits, Respondent discriminated against such employees in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

5. By unilaterally, without notice to or bargaining with the Union, changing the terms and conditions of employment of employees in the unit listed above by discontinuing group insurance premiums payments on disability as of July 1, 1983, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. The aforesaid violations of the Act constitute unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor pratices, I find it necessary to order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5), (3), and (1) of the Act when it refused to pay group insurance premiums for employees on disability on expiration of the former collective-bargaining agreement and on commencement of a strike on July 1, 1983, by other employees, and to restore the status quo ante existing before the violation, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to make such employees whole, with interest, for any losses occasioned by them as a result of Respondent's failure to pay the premiums for them during the period of their disability. This make-whole remedy is to be interpreted to require reimbursement of those employees, with interest, for premiums paid by them during the period of disability that would have been paid for them but for the Company's unilateral action. Interest is to be computed in the manner prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1962).[4]

Moreover, to complete the restoration of the status quo ante, it shall be ordered that Respondent reinstate the program for paying premiums for disabled employees and henceforth bargain with the Union over termination of such payments.

[Recommended Order omitted from publication.]

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On May 3, 1983, Administrative Law Judge Thomas R. Wilks issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Federacion General de Trabajadores de Puerto Rico (Federacion) filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

1. The judge found that unilateral changes in wage rates and other terms and conditions of employment, which were implemented by Respondent Hotel on March 9 and June 14, 1982, did not violate Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act and, therefore, that the Hotel did not violate Section 8(a)(3) and (1) by conditioning continued employment of unit employees on their explicit acceptance of those changes.[3] In reaching these conclusions the judge found that the General Counsel did not sustain the burden of proving that the Hotel did not bargain in good faith to impasse. The judge further found that the Federacion had been presented with sufficient opportunity to bargain about the changes, but waived its bargaining rights by a lack of diligence in demanding and pursuing bargaining. Based on these findings, the judge did not find it necessary to address whether, following the lawful rejection in bankruptcy of a collective-bargaining agreement, an employer must, on request, bargain to impasse prior to implementing new terms and conditions of employment.

We agree with the judge's conclusion that the Hotel's unilateral changes were lawful, but we do so on the basis of the analysis set forth in NLRB v. Bildisco & Bildisco, 465 U.S. 513 (1984), which issued after the judge's decision. In Bildisco the Supreme Court held that from the filing of a petition in bankruptcy until formal rejection, a collective-bargaining agreement is not an enforceable contract within the meaning of Section 8(d) of the Act. The Court thus held that a debtor-in-possession does not commit an unfair labor practice by unilaterally rejecting or modifying a collective-bargaining agreement after the filing of a petition but prior to court-approved rejection.[4]

In the instant case the Hotel and the Federacion were parties to a collective-bargaining agreement that was effective from May 1, 1977, until April 30, 1980. On May 20, 1980, the Hotel filed a petition for reorganization under Chapter 11 of the United States Bankruptcy Code. On June 23, 1980, the parties agreed to extend the collective-bargaining agreement to April 30, 1983. Thereafter, on October 5, 1981, the Hotel filed an application to reject the collective-bargaining agreement; on November 12, 1981, the bankruptcy court approved the rejection; and on March 8, 1982, the Hotel rejected the agreement. Thus, the Hotel's unilateral changes of March 9 and June 14, 1982, which occurred after court-approved rejection of the collective-bargaining agreement, were clearly implemented when the agreement was no longer an enforceable contract under Section 8(d). See Bildisco, above. Accordingly, we find that the unilateral changes were lawful and, therefore, that it was not unlawful for the

[1] The name of the Federacion appears as set forth in the complaint.

[2] The General Counsel has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

On August 18, 1983, the bankruptcy trustee for the Hotel filed a motion requesting stay of proceedings, in which he noted that the Hotel's Chapt. 11 petition was converted to Chapt. 7 on March 24, 1983. We deny the trustee's motion on the grounds that the Board's proceedings fall within the exceptions to the automatic stay provisions of the U.S. Bankruptcy Code. See 11 U.S.C § 362 (b)(4), (b)(5); Phoenix Co., 274 NLRB 995 (1985); J & B Smith Co., 280 NLRB 537 (1986).

In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

[3] The March 9 unilateral changes included, inter alia, reduced pay rates, shorter break periods, and discontinuance of deductions for union dues and the pension plan. The June 14 changes involved only a wage reduction.

[4] We are mindful that the Bankruptcy Amendments and Federal Judgeship Act of 1984, enacted by Congress on July 10, 1984, modifies Bildisco and governs a debtor-in-possession's rejection of a collective-bargaining agreement. The statute does not apply, however, to cases such as this in which the bankruptcy petition was filed prior to the enactment of the statute. Pub. L. 98–353 § 541, 98 Stat. 333, 390–391 (1984).

289 NLRB No. 164

Hotel to condition continued employment on the employees' acceptance of those changes.[5]

2. The judge found that Respondent Hotel did not violate Section 8(a)(3) and (1) by discharging employee Maldonado in connection with a leaflet that was distributed to employees and made available to hotel patrons on June 17, 1982. In this regard, the judge, relying on the line of cases beginning with NLRB v. Electrical Workers IBEW Local 1229 (Jefferson Standard), 341 U.S. 694 (1953), found that the leaflet was unprotected under the Act. The leaflet read as follows:

> June 16, 1982
> To All Employees of Hotel San Juan
> Hereby we wish to invite all fellow workers of all the departments of the hotel to attend an informative protest picket, which will take place on Monday, June 21, 1982, at 10:00 a.m., due to the irresponsible manner in which Mr. Hector Rodriguez Estrada, trustee of the hotel, is administering the same; and to make publicly known the abuses that this individual is committing against us employees who are doing our best to keep this Hotel operating.
> Fellow Workers: let us defend what is ours, which we have obtained through 25 years of work and sacrifice. Let's not allow this Dictator to close the Hotel. Which has been his desire since he started to operate the same, this has been said by the latter on different occasions "that it is to his advantage to close to [sic] Hotel rather than keep it open," inasmuch as by selling it, he will earn 2% of the total sale (price). This man has turned into the Robin Hood of the Rich, taking the wages away from the poor in order to pay a multimillionaire company.
> Fellow workers: We'll see you on Monday, June 21, 1982, at 10:00 a.m.

Specifically, the judge found that the leaflet injured the trustee's personal status; dissuaded customers from patronizing the Hotel by portraying it as being mismanaged in order to justify closing it; and contained assertions regarding the trustee's intentions to sell the Hotel that were either deliberately and maliciously false or made in reckless disregard of the truth. The judge further found that the Hotel had reasonable cause to believe that employee Maldonado authorized the leaflet or, at a minimum, was responsible for its distribution. In view of these findings, the judge concluded that Maldonado's discharge for distributing the leaflet was not unlawful. We find merit in the General Counsel's exceptions in which she contends that the judge improperly assessed the content of the leaflet and that the leaflet was, in fact, protected.

The Supreme Court in Jefferson Standard, above, held that employee conduct involving a disparagement of an employer's product, rather than publicizing a labor dispute, is not protected. As Jefferson Standard and subsequent Board cases show, there is sometimes a fine line between raising highly sensitive issues that relate to terms and conditions of employment and those that relate to disparaging an employer's reputation. The leaflet found unprotected in Jefferson Standard was an employee handbill that contained a "vitriolic" attack on the quality of the employer's television broadcasts and management policies. It made no reference to the pending labor dispute between the parties or to wages, hours, or working conditions; and it was not an appeal for public sympathy or support. Employees distributed the handbill on their picket line and on public property. Similarly, in Sahara Datsun, 278 NLRB 1044 (1986), enfd. 811 F.2d 1317 (9th Cir. 1987), the Board found that an employee's statements that the employer falsified customer credit applications, which were made to the bank that granted financing to the employer's customers, were unprotected. The Board found that the statements, although related to terms and conditions of employment, were, nevertheless, unsubstantiated assertions that could have ruined a longstanding business relationship based on trust and fair dealing. Sahara Datsun, above. On the other hand, the Board in Veeder-Root Co., 237 NLRB 1175 (1978), found that employee literature that was phrased in general political terms but made particular reference to the employer's activities regarding its employees and ended with the demand "FIGHT WAGE CUTS AND SPEED-UP!" was sufficiently related to wages, hours, and conditions of employment to be protected.

[5] The Court in Bildisco made clear that a debtor-in-possession had a continuing obligation to recognize and bargain with the employees' certified representative over the terms of a new contract pending rejection of an existing contract or following formal approval of rejection by the bankruptcy court. In the instant case, it is clear that the March 9 changes were inextricably tied to the March 8 rejection of the contract. We further find that the Hotel's unilateral changes of June 14 were lawful even if implemented pursuant to negotiations for a new contract as to which good-faith bargaining to impasse was required. For the limited purpose of this finding we adopt the judge's conclusion that the Federacion had sufficient opportunity to bargain about the changes, but waived its bargaining rights by a lack of due diligence.

The complaint was amended at the hearing to allege that the Hotel bypassed the Federacion and dealt directly with its unit employees by asking them to accept the unilateral changes in terms and conditions of employment. Generally, an employer's attempts to deal directly with employees rather than their designated bargaining representative concerning terms and conditions of employment violates Sec. 8(a)(5). Krolicki Wholesale Meats, 270 NLRB 941 (1984), enfd. 763 F.2d 215 (6th Cir. 1985). Here, however, we find that the Hotel's direct dealing was an effort to implement the lawful unilateral changes. We further find that by failing to pursue its bargaining rights with due diligence the Federacion waived its right to object on the basis of direct dealing. See Hiysota Fuel Co., 280 NLRB 763 (1986) (union waived right to object to direct dealing concerning the employer's unilateral implementation of new terms under Bildisco; the employer had sought to bargain over those terms, but the union refused to negotiate and the employer faced severe time constraints with respect to resuming operations).

In Veeder-Root, the Board also acknowledged that some cases approach the issue "from the viewpoint of the innate propriety of the activity, even though the activity is clearly related to wages, hours, working conditions, or grievances arising out of these conditions." 237 NLRB at 1177. For example, although the Act protects statements that are false, misleading, or inaccurate, as well as rhetorical hyperbole that is likely to be recognized for what it is, the Act does not protect information that is "deliberately or maliciously false," or made with "reckless disregard for the truth." See National Steel Corp., 236 NLRB 1033, 1035–1036 (1978), enfd. 625 F.2d 131 (6th Cir. 1980). The Board's decision in New York University Medical Center, 261 NLRB 822 (1982), provides an example of how the Board applies this standard in an effort to balance the right of employees to organize and the right of employers to maintain discipline in their establishments. In that case the Board found that the assertion "[T]he NYU bosses have turned their security guards into a fascist gestapo illegally searching workers and firing them" was not deliberately or maliciously false because it was based on employee reports that the employer's guards were searching black and Hispanic employees.

In the instant case we conclude that the leaflet clearly is protected. We find initially that the leaflet does not involve an unlawful disparagement of an employer's product; in this regard, the leaflet is addressed "to all employees" rather than to customers, and seeks not to damage the hotel's reputation but to prevent its closure. Cf. Jefferson Standard, above; Sahara Datsun, above. Further, the leaflet concerns an ongoing labor dispute between the parties and refers specifically to abuses "against us employees" and to "wages." Veeder-Root, above.

We further find that there is nothing "innately improper" about the leaflet. It is factually accurate that the trustee would earn a 2-percent commission if the Hotel were sold and, as found by the judge, the trustee did not explicitly deny Maldonado's testimony that he had threatened to sell the Hotel if pressured by demands from the Federacion. Under the circumstances, we find that the leaflet's assertion that the trustee would benefit from the sale of the Hotel is not deliberately false or misleading or made in reckless disregard of the truth. New York University Medical Center, above. We additionally find that the leaflet's references to the trustee as a "Dictator" and as "Robin Hood" are obvious rhetorical hyperbole. Accordingly, we reverse the judge and find that the leaflet was protected under Section 7 of the Act and, therefore, that Maldonado's discharge in connection with the distribution of the leaflet violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

3. The judge found that on June 17, 1982, the Hotel's employees commenced a protected economic strike. Specifically, the judge found that the employees began the strike, which was not authorized by the Federacion, to protest both Maldonado's discharge and reductions in their contractual benefits. Based on his prior findings that the discharge and the Hotel's unilateral changes were not unlawful, the judge found that the strike did not commence as an unfair labor practice strike but as economic activity.

The judge then addressed the Hotel's contentions that, as economic activity, the strike was unprotected because it violated the no-strike clause of the expired collective-bargaining agreement and was in derogation of the unit employees' bargaining relationship with the Federacion. Regarding the alleged breach of the no-strike clause, the judge initially found the rejected contract was terminated in its entirety and, therefore, that the no-strike clause did not survive by virtue of any partial survival of the contract itself. Addressing the issue of postexpiration arbitrability, the judge then found, citing Goya Foods, 238 NLRB 1465 (1978), that in the "normal bargaining stance," postexpiration survival of the no-strike clause is coterminous with survival of the obligation to arbitrate. The judge questioned, however, whether the presumption of postexpiration arbitrability set forth in Nolde Bros. v. Bakery Workers Local 358, 430 U.S. 243 (1977), is applicable when the contract expires not by its own terms, but by the extraordinary event of formal rejection in bankruptcy. In any event, on the specific facts of this case, the judge found it unnecessary to decide whether the no-strike clause survived the contract's rejection. In particular, the judge found that the nonarbitrable objects of the strike, involving a protest against reductions in salary and benefits, were so intertwined with what he viewed as the arbitrable issue of Maldonado's discharge that the dispute was not appropriate for arbitration and, therefore, that the strike would not breach the no-strike clause even if the clause had survived. The judge further found that even if the strikers—who constituted a large majority of the unit employees—sought recognition of the Union as their exclusive bargaining representative, the strike, although not authorized by the Federacion, was not in derogation of the exclusive bargaining status of the Federacion. In this regard the judge found, citing Emporium Capwell Co. v. Western Addition Community Organization, 420 U.S. 50 (1975), that the employees here did not seek parallel bargaining, but a total replacement of their bargaining agent during the period of contract negotiations.[6] Although we agree with the judge's finding that the strike was lawful, we find merit in the General Counsel's contention that the employees commenced an unfair labor practice strike rather than an economic strike.

The relevant facts are fully set forth in the judge's decision. In brief, as the Hotel attempted to negotiate changes in its contract with the Federacion to relieve its financial distress, the unit employees began to lose confidence in the Federacion as their bargaining representative. In December 1981 they hired an attorney to advise them regarding the formation of a new union. Employee Maldonado was a leader in this employee movement.[7] As indicated above, on June 17, 1982, Maldonado was discharged for distributing a leaflet alleging mismanagement on the part of the trustee and urging employees to attend an "informative protest picket" on June 21. That evening, both the day- and night-shift employees commenced a work stoppage. On June 18, the day after Maldonado's discharge, about 40 to 45 of the approximately 50 unit employees began picketing with signs. Some of the picket signs stated, "We Won't Enter Without Miguel";[8] the remaining signs reflected the language and tone of the June 17 leaflets. The strike was not authorized by the Federacion. An employee delegate told Federacion Agents Vega and Nicot, who learned of the strike from the trustee, that the employees were striking because of Maldonado's discharge.

As set forth above, we have found, contrary to the judge, that Maldonado's discharge violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. We further find that the discharge was the immediate precipitating cause of the strike. In so finding, we note that the picketing occurred a full 3 days prior to the scheduled June 21 protest of the reduction in contractual wages, and employee statements to Vega and Nicot indicated that the employees struck to protest the discharge. Accordingly, we find that the Hotel's employees commenced an unfair labor practice strike on June 17, 1982.

We agree with the judge, however, that the strike was protected. The Hotel formally rejected its collective-bargaining agreement in March 1982, prior to the strike. Thereafter, contrary to the Federacion's contentions in its exceptions, the agreement ceased to exist in its entirety. See 2 Collier on Bankruptcy, Chapt. 365.03 (15th ed. 1987) (an executory contract cannot be assumed in part and rejected in part).[9] Therefore, as the judge found, the no-strike clause in the parties' collective-bargaining agreement did not survive by virtue of any partial survival of the contract.[10]

We also agree with the judge that even if the employees were seeking recognition of the Union as their exclusive bargaining representative, the strike did not amount to the kind of demand for "separate bargaining" found unprotected in Emporium Capwell, above, 420 U.S. at 61, 66–70, i.e., a demand by a discrete group of employees that an employer deal with them regarding some particular contractual grievance, notwithstanding that the union which they acknowledge to be the unchallenged unit representative takes a contrary position on the matter. As the Supreme Court noted in Emporium Capwell, a union could not lawfully "bargain away the employees' statutory right to choose a new, or to have no, bargaining representative." Id. at 64 fn. 14 citing NLRB v. Magnavox Co., 415 U.S. 322 (1974). Insofar as the employees here sought recognition of the Union as their bargaining representative, in place of the Federacion, this could reasonably be viewed as merely an effort to rebut the presumption of continuing majority status that, pursuant to Bildisco, the Federacion enjoyed following the collective-bargaining agreement's rejection in bankruptcy. We do not read Emporium Capwell as insulating an incumbent union from such employee efforts.[11] Accordingly, we find that the employees' unfair labor practice strike did not lose its protection under the Act.[12] [6] In Emporium Capwell, the Court held that the exclusivity principle of Sec. 9(a) of the Act proscribes attempts by a minority of employees to engage in separate bargaining with their employer.

[7] In early June 1982 the unit employees formed the Union de Empleados de Casinos de Puerto Rico (the Union) and elected Maldonado as their president. The General Counsel stated in her opening argument that the Union filed a representation petition on June 11, 1982. Thereafter on October 1, 1982, the Federacion and the Hotel executed a new collective-bargaining agreement that was submitted to the bankruptcy court for approval on October 4. We note that this collective-bargaining agreement would not bar the Union's prior June 1982 petition. Therefore, we shall delete from the judge's recommended Order that provision precluding a finding of contract bar on the grounds of the Federacion's unlawful conduct with respect to the discharge of the striking employees, as described below.

[8] It is undisputed that the signs referred to Miguel Maldonado.

[9] The Federacion, although acknowledging this bankruptcy principle, contends that here the testimony of the parties, the language of the contract, and public policy warrant a finding that a part of the collective-bargaining agreement survived rejection and, therefore, that the Federacion remained the exclusive bargaining representative of the striking employees. The Federacion further contends that the Board should depart from bankruptcy precedent and find that the agreement here was only partially rejected in order to prevent its exclusive bargaining status from being undermined for reasons unrelated to its performance as a labor organization. In this regard, the Federacion maintains that the disruption of established bargaining relationships caused by total rejection is especially damaging in the context of an attempted reorganization under Chapter 11. The Federacion's arguments do not persuade us to depart from established bankruptcy precedent.

[10] Moreover, we agree with the judge's conclusion, although not all his reasoning, that the strike would not breach the no-strike clause of the expired agreement under an analysis of postexpiration arbitrability.

We have found that the employees commenced an unfair labor practice strike. In Mastro Plastics Corp. v. NLRB, 350 U.S. 270 (1956), the Supreme Court held that a no-strike clause in a collective-bargaining agreement does not waive the employees' right to strike against an employer for unfair labor practices. In Arlan's Department Store, 133 NLRB 802 (1961), the Board limited the application of this rule to "serious" unfair labor practices. See Studio 44, Inc., 284 NLRB 597 (1987); Goodie Brand Packing Corp., 283 NLRB 673 (1987). In the instant case we do not have to reach this precise issue. In this regard we find that even if Maldonado's discharge was not a "serious" unfair labor practice—or, alternatively, even if the strike was economic activity—the strike did not breach the no-strike clause of the expired collective-bargaining agreement. In this case there is no indication that the parties did not intend the arbitration and no-strike clauses of the contract to have coterminous application. See Goya Foods, above. Further, the Board recently has held that postexpiration disputes concerning employee discharges, like that of Maldonado, do not "arise under" the expired contract within the meaning of Nolde, above, and are, therefore, not arbitrable. Indiana & Michigan Electric Co., 284 NLRB 53 (1987); American Gypsum Co., 285 NLRB 100 (1987). Thus, it follows under Goya Foods that the Hotel's employees were not bound by an agreement not to strike regarding the nonarbitrable issue of Maldonado's discharge. Further, although we recognize that another underlying cause of the strike, as indicated in the June 18 leaflets and on picket signs, was employee concern with reduced wages and benefits, we find in agreement with the judge that these matters also are not subject to postexpiration arbitration and, therefore, not subject to a coterminous duty not to strike.

Member Johansen finds it unnecessary to reach the issue of the duty to arbitrate postexpiration grievances under Indiana & Michigan Electric, above.

4. The judge found that Respondent Hotel violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by entering into an agreement with the Federacion to condition reinstatement of the striking employees on abandonment of their strike activity and on continued recognition of the Federacion as their exclusive bargaining agent, and violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discharging those employees who failed to comply with the conditions. The judge further found that Respondent Federacion violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act by entering into and enforcing the agreement, and violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) by its June 19, 1982 letter to the striking employees that threatened loss of employment if the strikers failed to comply with the conditions. Although we have found that the employees commenced an unfair labor practice strike, we agree with the judge, for the reasons set forth by him, that the conditions on reinstatement and the discharge of the striking employees, because of their refusal to comply with those conditions, were unlawful.[13]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that

A. Respondent San Juan Hotel Corporation d/b/a El San Juan Hotel, Carolina, Puerto Rico, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Either individually or by agreement with Respondent Federacion General de Trabajadores de Puerto Rico, or any other labor organization, conditioning the nondischarge of its employees on their abandonment of a lawful unfair labor practice strike or other concerted activity for their mutual aid or protection or on any other unlawful condition.

(b) Discharging or otherwise discriminating against employees because they have engaged in a lawful unfair labor practice strike or other concerted activity for their mutual aid or protection or because they refuse to accept any unlawful condition on their continued employment.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action designed to effectuate the purposes and policies of the Act.

(a) Offer to Miguel A. Maldonado and to the employees named in Appendix C, attached, full and immediate reinstatement to their former jobs or, if such jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority and other rights and privileges, dismissing, if necessary, any employees hired as replacements for the positions. Respondent Hotel shall jointly and severally with Respondent Federacion General de Trabajadores de Puerto Rico make them whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered by reason of the discrimination against them in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the judge's decision.

(b) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful discharges and notify the employees in writing that this has been done and that the discharges will not be used against them in any way.

[11] For similar reasons this strike would not fall into the category of strikes that are unprotected because they are unauthorized or "wildcat" strikes in derogation of the authority of the acknowledged and unchallenged bargaining unit representative regarding strike action. See Buck Brown Contracting Co., 283 NLRB 488 and fn. 7 (1987). Where, as here, there is no collective-bargaining agreement in effect, it is inconsistent with employee free choice to require that employees obtain authority from the bargaining representative in order to engage in a strike that, in part, expresses employees' disclaimers of support for that representative.

[12] We note that the Board in Colonial Haven Nursing Home, 218 NLRB 1007 (1975), modified 542 F.2d 691 (7th Cir. 1976), held that striking employees did not lose their status as unfair labor practice strikers—and the attendant rights of reinstatement—because an object of the strike may also have been to obtain recognition and, to carry out this purpose, their picketing may have constituted a "technical" violation of Sec. 8(b)(7)(C). See also Rapid Armored Truck Corp., 281 NLRB 371 (1986). There is no allegation in this case that the employees' picketing violated Sec. 8(b)(7)(C).

[13] We note that, even if the strike constituted economic activity, as found by the judge, the unlawful inducements would have converted the strike into an unfair labor practice strike. See La Famosa Foods, 282 NLRB 316 (1986). Further, it is well settled that unfair labor practice strikers are entitled to immediate reinstatement to their former positions or, if such are not available, to substantially equivalent positions on their unconditional offers to return, even when the employer must terminate strike replacements to make positions available for them. Workroom for Designers, 274 NLRB 840, 856 (1985).

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its Carolina, Puerto Rico hotel copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix A."[14] Copies of the notice written in English and Spanish, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 24, after being signed by Respondent Hotel's authorized representative, shall be posted by Respondent Hotel immediately upon receipt, and be maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent Hotel to insure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) On being furnished the same by the Regional Director, post the notice marked "Appendix B" in the same manner as "Appendix A."

(f) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

B. Respondent Federacion General de Trabajadores de Puerto Rico, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Threatening employees with the loss of their jobs by enforcement of an agreement with Respondent Hotel which conditions their continued employment on the abandonment of a lawful unfair labor practice strike or other concerted activities for their mutual aid or protection or on any other unlawful condition.

(b) Entering into, maintaining, or enforcing an agreement with Respondent Hotel whereby employees' continued employment is conditioned on their abandonment of a lawful unfair labor practice strike or other concerted activities for their mutual aid or protection or on any other unlawful condition.

(c) In any like or related manner restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Jointly and severally with Respondent Hotel make whole Miguel A. Maldonado and the employees named in Appendix C, attached, for any loss of earnings they may have suffered by reason of the discrimination against them in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the judge's decision.

(b) Post in its offices and meeting halls copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix B"[15] (in English and Spanish). Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 24, after being signed by Respondent Federacion's authorized representative, shall be posted by Respondent Federacion immediately upon receipt, and be maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent Federacion and its agents to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Forward to the Regional Director signed copies of "Appendix B" for posting by Respondent Hotel at its Carolina, Puerto Rico hotel for 60 consecutive days in places where notices to employees are customarily posted.

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX A

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT either individually or by agreement with Federacion General de Trabajadores de Puerto Rico, or any other labor organization, condition the nondischarge of our employees on their abandonment of a lawful unfair labor practice strike or other concerted activity for their mutual aid or protection or on any other unlawful condition.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

THOMAS R. WILKS, Administrative Law Judge. The trial in this case was held before me in Hato Rey, Puerto Rico, on October 19-22, 1982. On June 18 and 28, 1982,[1] Union de Empleados de Casinos de Puerto Rico (the Union) filed charges in Cases 24-CA-4463 and 24-CA-4667, respectively, alleging that San Juan Hotel Corporation d/b/a El San Juan Hotel (Respondent Hotel) committed unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. Thereafter, on July 21, a consolidated complaint and notice of hearing issued alleging that Respondent Hotel violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by threatening its employees with discharge and other reprisals for having engaged in protected concerted activity, discharging an employee because of his union or other protected concerted activity, conditioning the reinstatement of its striking employees on their reaffirmation of Federacion General de Trabajadores de Puerto Rico (Respondent Federacion) as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of Respondent's casino employees and, finally, discharging 48 employees because the employees participated in a strike caused and prolonged by Respondent Hotel's unfair labor practices.

On July 16, Respondent Federacion filed a charge in Case 24-CA-4676 alleging, in essence, that Respondent Hotel committed unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. On August 12, an order further consolidating cases, complaint, and notice of hearing issued consolidating Case 24-CA-4676 with the above-described case, alleging that Respondent Hotel violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) by unilaterally changing, eliminating, reducing, or otherwise modifying existing wage rates and other terms and conditions of employment of its casino employees, and by threatening employees with layoff or discharge if they did not accept said unilateral changes.

Thereafter, on September 20, the Union filed a charge in Case 24-CB-1179 alleging that Respondent Federacion committed unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act. Pursuant to that charge, an order further consolidating cases, complaint, and notice of hearing issued on September 30 alleging, in essence, that Respondent Federacion entered into an agreement with Respondent Hotel to condition the reinstatement of striking employees on the employees' reaffirmation of Respondent Federacion as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the casino employees and, as a result of that agreement, caused Respondent Hotel to discharge its striking employees who refused to comply with that requirement.

Thereafter, at the trial, pursuant to a notice of intention to amend complaints, the consolidated complaint was further amended to allege that Respondent Hotel bypassed the Union and dealt directly with its casino employees by requesting the casino employees to accept the unilateral changes described above. The complaints were further amended to reflect that Respondent Hotel's unilateral changes in terms and conditions of employment of its casino employees, in addition to the discharge of an employee, were motivating factors that caused and prolonged the unfair labor practice strike.

On August 2 and 23, Respondent Hotel and, on October 11, Respondent Federacion filed answers that denied the commission of any unfair labor practices.

At the trial the parties were afforded full opportunity to participate, to present relevant, material, and competently adduced evidence, and to argue orally. Briefs were subsequently filed by the parties on or about January 14, 1983.

On the entire record in this case, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and in consideration of all the briefs, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE RESPONDENT HOTEL

Respondent Hotel, a corporation duly organized under, and existing by virtue of, the laws of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, has maintained its principal office and place of business at Isla Verde Road, Carolina, Puerto Rico, where it is and has been at all times material continuously engaged in providing facilities for lodging, entertainment, food, beverage, and related services. During a period representative of its annual operations generally, Respondent, in the course and conduct of its operations, derived gross revenues therefrom in excess of $500,000 and purchased and caused to be transported and delivered to its place of business, foodstuffs, beverages, and other goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 that were transported and delivered to its place of business in interstate commerce directly from places located outside the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico.

It is admitted, and I find, that Respondent is, and has been at all times material, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATIONS

It is admitted, and I find, that the Federacion is, and has been at all times material, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

In the complaint issued on July 21, 1982, in Cases 24-CA-4663 and 24-CA-4667, the Union is also alleged to have been at all material times a labor organization within the meaning of the Act. However, Respondent's subsequent answer denied that allegation. Based on uncontradicted evidence in the record, I find that the Union at all times material is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Facts

1. Unilateral changes

Respondent Hotel has for many years operated as one of the San Juan area's prominent resort hotels. There is no dispute that by 1980 it had entered into a situation of financial distress, and that thereafter its conduct that is alleged to be violative of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act was motivated not by unlawful discrimination, but rather that it was motivated by economic considerations, i.e., business survival.

[1] All dates herein are for the year 1982 unless otherwise noted.

A petition for reorganization under Chapter XI of the U.S. Bankruptcy Act was filed with the U.S. Bankruptcy Court by the Respondent on May 20, 1980. On July 10, 1980, the court appointed as operating trustee of Respondent Hotel, Hector Rodriguez Estrada, who is a member of the trustee board of the U.S. Bankruptcy Court. His function was directed to the operation and financial rehabilitation of the hotel. After having studied the hotel's operations, the trustee commenced on a course of instituting various cost-saving stratagems involving, e.g., the elimination of executive and managerial positions and unprofitable shops, restaurants, bars, etc.

The trustee then returned his attention to all nonmanagerial positions. He became aware that the hotel's employees were represented by labor organizations in separate units and covered by existing separate collective-bargaining agreements. The trustee discovered that one of these contracts was with Local 610 of the Gastronomical Workers Union, and was the subject of a petition for rejection filed by Respondent with the bankruptcy court the day preceding the trustee's own appointment. The trustee arranged to meet with Local 610 leaders in order to avoid the need for court rejection of their labor contracts. In October 1980, after negotiations, an agreement was reached with that labor organization, whereunder economic concessions were granted. The new agreement was approved by the bankruptcy court.

In addition to Local 610, the Federacion also represented certain employees of Respondent Hotel. In 1974, it had been certified by the Board as exclusive collective-bargaining agent for two separate units. In unit 1 were included all croupiers employed by Respondent at its hotel casino or gaming room, but excluding: all other employees, employees in the service and maintenance unit, casino cashiers, runners, waiters and doorman, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act. In unit 2 were included all casino cashiers and runners employed by the Respondent at its hotel casino or gaming room, but excluding all other employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act. The Respondent and the Federacion had entered into a collective-bargaining agreement effective from May 1977 until April 30, 1980, the terms of which covered the following unit:

> Included: all croupiers, cashiers and runners employed by the Casino of Hotel San Juan, in Isla Verde, Puerto Rico.
> Excluded: all other employees, office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the National Labor Relations Act.

On June 23, 1980, the Respondent had, by written agreement, extended the terms of its Federacion contract to April 1983.

Having received economic relief from Local 610, the trustee sought to discover other areas of effectuating economics. He had received information that the croupiers were opposed to economic reductions. However, the casino managers had agreed to certain concessions, and job vacancies were left unfilled. The outset of the 1980–1981 winter tourist season was at hand, and the trustee decided to evaluate the results of that season before acting further. March 1981 marked the end of the tourist season that proved to be financially disappointing. The trustee testified without contradiction that he next communicated with Federacion leaders and expressed the necessity for economic relief from its collective-bargaining obligations, to assure a continuation of operations and employment for all hotel employees.

According to the trustee's uncontradicted testimony, after a series of meetings concerning contractual concessions between the trustee and the union leaders, i.e., President Luis G. Nicot; Secretary-Treasurer Marcos Vega Robles; and employee delegates Miguel A. Maldonado Freites, Alfredo Battista, and Jorge Blanco. On September 24, 1981, the Respondent distributed to the unit employees a memorandum addressed to them that, inter alia, set forth its claim of financial distress, and stated further:

> At this time we are asking you, the Casino Union members, who earn more than twice as much as other hotel employees, and who are among the higher paid workers in Puerto Rico to also make sacrifices, to help keep your jobs as well as the jobs of the other hotel employees.
> Union Reply
> This situation was explained to your Union leader and delegates. The Union leader said he would not negotiate any changes in the contract. When it was suggested that the union members should have the opportunity to decide if they preferred to have the present contract, but no jobs, or have jobs with a modified contract, a delegate replied that they would make the decision for you.
>
> Next Steps
> During the week of September 28th, the Company will file a motion in Court to reject the contract, effective October 5, 1981. On Monday, October 5th the changes we have proposed will become effective. When you report to work, it will be under the new conditions.
> We are of course willing to negotiate with your union. However, their refusal to negotiate leaves us no choice, but to proceed as we are doing. This is in your interest as well as ours, as this is the only way we can save your jobs.

The memorandum referred to the existing contract as a "classic example of featherbedding" and entered specific areas of alleged "abuse."

On October 5, 1981, an application for rejection of collective-bargaining agreement was filed by Respondent with the Honorable Antonio I. Hernandez Rodriguez, judge of bankruptcy court. The petition set forth a claim that the Federacion contract would be onerous and detrimental to the estate and in particular it enumerated as such 15 specific areas of performance:

1. The restrictive scheduling of hours.
2. The lunch period duration.
3. Sick pay in excess of regular pay rates.
4. Vacation pay in excess of regular pay rates.
5. An increase in the number of paid vacation days.
6. A seniority proviso alleged to result in the inappropriate utilization of personnel.
7. A guarantee of a rotation of days off alleged to result in excessive overtime payment.
8. The institution of two work shifts allegedly necessitating excessive personnel.
9. The closing of the Casino on certain holidays when business would appear to be most profitable.
10. A guarantee of a Christmas bonus of 7 days' pay.
11. An increase of the number of sick days from 15 to 21.
12. A guarantee of employment to a minimum of 60 employees.
13. Guaranteed salaries to senior croupiers.
14. Paid holidays for Fathers Day and the employees' birthday or double pay for work required on those dates.
15. Severance pay in excess of that required by law.

On October 7, 1981, trustee Rodriguez distributed a memorandum to all croupiers, cashiers, and runners wherein he alluded to the collective-bargaining agreement as burdensome and onerous to the bankruptcy estate and subject to necessary change. He further stated: "we have tried to renegotiate the labor contract with the Union, but they refused to negotiate," and he notified them that a petition to reject the contract had been filed. He also announced the immediate implementation of unilateral contractual modifications concerning:

> 1. A limitation of vacation and sick leave.
> 2. Elimination of Fathers Day and employee birthday as paid holidays.
> 3. The opening of the Casino on New Year's Eve, Christmas and Holy Thursday.
> 4. Reduction of Christmas bonuses to that amount granted to other employees.
> 5. The setting of shift starting times in accord with business needs.
> 6. The programming of rotation of days off according to business needs.
> 7. Task and shift assignment in accord with business needs.
> 8. Layoff policy to conform with that of other nonunit employees.
> 9. The elimination of severance pay for temporary layoffs.
> 10. The determination that a workday consists of an 8-hour shift.

Trustee Rodriguez concluded:

> Also, we are studying other measures that will help the company in achieving additional savings in order to retain our rehabilitation program.
> We hope that you will continue cooperating with the Hotel, as usual. We are still willing to meet with your Union to discuss the above changes and any future changes. If you do not wish to work under these new conditions, please notify the Casino Manager.

Rodriguez testified, without contradiction, that prior to the hearing on the rejection petition he had met with the Federacion representatives in order to obtain concessions from the contractual obligations and thus avoid a court-ordered rejection of the contract, as he had done with Local 610, but that in negotiations the Federacion did not agree to change the contract. He conceded that he had effectuated the modifications prior to any court-approved contract rejection, but that he had done so on a temporary basis subject to negotiations with the Federacion.

The bankruptcy court hearing on the rejection petition was held on November 2, 1981. Prior to that date the Federacion, through its attorney, was given access to Respondent Hotel's business records. The Federacion was represented at the hearing. At one point during the hearing, the parties were provided an opportunity during a recess to negotiate further. It is Rodriguez' uncontradicted testimony that he was advised by the Federacion attorney that although the Federacion officers were willing to negotiate, the delegates were opposed to negotiations for the purpose of reducing contractual benefits and that the leaders therefore preferred to have a ruling by the court that would obligate them to negotiate. On November 12, 1981, Bankruptcy Judge Hernandez-Rodriguez issued an opinion and order in which he authorized the trustee "to reject the contract," and stated therein:

> In the case before us at this time, the trustee did bring forth evidence to the effect that the collective bargaining agreement was burdensome and onerous to debtor's estate. The union failed to refuse this evidence. This court was convinced that should the agreement remain in effect, it would thwart debtor's efforts to rehabilitate itself and that it could be forced to default in its payments to the secured creditors and to the taxing agency . . . .
> The case of Brotherhood v. Rea Express Inc. (523 F.2d 164) also pre-Code, went even further than Kevin (519 F.2d 698), in requiring a showing that "unless the agreement is rejected, the debtor will collapse and the employees will no longer have their jobs." Although we are not willing to say that this showing will be required in all cases where we are presented with a similar controversy as to authorization to reject a collective bargaining agreement, we can safely say that the trustee in this case came forward and met this more stringent test. Moreover, the "Federacion" failed to present any evidence whatsoever to the contrary.

Trustee Rodriguez testified further without contradiction that after November 12, and prior to the opening of the tourist season on December 1, 1981, he met again several times with the leaders of the Federacion, i.e., Nicot and Vega, and with delegates Maldonado, Battista, and Blanco. The last of that series of meetings was held on or about November 24. The subject of these meetings was the changes already effected as well as other additional new concessions, including a reduction in salary. At one point, according to Rodriguez' uncontradicted testimony, the union leaders came to an agreement on these concessions, subject to membership approval. On such submission, however, the membership rejected the tentative agreement. Several more meetings were held between Rodriguez and the Federacion negotiators in late November and early December 1981. Rodriguez testified (without contradiction):

> Yes, I met with them during that same period and we agreed to leave things pending to see what would happen during the winter season that was coming, to see if there was a need for any economic modification in the collective-bargaining contract.

Vegas testified that the Federacion bargaining representatives met with the trustee "more or less" toward the end of November and early December 1981, that a full agreement was reached but rejected in part with respect to the salary reduction; that after further negotiations an agreement on salary reduction was again reached with the Federacion leaders over the objection of the delegates. That agreement on salary reduction was thereafter, in accordance with the delegates' objection, rejected by the members.

On December 8, 1981, Nicholas Delgado Figueroa, who now represents the Union, drafted a motion requesting permission to intervene, which was signed by Maldonado as "union representative," and filed by him with the bankruptcy court.

In that motion, Maldonado asserted, inter alia, that he represents the croupiers as union delegate, and that the trustee relying on the court's November 12 contract rejection authorization had informed the croupiers of his authority to reduce all salaries, that the trustee "shows complete disregard for the clauses of the Bargaining Agreement that has no economic impact," and that he and the croupiers have proposed "several ideas" to the trustee to save money. On December 16, the court denied that motion on the grounds that the court had before it "nothing pending in this matter to resolve." Maldonado testified that he filed that motion "based on the fact that I was leader of the group." On direct examination, he evaded a question whether he had made any effort to communicate with the Federacion. On cross-examination, he conceded that he was not authorized by the Federacion leaders to file that motion. He testified that prior to the filing of that motion there had been unsuccessful negotiations between the trustee and the Federacion, although he conceded that agreement had been reached in negotiations in November or December 1981 that was subsequently rejected by the members of the bargaining unit.

On December 15, Respondent, by its attorney, filed a report with the bankruptcy court in which it stated that although the court had issued its prior contract rejection authorization, the Respondent would continue to comply with the terms and conditions of the contract until such time as an agreement with the Union would occur or become unfeasible.[2] By letter dated December 22, addressed to trustee Rodriguez, signed by Maldonado, a request was made to meet, pursuant to the December 15 bankruptcy court report, on January 4, 1982. Rodriguez testified that he hoped that economic conditions would improve, and he was therefore receptive to the idea of meeting. He testified, without explicit contradiction and in large part corroborated by Vega, that he communicated with the Federacion leaders to confirm the meeting date but was advised that Maldonado was not authorized to arrange for meetings and that he ought "to forget about the meeting."

The 1981-1982 tourist season turned out to be economically dissatrous, and the Respondent Hotel's situation deteriorated from that of the previous year. It is Rodriquez' uncontradicted testimony that he had individual conversations on unrecalled dates that winter with Vega and Nicot in which he told them that although he was awaiting the final outcome of the tourist season, he insisted to them that the casino employees were the only employees not to have made some sacrifcies and that they ought to "start thinking about the possibility to renegotiate economic clauses," and further he testified that it was understood that the collective-bargaining agreement continued to be in effect until 1983.[3] Vega testified that he was supplied with a copy of the December 15 report, but did nothing immediately thereafter. He did not contradict Rodriquez. He could not recall whether he had individual conversations with Rodriquez that winter and did not deny them. He did not deny that there had been a mutual agreement to postpone further meetings pending the outcome of the tourist season. Rodriquez' testimony is therefore unchallenged and I credit him. Vega corroborated Rodriquez with respect to the existence of a mutal "understanding" that the unchanged remainder of collective-bargaining agreement remained in effect and that Respondent continued to abide by the unchanged clauses. He testified that Rodriquez had been "mentioning that from way back, that he was going to make changes," i.e., more changes.

On February 11, 1982, Maldonado by letter dated and addressed to Respondent's counsel alluded to the December 15 trustee report, expressed doubts concerning that report and the doubts concerning rights of the employees, and further requested a meeting. There had been no change with respect to Maldonado's lack of authority to schedule meetings. Maldonado did not clarify in that letter whether he was acting as spokesman for the Federacion or as spokesman for employees in an unofficial capacity. He conceded that he was not in fact authorized by the leaders to write the letter. He received an acknowledgment of receipt but not further contact. In any event, a meeting was arranged to be held between the trustee and the Federacion bargaining committee, i.e., Nicot, Vega, and delegates, on March 3. It is not clear who initiated that arrangement. That meeting was subsequently aborted, according to the trustee and Vega because of Maldonado's unauthorized intervention and individual misrepresentations to Vega and Rodriguez. I credit the testimony of Rodriguez and Vega in this regard which I find more certain and convincing than that of Maldonado whom I found to be a far less responsive and a highly evasive witness.[4] [2] There is no evidence that Respondent had rescinded any of the earlier unilateral changes.

[3] His testimony is unclear whether he explicitly stated this "understanding."

Vega testified that on March 4, he became aware of Maldonado's conduct, and that the March 3 meeting was not canceled by the Respondent. Vega testified on direct examination without context and without detail that a meeting was arranged a week prior to March 9, to hold a negotiation meeting on that date at 2 p.m. at the hotel. On cross-examination, he affirmed the truth of his pretrial affidavit in which he recounted a March 8 midnight conversation with Rodriguez that "ended on the promise that we would meet at 2 p.m. on the following date,"

Rodriguez testified, without explicit and clear contradictions, that on March 8, Federacion delegates Maldonado, Battista, Blanco, and Attorney Delgado appeared at his office and requested that he bargain with them as representatives of the Federacion. Maldonado testified hesitantly and uncertainly that he did not recall whether he had met with the trustee subsequent to his letter of February 11 to Respondent's counsel. I credit Rodriguez' more certain and detailed testimony as to the occurrence of such a meeting and what transpired. At that encounter, Rodriguez who had never negotiated with the Federacion in the absence of Vega or Nicot, and who had always dealt with another attorney as a legal representative of the Federacion, deferred to the request to bargain and suggested that when they presented to him written authorization of their status he would thereupon bargain.

Trustee Rodriguez testified that on departure of Maldonado's committee, he telephoned Vega about 2 or 3 p.m. on March 8 and informed him of his earlier encounter with Attorney Delgado and the delegates and offered to meet with them and call them the next day if Vega could confirm their authority to represent the Federacion. Rodriguez testified further that Vega responded that he should take no such action because they did not represent the Federacion for contract concession bargaining. According to Rodriguez, he then informed Vega that he had newly acquired information about further deterioration of the financial position of the Respondent Hotel that indicated that operations under the economic burdens of the collective-bargaining agreement could not continue and that "since there was an impasse in the negotiations" that he would have to take "economic measures in order to guarantee" continued employment for the employees, and further that he was then in process of consulting his accountant and "economic counselors" with the objective of preparing "modifications" to the collective-bargaining agreement. Rodriguez testified that he told Vega that he would call him to talk about those modifications as soon as he had finished compiling them that day and that Vega told him to telephone him at midnight.[5]

That same day Rodriguez distributed a written notice of meeting to all unit employees to be held exclusively with employees on March 9 at 11 a.m. in the Dolce Vita Room of the hotel. Simultaneously, Rodriguez issued the following letter of March 8 to the Federacion:

> More than 5 months ago, we started talking with you about changes in the Union contract that are needed in order for the hotel to continue operating and for your members to continue working. Your main interest appears to be in "keeping the Union benefits, we have worked so hard for." The fact that these benefits will be worth nothing if your members are unemployed, seems to be something that you do not wish to accept.
> As you know, we went to Court to request permission to end the Union contract. The Court granted us permission, and pointed out that it was necessary for the hotel to survive, and for your members to keep their jobs. Still, you have not been willing to make any major concessions.
> Accordingly, as of March 8, 1982, by the authority granted us by the Bankruptcy Court, we are terminating our contract with your Union.

According to Rodriguez, he called Vega about midnight and read to him a draft of intended modifications and the following conversation transpired. Vega stated that he understood the economic problems of the hotel and that although "he was not rejecting them he could not say either that he was accepting them because he had not consulted [concerning] them with the members." Rodriguez asked Vega to meet with the delegates that night and that it would be discussed at the 2 p.m. meeting that had previously been tentatively arranged on March 4 for March 9. Vega responded:

> Look, there is no doubt we have reached an impasse. It's not worth [it] for me to submit these changes to the members because I don't think they will approve them. I am tired of wasting my time.

Rodriguez testified that he informed Vega of a request by Maldonado that the checkoff of Federacion dues cease and that in light of the overall economic problems of the members, he agreed to waive further dues checkoff by stating that he would not "fight it."[6] Rodriguez testified that he was then faced with two alternatives, "either to continue negotiating and close the hotel and continue negotiating afterwards, or not to close the hotel and make the necessary economic changes, and then continue negotiating." However, he testified that he found himself at that state of events where he and the leadership of the Federacion had come to agreement on economic concessions, but where the Federacion members "would not arrive at anything or reach agreement." Accordingly, he proceeded to implement economic modifications on March 9.

[4] Maldonado telephoned the trustee and informed him that Vega and Nicot could not meet that day but desired to meet on March 4. On March 4, the trustee was prepared to meet, but Vega and Nicot were out of the city in Mayaguez. Vega testified that the Federacion did not cancel the March 3 meeting, and further were not advised of the substitute date of March 4.

[5] Rodriguez testified without contradiction that Vega had on past occasions met with delegates at the casino late at night. Vega did not deny that he suggested the midnight call.

[6] Maldonado, in cross-examination, after an evasion, denied that he had ever asked the payroll master to cease Federacion's dues checkoff. I credit the more convincing and certain testimony of Payroll Master Ramon Perez Agosto that Maldonado came to his office about noon March 8 and made such request and that he subsequently advised Rodriguez.

Vega testified to one conversation with Rodriguez at midnight on March 8, in which reference was made to the delegate committee visit with Attorney Delgado that Vega assured him was unauthorized, and also in which Rodriguez announced an intention of making further changes in the collective-bargaining agreement to which Vega responded: "We have a meeting tomorrow at 2:00, not to do anything . . . we're going to negotiate tomorrow." According to Vega, the trustee then stated, "I'm going to do what I'm going to do and that's it," and then Vega said: "Well, it's 12:00 at night, I can't do anything now, we're going to be there tomorrow at 2:00 so I suggest you wait until 2:00 tomorrow." He testified that Rodriguez ended the conversation by saying, "Well, I'll see you tomorrow at 2:00, you come tomorrow at 2:00 but I'm going to do what I'm going to do. I've got my decisions made."

Vega denied that any specific changes were stated in the foregoing conversation, but when asked whether a specific reduction in wages was stated, he answered "not that I recall." On cross-examination he recalled that Rodriguez did make reference to a request by Maldonado to cease the dues checkoff and testified, "I was disgusted, and I knew that couldn't be done because of Maldonado's saying that." He could not recall further details. When pressed further to make an effort to recall, he testified with a furtive grin and abashed manner, "Frankly, it was 12:00 midnight, I can only tell you what I remember because I had a nice night that night." His testimony concerning his response to Rodriguez became more cryptic and was given grudgingly as follows: "I told him not to do it." He was thereafter confronted with his pretrial affidavit in which he delineated the conversation in somewhat more detail by recounting that Rodriguez made reference to the results of the fall-winter season that were such as to render the collective-bargaining agreement unaffordable, and that the trustee also referred to the paralysis of negotiations and conflict among union members, all of that necessitated that he must proceed to modify the bargaining contract. In that affidavit, which he testified was "basically" true, he stated, "I informed the Trustee that he could do whatever he pleased, but the union would then decide whether to accept the changes or not." In that affidavit he also stated, in response to the trustee's reference to the dues-checkoff request by Maldonado, that Vega "would not make an issue of it."

The affidavit statement concludes the conversation "on the promise we would meet at 2:00 p.m., on the following day." The affidavit does not recite a clearcut demand for negotiations prior to any change; nor does it recite that Vega disagreed with the accusation of an internal union conflict nor that he disagreed with the contention that negotiations were at an impasse. In any event, I credit the testimony of Rodriguez as far more certain, detailed, spontaneous, responsive, and convincing than Vega who was markedly hesitant and uncertain about the events of March 8. I therefore conclude that Rodriguez had two conversations with Vega on March 8, which transpired as testified to by Rodriguez.

The Dolce Vita Room meeting between the trustee and unit employees was held as announced at 11 a.m. on March 9. At that meeting Rodriguez read a memorandum that was addressed to and distributed to the assembled employees. The memorandum commenced by stating that on March 8, Respondent Hotel had "ended [the] contract with the [Federacion]," and attached thereto a copy of the March 8 letter to the Federacion. The memorandum set forth, inter alia, changes in the following:

> 1. Hours of work—8 hour day, 30 minute rest periods, 1 hour lunch, etc., resulting in shorter break periods.
> 2. Fringe Benefits—continuation of contractual health plan, discontinuation of pension plan, and "all other benefits will be as prescribed by law."
> 3. Pay Grades—reductions in salary for Croupiers, Cashiers, and Runners, by setting new maximum rates and the effectuation of future promotions by merit exclusive of seniority.
> 4. Union Dues—checkoff deductions from pay checks discontinued.

Vega became aware of the meeting by chance conversation with Maldonado. He arrived at the hotel and entered the meeting at the outset. He was advised by the trustee that the meeting was exclusively with employees but he was invited to stay as an observer. Vega elected to leave and proceeded to wait in the lobby where for the first time he received a copy of the March 8 letter of contract rejection and the March 9 memorandum to employees, from one of the unit members as they departed from the Dolce Vita Room.

It had been arranged that Vega and Nicot and the Federacion attorney were to have been accompanied to the 2 p.m. March 9 meeting by delegates Maldonado, Battista, Blanco, Aponte, and Fortunato Martinez. However, the delegates refused to attend. The Federacion leaders met with Rodriguez without the delegates. Nicot, in reference to the trustee's announcements of changes, accused him of acting precipitously and stated that he should have waited for the scheduled meeting at 2 p.m. Rodriguez protested that he had earlier communicated with Vega. Vega insisted that he told Rodriguez not to make any changes. Rodriguez again recited the reasons he acted, inter alia, past failure to reach agreement, and the rapid economic deterioration of the hotel that required immediate action to forestall closing, and the internal conflict within the Federacion as evidenced by Maldonado's individual actions that were unauthorized and even unknown by the Federacion, and that tended to have a disruptive effect on negotiations. Rodriguez proposed that further negotiations be continued by committees of four persons on each committee to be nominated by each party, and that his representatives would be named in a subsequent letter. The subject of the changes announced on March 9 was not raised. With respect to the collective-bargaining agreement benefits not explicitly referred to in the March 8 and 9 written communications, Rodriguez made explicit reference only to the medical plan that he stated would remain unchanged.

With respect to the March 9 meeting, there is no evidence that the Federacion representatives challenged the assertions of Rodriguez as to a past impasse, nor the accuracy of his position that the economic situation demanded immediate action. Nor is there evidence that the Federacion demanded that Rodriguez forestall further implementation of the changes, nor that they submitted any proposals to him, nor that it on March 9 expressed any desire to submit economic proposals nor that it made any demand to bargain about these changes or the effects of these changes at that meeting or at a later meeting. Finally, there is no evidence that the Federacion made any response to the trustee's assertions regarding the conflict within the ranks of the association. It thus appears that the Federacion, except for accusing the trustee of acting precipitously, stood mute and unresponsive.

As to the subject of the continued negotiations thereafter, such is clearly revealed by Rodriguez' letter of March 9 addressed to the Federacion that states:

> Even though we have terminated our contract with your Union, we still recognize you as the bargaining agent for the Casino Croupiers, Cashiers and Runners. We are willing to meet with you and carry out negotiations, possibly leading to a new contract.
>
> To accomplish this we have designated a Committee, composed of the following management personnel.
> Melba Curet Brugueras
> Miguel D'Angel
> Marshall J. Kagan
> Samuel Schweitzer
> This committee will be pleased to meet with your representatives (we would suggest about 4). When you have selected your representatives, and wish to have a meeting, please let me know, and we will arrange it at a time convenient to both parties.

On March 9, Respondent Hotel's payroll master received a memorandum from Rodriguez, which stated:

> As a result of our cancellation of the Casino Union contract, the following changes will go into effect immediately.
> 1. No deduction of Union dues.
> 2. Vacation & sick pay accruals at rate prescribed by law.
>
> 3. No pension plan deduction or contributions.
> 4. Working day will be 8 hours. Sick pay and vacation pay per day will be equal to a regular day's pay.
>
> 5. Holidays will be as follows (five holidays set forth).
> 6. New pay rates become effective March 9, 1982.

On March 11, Casino Manager Rafael Diaz presented Maldonado with a memorandum acknowledgement of acceptance of the reduction in wages to be executed by Maldonado and all unit employees. Diaz stated that any employee who refused to execute the document would be laid off pursuant to the explicit terms of that document.

No response was made by the Federacion to the trustee's March 9 invitation to negotiate a new contract until on April 26 it forwarded to Rodriguez a letter signed by Nicot which stated that it was "most willing to sit down and bargain concerning the collective Bargaining Agreement." In that letter the Federacion suggested that Rodriguez set the date, time, and place for negotiation at the trustee's "best convenience." The union negotiating committee was named to consist of Nicot, Vega, Blanco, and Maldonado.[7]

On May 3, Rodriguez acknowledged the April 26 Federacion letter and suggested a meeting date of May 11 at the Dolce Vita Room. A meeting was held on that date between the Federacion committee, and a committee of Respondent Hotel representatives headed by Sam Schweitzer, former president of the hotel and counsel to the trustee, who was not to participate at that meeting. After he had presented an oral report to the Federacion of the hotel's economic crises, Schweitzer asked if the Federacion had brought any proposals to further reduce the hotel's expenditures. Vega responded that the Federacion proposal was the unchanged collective-bargaining agreement, but that the Federacion was willing to negotiate from that contract, clause by clause, to determine where reductions might be made and that a mutally agreeable resolution might be effectuated. Schweitzer stated that he was authorized by the trustee to negotiate only from the status of the already effectuated economic changes for further economic concessions. Vega protested that the unilateral changes previously effected had never been accepted by the Federacion despite Respondent's assumption of such acceptance. Vega announced that the Federacion committee was leaving because Schweitzer did not have authority to negotiate from the status quo, before the unilateral changes, i.e., October 1981 and March 9, 1982. Vega suggested that Respondent Hotel obtain Rodriguez for another meeting because only he had authority to negotiate from the premise sought by the Union. Schweitzer said he would notify the Federacion, and the meeting of 20 minutes' duration ended, as Vega said the Federacion was available at "any time."

At the beginning of May, Rodriguez received an audit report that reflected a loss of $1.6 million for the economic year of May 1981–1982, due to the cancellation of a British tourist contract.

On June 4, the Federacion by letter from Nicot to Rodriguez, referred to the agreement to negotiate an "agreement concerning the Casino's collective Bargaining Agreement," by the reduced committee format, and noted its request at the last meeting to enlarge the committee to six persons. The letter gave notice of the addition of two persons "for the next morning." No request to bargain at any specific time set forth, nor were there any proposals submitted by the Federacion, nor was there any indication that the Federacion was willing to moderate its position that any negotiations must commence from the point of status quo ante, and the old contract.

[7] On April 14, the bankruptcy court conducted a hearing pursuant to a motion filed by Delgado. On that date the bankruptcy court ordered the Federacion and Respondent Hotel to meet and attempt to enter into a collective-bargaining agreement.

At the beginning of June, Maldonado engaged in the leadership role of initiating the existence of a new union. He met with unit employees in the croupiers' restroom at the hotel. Thirty-eight croupiers were present. Attorney Delgado addressed them.[8] In consequence, the Union was formed and its executive board was named by the employees. Maldonado was elected president and Blanco was elected vice president. Eliont Garcia was elected secretary-treasurer. Other positions were created and officers elected. The purpose of the organization was to negotiate a collective-bargaining agreement, resolve grievances on behalf of employees, and negotiate better working conditions with Respondent Hotel. Thereafter, bylaws and a constitution were devised. Within 2 days the Union filed a representation petition seeking certification of its status with the Board.

On June 10, trustee Rodriguez sent by messenger the following letter to Nicot:

> We appreciate your patience in waiting to resume negotiations.
>
> The obligation that prevented us from meeting are now reduced and we can meet with you next week. We suggest Tuesday, June 15, 1982, at 10 A.M., in La Dolce Vita Room at the hotel. If this is not convenient, please call and we will arrange a meeting for another date and time.
> Enclosed is a notice to the Casino employees regarding a reduction in salary that will go into effect Monday, June 14, 1982. We will explain in detail the economic problems that make this necessary.

The attached notice to employees was dated June 10, and set forth further salary reductions, to be effective June 14, with the explanation that recent worsening economic conditions necessitated these reductions in order to keep the hotel operational.

Vega testified on direct examination that the June 15 meeting was postponed at the request of the Federacion.[9] Vega testified that there had been no other meeting held or scheduled, and no discussions concerning the subject of the June 10 notification, receipt of which he admitted on June 10. Clearly then, the Federacion made no demand to bargain about these additional reductions, nor did it make a request to postpone the effectuation of these reductions in order to bargain about the subject. Rodriguez testified that he had private, individual conversations with the Federacion's leaders (i.e., Vega and Nicot) about further salary reductions. His testimony as to these conversations was generalized and conclusionary, but to the effect that the Federacion leaders (Vega and Nicot) stated that they understood the inevitability of these reductions and that negotiations were a waste of time. Rodriguez testified that nevertheless they did decide to meet formally and he therefore invited discussions about salary reductions thereafter in the June 10 letter. In cross-examination Vega conceded that during May and June he and Nicot individually and separately talked to the trustee by telephone on an indeterminate number of times. Vega could not recall the substance of the conversations except that part of it related to setting a date for meeting "for June 10 or 15th, those dates." He admitted that these conversations were not routine. He was asked the following:

> (By Mr. Del Valle) During these conversations (of May and June) did (the Trustee) ever tell you that the need to make the change was a question of jobs or salary, between one of the two?
> He probably mentioned that, but that was normal for him to mention that. He's been mentioning that from way back, that he was going to make changes, that he was going to make the changes. And like I stated, he said, I'm going to make some changes. We did not agree we did not accept them.

Vega did not categorically deny that he told Rodriguez during these May-June individual conversations that he understood the need for further salary reductions and that negotiations were a waste of time. Although he insisted that the Federacion never affirmatively agreed to these reductions, he admitted in cross-examination that even after the receipt of the June 10 letter the Federacion made no request to meet with Rodriguez prior to the effectuation date. Nicot did not testify. Thus the testimony of Rodriguez concerning these May-June conversations, although generalized and conclusionary, stands virtually uncontradicted. Furthermore, there is no evidence that the June 10 announcement was irrevocable, or that a request to postpone the effective date and negotiate would have been futile.

On June 11, Maldonado and Blanco visited Rodriguez and personally delivered to him and signed by Maldonado as president of the Union, the following letter:

> Hereby we wish to inform you that at a meeting held the 8th of June 1982 at 8:00 in the evening, all the croupiers of the Hotel made the decision to form a labor organization independent from any labor union in the country.
>
> Our organization adopted the name of Union de Empleados de Casinos de Puerto Rico, Inc.
>
> A provisional board of directors was chosen consisting of the following: Miguel Maldonado, president, Jorge Blanco, Vice-President, Elionary Garcia, Secretary-Treasurer, Javier Aponte, Records Secretary and four members-at-large. We also approve a Constitution and Bylaws.

---

[8] Maldonado testified that Delgado had been retained as early as December for the purpose of organizing the Union.

[9] Vega was confused whether the meeting was scheduled for June 17 or 21. Rodriguez testified credibly that a meeting was set for June 17 at 11 a.m., and that the Respondent Hotel bargaining committee waited in vain for Federacion negotiators who failed to appear.

> It was agreed that upon advising you about the organization that will represent us in all labor-management matters, we request your voluntary recognitions of our organization and that we set a date to commence negotiations.
> Due to the anxiety reigning among our membership and the need for us to adequately prepare ourselves before the new tourist season commences, we wish to meet with you on Tuesday, June 15 of this year, at 3 in the afternoon to commence said negotiations.

Rodriguez declined recognition of the Union until such time as the Federacion was decertified and the Union was certified as exclusive bargaining agent by the Board. He also stated that the bargaining date they sought was precisely the same that had been set for meeting with the Federacion. As of the filing date of the Union's representation petition with the Board on or about June 11, the Federacion had not as yet filed any unfair labor practices against the Respondent with respect to the alleged breach of bargaining obligations.

At undisclosed dates prior to this hearing, the Federacion and Respondent Hotel met and, in consequence, negotiated and excuted on October 1, 1982, a new collective-bargaining agreement, which was submitted on October 4 for approval to the bankruptcy court.

On October 7, Respondent Hotel submitted for approval of the bankruptcy court a settlement agreement purportedly remedying some but not all allegations of violations in this case. On October 15, the Regional Director for Region 24 of the Board filed an opposing motion with that court wherein he argued that the remedy provided was inadequate, and further requested that the bankruptcy court refrain from adjudicating an unfair labor practice. On October 15, the Regional Director by letter informed Respondent Hotel of his own refusal to approve that settlement agreement, and set forth therein a recitation of the inadequacies of the settlement. At the hearing herein, Respondent submitted to me for approval the same document. I also refused to approve that agreement for the same reasons recited by the Regional Director, i.e., it does not provide for a full remedy or substantially full remedy for the violations alleged.

2. The 8(a)(3) allegations—discharge—strike

The hotel casino operated on the following shift basis. On the day shift, one group of employees worked from 12 noon to 7 p.m., and another group worked from 1 until 8 p.m. On the night shift, one group worked from 8 p.m. until 3 a.m., and the other group worked from 9 p.m. until 4 a.m.

On June 17, Maldonado was scheduled for the 12 noon to 7 p.m. shift. From 11 a.m. until noon, Rodriguez and his negotiatiors waited for the Federacion representatives who did not appear.

Sometime between 11:15 to 11:45 a.m., Hotel Resident Manager Charles Garcia was in the office of Hotel General Manager Stewart Waters with Waters and Chief Maintenance Engineer Marcos Acquino Rochette, who was there discussing a maintenance problem concerning the hotel pool. The reservation manager, Miriam Vidal Dominguez, entered with a handful of leaflets that she displayed to Garcia and Waters and informed them of their distribution in the lobby where they were being handed out. The unsigned leaflet, the distribution of which ultimately led to Maldonado's discharge, stated as follows:

> June 16, 1982
> To All Employees of Hotel San Juan
> Hereby we wish to invite all fellow workers of all the departments of the hotel to attend an informative protest picket, which will take place on Monday, June 21, 1982, at 10:00 a.m., due to the irresponsible manner in which Mr. Hector Rodriguez Estrada, trustee of the hotel, is administering the same; and to make publicly known the abuses that this individual is committing against us employees who are doing our best to keep this Hotel operating.
> Fellow Workers: let us defend what is ours, which we have obtained through 25 years of work and sacrifice. Let's not allow this Dictator to close the Hotel. Which has been his desire since he started to operate the same, this has been said by the latter on different occasions "that it is to his advantage to close to Hotel rather than keep it open, inasmuch as by selling it, he will earn 2% of the total sale (price). This man has turned into the Robin Hood of the Rich, taking the wages away from the poor in order to pay a multimillionaire company.
> Fellow workers: We'll see you on Monday, June 21, 1982, at 10:00 a.m.

Acquino had about 11 a.m. observed some hotel maids with leaflets but had not read them and had said nothing when Vidal presented the leaflets. In fact, Acquino paid little attention to the leaflet conversation. Waters and Garcia then delivered the leaflets to Rodriguez who became effronted and directed Garcia to investigate and discover the distributor. Garcia proceeded to the hotel lobby and noticed many of the same leaflets on a table provided for the use of hotel patrons then attending a convention. He failed to discover who placed those leaflets. Meanwhile, Acquino had left the meeting in Waters' office, proceeded to the engineering office that is located in the back basement area of the hotel along with the housekeeping and hotel security officers.[10] At his office, Acquino observed a group of employees reading the leaflets. He read the leaflet and shortly thereafter he proceeded to Waters' office where he carried one of the leaflets. On his way to Waters' office he observed a casino worker, distinctive in appearance because of his uniform, walking in the engineering office area. Casino workers do not normally frequent that area. Acquino observed nothing else, i.e., he did not observe that casino worker distributing nor carrying leaflets. At trial he identified that worker as Maldonado. In Waters' office he told Garcia that he had seen a casino worker walking in the engineering area, and that he had seen employees in the area who were reading that leaflet. Garcia asked whether he knew the identity of the worker. He answered negatively.[11] Both Acquino and Garcia place this about 11:45 a.m.

[10] Maldonado who had worked at the hotel since 1965 testified that he did not know the location of the engineering department, but quickly added that he was aware that it was "somewhere" in the basement.

Garcia immediately proceeded to the casino without Acquino and encountered Assistant Casino Manager Adalberto Rivera who was engaged in preparations for opening the casino at noon. Garcia asked him to assist in identification of the leaflet distributor. As Rivera was busy, he assigned his assistant, Arroyo, to Garcia. At that moment, according to Rivera and Garcia, Maldonado appeared in the casino from the croupiers' resting area, and the following conversation took place. Rivera confronted him and asked if he had knowledge of the distribution of leaflets by any of the casino employees to which Maldonado stated: "It is impossible, the leaflets are in my locker and that is impossible that anybody is handing out the leaflets." Maldonado and Garcia with Arroyo departed in different directions. Rivera had not yet read a copy of the leaflet that Garcia had given him.

Garcia and Arroyo proceeded to the outside of the hotel. As they did so, while passing through the casino, Garcia noticed numerous employees reading leaflets. Having discovered nothing outside, they reported to Rodriguez and thereafter proceeded to question the hotel security guard, Angel Rivera. According to Angel Rivera's testimony, as he returned from lunch sometime after 11:30 a.m. on June 17, in the hotel security area he was given a leaflet by Maldonado, whom he did not know by name. Maldonado told him that the leaflet was for all hotel employees regardless of their particular union representation. Thereafter when Garcia questioned Angel Rivera about 1:30 p.m., he was told what occurred earlier and given a description of the leaflet distributor.

Garcia returned to Acquino, from whom he also obtained a physical description of the casino employee which, he concluded, matched that given by Angel Rivera. Garcia took Acquino to the hotel personnel office where, from a file of photographs, he selected Maldonado's photograph and thus identified him. Garcia did not arrange for the same procedure with Angel Rivera until 2 p.m. of the next day, when Rivera similarly identified Maldonado. On the afternoon of June 17, Garcia reported the results of his investigation of that day to Rodriguez.

Manager Adalberto Rivera testified that shortly after the noon conversation with Garcia and Maldonado, he proceeded to the casino employee rest area, and while Maldonado was speaking on the telephone, he read the flyer that was posted on the employee bulletin board and then removed it. Maldonado finished his telephone conversation and reproved Garcia for removing the leaflet from the employee bulletin board. Rivera apologized and replaced it.

Maldonado testified that he was unaware of who prepared, delivered, or distributed the leaflets on June 17 and also unaware of who sponsored the picketing or was behind the leaflet.[12] He testified that he arrived "at work" on June 17 at 12 noon. He also testified that he discovered about 25 leaflets on the table in the rest area on his entrance there. After reading one of them and because he did not "see anything incorrect" thereon, he proceeded to put a copy on the employee bulletin board.[13] According to Maldonado, at that moment Manager Rivera entered, proceeded toward the bulletin board, and removed the leaflet.[14] Maldonado told him he had no right to do so and Rivera apologized and reported it, although manifesting a demeanor of displeasure. Maldonado testified that he then immediately telephoned Delgado and reported these events.[15] He next proceeded to his assigned post at one of the gaming tables but was called aside to the manager's desk in the room by Manager Rivera. Maldonado summoned another employee as a witness. It is Maldonado's uncontradicted testimony that Rivera told him that "disciplinary measures were going to be taken against the persons who distributed this leaflet," and that his response was that if Respondent Hotel had proof of the identity of that person and if they understood discipline was justified, it should proceed according to its "best judgment."[16]

Maldonado left the manager's desk and summoned the shop stewards to the casino. When they arrived, he informed them of these events and they remained until 4:30 p.m., at which time they were dispatched home by Maldonado inasmuch as nothing had occurred. However, at 4:45 p.m. Maldonado was directed to report to the office of Personnel Director Melba Brugeras. He did so and there was confronted by Brugeras and Garcia. Brugeras presented Maldonado with a letter of discharge to which were attached two documents; one of which was addressed to the Federacion and which withdrew recognition of Maldonado as a Federacion steward; and the other was an order to Maldonado to leave the premises immediately. The letter of discharge signed by Personnel Director Brugeras states the reason for discharge as the distribution of the June 17 leaflet "which injures the moral integrity of persons composing the Hotel's management and is deterimental to the good functioning of this business establishment." In the letter to the Federacion executed by Rodriguez, it is stated as follows:

[11] Contrary to Acquino, whom I credit as the more certain in his recollection, Garcia on direct examination testified that Acquino told him that he had observed a casino employee distributing leaflets downstairs in the back basement area. On cross-examination his testimony is in accord with Acquino.

[12] He asserted further that total ignorance as of the time of the trial. After some evasion, he conceded to have given affidavit testimony prior to this trial, to the effect that after the discharge he had received information that Blanco had brought the leaflets to the hotel.

[13] On cross-examination, he testified that the only reference he found untrue was the characterization "dictator."

[14] On cross-examination, he testified that he discovered the leaflets in the rest area shortly before noon and that he proceeded to the gaming room at noon.

[15] He did not contradict Manager Rivera's testimony as to the confrontation in the gaming room that preceded this event. I therefore credit Rivera. Maldonado explained that he called Delgado because of the "atmosphere" in the hotel, i.e., a "worried state" of supervisors and employees.

[16] On cross-examination, Maldonado attempted to explain how he had time to have become aware of the worried state of employees to have prompted a call to Delgado while in the rest area. He then testified that the ascertainment of the worried state was concurrent with the Rivera warning. However, this contradicts his direct examination that placed it at a subsequent time.

> During the course of today, June 17, 1982, Mr. Miguel Madonaldo Freites, Union steward, distributed among the guests, employees and everyone who was at the Hotel, the enclosed leaflet. He also posted the same on the Casino's bulletin board.
> Mr. Maldonado's conduct shows that he has gone way beyond what is required by a steward's function. He has charged this Hotel's Management with ulterior intentions contrary to the genuine interests of the company, which charge entails an idea of immorality and is insulting to the persons who are members of Management. Furthermore, the written statements made with the intention that they be read by the guests of the Hotel, and which have been read, have the intention of preventing said guests from continuing to use the facilities of the Hotel.
> For the above-stated reasons, we shall not continue to recognize Mr. Maldonado as a steward or otherwise a representaive of Federacion General de Trabajadores de P.R.

Trustee Rodriguez testified that the motivation for his decision to discharge Maldonado rested solely on his conclusion based on the reports of the investigation that Maldonado distributed the June 17 leaflet. Rodriguez testified most vividly and convincingly that he found that memo to be personally offensive and insulting. He also testified that he viewed the leaflet as an act of disloyalty to the hotel. He testified correctly that the Bankruptcy Code imposed an obligation on the trustee to seek the rehabilitation of the hotel. Although he conceded that the leaflet accurately reflects that he had the authority to sell the assets and that it accurately states the rate of commission he denied that he was motivated in his management decision by a desire to run down the hotel so as to be put into a position of justifying the sale as was clearly implied in the leaflet and denied that the alleged quotation within the leaflet was truthful. Such a motivation, he claimed, was deterimental to him professionally as it was to the business of the hotel. However, Rodriguez did not explicitly deny Maldonado's generalized testimony that the trustee stated during several informal confrontations over grievances in the lobby and in the office that he would convert the hotel from a Chapter XI Bankruptcy to a Chapter VII Bankruptcy and close the hotel if he were to be subjected to further "pressures," i.e., presumably by Maldonado and/or the Federacion. Maldonado gave no details nor any context for these confrontations. It is therefore unclear whether Rodriguez was referring to the Federacion's economic position or to grievance filing relating to other matters.

After the receipt of the discharge notice, Maldonado testified that he left the hotel and waited on the street for the stewards to arrive. He also testified on cross-examination that in his pretrial affidavit he testified that he did not leave the hotel immediately but that he first went to the casino to speak with the other croupiers about his discharge. He also testified on cross-examination that he telephoned the Federacion for assistance.[17]

According to Maldonado, after he left the hotel about 5:15 p.m., he proceeded to wait at an ice cream restaurant across the street from the hotel pursuant to the instructions of Battista, one of the two delegates who had left at 4:30 p.m. and who had returned and talked to Maldonado as he was being escorted by Garcia.[18] Maldonado testified that Battista told him as he was escorted out to wait outside while "we decide your problems." According to Maldonado, he waited outside the hotel at the ice cream restaurant from 5:15 until 10 p.m., without further communication with other employees.

After an unsuccessful effort by the stewards (delegates) to obtain rescission of the discharge, they spoke with Maldonado at the ice cream restaurant, and informed him that all the unit employees had stopped work in protest of his discharge. At 10 p.m., the day-shift unit employees appeared and joined the night-shift employees out on the sidewalk and formed a united work stoppage. According to Maldonado, as the employees appeared they told Maldonado that they were striking because of his discharge.

Maldonado testified that he informed the employees that they could not erect a picket line because of the lack of picket signs. Thereafter, Maldonado and Battista constructed picket signs, and picketing with placards commenced, at 10 a.m. on June 18, by about 40-45 unit employees.[19] The picket signs bore the following legends that in part reflect the language and tone of the June 17 leaflets:

1. We Won't Enter Without Miguel.
2. Trustee's poor judgement Closing the Hotel.
3. Do You Want To Gamble—Go to The Palace.
4. 23 Years of Conquests In Fight [illegible] Federal Trustee.
5. Trustee Is Treating Us Abusively.
6. Trustee Protects Interests of Conneticut [sic] Life.
7. Working hours are Increased and Salary Reduced.
8. Fellow Worker (Cooperate) and (Don't) Cross the Picket Line.
9. Croupiers of The Casino of Hotel San Juan are on strike.
10. Casino Employees Hotel San Juan Almost On The Street.

Neither Vega nor Nicot had authorized the strike. On the morning of June 18, the trustee accused Vega of calling a strike. Vega denied having authorized a strike. He immediately proceeded to the hotel. He encountered Battista and asked why the employees were on strike. According to Vega's uncontradicted testimony, Battista told him that the employees were on strike because of Maldonado's discharge. Vega spoke to Maldonado and discovered that he had already filed an unfair labor practice charge with the Board with the assistance of Attorney Delgado.

[17] At one point he testified on cross-examination that he did not know the telephone number of the Federacion. When asked whether in 9 years of representation he had never called the Federacion, he explained that he did not memorize the number. He conceded that he knew the location of the Federacion's headquarters. In a pretrial affidavit he testified that he did not know whether the Federacion had an office, a telephone, or employees other than Vega and Nicot.

[18] Maldonado explained that he had telephoned Battista from the personnel office. He did not explain the logistics of these confusing events.

[19] From Rodriguez' testimony, I conclude there were about 50 employees in the unit represented by the Federacion.

Subsequently on June 18, Nicot and Vega met with delegates Aponte and Battista to discuss the reason for the strike, i.e., Maldonado's discharge. Vega reproved them for acting without informing him. He reminded them that just a few weeks earlier a discharged employee by the name of Calderon had been reinstated pursuant to a grievance filed by the Union. According to his testimony, Vega advised the delegates that they should not have walked out because the collective-bargaining agreement does not expire until April 1983 and that it contains a no-strike clause, and that according to the internal Federacion rules only Nicot, the president, can authorize a strike. He told them that all their jobs were now in jeopardy.[20] Vega testified that Battista acknowledged he had erred in calling a strike and Aponte conceded that they now were faced with a "big problem." To that, Nicot stated that he and Vega were scheduled to meet with Rodriguez that afternoon and perhaps they could resolve the situation. Vega then told them that the strike was not a Federacion strike but an "illegal strike" in violation of the no-strike clause of the old contract, but that the Federacion would in any event seek to assist them.

In the afternoon of June 18, Nicot and Vega met with Estrada at the hotel coffeeshop. They asked why Maldonado was discharged and, according to Vega, the trustee responded that Maldonado had distributed a leaflet that denigrated the hotel. The Federacion officers asked whether he had proof, and Rodriguez stated that he had witnesses who had observed it. Thereafter, Rodriguez agreed to reinstate the strikers without reprimands with the exception of Maldonado, whose discharge would be resolved through some appropriate forum such as the Board. It was agreed that the hotel could operate without them throughout the weekend, i.e., Father's Day weekend, but that they would have to return by Monday, June 21. Acceptance of that offer and a cessation of picketing was given a deadline of 8 p.m., June 18.

Both Vega and Rodriguez testified that those were the only conditions discussed and agreed on for ending the strike.

Vega testified that during this conversation, in Rodriguez' presence, he stated to Nicot that the employees were talking "about this independent union, etc.," and Nicot stated as follows:

> Well, they're going back to work, they know there's a contract, the contract has got an expired date which is for 1983, so this union, they can't have an election now, or anything like that, they'll go by our union, we'll throw the people out, but we got a contract. I'll explain to them (that in order) to have another union come in they will have to wait 60, 90 day period before the expiration of the contract they'll come back to work and they have a new contract for the last two years, and they know its like that, we'll explain to them.

Vega testified that they told Rodriguez that they would "explain" the foregoing to the strikers. Nicot and Vega promised to notify Rodriguez of the results of their efforts at 8 p.m. Thereupon, Vega and Nicot departed for the picket line about 4 p.m.

Vega testified that the foregoing described agreement was conveyed to the picketing strikers that afternoon and that they were urged to comply. He also told them that, with respect to an outside union, because of the duration term of the old contract, they would have to wait for the expiration date before they could organize and file a petition. Some strikers refused to discuss it without Blanco and Maldonado, who were not present. Others became boisterous. Vega testified that he decided that it was not feasible to meet there on the street, and requested that Aponte convey to Maldonado the agreement and that he and Nicot would await their decision at the union hall. They waited until 10 p.m., but no one called. Vega notified Rodriguez of the nonresponse and it was agreed between them that the Union would publish leaflets explaining the settlement to the strikers and the deadline for acceptance of the agreement and concurrent withdrawal of pickets would be extended to 6 p.m. Saturday. Consent was given to Rodriguez to distribute his own leaflet reflecting the agreements.

On Saturday, June 19, the Union distributed to the striking employees the following leaflet, a copy of which was provided to Rodriguez at 3 p.m.:

> Yesterday afternoon, June 18, 1982, we met with Mr. Hector Rodriguez Estrada (Hotel San Juan Trustee) to attempt to resolve the problem of the strike called by yourselves.
> This strike was not authorized by our Union. This strike is illegal. Now all our efforts are aimed at trying to resolve the problem which is no other but to protect all of our jobs.
>
> The agreements reached between Mr. Rodriguez and this Union were the following:
> 1—That you remove the pickets that same afternoon at or before 8 p.m., and advise the Union as to re-

---

[20] Vega testified without contradiction that on May 11, prior to meeting with Schweitzer, he had engaged in a discussion, in the hotel lobby, with Aponte, Battista, Martinez, Blanco, and Maldonado, while all were seated around a table, wherein Nicot told them, in answer to a question, that "the agreement we were going to make with the hotel" was to be for the duration of the old contract. In that same conversation Nicot spoke in conciliatory terms of the attempt to obtain representation by an independent union, their loss of faith in the Federacion, and requested understanding of the difficulities of negotiating with a bankrupt employer that made unilateral changes that the Federacion had not "accepted." Nicot also told them that they would have to wait for the expiration date of the older contract, i.e., another year, before they could seek other representation. There is no other evidence, except for the documentary evidence, of representations to employees of the status of the old contract.

> turning to work on Monday, June 21, 1982, except Mr. Miguel Maldonado.
> 2—That Mr. Miguel Maldonado's case be handled through the Hon. Federal Labor Relations Board.
> 3—To ratify Federacion General de Trabajadores de P. R. as the only Union representing the casino employees of Hotel San Juan.
> Although these conditions were notified to you verbally yesterday and you were given a deadline until 8 p.m. yesterday to remove the pickets, our Union can get said deadline extended until 6 p.m. today, Saturday, June 19, 1982.
>
> Anyone interested in returning to work under these conditions please get in touch immediately, at or before 6 p.m. today, personally with our offices where we shall be waiting for you until that time.
> Colleagues, our only interest now is to protect your jobs. It is your turn to speak now.

Vega remained at the picket line but heard only one thing for 45 minutes, i.e., the repeated chant: "Without Miguel, No!" Vega returned to the Federacion headquarters where he stayed until 9 p.m., but received no acceptance of the offer by any striker.

Trustee Rodriguez, pursuant to prior consent of Nicot and Vega during their earlier telephone conversation, concurrently drafted and caused to be delivered to the strikers at a time not clearly established in the record the following leaflet that he testified contained the only conditions agreed to with the Federacion. That leaflet states:

> Yesterday afternoon I had the pleasure of meeting with the Messrs. Luis G. Nicot and Marcos A. Vega, for the purpose of together seeking a solution to the problems that have motivated your strike.
> Although the strike called by you was not authorized by the Union that represents you and the same has been branded as illegal by said Union, we have agreed to allow you to desist from the picketing and to return to your usual duties on your respective shifts next Monday, June 21, 1982. This was subject to the pickets being removed yesterday, Friday, at or before 8:00 in the evening, which was notified to you by the Messrs. Nicot and Vega.
> Today, Saturday, June 20, 1982, early in the morning, we have met again in order to extend to you the same invitation that was made to you yesterday, conditioned upon your removing the pickets this afternoon at or before 6:00 p.m.
> I urge you to please desist from your attitude and today, at or before 6:00 p.m., to remove the pickets and accept our invitation to go back to your jobs next Monday as usual on your respective shifts.

Rodriguez received a copy of the Federacion leaflet about 3 p.m. on June 19, and immediately drafted and sent a responding letter of acknowledgment. That letter is translated in the record as follows:

> Receipt is acknowledged of the copy you sent me of the circular letter addressed to all the croupiers at the Hotel San Juan's Casino, dated June 19, 1982.
>
> The agreements entered upon yesterday between your distinguished Union and us are enumerated[21] in said circular letter. You also invite our fellow croupiers to desist from their attitude of maintaining pickets in front of the Hotel and warn them that "this strike was not authorized by your union" and that "the strike is illegal."
> You continue to invite them to rectify their positions and urge them to return to their duties under the conditions we agreed upon and which you verbally informed them about yesterday, indicating to them that you could succeed in having the time limit they were given yesterday extended until today at 6:00 p.m.
> I am pleased to inform you that if agreements entered upon between us yesterday are complied with by the croupiers, we are most willing to extend the above-mentioned period until today, Saturday, June 19, 1982, at six in the evening (6:00 PM).
> If the above is achieved, you must inform me about it on or before six in the evening today (6:00 PM). Otherwise we will regretfully be forced to understand that those represented by you have permanently abandoned their duties in our Casino and will have to be immediately replaced. We hope that God will enlighten them in making their decision.

Rodriguez testified that he, Nicot, and Vega discussed only two conditions for the reinstatement of strikers, i.e., return to work and resolution of Maldonado's case by an appropriate forum.

Vega testified that there was no discussion between them relating to the pledging of loyalty to or ratification of the Federacion as exclusive bargaining agent a condition of the employees' reinstatement. Vega testified that the use of the word "ratify" was not intended to be understood as a pledge of loyalty by the strikers to the Federacion, but instead was intended to relate to the strikers the Federacion's understanding with the Respondent that it had a collective-bargaining agreement and that under Board rules no question of representation could be raised nor any representation election conducted during the term of that contract. He conceded that the leaflet, as phrased, did actually set forth three conditions to be accepted by the strikers precedent to their employment.

No other communications were delivered to the employees nor were any received from them. On June 20, Respondent Hotel sent the following letter to each of the striking unit employees:

> Last Thursday evening some of you abandoned your jobs and others failed to report to their corresponding shifts the next day. Subsequently, up to this date, June 20, 1982, none of you have reported to your jobs on your corresponding shifts.

[21] Respondent Hotel argues correctly that the Spanish verb actually used, "detallan," should be more accurately translated as "detailed" or "particularized," whereas "to enumerate" is usually reserved for the Spanish phonetic twin "enumerar," citing New Revised Valezquez Spanish and English Dictionary, Follett Publishing Co. (1967).

> Although both the Hotel's Management as well as Federacion General de Trabajadores de Puerto Rico has invited you to return to your jobs, we have not achieved our purpose. We understand and accept as a fact that you have resigned from your jobs and therefore we are proceeding to replace you permanently.

On Friday, June 25, the following letter executed by Jorge Blanco as vice president of the Union was sent to and received by Trustee Rodriguez:

> We, the employees of the San Juan Hotel casino, received, on June 21, 1982, a written notification in the form of a certified letter where we are informed the following:
> 1. That we have been replaced in our employment due to the fact that we abandoned our work.
> 2. That the Hotel extended an invitation to us for us to return to work so that you could later sit down with representatives of the Federacion General de Trabajadores to discuss the differences that existed.
> We wish to inform you about the points we object to:
>
> First: That, as you allege, we abandoned our work because you, with your anti-labor action, were the one who provoked this situation. You fired our leader, Mr. Miguel Maldonado. We could not allow you to continue acting, when faced with our claims, in such a negative manner.
> Second: You lowered our salary on two consecutive occasions; all this in an arbitrary manner.
>
> Third: The Union dues checkoff was discontinued as per your orders.
>
> Fourth: You owe us vacations and other working conditions that had already been agreed to; in other words, you yourself eliminated Federacion General de Trabajadores as our labor representative and now you are the one who are contradicting yourself and you want that the Union that you rejected be the one to represent us and we do not want that Union.
> Fifth: We have organized ourselves into an independent union and asked you to recognize us and you also rejected that and, to top it all, you now discharge our leader without having any arguments or proof of your allegations against him.
> Sixth: You refuse to bargain concerning employment conditions.
> Therefore, all of us are willing to work right now, if you change your attitude.
>
> We are hereby requesting that Mr. Miguel Maldonado be reinstated in his employment and that the Union that we have voluntarily chosen, UNION DE EMPLEADOS DE CASINO DE P.R., INC., be recognized for us.
> It is your turn now, Mr. Rodriguez.

The hotel and casino continued to operate and virtually all the croupiers remained on strike, i.e., they continued to picket. The record is not clear whether the cashiers and runners joined in the strike. It is clear, however, that the vast preponderance of bargaining unit engaged in the strike. It is also unclear when any permanent replacement employees were hired.

On June 19, 1982, the Union filed an unfair labor practice charge against Respondent Hotel in Case 24-CA-4663 alleging that the Employer terminated the employment of Miguel A. Maldonado because of his membership in and activities on behalf of the Union. On June 28, 1982, the Union filed a charge against Respondent Hotel in Case 24-CA-4667 alleging that Employer terminated the employment of 46 casino employees because of their membership in and activities on behalf of the Union and because they engaged in protected concerted activities on behalf of themselves. On July 8, 1982, this charge was amended by the inclusion of two additional casino employees. On July 16, 1982, the Federacion filed a charge against Respondent Hotel in Case 14-CA-4676, alleging that Respondent Hotel refused to bargain in good faith with it. On September 20, 1982, the Union filed a charge in Case 24-CB-1179 alleging, as amended on October 5, as an unfair labor practice the entering into, enforcement of, threat to enforce, and maintenance of the June 19 agreement with Respondent Hotel insofar as it conditions reinstatement of striking employees on their reaffirmation of Respondent Federacion as the exclusive bargaining representative of casino employees; and that Respondent Hotel on June 20 discharged striking employees because of their refusal to comply with that condition.

On September 23, Respondent Federacion, by President Nicot, sent a letter to the trustee, and copies to all unit employees, in which it stated:

> We refer to the several meetings which we have had with you as Operating Trustee of El San Juan Hotel and us as representatives of the Casino employees involved in a labor dispute with the Hotel. We also refer to a leaflet dated June 19, 1982 from myself and Marcos Vega, Secretary-Treasurer of the Union, issued to the striking employees of the Casino.
> We wish to advise you and we are advising those employees that it was never a condition for them to return to work that they reaffirm our Union as their representative. That was never the agreement with you. At the same token, we reaffirm to you and to them what we advised them at that time, namely, that in our opinion the strike was illegal because it was in violation of the no-strike clause of the agreement. We made all the efforts to settle the strike, but the employees did not accept the settlement bargained by us. For this reason, we are not liable for any damages that the strike may cause the Hotel.

The strike, i.e., picketing, has continued and there has been no evidence of further communications between the strikers and either of the Respondents.

B. Conclusions

1. The 8(a)(5) allegations

Section 8(d) of the Act provides that "to bargain collectively is the performance of the mutal obligation of the employer and the representative of the employees to meet at reasonable times and confer in good faith with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employement."

Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act obliges an employer to notify and bargain with the designated exclusive bargaining agent concerning changes in wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment. NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736 (1962). On notice of such proposed change, the employees' bargaining agent must timely request and diligently pursue bargaining if it wants to preserve its right to bargain on that subject. Otherwise it may be deemed to have waived its right to bargaining. Emporium, 221 NLRB 1211 (1975); City Hospital of East Liverpool, Ohio, 234 NLRB 58 (1978); Citizens National Bank of Wilmar, 245 NLRB 196 (1979); Salem College, 261 NLRB 327 (1982).

However, when the proposed change concerning wages, hours, or other terms and conditions of employment encompasses a change or modification of an existing collective-bargaining agreement, a stricter obligation is imposed on the employer. It is well settled law that modification of a clear and unambiguous term of contract of fixed duration, regardless of economic motivation or necessity must be obtained pursuant to a positive affirmance by the employees' bargaining agent, otherwise the requirements of Section 8(d) of the Act are not met and a violation of Section 8(a)(5) results. C & S Industries, 158 NLRB 454, 456–457 (1966); Oak Cliff-Golman Baking Co., 207 NLRB 1063 (1973); Struthers Wells Corp., 245 NLRB 1170 (1979). Thus contractual modification concerning wages, hours, or other terms and conditions of employment cannot be effectuated by merely providing to the bargaining agent an opportunity for negotiation.

The General Counsel, in this case, concedes that the Respondent Hotel acted lawfully by rejecting the collective-bargaining agreement as authorized by the bankruptcy court. The complaint alleges, and the General Counsel argues, that the Respondent violated the Act by refusing and failing to bargain with the Union with respect to unilateral changes in conditions of employment after it had lawfully rejected the contract.

The General Counsel argues that once having lawfully rejected the collective-bargaining agreement the Respondent was nevertheless obliged to notify and provide the Federacion with an opportunity to bargain and on demand to bargain in good faith on demand to agreement or to impasse prior to implementing new terms and conditions of employment. The General Counsel cites in support of its position Iron Workers Local 455 v. Kevin Steel, 519 F.2d 698 (2d Cir. 1975); Century Printing Co., 242 NLRB 659, 669 (1979); Airport Limousine Service, 231 NLRB 932 (1977); Jersey Juniors, Inc., 230 NLRB 329 (1977); Bell Co., 225 NLRB 474 (1976).

Respondent Hotel argues that it fulfilled its bargaining obligations prior to implementing changes in terms and conditions of employment. It further argues that its position under a Chapter XI bankruptcy entitled it to unilaterally implement changes in terms and conditions of employment, citing NLRB v. Bildisco & Bildisco, 682 F.2d 272 (3d Cir. 1982), cert. granted 459 U.S. 1145 (1982).

It is unnecessary to discuss the conflicts between the aforecited decisions of the Second and Third Circuit Courts of Appeals, inasmuch as I conclude that the General Counsel did not sustain the burden of proving that Respondent did not bargain in good faith to impasse, and that the record establishes that the Federacion had been presented with sufficient opportunity to bargain about the changes but waived its bargaining rights by the lack of diligence in demanding and pursuing bargaining.

The first alleged changes in employment, which is alleged in the complaint to be violative of the Act, occurred on March 9. These changes were preceded by a longstanding demand of many months that the Federacion agree to economic changes and notification that changes were inevitable because of economic necessity. The Federacion was told of the trustee's intention to effectuate economic retrenchment from the contractual salary and fringe benefits. Some changes were made in October 1981. The Federacion at no time challenged the trustee's assertions of economic crises and a continuing deterioration in the hotel's financial status.

Thus the Federacion entered the fall of 1981 against a background that put it on notice that economic changes were going to be made by Respondent Hotel. During the negotiations immediately preceding the December 1 commencement of the tourist seasons, Respondent Hotel and the Federacion negotiators twice agreed on salary and other economic benefits reductions but were twice frustrated by the Federacion members whose opposition to salary concessions were aligned with the position of the delegates of whom Maldonado was the leader. The parties agreed to suspend negotiations in the hope that the new season might provide economic relief. It proved otherwise. Respondent Hotel's economic position deteriorated from what it had been when the members had rejected the negotiated changes in salary and benefits. Clearly Respondent Hotel's position changed to that of requiring additional concessions. The Federacion leaders were warned during that disastrous winter season to prepare to negotiate concessions, i.e., there was no economic relief to cause a change in Respondent Hotel's position.

The trustee was presented with no demands to negotiate by the Federacion and given no intimation that the Federacion was willing to moderate its earlier adamancy imposed by the will of the members and delegates. Concurrently, the trustee witnessed the actions of Maldonado that reasonably indicated to him that there was a growing internal conflict within the Fedracion. Thus the earlier division between the leaders and delegates appeared to be worsening.

On March 8, the trustee received more information about the growing economic crises and acted quickly. I do not find the speed with which he put the Federacion on notice of further changes to be unreasonable. There is no challenge to his testimony that the economic situation was desperate. His past experience in negotiations with the Federacion and his exposure to a growing internal conflict in the Federacion led him to conclude that further bargaining would be futile. His sudden notification to Vega served as a prod to action to Federacion leaders, one of whom gave some testimony as to not accepting changes but no testimony of having proposed anything to negotiate. Vega was clearly one of two responsible Federacion leaders. Had he on March 8 and during the midnight conversation protested to the trustee and demanded prior negotiations before the salary reduction became effective, the trustee's good faith would have been put to the test. As the evidence indicates, he did not do so but, at most, merely withheld affirmative agreement. Moreover, he agreed with the trustee that impasse had been reached, and that further negotiations would be futile, as the members had not moved from their opposition to salary concessions. Even during the meeting of March 9, the Federacion manifested a continuing internal conflict by appearing to meet with the trustee in the absence of the delegates who did not wish to attend. The Federacion leaders' conduct described herein amounted to little more than mild objections to the speed of implementation and constituted, in effect, acquiecence to the trustee's assertion that past impasse and internal Federacion conflict portended futility to further negotiations.

After the March 9 changes in employment conditions, and the rejection of the old contract, the trustee invited the Federacion to negotiate for a "new contract." The Federacion was notably lax in pursuing further negotiations. When a meeting was finally held on May 3, the Federacion was again confronted with a report of continuing economic crises and a request for further economic reductions to be incorporated in the new contract. The Federacion thereupon attempted to do, what in the past it had been presented with the opportunity of doing, but which it had wasted, i.e., to bargain about the March 9 economic changes. The Federacion insisted that it would only bargain from a status quo ante, i.e., the original contract conditions. Respondent Hotel was equally insistent that economic conditions necessitated not only retention of old concessions, but also the addition of new concessions. The meeting broke off as Vega stated that the Federacion would not meet until Respondent Hotel was represented by negotiators with authority to agree to negotiate from the status quo ante.

As the Respondent's economic situation is conceded to have been in dire straits, I cannot conclude that it acted unreasonably on insisting on retention of the lawfully implemented March 9 changes. This meeting, in any event, is not alleged to have constituted bad-faith bargaining.

The Federacion permitted matters to drift thereafter. It made no demands to bargain, no demands to meet, made no request for information, made no challenge to the trustee's claims of poverty, and gave no indication that it would be willing to modify its past position of opposition to salary reductions. Meanwhile, the trustee continued to encounter economic losses for the year ending May 1982. In early June, Maldonado accelerated his dissident activity by spearheading the formulation of the Union. Concurrently in May and early June, the trustee held individual conversations with the Federacion leaders that reinforced his conclusions that negotiations about further salary reductions would be futile. On June 10, by letter, he announced the changes to be effective June 14 and suggested a meeting with the Federacion for June 15 for further new contract negotiations. Again, the good faith of the trustee could have been put to the test by a vigilant Federacion. Instead, no bargaining demands were made and no requests to defer implementation were demanded. The Federacion's conduct was in accord with the individual conversations between its leaders and the trustee, i.e., that of quiescence. The only movement from the Federacion was a request to postpone the next contract bargaining session even later than proposed by the trustee! Shortly after his letter of intent to reduce salary further, the internal conflict blossomed in full, with a demand to be recognized by the Union. The June salary reductions proceeded into effect on June 14, with hardly a sign of protest by the Federacion. Subsequently, Maldonado was discharged on June 17, virtually all employees went on strike, and the meeting of June 17 was postponed at the Federacion's request to June 21 and apparently not held.

I therefore conclude that in view of the foregoing factual conclusions that the General Counsel has failed to prove its allegations with respect to violations of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act regarding the unilateral charges of terms and conditions of employement. Inasmuch as I conclude that the March 9 and June 14 changes were not proven to be unlawfully implemented, I do not find unlawful Respondent's conduct in conditioning employment of unit employees on their explicit acceptance of those changed conditions of employment.

2. The 8(a)(3) allegations

a. Discharge of Maldonado

Respondent Hotel contends that it had reasonable cause to believe that Maldonado had ultimate responsibility for the publication of the June 17 leaflet and that he was identified as the distributor of the leaflet. The General Counsel argues that Maldonado had not been identified as the distributor of the leaflet until June 18 and Respondent Hotel "either assumed his complicity because of his prior protected activities or seized upon the leaflets as a pretext for ridding itself of a nettlesome, activist employee."

I conclude that the record contains substantial evidence to support the position of Respondent Hotel. There is insufficient evidence that Respondent was so hostile to Maldonado's activities on behalf of either the Federacion or the Union that it seized on the leaflet incident as a pretext for discharge. As will be further explored, the leaflet publication and distribution is a serious matter that cannot be dismissed as so frivolous as to necessitate an inference of other unlawful motivation, as the General Counsel suggests. However, I agree that the Respondent probably relied on its knowledge of Maldonado's concerted and union activities in forming its belief of his culpability. Indeed, Maldonado was the leader of the croupiers, and the spearhead of the formation of the Union. The leaflet was in accord with his past conduct and the objective of the new challenging Union and patently not a product of the less aggresive incumbent Federacion leaders. Such knowledge reinforced Respondent Hotel's conclusions, but that is not to say that it was motivated by the subject of that knowledge, i.e., union or other protected activities.

That Respondent's assumptions were reasonable is supported by the evidence. Maldonado admitted to Garcia and Rivera that he had the leaflets in his locker and, by such statement, implied that he had authority and responsibility for their distribution. He personally posted a copy on the employee bulletin board and possessively intervened when a manager attempted to remove it. By the reports of Garcia based on a combination of interviews with both Angel Rivera and Acquino, Respondent Hotel had identified Maldonado as a distributor of the leaflet to employees in the basement area. Although no one identified Maldonado as having placed the leaflets in the public area on the table provided for the convention patrons, I conclude that under the factual circumstances Respondent Hotel reasonably concluded that Maldonado either placed the leaflets or caused them to be placed there for access by the public and was responsible for their distribution throughout the hotel.

Maldonado was the leader of the delegates, the president and leader of the new Union, and, as he described himself, "the leader of the group," i.e., all unit employees. He was responsible for the composition and construction of picket signs of which necessity he reminded the strikers. The contents of those signs are strikingly similar, in part, to the language of the leaflet. I find that Respondent's conclusions regarding Maldonado's responsibility for the June 17 leaflet was not shown to have been unsupported by facts to the contrary, as I discredit the denials of Maldonado whom I do not find to be a persuasive, forthright, or candid witness.[22]

The Respondent contends that Maldonado's conduct with respect to the June 17 leaflet distributions is not protected by the Act because: (1) the leaflet disloyally disparages the operations of the hotel to employees and to the public;[23] and (2) the leaflet distribution was activity in derogation of the Federacion as the duly designated exclusive bargaining agent.[24]

The General Counsel argues that the June 17 leaflet is distinguishable from the Jefferson Standard case and its progeny because unlike those cases the employees in its communications to the public omitted reference to a labor dispute with the employer and engaged in an attack on the employer's product or services. The General Counsel argues that the leaflet contained truthful assertions as to the receipt of commission by the trustee in the event of a sale and was not so disloyal, opprobrious, or defamatory as to be removed from the protection of the Act.[25]

The General Counsel further argues that the characterization of the trustee as a "Dictator" or "Robin Hood" constitutes "rhetorical hyperbole" found by the Board to be protected in other similar circumstances.[26] The General Counsel argues that there is no evidence herein on which to conclude that the leaflet contained deliberate or malicious falsehoods, and that similar attacks on management have been held protected.[27]

Respondent Hotel contends that the leaflet is part of Maldonado's activities that formed an attempt to undermine the incumbent Federacion and to cause Respondent Hotel to recognize and bargain with the Union as a new bargaining agent and as such is unprotected. However, without deciding at this point whether his other conduct with respect to the status of the Federacion is or is not protected, it is clear that that leaflet distribution is a discrete and separate action having a meaning and existence of itself, i.e., it constitutes an appeal to fellow workers to join in public protest of an alleged disagreeable working condition and to protest again the loss of negotiated benefits. This leaflet is not an appeal for the support of the Union nor a call for separate negotiations. The leaflet's purpose is in accord with that of the leaders of the Federacion who told its members that at no point had it assented to contract concessions. Thus the leaflet reinforced the official public Federacion position. Cf. East Chicago Rehabilitation Center, 259 NLRB 996 (1982). Even if this activity was more of a spur to the Federacion to take more aggressive action rather than a reinforcement of what the Federacion was already doing, such conduct still would not lose its protected nature. Pacemaker Yacht Co., 253 NLRB 828, 831 fn. 8 (1980); Armco Steel Corp., 232 NLRB 696 (1977). The leaflet also constituted a way of presenting a grievance to the Respondent Hotel and alerting it to what the employees considered disagreeable working conditions. The Emporium case does not permit the discharge of employees for presenting grievances. Richardson Paint Co. v. NLRB, 574 F.2d 1195 (5th Cir. 1978).

As to the June 17 leaflet, the question arises as to whether it constituted such egregious conduct as to forfeit the protection of the Act. With respect to engaging in protected activities, it has been held:

> [Offensive], vulgar, defamatory or opprobrious remarks uttered during the course of protected activities will not remove activities from the Act's protection unless they are so flagrant, violent, or extreme as to render the individual unfit for further service.[28]

In situations where vulgar or obscene epithets were uttered in the heat of argument arising during a protected employer-employee confrontation, the Board has excused such conduct particularly where provoked by the conduct of the employer.[29]

[22] Good-faith belief of misconduct engaged in during the course of known concerted, protected activities is no defense if it is proven that such misconduct had in fact not been engaged in. NLRB v. Burnup & Sims, 379 U.S. 21, 23 (1964); General Motors Corp., 218 NLRB 472 (1975).

However, the Board has taken particular care to evaluate, inter alia, the place of the confrontation.[30]

In Hawthorne Mazda, 251 NLRB 313 (1980), insulting epithets concerning managerial competency, uttered during an employee-employee office confrontation were held protected, but the Board took care to note that such conduct was not made on the shop floor where it could have negatively affected the (general manager's) status in the eyes of other employees. The Board also noted therein that the protection of the Act is afforded to misstatements made during the course of protected activities unless they are "deliberately or maliciously false."[31]

Without consideration of the impact on the public, the addressee of the leaflet was not only the unit employee, but employees of the entire hotel. The language of the leaflet was not the result of some intemperate personal outburst. It was drafted, printed, and distributed and tended to disparage the authoritative status of the trustee. It cannot therefore be excused as part of the give and take to be expected in the heat of grievance presentation or similar protested activities.[32] Nonetheless, concerted activity in the form of leafleting has similarly been held to be protected. Thus, in Great Lakes Steel, supra, a leaflet with references to "murder" was excused as rhetorical hyperbole used to bring about improvements in medical and ambulance practices of the employer and clearly not intended to be literally interpreted as accusations of criminal conduct. In Veeder Root Co., supra, sidewalk leaflets of employer-employee relations but that were not true. However, there was no evidence that the misstatements contained therein were deliberately false. In New York University Medical Center, supra, it was found that leafleting was protected where there was a failure of proof that the author knew that its accusations were false or that he acted in a reckless disregard of the truth. The author-distributor, in that case, had, in good faith, relied on reports of other persons and based his accusations that Respondent's guard had engaged in unlawful searches on those reports.[33]

With respect to the presentation of the leaflet to the public, the Board has stated:

> [An] employee may properly engage in communication with a third party in an effort to obtain the third party's assistance in circumstances where the communication was related to a legitimate, ongoing labor dispute between the employees and their employer, and where the communication did not constitute a disparagement or vilification of the employer's product or its reputation.[34]

Either viewed as a communication to fellow employees above, or viewed as a communication also to the public, I conclude that the distribution of the June 17 leaflet does not fall within the protection of the Act. I agree with the General Counsel that insofar as the leaflet refers to the trustee as a "dictator" and a "robin hood," it merely engages in "rhetorical hyperbole." But I find that the leaflet exceeds that point and attacks the ethics and integrity of the trustee by attributing to him a motivation and plan of action that conflicts with his primary obligations as a bankruptcy court trustee. Such an attack injures the trustee's professional status. Insofar as it was presented to the hotel guests, it portrays to the public that Respondent Hotel is being so mismanaged as to justify closure. Clearly, a prospective customer expects high caliber service and accommodations from a resort hotel and will be dissuaded from patronage by the knowledge that the management is motivated by a desire to purposely run down the business.

As severe as the disparagement is, I find that the egregiousness of the accusations is compounded by the clear assertion that the trustee has stated "on different occasions" that it was his desire from the onset of his trusteeship to close down the hotel in order to reap a commission on the sale of assets. I credit the trustee that his primary intention was in accord with his duty as trustee to rehabilitate the hotel, and that he on no occasion stated his purpose to close the hotel for the sake of a personal commission.

Respondent had reasonable cause to believe that Maldonado authored the leaflet. The evidence reveals that he, at the very minimum, adopted it and was responsible for its distribution. His vague testimony, even if credited, as to grievance confrontations relate to references to closure statements made in an entirely different context. Maldonado testified to no basis whatsoever to support the accusations of the leaflet as to the trustee's intent and motivations. No evidence was adduced to support a contention that the leaflet was premised on reports, hearsay, rumor, or any basis to support a colorable good-faith belief in its truthfulness.

It is too long a leap to conclude that because the trustee obtains a commission on sale of assets, that the trustee actually intended to run down the hotel for personal profit, and that he in fact announced such intentions. I therefore conclude that the assertions made in that leaflet were deliberately and maliciously false or were made in such reckless disregard of the truth as to fall beyond the protected reach of the Act. I therefore conclude that Respondent Hotel did not discharge Maldonado because of any activities protected by the Act.

b. The nature of the strike

The factual findings herein necessarily lead me to conclude that the employees engaged in the June 17 strike to protest the discharge of Maldonado and to seek his reinstatement and to protect reductions in their contractual benefits. Both the discharge of Maldonado and the effectuation of salary and other benefit changes have not been proven to constitute unfair labor practices. Accordingly, I conclude that the strike that commenced on June 17 did not commence as an unfair labor practice strike. A further question to be resolved is whether the strike as an economic strike was protected activity whereby the employees could be permanently replaced, but not unlawfully discharged, as is alleged by the General Counsel, or whether their strike constituted unprotected activity under the rationale of the Emporium case, supra, or in breach of the no-strike clause of the rejected contract as is argued by Respondent Hotel. It is contended by Respondent Hotel that the strikers were not in fact discharged but that they refused an unconditional offer to return to work. The General Counsel argues that the offer of reinstatement to the strikers was premised on their acceptance of an unlawful condition, i.e., reaffirmance of the incumbent Federacion as exclusive bargaining agent, and that the strikers were in fact discharged prior to replacement and that they were discharged because of their support of the Union.

The Respondents correctly contend that the strike of June 17 was unathorized by the Federacion and argue that it was therefore conduct in breach of article XII, section 2 (no-strike clause) of the collective-bargaining agreement. Respondents argue that despite the rejection of the collective-bargaining agreement that those portions of the collective-bargaining agreement covering conditions of employment unchanged by Respondent Hotel's unilateral actions survived despite the bankruptcy law principle that an executory contract cannot be rejected in part and assumed in part.[35] Respondents cite the "understandings" of the trustee and Federacion leaders, and the fact that Respondent complied with the contract in all respects. I conclude to the contrary.

The evidence, particularly the documentary evidence, reveals that the old contract was terminated in its entirety and that bargaining took place for the purpose of agreement on a new succeeding contract. Merely because the terms of an expired contract are complied with in the sense that no further unilateral changes are effectuated in the established terms and conditions of employment in no manner effectuates the continued life, in shrunken form, of the rejected and thus expired agreement. Surely, if Respondent Hotel desired to alter further conditions of employment covered by that rejected contract, it would not have been required to apply to the bankruptcy court for another rejection authorization, nor would it need to announce again that the contract is rejected. Instead, it would merely provide sufficient notice, opportunity to bargain, and on request bargain with the Federacion to agreement or to impasse before instituting the desired changes. Once having fulfilled that obligation, it would not require the positive affirmance of the Union in order to make a midterm change in the terms and conditions of employment covered by the rejected contract, as it would if the remaining contract were in effect.

The allegations to "understanding" of contract partial survival of Vega and Rodriguez are based on vague, generalized, subjective, and conclusionary testimony, unworthy of credence or probative value. Far more credible is the documentary evidence that clearly indicates that the contract had been expired by force of its total rejection. The only other evidence to the contrary is the ambiguous references by Vega to the trustee and to the employees on May 11 and after the strike, to the effect that the duration clause of the rejected contract precluded the raising of a question concerning representation. Such testimony does not rebut the weight of the evidence. I therefore find that what the Respondents had understood and had acted on was the "understanding" that the remaining terms and conditions covered by the rejected contract would not be altered unilaterally without bargaining and that a new written contract would be negotiated. Accordingly, I conclude that the no-strike clause of the contract did not survive by virtue of the survival of the contract itself.

The Respondent contends that the motivating factor for the strike was the discharge of Maldonado, which, as a disciplinary matter, was arbitrable under the terms of the rejected contract, and that even if the contract had expired by force of bankruptcy court rejection the duty to arbitrate survived the March 8 rejection. Article XVII, grievance procedure, states:

> A. A grievance within the meaning of the Collective Bargaining Agreement shall be a dispute or difference of opinion arising and the express provisions thereof during the life of this Collective Bargaining Agreement.
> B. If any issue, dispute, conflict or any discrepancy or differences in interpretation should arise between the Union and the Company involving the meaning or the application of the express provisions of this agreement or should any issue arise between the Union and the Company in regard to disciplinary measures imposed by the Company, said issue shall be compulsively resolved by following the procedure set forth below.

Respondent further argues that the survival of the no-strike clause was necessarily coterminous with the survival of the obligation to arbitrate. Accordingly, it is argued that the strike was therefore unprotected as a breach of that surviving concomitant obligation to submit to the surviving mandatory arbitration provision.[36]

[36] Citing Goya Foods, 238 NLRB 1465 (1978).

Respondent Hotel contends that the record evidence affirmatively establishes a recognition by Maldonado and the Federacion that the grievance and arbitration process survived. I do not agree. At most, the evidence indicates that with respect to the discharge of employee Calderon on or about March 17, the Federacion presented a grievance that was resolved at some preliminary stage in the grievance process in the office of the trustee. There is no evidence that the Respondent understood and explicitly recognized or agreed to the survival of the compulsory arbitration proviso. It has long been a basic principle that employees lose their rights to engage in protected activities only on the effectuation of a clear waiver, but in the Goya case relied on by Respondent, the Board construing decisions by the Supreme Court, stated:

> In sum the Court in Nolde [Bros. v. Bakery Workers Local 358, 430 U.S. 243 (1977)] found that the duty to arbitrate extended beyond the contract term if over a matter covered or created by the contract and in [Teamsters Local 174 v.] Lucas Flour [Co., 369 U.S. 95 (1962)] and Gateway Coal [Co. v. Mine Workers, 414 U.S. 368 (1974)] found that, absent express negation, the contractual duty to arbitrate over a particular issue implied a duty not to strike over the same issue.

Goya Foods, supra at 1467. The Board therefore found that employees were bound by the no-strike clause of an expired contract in the absence of an "an express negation that the duty to strike should continue with the duty to arbitrate."[37]

The Board and the Courts, however, were in the foregoing cases construing the relationship of the parties in a normal bargaining stance and certain presumptions of intent of the parties were made as to the survivability of arbitrability in that context. The instant case involves expiration of the contract by the extraordinary event of bankruptcy court intervention. A doubt therefore arises whether the Court and Board would have made the same presumptions in this context.[38]

It is unnecessary to decide whether the no-strike clause survived the contract's rejection because I conclude that even had it survived, the subject dispute that motivated the strikers did not consist of a simple arbitrable issue of discipline, but rather concerned matters not subject to the arbitration process.

Although the facts demonstrate that the discharge of the strike was precipitated by the discharge of Maldonado, it also constituted a protest against the economic policies of Respondent Hotel that the employees viewed as regressive and arbitrary. Maldonado, the leader of the delegates who were backed by the membership, opposed salary reductions. The very conduct for which he was discharged constituted a protest against reductions of salary and benefits.

The Respondent Hotel itself implicitly recognizes that the strike motivation cannot be viewed as a simple matter of one employee's discharge inasmuch as it argues that the strike was not protected because it formed part of an effort to obtain bargaining with an outside union, which it argues is unprotected activity in derogation of the incumbent Union, with which it is obliged to bargain exclusively.[39] Respondent argues that the June 25 letter from Union Vice President Blanco is evidence of the strikers' intent. There is no evidence to support the conclusion that all or a majority of the striking employees desired representation by the Union, or recognition and bargaining with it by Respondent Hotel on June 17. The letter itself constitutes a self-serving claim by a union official of majority status, but there is no evidence that a majority of unit employees or strikers authorized that letter. The evidence clearly establishes that the majority of unit employees engaged in a strike in support of opposition to further loss of salary and benefits. It can readily be inferred that they endorsed Maldonado's leadership role in opposing attrition of their pay and benefits, but there is insufficient evidence to support the conclusion that on June 17 they commenced striking for the purpose of obtaining Respondent Hotel's recognition of and bargaining with the Union. I do find that the nonarbitrable objects of the strike were so entwined with the disciplinary issue, that the dispute was not appropriate for the arbitration process, and therefore the strike was not a breach of the no-strike clause, even if it and the arbitration clause survived the expiration of the contract. I therefore conclude that the strikers on June 17 commenced a lawful economic strike.

Although I cannot conclude that as of June 17 the strikers, i.e., the majority of unit employees, sought the recognition of the Union as their exclusive bargaining agent, as Respondent Hotel seems to suggest, I could not, in any event, conclude that such objective would have rendered their strike as nonprotected as an act in derogation of the exclusive bargaining status of the Federacion. The Emporium case and its progeny dealt with situations in which a dissident or minority faction of employees sought parallel bargaining that conflicted with the position of the designated, exclusive bargaining agent. In RCA Del Caribe, Inc., supra, the employer was engaged in negotiations with an incumbent union and was found not to have violated the Act by negotiating and executing a contract with the incumbent union after an outside union filed a representation petition with the Board. The Board recognized the special status of an incumbent union and decided that it would effect an undue hardship to suspend negotiations because of the filing of a petition, and that continued bargaining with an incumbent union "is the better way to approximate employer neutrality." However, the Board made clear that it did not intend its decision "to have the effect of insulating incumbent unions from a legitimate outside challenge." Clearly then, the Board did not intend to render as unprotected the activities of employees in support of a total replacement of their bargaining agent, during the contract renegotiation period. In a subsequent decision the Board found it violative of the Act for an employer to have negotiated and entered into a renewal contract with an incumbent union when it possessed affirmative knowledge that a majority of its employees no longer desired representation by that union. Type Rite Ribbon Mfg. Co., 264 NLRB 650 (1982).

[37] The Board found that the words "during the life of this Agreement" contained in the no-strike clause did not constitute "express negation."

[38] The General Counsel contends that sec. 362 of the Bankruptcy Code automatically stays Respondent Hotel's obligation to arbitrate private rights.

[39] Citing RCA Del Caribe, Inc., 262 NLRB 963 (1982); and the Emporium case, supra.

Respondent finally argues that the Board should, as a matter of policy, view the position of bankrupt employer and incumbent union as occupying a special status and in order to provide a breathing spell and to insulate the incumbent from outside challenges and enable it to negotiate a renewal contract without having the outside challenger reaping the benefits of disenchantment of employees, by finding that the unchanged part of the contract, the no-strike clause, and recognition clauses of the contract survived the rejection of that contract. Whatever the merits may be for a prospective construction of employer and incumbent union rights and obligations differently during a bankruptcy situation, I find no precedent to enable me to find that the employees here were vulnerable to discharge because they engaged in activity that under longstanding Board precedent should be deemed protected. Therefore, I find that the employees on June 17 commenced and continued a lawful, protected economic strike.

c. The discharge of strikers

The Respondents in combination issued letters to the striker's soliciting the return to work. The June 19 Federacion letter was read by the trustee and never explicitly disavowed to the strikers. The trustee acknowledge to the Federacion the receipt of the June 19 letter and although some quibble may be engaged in whether he characterized the letter as "enumerating" or "detailing" the understandings between parties, nowhere did he assert that the understandings were mistated or improperly augmented. Regardless of what was explicitly discussed at the meeting among Vega, Nicot, and Rodriguez, the trustee by inaction and by confirming letter adopted the condition of reinstatement as set forth in the Federacion letter to employees.[40] Furthermore, by its own letter to the strikers he confirmed to them that agreements were reached with the Federacion and by explicit reference to notification to them by the Federacion he suggested to them that he was aware of the Federacion's communications to them and the substance thereof. Although Rodriguez did not recite in his own letter condition three, as set forth in the Federacion letter, if Rodriguez did not agree to such condition it was incumbent on him to have explicitly disavowed such condition in his own letter, for otherwise the reader would necessarily have concluded that Respondent Hotel was in agreement with the Federacion's representations as to the conditions presented to the strikers.

I therefore conclude that the strikers were on June 19 presented with three conditions to which they were required to accept in order for them to avoid the loss of their jobs. The Federacion letter set forth the phrases "to protect your jobs," and Vega orally told the strikers that their jobs were in jeopardy. Clearly then, the strikers were informed by the Federacion and implicitly by Respondent Hotel that they would be discharged if they did not at a set time and date abandon their strike, which I find was economic and protected.

The final and third condition set forth in the Federacion letter was that the strikers must satisfy, i.e., accept Respondent Hotel's recognition of the Federacion as their exclusive bargaining agent. The meaning of such condition within the context of what was told to them was that the strikers were obliged to forgo their rights to seek representation by any other union.[41] As I have concluded above that such activity was protected by the Act, I must necessarily conclude that the Respondents jointly imposed on the strikers an unlawful condition as a condition precedent to not being discharged. Furthermore, the Respondents also threatened the loss of jobs, i.e., discharge for economic strikers who refused to abandon their protected activities by a specified time and date.

In his June 20 letter to the strikers, Trustee Rodriguez discharged all the strikers who had up to that time refused to abandon the economic strike. That is the clear meaning of his words:

> We understand and accept as a fact that you have resigned from your jobs and therefore we are proceeding to replace you immediately.

By such conduct Respondent Hotel construed the status of the strikers not as economic strikers who may be replaced but whose employment relationship remains to the extent that they are entitled to reinstatement privileges. Laidlaw Corp., 171 NLRB 1366 (1968). Rather, the Respondent construed to be and informed the strikers that were in fact terminated and severed from their jobs, i.e., discharged. Regarding similar conduct the Board recently observed in Cooperative de Credito y Ahorro Vegabajena, 261 NLRB 1098, 1099 (1982):

> [It] is well established that an employer lawfully may replace economic strikers but that it violates the Act by discharging them prior to replacement. NLRB v. International Van Lines, 409 U.S. 48 (1972). Thus, even assuming, arguendo, the strike was an economic strike at its inception, Respondent's discharge of all the strikers violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) since all were terminated prior to being replaced.

I conclude that Respondent Hotel and Respondent Federacion jointly agreed to the termination of economic strikers who failed to abandon their protected activities by a certain deadline, and also jointly agreed to the termination of strikers who refused to accept the continued recognition of the Federacion as their exclusive bargaining agent. I further conclude that pursuant to their agreement, Respondent Hotel on June 20 discharged its striking employees who failed to comply with those conditions, i.e., the abandonment of lawful protected activity, an economic strike, and the continued acceptance of the Federacion as their exclusive bargaining agent.[42] I further find that subsequent to June 20, Respondent Hotel has since failed and refused to rescind the June 20 discharge.[43] I conclude that by the foregoing conduct Respondent Hotel has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act as alleged in the complaint, and that Respondent Federacion has violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) as alleged in the complaint. I further find that Respondent Federacion violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act as alleged in the complaint by the June 18 letter that threatened economic strikers with a loss of their employment if they failed to comply with conditions set forth therein, i.e., abandonment of the strike and acceptance of the Federacion as exclusive bargaining agent.

[40] It should be recalled that according to Vega, Nicot did discuss with the trustee the incumbency status of the Federacion and its presumed protected status during the duration term of the rejected contract. Furthermore, when Vega orally solicited the strikers' return, he told them that they could seek outside union representation during that period of time.

[41] The meaning is the same whether the reading is that the strikers must ratify the Federacion or that the strikers must accept Respondent Hotel's agreement to ratify the Federacion as exclusive bargaining agent

Conclusions of Law

1. Respondent San Juan Hotel Corporation d/b/a El San Juan Hotel is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2) of the Act and is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Respondent Federacion General de Trabajadores de Puerto Rico is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Union de Empleados de Casinos de Puerto Rico is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

4. Respondent Hotel, in agreement with Respondent Federacion, conditioned the nondischarge of its employees on their abandonment of a lawful strike, and on their acceptance or ratification of Respondent Hotel's recognition of Respondent Federacion as their exclusive bargaining agent, and thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

5. Respondent Federacion threatened employees with discharge by enforcement of the agreement with Respondent Hotel described in paragraph 4, above, and thus violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

6. On June 20, Respondent Hotel, pursuant to the agreement with Respondent Federacion described in paragraph 4, above, discharged the employees named in Appendix C attached to this decision because the employees refused to abandon a lawful economic strike, and/or because they refused to ratify or accept Respondent Hotel's continued recognition of Respondent Federacion as their exclusive bargaining agent, and thereby Respondent Hotel violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

7. By having entered into the agreement described above in paragraph 4 and by virtue of the enforcement of the agreement whereby Respondent Hotel engaged in the conduct described above in paragraph 6, Respondent Federacion violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act.

8. The above unfair labor practices occurring in connection with Respondent Hotel's business have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and among the States and the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

The Remedy

Having found that the Respondents violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) and Section 8(b)(2) and (1)(A) of the Act, I shall recommend that they cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Board precedent requires that unlawfully discharged economic strikers are entitled to an offer of reinstatement and backpay even in the absence of an unconditional offer by them to return to work. Abilities & Goodwill, 241 NLRB 27 (1979), enf. denied on other grounds 621 F.2d 6 (1st Cir. 1979); Tamara Foods, 258 NLRB 1307 (1981), enfd. 692 F.2d 1171 (8th Cir. 1982); Serendippity-Un-Ltd. & Tigerr, Inc., 263 NLRB 768 (1982). Having found that Respondent Hotel discharged striking employees in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act pursuant to an agreement enforced by Respondent Federacion in violation of Section 8(a)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act, it will be ordered that Respondent Hotel be required to offer them reinstatement to their former positions of employment or to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges and to remove from its files any references to their discharge and notify them in writing that this has been done and that evidence of these unlawful discharges will not used as a basis for future personnel actions against any of them. I shall also recommend that Respondent Hotel and Respondent Union jointly and severally be required to make them whole for any loss of pay they may have suffered because of the discrimination against them with interest calculated in the manner set forth in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[44]

---

[42] Although there is evidence that Respondent Federacion publicly renounced its agreement with respect to conditioning the nondischarge of strikers on their continued acceptance of it as exclusive bargaining agent, it is impossible for it to undo the concurrent unlawful condition, i.e., abandonment of a strike by a date past.

[43] Those discharged are named in App. C attached to this decision.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On June 3, 1985, Administrative Law Judge Norman Zankel issued the attached decision. Thereafter, the Respondent Unions filed exceptions and a supporting brief; the Charging Party, Associated General Contractors of Massachusetts (AGC), filed a brief in support of the judge's decision; and the General Counsel filed a brief in support of the judge's decision and in answer to the Respondents' exceptions. Thereafter, the Respondents filed a copy of an arbitrator's decision in a related matter, as described below.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings,[1] findings,[2] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The judge found that Local Union 33, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America (Local 33) violated Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(D) of the Act by filing and pursuing an arbitration claim against general contractor Blount Brothers Corporation (Blount) alleging Blount to have breached its contract with Local 33 by subcontracting certain scaffolding work to Anastasi Brothers Corporation (Anastasi) at the Lafayette Place construction site in downtown Boston, Massachusetts. For the reasons explained below, we reverse the judge's finding and shall dismiss the complaint.

Blount was the general contractor for the construction of a hotel and retail store complex at Lafayette Place in Boston, Massachusetts. At all pertinent times, Blount, a member of the Associated General Contractors of Massachusetts (AGC), and Local 33 were parties to a collective-bargaining contract which provided, inter alia, for Local 33's members' performance of certain work including the erecting of all scaffolding for all trades.[3] The contract also provided that Blount would not subcontract any work encompassed in the contract to a subcontractor who did not have a contract with Local 33.[4] Sometime prior to mid-May 1983, Blount subcontracted the masonry work to Filloramo Construction Company, which was later replaced by Anastasi, whose employees erected the scaffolding for the masonry work. Anastasi's employees were represented by Laborers, and it did not have a contract with Local 33. Officers of Local 33 informed Blount that the scaffolding work was within the jurisdiction of Local 33 and, from August 24 to 30, 1983, employees represented by Local 33 ceased working off the scaffolding erected by Laborers. On August 31, 1983, Local 33 initiated a grievance against Blount for violation of the contract's subcontracting clause and, in December 1983, Local 33 demanded arbitration of the issue.

Thereafter, on January 20, 1984, the AGC initiated 10(k) proceedings before the Board by filing a charge on behalf of Blount. The Board subsequently issued a Decision and Determination of Dispute on October 22, 1984, in which it found Anastasi to be the "employer" for the purpose of determining the work dispute and, after weighing various factors in that light, awarded the work at issue to employees of Anastasi who were represented by the Laborers.[5]

In the meantime, the initial arbitration hearing involving Blount and Local 33 had taken place in September 1984. Counsel for Local 33 argued that Blount had breached its collective-bargaining agreement by subcontracting the work to a subcontractor who was not under contract with Local 33 and requested a remedy making whole the employees represented by Local 33 for loss of earnings in lieu of the scaffolding work already performed.[6]

[1] We adopt the judge's recommended remand of Case 1-CD-715 to the Regional Director for further appropriate action.

[2] In sec. III, B,2, par. 10 of his decision, the judge referred to arbitration testimony of an individual the judge erroneously identified as Union Representative Grosso. The record shows that James Grosso is executive director of AGC. This inadvertent error is insufficient to affect our decision.

[3] Blount, through the AGC, had a similar provision in a contract with Laborers Local 223, Laborers International Union of North America (Laborers).

[4] A similar provision was contained in Blount's contract with Laborers.

[5] See 272 NLRB 860 (1934).

[6] By letter of March 22, 1985, however, counsel for Local 33 advised the arbitrator that it was not seeking a backpay remedy or any money damages for breach of the collective-bargaining agreement.

289 NLRB No. 167

The arbitration proceeding resumed on November 6, 1984, shortly after the Board's 10(k) decision had issued. On November 9, 1984, the AGC filed suit in the U.S. District Court for the District of Massachusetts seeking to enjoin the arbitration proceeding on the ground that it was preempted by the Board's 10(k) decision. The court refused to grant the injunction and found the arbitration proceeding to involve a contract issue separate from, and not in conflict with, the Board's 10(k) decision. The court noted that the Board's decision merely held that Anastasi, the designated "employer" for determining the work dispute, had correctly awarded the work to employees represented by Laborers, while the arbitration involved only the contract rights of Local 33 vis-a-vis Blount. The court indicated that a decision by the arbitrator that Blount had breached its contract with Local 33 by subcontracting work to Anastasi would not cause Blount to be subjected to conflicting requirements of the Board's 10(k) decision and any arbitration award. Thus, the court indicated that cases cited by AGC and Blount:

> [B]eginning with Carey v. Westinghouse Electric Corp., 1963, 375 U.S. 261, which held that an employer is not liable in damages when it makes a disputed job assignment in conformity with the Board's determination are not on point. The rationale for immunizing an employer from contract liability in a jurisdictional dispute is to prevent the employer from being subjected to the "conflicting demands of two or more unions." Associated General Contractors v. International Union of Operating Engineers, Local 701, 9th Cir. 1976, 529 F.2d 1395, 1397 ("AGC v. Local 701"). Blount was not an employer making job assignments to one of two rival unions: as was recognized in the Board's decision, the employer subject to conflicting demands in the present case was Anastasi. Since Anastasi is not even a party to the arbitration, an award favorable to the Carpenters would have no impact on Anastasi's assignment of the work to the Laborers.[7]

On December 28, 1984, the present complaint issued. Thereafter, on June 3, 1985, the judge found that Local 33's pursuit of its contract claim violated Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(D) as it was in derogation of the 10(k) determination of dispute. In this regard, the judge found that Local 33's arbitration claim was a mere extension of the work jurisdiction dispute which the Board had earlier decided adverse to Local 33 in the related 10(k) proceeding. The judge noted that Local 33 initially had based its claim to the work wholly on jurisdictional grounds and did not file a grievance over the matter until 3 months later. He also noted that the grievance was filed on August 31, 1983, the day after the end of Local 33's work stoppage in support of its jurisdictional claim. Moreover, Local 33 had claimed before the arbitrator that the disputed work belonged to carpenters and had requested an award of pay in lieu of the lost work. The judge, relying on Longshoremen ILWU Local 7 (Georgia-Pacific), 273 NLRB 363 (1984), noted that the Board has held a claim for "in lieu of" pay to be tantamount to a claim for the disputed work.

Thereafter, in finding Local 33's pursuit of the arbitration claim to be coercive and to have had the object of forcing the assignment of the disputed work to employees represented by Local 33, the judge relied on Local 33's having earlier threatened and then engaged in a work stoppage in pursuit of the work. The judge further noted that Blount, the general contractor, was a neutral employer with no direct control over the work assignment at issue and that it was inherently coercive to enmesh a neutral in a work dispute. Relying on, inter alia, Longshoremen ILWU Local 32 (Weyerhaeuser Co.), 271 NLRB 759 (1984), enfd. 773 F.2d 1012 (9th Cir. 1985), the judge also noted that an arbitral award of "in-lieu-of" pay would work an economic hardship on Blount by compelling it to pay for work not performed and thus inducing Blount to cease engaging subcontractors who have no collective-bargaining contract with Local 33. While Blount did assent to limit its subcontracting rights in its collective-bargaining contract with Local 33, the judge found such assent could not have contemplated the contract's enforcement to seek objectives proscribed by the Act. Finally, the judge found that he was not bound by the arbitrator's views because under Carey v. Westinghouse Electric Corp., 375 U.S. 261 (1963), the Board's 10(k) decision takes precedence over the arbitration process.

In the related arbitration proceeding, Arbitrator Tim Bornstein issued his decision and award on October 18, 1985, and found that Blount had violated its contract with Local 33 by subcontracting the scaffolding work to one or more subcontractors who were not signatory to a contract with the Carpenters. Consistent with the Union's request, the arbitrator did not award any money damages or make an award of the work, but issued only a declaration of the Union's contract rights.

Based on the above, contrary to the judge, we find Local 33's action did not constitute proscribed economic coercion within the meaning of Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(D), and we find no violation of that section of the Act in this proceeding in Local 33's filing and pursuit of its arbitration claim.

[7] Associated General Contractors of Massachusetts v. Boston District Council of Carpenters, 599 F.Supp. 1560, 1561-1562 (D. Mass. 1985).

In this regard, in the circumstances of the present case, we find that there is no conflict between the arbitration proceeding and the 10(k) proceeding. While the Board determined in the 10(k) proceeding that the employees of Anastasi were entitled to perform the disputed work, the Board did not consider the issue of whether Blount, in subcontracting this work to Anastasi, thereby had breached its contract with Local 33 and, if so, whether Local 33 is entitled to a remedy for that breach. Thus, we find that the Board's 10(k) decision precludes Local 33 from forcing the use of employees it represents on the disputed scaffolding work, but does not preclude Local 33 from asserting its contract rights against Blount, including possible money damages for breach of contract.[8] See also the analysis in Associated General Contractors v. Operating Engineers Local 701, 529 F.2d 1395 (9th Cir. 1976), cert. denied 429 U.S. 822 (1976).[9] In this regard, we disagree with the judge's conclusion that Local 33's pursuit of its arbitration claim was unlawful coercion in that it enmeshed a neutral employer, Blount, in a work dispute. Because Blount, while in a contractual relationship with Local 33, had control of the work which it ultimately subcontracted, Blount is not a "neutral" employer at least with respect to Local 33's breach of contract claim.[10] Moreover, because the Union's contract action against Blount will have no effect on Anastasi's assignment of the work, it cannot be said that the contract action runs afoul of the award made by the Board in the 10(k) proceeding. Accordingly, in the circumstances of this case, Local 33's grievance does not amount to unlawful coercion within the meaning of the Act.[11]

Importantly, and contrary to the judge, Carey v. Westinghouse, supra, is not authority for depriving Local 33 of its right to pursue its grievance. In fact, in Carey, the Court, relying on Smith v. Evening News, 371 U.S. 195 (1962), held that a union is entitled to arbitrate an issue even though the dispute could involve matters within the Board's jurisdiction such as a work jurisdiction claim. While there is language in the Carey decision to the effect that if the Board should disagree with the arbitrator the Board's ruling would take precedence, that language is inapplicable to the instant case because Carey involved a grievance filed against an employer which had assigned certain work to employees represented by one union and which was involved in a dispute with that and another union over the assignment of work. In the event of inconsistent Board and arbitral decisions, such an employer would be presented with a choice of either complying with the Board's decision and risking Section 301 damages, or complying with an arbitrator's decision which was contrary to the Board's determination. Such a result is not possible here because, as noted earlier, Blount is not the employer who made the work assignment, Anastasi is. Accordingly, Carey is inapposite to the present case.

For the foregoing reasons, we shall dismiss the complaint.

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

---

[8] Although Local 33 withdrew its request for money damages as a remedy in its breach of contract claim, we would find in the circumstances of this case that Local 33 properly could seek such a remedy without running afoul of Sec. 8(b)(4)(ii)(D). Thus, in this case, we view the request for money damages as consistent with Local 33's Sec. 301 right to sue for breach of contract and to receive an appropriate remedy. See generally McNeff, Inc. v. Todd, 461 U.S. 260, 261 (1983). As the judge himself noted, the question of whether resort to contractual procedures for the collection of money damages constitutes proscribed threats, coercion, or restraint depends on the circumstances of each case and for the reasons elaborated here we find no proscribed activity in this particular case.

[9] Blount argues that AGC v. Local 701 is distinguishable because there the general contractor was signatory to a contract with only one of the two competing unions but here Blount is signatory to contracts with both Local 33 and Laborers. We reject this argument for reasons the district court set out in denying the AGC's earlier attempt to enjoin the arbitration proceeding that Local 33 was pursuing. The court held there that

> Contrary to the argument of the plaintiffs, AGC v. Local 701 is not limited merely to those situations in which a general contractor is signatory to only one relevant union agreement, but to any case in which the general contractor is not subjected to inconsistent demands by two or more union agreements. While the presence of a second union agreement may result in a jurisdictional dispute at the subcontractor level, the Carpenters may be entitled by virtue of the agreement with Blount to have entered that struggle on equal footing with the Laborers, at least to the extent of having a collective bargaining agreement with the employer [footnote omitted]. [599 F.Supp. at 1562.]

As noted supra, the court had earlier underscored its conclusion that Blount was "not subjected to inconsistent demands by two or more union agreements" by noting:

> The plantiffs do not dispute that Blount could have fulfilled their [sic] contractual obligations to both unions by subcontracting the scaffolding work to a subcontractor who had signed agreements with both unions just as Blount itself had done. Nor is it disputed that Blount could have retained the work for its own employees without breaching the agreements. Therefore, a decision by the arbitrator that the Carpenters' agreement was breached by Blount would not cause Blount to be subjected to conflicting requirements. [599 F.Supp. at 1561, emphasis in original.]

[10] See, e.g., Longshoremen ILWU Local 32 v. Pacific Maritime Assn., 773 F.2d 1012, 1017 (9th Cir. 1985). We note that the present case is factually and analytically distinguishable from Longshoremen ILWU Local 7 (Georgia-Pacific), supra, and from Longshoremen ILWU Local 32 (Weyerhaeuser Co.), supra. In these latter cases, inter alia, the employers against whom the unions filed grievances and sought money damages never had control of the work and the employer who did control the work had no contractual obligations to the unions. Here, Blount did have such control, but decided to subcontract the work, and Local 33 did have a contractual relationship with Blount.

[11] We overrule Iron Workers (Hoffman Construction), 273 NLRB 260 (1984), and Carpenters Local 102 (Meiswinkel Interiors), 260 NLRB 972 (1982), to the extent they are inconsistent with our decision herein.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

NORMAN ZANKEL, Administrative Law Judge. These cases came before me on 18 March 1985 at Boston, Massachusetts.

On a charge filed by Associated General Contractors of Massachusetts, Inc. (AGC) in Case No 1-CD-714 on 20 January 1984;[1] and a charge filed by AGC, in Case 1-CD-715, on 8 February, and an amended charge in Case 1-CD-715 filed by AGC on 22 February, the Acting Regional Director for Region 1 of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) issued an order consolidating cases, complaint, and notice of hearing on 28 December against the Unions alleging they violated Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(D) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act).

The complaint alleges: (1) that since on or about mid-May 1983, Carpenters Local 33 demanded that Anastasi Brothers, a subcontractor to Blount Brothers Corporation, assign the work of erecting and dismantling pipe scaffolding for the installation of masonry work at a project at Lafayette Place, Boston, Massachusettes (Lafayette Place site) to employees who are members of, or are represented by, Local 33 instead of to employees who are members of, or represented by, Laborers Local 223; and (2) that since on or about 1 November 1983, Boston District Council of Carpenters and Local 218 demanded that G. J. Luchetti, Inc. and Volpe Construction Company assign the work of erecting and dismantling pipe scaffolding for the installation of masonry work at a construction project in Malden, Massachusetts (Malden Hospital site), to employees who are members of, or are represented by, Local 218 instead of to employees who are members of, or are represented by, Laborers Local 22.

The complaint also alleges that all the Unions have failed and refused to follow the Board's Decision and Determination of Dispute (Laborers Local 223 (Anastasi Bros.), 272 NLRB 860 (1984)), which awarded the disputed work at the Lafayette Place site to employees of Anastasi represented by Laborers Local 223, and the disputed work at the Malden Hospital site to employees of Luchetti represented by Laborers Local 22 by failing to give the Regional Director timely and unequivocal notice of their intention to comply therewith.

Additionally, the complaint alleges that to compel and coerce assignment of the disputed work to it, Local 33 (on 21 September) instituted and is pursuing arbitration proceedings against Blount charging that Blount violated its collective-bargaining agreement with Local 33 by allowing Anastasi to use employees of Laborers Local 223 to perform the disputed work at the Lafayette Place site.

The Unions filed a timely answer to the complaint. The answer admitted certain of the complaint allegations, but denied the commission of any unfair labor practices. Also, the answer avers that, by letter dated 5 November, each Union notified the Board that it would refrain from forcing assignment of any of the disputed work to employees represented by any of them. Also, while admitting it is pursuing its claim against Blount in arbitration, Local 33 denies that the arbitration proceedings are to force assignment of any of the disputed work to employees who are its members or represented by it.

At the hearing, no party produced any witness to testify. All parties agreed to submit the issues to me for resolution based on the pleadings, their oral stipulations of facts, and the documentary evidence.[2] In addition, the parties submitted written briefs which have been duly considered.

On the entire record, I make the following

FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

I. JURISDICTION

AGC is an association representing employers engaged in the construction and related industries. Blount and Volpe are two of its members. Blount, a general contractor incorporated in Delaware, and Volpe, a general contractor in Massachusetts, annually receives goods, products, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points located outside the States of Delaware and Massachusetts, respectively.

Anastasi, a Pennsylvania corporation, and Luchetti, a Massachusetts corporation, are both masonry subcontractors, and receive goods, products, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points located outside the States of Pennsylvania and Massachusetts, respectively.

The answer admits, the record reflects, and I find that the Employers are engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and that Boston District Council of Carpenters, Local 33 and Local 218 are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

Also, the record reflects, and I find, that Local 22, Laborers International Union of North America and Local 223, Laborers International Union of North America are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ISSUE

Is the pursuit of a grievance, into arbitration, by Local Union 33, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America against Blount Brothers Corporation violative of Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(D) of the Act even though Local 33 gave the Regional Director notice of its intention to comply with the Board's 10(k) decision?

---

[1] All dates hereafter are 1984 unless otherwise stated.

[2] I have also taken official notice of the entire record in the 10(k) proceedings underlying the Board's decision reported at 272 NLRB 860 (1984). See, e.g., Electrical Workers IBEW Local 3 (Mansfield Contracting), 206 NLRB 432 (1973).

As noted above, in the section entitled "Statement of the Case" other issues were raised by the consolidated complaint against Local 33, and also Carpenters Local 218 and the Boston District Council of Carpenters. Those other matters are disposed of as follows.

First, it is noted that Local 33 and Blount are parties in Case 1-CD-714 only. Carpenters Local 218, the Boston District Council of Carpenters, and Volpe Construction Company are parties in Case 1-CD-715 only.

As earlier stated, all the labor organizations involved have been charged, in the complaint, with violation of Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(D) by not advising the Regional Director of their intention to comply with the Board's 10(k) decision. In addition, Local 33 is alleged to have violated that same section of the Act by its processing, into arbitration, of its grievance which, on its face, alleges Blount is in violation of its subcontracting agreement with that labor organization.

At the hearing, counsel for the General Counsel presented me with a withdrawal request in Case 1-CD-715, and moved that I approve it. As a result of discussion among counsel for the General Counsel, counsel for the Charging Party in Case 1-CD-715, and me, regarding the effect of approval of a withdrawal in light of the Board's decision in Ducane Heating Corp., 273 NLRB 1389 (1985), the motion to approve the withdrawal request was withdrawn. This was done because the Charging Party's counsel asserted he "could easily envision there being a future basis for reactivating the charge (1-CD-715)."

The basis for such potential "reactivating" is clarified by one of the parties' stipulations. Specifically, by stipulations 4 and 5 (Tr. 18-19, 18 March 1985), it became clear that Local 218 had filed a grievance against Volpe (identical to that filed by Local 33 against Blount) asserting a violation of its subcontracting clause, but processing of that grievance is being held in abeyance by the parties' agreement pending resolution of the Local 33-Blount arbitration proceedings, which are the subject of the issue before me. Thus, the parties contemplated the possibility exists that the complaint allegations, pertaining to the parties in Case 1-CD-715, might be expanded in the future to include an allegation that the Local 218-Volpe grievance (and its possible arbitration) comprises an 8(b)(4)(D) violation.

The hearing proceeded. All evidence was by nature of stipulations among the parties and related only to the allegations pertaining to the unfair labor practices alleged to have been committed by Local 33, in Case 1-CD-714. All such evidence relates to the single issue as I have formulated it above.

With respect to the allegation (complaint pars. 11(a)(ii), 11(b), and 12(b)) that all three labor organizations violated the Act by failing to inform the Regional Director of intention to comply with the Board's 10(k) decision, the parties stipulated that each such Respondent actually had written the Regional Director on 5 November 1984 that each would comply with the Board's decision. Thus, counsel for the General Counsel noted, in her posthearing brief, that she "does not urge a finding of violation with respect to complaint paragraphs 11(a)(ii), 11(b) and 12(b)." In the Union's brief, it is contended "there is no longer any factual basis for maintaining this complaint against the Boston District Council and Local Union 218," because of the 5 November 1984 letter.

In the above posture, I deem it procedurally sound to distinguish the instant cases from one another. For clarity, and ease of disposition, I conclude the merits of the allegations in Case 1-CD-714 should be determined separately from those in Case 1-CD-715. This approach will promote the parties' apparent intentions in dealing with the Local 218-Volpe grievance being held in abeyance. Clearly, all parties understood that the allegations of Case 1-CD-715 that pertain to the legality of continued processing of the Local 218 grievance against Volpe should remain extant.

Accordingly, I sua sponte sever Case 1-CD-714 from Case 1-CD-715; and shall proceed to resolve all the issues in Case 1-CD-714, while recommending that the Board remand Case 1-CD-715 to the Regional Director for appropriate action.

As earlier described, the parties' stipulations show that each Respondent Union literally notified the Regional Director of its intention to comply with the Board's 10(k) decision. Accordingly, in order to dispose of all the allegations involving Local 33, I conclude it is appropriate to dismiss the allegations relating to its failure to give the notice to the Regional Director as unsupported by the evidence. I shall also recommend no conclusions or findings will be made on the failure-of-notice allegations directed against Local 218 and Boston District Council of Carpenters. Instead, those allegations (part of Case 1-CD-715) will remain unresolved, and subject to my remand recommendation.[3]

I now turn to consideration of the sole issue remaining, as I have framed it, in Case 1-CD-714.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Facts[4]

The operative facts are straightforward and substantially unrefuted. They fairly may be summarized as follows

1. Blount, a member of AGC, has authorized AGC to enter into collective-bargaining agreements with Local 33, among others.

2. At all material times Blount and Local 33 were parties to a collective-bargaining agreement, which contains, inter alia, a subcontracting provision that, in relevant part, provides:

> . . . the Employer (Blount) agrees that he will not sub-contract any work covered by this Agreement . . . except to contractors who are parties to a col-

---

[3] If the Board adopts my procedural actions, all future formal documents relative to the complaint allegations that are resolved by this decision necessarily should refer to Case 1-CD-714 only.

[4] The recitation of facts is a composite of facts that appear in the record of the 10(k) proceeding and those stipulated by the parties at the hearing before me.

All facts and argument of counsel have been considered. Omitted material is considered irrelevant, of little probative value, or superfluous.

> lective-bargaining agreement with the Union (Local 33).

Also, the collective-bargaining agreement provides that Local 33 shall perform all work concerning:

> The building, erecting and dismantling of all scaffolding and staging for all trades.

3. Some time before mid-May 1983, Blount, as general contractor for the Lafayette Place project, subcontracted the masonry work at that project, including erection of scaffolding for the installation of masonry work, to Filloramo Construction Company (not a party to this case). Filloramo was later replaced by Anastasi.

4. Anastasi was not a signatory to a collective-bargaining agreement with Local 33. Anastasi assigned the scaffolding work to members of Laborers Local 223.

5. In mid-May 1983, Local 33 Business Agent Ed Thompson told Blount's project manager for Lafayette Place that Local 33 was claiming jurisdiction over the scaffolding work.

7. The claim for the scaffolding work was repeated later on a number of occasions before August 1983 by R. Erickson, steward for Local 33.

8. On 24 August 1983, Carpenters Business Agent Marshall and Steward Erickson met with Blount's project manager Humphrey. Marshall said he was directing employees represented by Local 33 to discontinue working off the scaffolding which had been erected by Laborers pursuant to the subcontractor's assignment.

9. From 24 August until 30 August 1983, carpenters did not work off the scaffolding.

10. On 31 August 1983, Local 33, by telegram, requested meeting with AGC (apparently on behalf of Blount) "concerning the violation of our subcontracting clause." Pursuant to the grievance procedure (art. XXVII) of the Carpenters-AGC collective-bargaining agreement, this telegram effectively initiated a grievance by Local 33 against Blount.

11. On 16 December 1983, Local 33 demanded arbitration before the American Arbitration Association of the Union's claim that Blount violated its subcontracting agreement by allowing its masonry subcontractors to use laborers, instead of carpenters, for the scaffolding work at the Lafayette Place site.

12. On charges duly filed with the Board, the 10(k) hearing, underlying the instant proceeding, was conducted on 9 and 30 April and 4 May 1984.

13. Arbitration hearing on the Local 33 grievance described above, in paragraph 11, began on 21 September 1984.

14. On 22 October 1984, the Board issued its 10(k) decision, supra, 272 NLRB 860.

15. On 5 November 1984, Local 33 wrote the Regional Director it would refrain from forcing or requiring Blount (and Anastasi) to assign the disputed work, by means paroscribed by the Act, to employees represented by Local 33.

16. On 6 November 1984, the arbitration hearing resumed on the Local 33 grievance. At that session, the arbitrator ruled that the grievance was arbitrable.[5]

17. Further arbitration hearings were conducted on 3 and 4 January 1985, the arbitration remains in progress.[6]

18. Local 33 and Blount framed the following issues for the arbitrator: Is the grievance arbitrable; if so, did Blount violate the collective-bargaining agreement when it subcontracted certain work to a subcontractor who was not a signatory to a contract with the Carpenters Union; and, if so, what shall the remedy be? The AGC and Blount contended that the grievance was not arbitrable because of the Board's 10(k) award and because jurisdictional disputes are excluded from the grievance machinery by the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement.

19. In support of its claim the grievance was arbitrable, Local 33 argued, during the 6 November 1984 arbitration hearing "we are not here claiming that the subcontaractor on this particular job made an error in his work assignment, that's not the issue before you. . . . (the arbitrator)."

Also, on the same date, counsel for Local 33 asserted:

> The NLRB has come down in the meantime and said with respect to the work performed by these masonry subcontractors on these two particular jobs, the work should be that of the laborers. This grievance is not being brought under the jurisdictional procedure provisions of the contract. . . . All we are here to determine, I suggest to the arbitrator, is whether or not there is a violation of our agreement with Blount Brothers as to whether or not Blount Brothers violated the subcortracting clause.

20. Also, on 6 November 1984, Local 33 compared the work jurisdictional clauses of both the Carpenters' and the Laborers' collective-bargaining agreements and concluded that while the laborers agreement "does not in the agreed upon section contain a recitation that the erecting and dismantling of scaffolding is laborers' work," in the Carpenters contract there is "a clear agreement that erecting and dismantling of work is covered by our agreement." (Jt. Exh. 2(d), pp. 39–40). Also, Local 33 Representative Marshall testified that any scaffolding over 14 feet in height should be erected by members of the Carpenters Union. (Jt. Exh. 2 (d), pp. 79–80.)

21. During the 3 January 1985 arbitration hearing, Local 33 maintained:

> [a] Our dispute was always, as we maintained, a subcontracting dispute. We conceded, as we've con-

---

[5] On 9 November 1984, AGC and Blount filed suit in the U.S. district court to enjoin the arbitration on the ground the Board's 10(k) decision preempted it. The injunction was denied on 3 January 1985. In salient part, the court agreed with the Carpenters' contention that "the dispute is purely contractual and is not preempted or controlled by the 10(k) determination" AGC v. Carpenters, Case 84–3603–G, 3, U.S. District Court (Mass).

[6] At the hearing before me, additional dates for resumption of the arbitration had not yet been arranged.

> ceded from the date that the Board issued a determination, that the work performed by Anastasi's employees was not work to be performed on that job site by carpenters, because the Board had made a determination utilizing its factors not germane to an arbitration proceeding, that that particular work on that job for the reasons it gives in that decision should have been done by laborers. [Jt. Exh. 2, January 3, 1985 arbitration hearing, pp. 77–78.]
> [b] We've gone so far as to spell out that in subcontracting situations, the general jurisdictional dispute arguments don't apply. We're not arguing with Anastasi here over which of his employees should not have subcontracted the work to Anastasi because it is in violation of our particular contract, because certain work performed by Anastasi is ennumerated [sic], covered by the list in this contract. [Jt. Exh. 2, January 3, 1985 arbitration hearing, p. 87.]
> [c] We're not asking Blount Brothers to force Anastasi to use anyone else but laborers. That is not the claim before the arbitrator. (Jt. Exh. 2, January 3, 1983 arbitration hearing, p. 90.]

22. As to remedy sought from the arbitration proceeding, Local 33 urged:

> We would seek against the general contractor here—because the work has already been performed by laborers, we would seek . . . that individuals [who would have gone to work for Blount Brothers or any other sub who was signatory to this agreement] be made whole for any loss of pay that they would have suffered because the carpenters [sic] were given the work, and that contributions be made to the various benefit funds for all the hours which it took laborers to erect and dismantle the pipe scaffolding as opposed to carpenters [Jt. Exh. 2(d), pp. 40–41.]

B. Analysis

1. Parties' contentions

The General Counsel and AGC (for Blount) contend the filing of the grievance by Local 33 against Blount, and its pursuit in the arbitration proceeding, especially after the Board's 10(k) decision, has, as an object, the forcing or requiring of Blount to assign the disputed work to members of the Carpenters Union rather than to members of Laborers. They argue that such conduct by Local 33 contravenes and undermines the Board's 10(k) decision and violates Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(D).

Local 33 contends continued pursuit of its grievance against Blount, into arbitration, is a lawful exercise of its right to rectify what it believes to be a breach of their subcontracting clause, and that the arbitration is not intended to require assignment of the disputed work to the carpenters.

2. Discussion

In my view, resolution of the issue requires an assessment of the positions taken by, and conduct of, representatives, of Local 33. If, as Local 33 asserts, the evidence demonstrates its arbitration case is solely designed to remedy an alleged breach of contact, then Local 33 should prevail. If, on the other hand, the record shows that the arbitration is merely an extension, and continuation, of jurisdictional claims that the Board found to exist, then the General Counsel and the Charging Party will have satisfied the burden of proving the violation charged.

The position of Local 33 is superficially appealing. However, it does not withstand scrutiny. Evaluation of all relevant evidence persuades me that there is merit to the position of the General Counsel and the Charging Party.

My analysis proceeds from the Board's 10(k) decision. There, the Board found that Local 33 orally claimed the disputed work, engaged in a work stoppage to enforce that claim, and filed a grievance against Blount. The Board, in that decision, concluded that a jurisdictional dispute existed between Local 33 and Blount. Based on that finding, I conclude that there is present herein a jurisdictional dispute over the scaffolding work. That issue was raised and fully litigated in the 10(k) proceeding. It may not be relitigated in the instant case. Longshoremen ILWU Local 7 (Georgia-Pacific Corp.), 273 NLRB 363 (1984).

The critical question presented is whether the arbitation proceedings are in furtherance of the Carpenters jurisdictional claim to the disputed work. The answer to this factual question may be found by resort to the following evidence.

The following factors tend to show, as the General Counsel claims, that the arbitration issue, "although referred to as a breach of the subcontracting clauses, was actually bottomed on" the Carpenters' original jurisdictional claim.

1. The grievance was filed on the very next day following the end of the Carpenters' 1-week work stoppage. As earlier noted, the Board (in the 10(k) decision) found that work stoppage was conducted in support of the jurisdictional claim.

Also significant is the fact that the grievances, for the first time, articulated the issue in terms of a contractual dispute. Thus, the record reflects that, from at least mid-May 1983 until the grievance filing (on 31 August 1983), no representative of Local 33 claimed a breach of the subcontracting clause. Until the grievance was filed, Local 33 based its claim to the disputed work purely on jurisdictional grounds.

In my view, the approximately 3 months during which Local 33 laid its claim to the disputed work in terms of a jurisdictional dispute tends to diminish the strength of that union's protestations that the grievance and arbitration are based on a breach of contract. This view is buttressed by the evidence (not previously described) which shows that a grievance normally would have been filed sooner than it was, had the issue been contractual rather than jurisdictional in character. Thus, during the arbitration hearing, Marshall testified that when the Carpenters perceives a contractual violation, the matter is customariy processed in the grievance procedure (Jt. Exh. 2, pp. -66-77; 3-79-80; 3-31-137).

In the peculiar circumstances of this case, I conclude the delay in resorting to the grievance procedure, coupled with the filing of the grievance, virtually contemporaneous with the end of the jurisdictional work stoppage, tends to show the grievance was an extension of the jurisdictional dispute. I concede the possibility the grievance filing is susceptible to an acknowledgment by Local 33 that it erroneously perceived the issue to be jurisdictional and the filing of the grievance constituted corrective action to more accurately characterize the dispute. Nonetheless, I find such an interpertation highly speculative in all the surrounding circumstances, and negated by the other events, and their import, to be described below.

2. At the arbitration hearings, Local 33 assiduously sought to impress the arbitrator with the point that Local 33 believes the disputed work is to be performed by carpenters. At one point, it was argued that the Carpenters-AGC collective-bargaining agreement contains an agreement that "erecting and dismantling of work is covered by our [the Carpenters'] agreement" (Jt. Exh. 2, p. 40). Later, Union Representative Grosso testified that, when he learned that Blount's Masonry subcontractor had no contract with the Carpenters, he advised Blount that the disputed work "was traditionally done by the carpenter(s) . . . . (Jt. Exh. 2, p. 3-21). Also, Marshall testified, at the arbitration hearing, that he had claimed (to Blount) the disputed work "was covered within the craft jurisdictional claim of the carpenters" (Jt. Exh. 2, pp. 3-57, L.15-19). Marshall, during the arbitration, acknowledged he met at least once with representatives of the Laborers Union (to whom the Board later awarded the disputed work) to discuss the issue in a jurisdictional framework (Jt. Exh. 2, pp. 3-69-3-70). He also claimed, during his arbitration testimony, "we feel [the disputed work] is the work of the carpenters," and cited jurisdictional decisions in the so-called green book as the basis for the carpenters claim (Jt. Exh. 2, pp. 3-80).

The repetitious emphasis, during the arbitration proceeding, of the Carpenters' belief that performance of the disputed work belonged to employees it represented, I find, casts light on the true nature of the arbitration. Though that emphasis does not conclusively foreclose the issue, it is some indicator that an objective of the arbitration is to assure the disputed work is awarded to the Carpenters. Such an obligation is more consistent with continued pursuit of the Carpenters' jurisdictional claim than with its claimed contractual breach. It entirely undermines the Board's 10(k) decision.

3. The remedy sought by Local 33, through arbitration, tends to demonstrate the dispute continues to bear its juridictional character. In paragraph 22, section IIA, supra, there is abstracted a statement, made during the arbitration, of the remedy Local 33 seeks to achieve from it. That abstract shows Local 33 would expect the arbitrator to render an award which compensates its members as if they had performed the disputed work. Seeking such a remedy, so-called in lieu-of, has been held tantamount to a claim that the disputed work belongs to the claimant's members. As such, the claimed remedy is indicative of a jurisdictional claim. Longshoremen Local 7 ILWU (Georgia-Pacific), supra.[7]

Also, in Longshoremen ILWU Local 32 (Weyerhauser Co), 271 NLRB 759 at 762, the Board left undisturbed its judge's observation that "[i]t is implicit that if [the employer] is compelled to pay wages for work not performed, it will suffer economically, and the incentive will be to either cease doing business with Weyerhauser or to force or require Weyerhauser to reassign the disputed work to Respondent's members." I conclude the arbitration remedy requested by Local 33 will have the same result herein. Obviously, an order requiring Blount to pay the members of Local 33 what they would have earned had they been assigned the disputed work will be to Blount's economic detriment.

Moreover, it is rather disingenuous for Local 33 to claim that it seeks only a backpay remedy from the arbitration. Clearly, if Blount is required to pay twice for work performed only once, it is logical to assume Blount will seek ways to extricate itself from similar double-liability. The method of doing so is to cease engaging subcontractors who have no collective-bargaining agreements with the Carpenters, and make subcontracting arrangements which will assure assignment of the disputed work to the carpenters. The ultimate effect of such arrangements clearly reflects an object proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D). The fact that the arbitration claim is ostensibly predicated on contractual obligations does not affect the impact of other evidence that tends to portray the jurisdictional nature of the dispute. Teamsters Local 85 (Pacific Maritime Assn.), 224 NLRB 801, 806 fn. 3 (1976); Electrical Workers IBEW Local 354 (Johnson Co.), 200 NLRB 599, 601 (1972); Carpenters Local 735 (Blount Bros.), 175 NLRB 496, 497 and cases at fn. 3 (1969).

In the context of the above-described factors, the numerous assertions and contentions by Local 33 (see pars. 19 and 21, section I,Ia, supra, that its pursuit of the arbitration case against Blount does not have, as an object, the assignment of the disputed work to its members wholly unpersuasive. The Board views such bare disclaimers with skepticism where, as here, there is extrinsic evidence that the disclaiming party has engaged in conduct inconsistent with the disclaimer's terms.

In Carpenters Local 102 (Meiswinkel, Inc.), 260 NLRB 972, 975 (1982), the Board commented, in circumstances similar to the instant case, "The Board will not honor a hollow disclaimer." Also, in Iron Workers Local 350 (Cornell & Co.), 271 NLRB 1182 (1982), in which the Carpenters pursued a grievance against the general contractor, not the subcontractor who assigned the disputed work (a situation analogous to the present case), the Board held the pursuit of a similar grievance is inconsistent with the grievant's disclaimer that the grievance was in furtherance of a jurisdictional dispute.

[7] I note that, in the cited case, the charged union had not notified the Regional Director it intended to comply with the 10(k) award in that case. This distinction is not significant because I conclude the instant circumstances render the 5 November 1984 Local 33 letter to the Regional Director of little probative value herein. The evidence, described immediately above in the text of this decision, is, to me, more cogent evidence of the true nature of the arbitration objective than the purely self-serving assertion made in the 5 November letter.

Local 33 strongly suggests that I am virtually precluded from concluding a proscribed object exists because (1) its 5 November letter to the Regional Director effectively dispels the existence of such an objective; (2) the arbitrator's conclusion the grievance is arbitrable and that an "in-lieu of" remedy is unlikely vitiates such a finding; and (3) the U.S. district court's denial of the Charging Party's petition to enjoin the arbitration included the judge's observation that "the dispute is purely contractual and is not preempted or controlled by the 10(k) determination." (See fn. 5, supra). I disagree. Instead, I conclude none of these elements prevents the finding, which I make, that an object of the arbitration contravenes Section 8(b)(4)(D). I have already noted (fn. 7, supra) the contents of the 5 November letter are of little probative aid to Local 33. This is so because I conclude the Union's subsequent activity, both factually and legally, belie the assertions in the letter.

Regarding the contention that the pronouncements of the arbitrator require me to rule in favor of Local 33, while it is clear that though national labor policy encourages the arbitral process, it is equally clear that the Board's 10(k) decision is entitled to precedence over the arbitration process. Carey v. Westinghouse Electric Corp., 375 U.S. 261, 272 (1963). Thus, I conclude, I am not bound by the arbitrator's views.

Similarly, I need not give dispositive weight to the conclusions of District Court Judge Garrity. It is my obligation to follow Board precedent until the Board or the Supreme Court overrules them; and this is true despite contrary authority in courts of appeals. Waco, Inc., 273 NLRB 746 fn. 14 (1984); Iowa Beef Packers, 144 NLRB 615 (1963).[8]

Likewise, the following other cases cited by Local 33 are found not to be conclusive precedent Laborers Local 1140 (Lanco Corp.), 227 NLRB 1247 (1977); Operating Engineers Local 12 (Robert E. Fulton), 154 NLRB 839 (1965). Each of these cases is materially distinguishable from the instant case in that each was decided, in relevant part, on a totally different statutory scheme, namely, enforcement of an agreement governed by 8(e) or 8(b)(4)(B) violations (the secondary nature of which do not involve jurisdictional issues), not Section 8(b)(4)(D) and Section 10(k) as in the case at bar.

Finally, I find the efforts of Local 33 to distinguish the Weyerhauser and Georgia-Pacific cases, supra, relied on by the General Counsel and the Charging Party, unconvincing. In the particular circumstances of this case, I conclude the differences noted by Local 33 are not sufficiently cogent to remove the applicability of relevant legal principles of those cases to the instant matter.

Having determined a jurisdictional dispute is present, and that an object of the Local 33 arbitration is proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D), I turn now to the coercive nature of the Union's activity.

The circumstances of this case persuade me that the coercive nature of Local 33's pursuit of its arbitration case is as implicit here, as in Weyerhauser, supra. Whether or not resort to contractual procedures for collection of money damages for alleged violations of work assignments provisions comprise proscribed threats, coercion, or restraint depends on the circumstances of each case. Compare, Sheet Metal Workers Local 49 (Los Alamos Contractors), 206 NLRB 473 (1973), with Pulp & Paper Workers Local (Georgia-Pacific Corp.), 267 NLRB 26 (1983), and Teamsters Local 85 (Pacific Maritime Assn)., supra. Here, I interpret pursuit of the arbitration case by Local 33 against Blount an effort to achieve, by indirection, what the Union failed to accomplish in the 10(k) proceeding, namely, assignment of the disputed work to the carpenters. Pursuit of in-lieu-of grievances has been found to possess proscribed coercion in cases analogous to the instant matter Georgia-Pacific, supra; Weyerhauser, and Teamsters Local 85, supra.

Here, the coerciveness of Local 33's activities is further demonstrated by its activities beyond the mere pursuit of the arbitration. First, Local 33 threatened a work stoppage. Later, albeit of brief duration, it actually engaged in a work stoppage. It requires no extensive analysis for discussion to perceive the plainly coercive character of that conduct.

Finally, I consider the fact that Local 33 is pursuing its arbitration against Blount, a neutral employer having no direct control over the disputed assignment, an important and revealing factor in assessing the coerciveness of its conduct. Such pressure both diminishes the thrust of Local 33's contention that its arbitration is designed to resolve a contractual dispute, and also nurtures a coercive atmosphere. Enmeshing a neutral within the ambit of a dispute to which it is not a party patently is inherently coercive because, absent the presence of the arbitrtion, the neutral employer would be free to pay only once to have the disputed work performed and would not have to act more cautiously in future acquisition of its subcontractors to perform that work. Stated another way, the presence of the arbitration impedes the neutral's freedom to select its subcontractors.

While I acknowledge it is arguable that Blount's agreement to the subcontracting clause may be viewed as its voluntary relinquishment, or qualification, if that freedom, Blount's assent to the subcontracting limitations could not have contemplated its enforcement to seek objectives proscribed by the Act. On the foregoing, I conclude that, in all the present circumstances, pursuit of the abitration is coercive within the meaning of the Act.

On all the above, I find that the record supports the conclusion, which I make, by a preponderance of the evidence, that Local 33 is violating Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(D) of the Act by initiating and pursuing its arbitration against Blount over the disputed work.

Conclusions of Law

1. Blount Brothers Corporation is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Local 33, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

---

[8] For these reasons, I find Associated General Contractors v. Operating Engineers Local 701, 91 LRRM 2426 (9th Cir. 1976), cited by Local 33, not controlling here.

3. Local 33 did not fail to notify the Regional Director of its intent to comply with the Board's 10(k) decision underlying the instant proceedings. Hence, there is no merit to the allegations contained in complaint paragraphs 11(a)(ii) and 12(a).

4. Local 33 has engaged in unfair labor practices proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(D) of the Act by filing, and pursuing into arbitration against Blount, in-lieu-of claims for work performed by Laborers Local 223 with an object of forcing or requiring Blount to assign the work, described below, to employees represented by Local 33 rather than to employees represented by Laborers Local 223. The work consists of: Erecting and dismantling of pipe scaffolding for the installation of masonry work on the Lafayette Place project.[9]

5. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Local 33 has engaged in unfair labor practices proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(D) of the Act, I shall recommend that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the purposes of the Act.

[Recommended Order omitted from publication.]

---

[9] This conclusion is not mooted by the fact the work on the Lafayette Place project has been completed. There is no evidence to show that the dispute will not recur should Blount perform future similar work within the geographic jurisdiction of Local 33. Boston Building Trades Council, 269 NLRB 479, 480 (1984).

Brannan Sand and Gravel Co. and Laborers' International Union of North America, Local No. 86. Cases 27-CA-9329-2,[1] 27-CA-9391, and 27-CA-9527

July 29, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On September 23, 1986, Administrative Law Judge Gerald A. Wacknov issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a cross-exception,[2] a supporting brief, and an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the portions of the decision relating to Cases 27-CA-9329-2, 27-CA-9391, and 27-CA-9527 and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[3] and conclusions [4] relating to the above cases and to adopt the recommended Order as modified and fully set forth below.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified and fully set forth below and orders that the Respondent, Brannan Sand and Gravel Co., Denver, Colorado, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Failing and refusing to bargain in good faith with Laborers' International Union of North America, Local No. 86 as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of its employees in the following appropriate bargaining unit:

> All employees employed as asphalt laborers and general laborers, but excluding office clerical employees, salesmen, professional employees, and all guards and supervisors as defined in the Act, and employees represented under collective-bargaining agreements in effect between the Respondent and Teamsters Local No. 13, and Operating Engineers Local No. 9, and all other employees.

(b) Failing and refusing to enter into, execute, and abide by the terms of a collective-bargaining agreement reached with the Laborers on July 24, 1985.

(c) Failing to reinstate immediately unfair labor practice strikers upon application.

(d) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request, bargain collectively with the Laborers as the exclusive representative of the employees in the above-described Laborers unit, and enter into, execute, and give retroactive effect to the provisions of the collective-bargaining agreement reached with the Laborers on July 24, 1985. Make employees whole, with interest,[5] for any losses resulting from the Respondent's failure to comply with the terms and conditions of the collective-bargaining agreement.

(b) Make whole employees Allan Hillard, Tom Garcia, and Fred Stemen for the discrimination against them, in the manner set forth above in the remedy section of the judge's decision.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its facility in Denver, Colorado, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[6] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 27, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

[1] Case 27-CA-9329-3 involving the Respondent and Teamsters Construction Workers, Local Union No. 13 was severed from these cases by Board Order dated October 30, 1987.

[2] The General Counsel's request for a visitatorial clause is denied as the circumstances of this case do not "demonstrate a likelihood that [the] [R]espondent will fail to cooperate or otherwise evade compliance." See Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

[3] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

In sec. III,C,1, par. 12 of his decision, the judge referred to a July 22 contract proposal. The correct date of the proposal is July 2. We correct this inadvertent error.

[4] In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

[5] Interest shall be computed in accordance with New Horizons, supra, and Merryweather Optical Co., 240 NLRB 1213 (1979), as appropriate.

289 NLRB No. 169

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain with Laborers' International Union of North America, Local No. 86 as the exclusive representative of the employees in the bargaining unit.

WE WILL NOT fail and refuse to execute the collective-bargaining agreement that was accepted on July 24, 1985, by Laborers' International Union of North America, Local No. 86.

WE WILL NOT refuse to reinstate unfair labor practice strikers on application.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, on request, bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative of employees in the following appropriate bargaining unit:

> All employees employed as asphalt laborers and general laborers, but excluding office clerical employees, salesmen, professional employees, and all guards and supervisors as defined in the Act, and employees represented under collective-bargaining agreements in effect between us and Teamsters Local No. 13, and Operating Engineers Local No. 9, and all other employees.

WE WILL, on request, execute the agreement reached with the Union on July 24, 1985, and WE WILL give retroactive effect to its terms.

WE WILL make employees Allen Hillard, Tom Garcia, and Fred Stemen whole, with interest, for our failure to timely offer them reinstatement.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

GERALD A. WACKNOV, Administrative Law Judge. Pursuant to notice, a hearing with respect to this matter was held before me in Denver, Colorado, on 6-9 May 1986. The initial charges were filed as follows: Case 27-CA-9329-2 (1 August 1985, Laborers); Case 27-CA-9329-3 (2 August 1985, Teamsters); Case 27-CA-9391 (18 September 1985, Laborers); and Case 27-CA-9527 (27 January 1986, Laborers). Pursuant to the various charges, complaints were issued by the Regional Director for Region 27 on 2 and 30 October 1985, and a final consolidated complaint was issued on 18 February 1986. The consolidated complaint alleges violations by Brannan Sand and Gravel Co. (Respondent) of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the National Labor Pelations Act (the Act).

The parties were allowed full opportunity to be heard, to call, examine, and cross-examine witnesses, and to introduce relevant evidence. Since the close of the hearing, briefs have been received from the General Counsel and counsel for Respondent.

On the entire record,[1] and based on my observation of the witnesses and consideration of the briefs submitted, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Respondent is engaged in the asphalt paving and sand and gravel business, and maintains its office and principal place of business in Denver, Colorado. In the course and conduct of its business operations, the Respondent annually purchases and receives goods, materials, and services valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points and places outside the State of Colorado, and annually sells and ships goods, materials, and services valued in excess of $50,000 directly to other enterprises or entities within the State of Colorado, including the State of Colorado and the city and county of Denver, which other enterprises are directly engaged in interstate commerce.

It is admitted, and I find, that the Respondent is now, and has been at all times material, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

---

[1] The General Counsel's 17 July 1986 unopposed motion to correct transcript is granted.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATIONS INVOLVED

It is admitted, and I find, that Laborers' International Union of North America, Local No. 86, and Teamsters Construction Workers, Local Union No. 13 are now, and have been at all times material, labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Issues

The principal issues raised by the pleadings are whether Respondent has refused to bargain in good faith with the Teamsters, and has refused to enter into and execute a collective-bargaining agreement with the Laborers. Subsidiary issues concern the effects of such alleged violations of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

B. The Facts

1. Background—The Teamsters negotiations

The Respondent has maintained a collective-bargaining relationship with Teamsters Local 13 for in excess of 30 years. Historically, the Respondent has been one of the three major paving contractors in the greater Denver geographic area, and has entered into the same or substantially similar collective-bargaining agreement with the Teamsters as Western Paving and Peter Kiewit, the other two major contractors. The Respondent has also maintained a collective-bargaining relationship with the Laborers and Operating Engineers. Each of the three contracts between Respondent and the aforementioned Unions expired simultaneously on 30 June 1985.[2]

Negotiations for new contracts commenced on 7 June. The Teamsters negotiated independently, although they frequently attended bargaining sessions of the other two unions. The Laborers, for convenience, frequently negotiated in the same sessions with the Operating Engineers, but it was understood that each union was negotiating a separate agreement.

Written proposals were exchanged at the outset of the first negotiating session between Respondent and the Teamsters. The proposal handed to the Respondent at that first meeting by the Teamsters assumed continuation of the existing agreement except for some modification of the hours of work and overtime article. The proposal also contained a request for a general increase in wages of 65 cents per year for each year of a proposed 3-year agreement, and yearly increases in health and welfare, pension, and vacation benefits.

Respondent's chief spokesman, Kermit Darkey of Mountain States Employers Council, enunciated the Respondent's bargaining position at the outset of that first meeting. Darkey stated that the paving industry environment in Colorado and in the metropolitan Denver area had become increasingly nonunion, that this was making it more difficult for the Company to be competitive, and that it was important for Brannan to be competitive to survive. Darkey then went on to name some 30 or 40 contractors in the Denver metropolitan area that, according to Darkey, were Brannan's competitors. He pointed out that these competitors were either no longer unionized and therefore not restricted by collective-bargaining contracts, or had never been unionized. Darkey went on to state that for Brannan to remain competitive, survive, stay in business, and continue to provide jobs for union members, the restrictions and inefficiencies embodied in the existing contract must be deleted. Darkey advised the Teamsters that for Brannan "to survive or compete, it must operate as efficiently, as economically, as productively as the largest or smallest nonunion Company against which we competed. That we're not restricted with what was in the Union contracts."

Darkey's emphasis on the inefficiencies in the existing contract prompted Jack Parker, the Teamsters' president and chief negotiator, to point out specific areas of inefficiency on the part of management. Darkey said the Company knew about these matters but intended to do nothing about them. Rather, Brannan wanted to get concessions at the bargaining table.

Respondent's contract proposals, which were presented to the Teamsters that day, constituted a radical departure from the existing agreement and sought to delete or substantially change virtually every significant current provision:

1. The union membership article would be changed to delete the 8-day requirement for employees to become union members, and a 30-day requirement period would be substituted.

2. The hiring procedure article, which established a formal hiring hall system, was deleted. In its place the Respondent proposed the following:

> The Employer reserves and retains the right to hire any employee from any source. NOTE: This Article is modified because of the Union's reluctance and opposition to assisting the Employer in manning an efficient and productive operation.

3. The safety article, which, inter alia, provided that employees could refuse to work under unsafe conditions, was deleted.

4. The Respondent proposed to delete the new inexperienced employees article, which provided that in the event an experienced employee was unavailable, the Union could refer an inexperienced employee at a rate of 25 cents per hour below the contract classification rate. In its place the Respondent proposed a new article entitled "Trainees and Helpers," which would establish a $6-starting rate for new employees classified as trainees and helpers.

5. The Respondent proposed that the management article contain, inter alia, the following:

> Notwithstanding the Recognition Article or any Article of this Agreement, the Employer retains the right to assign, transfer or interchange employees under this Agreement to perform work and duties as assigned even though the work is not covered by this Agreement. Said employees may be assigned, transferred or interchanged to work with other employees of the Employer in the interest of an efficient, economic and productive operation.

6. The Respondent proposed to delete the job stewards article, which provides that the Union may appoint a job steward for each shift on each job or project, who is authorized to carry out duties relating to enforcement of the agreement. In its proposal the Respondent gave the following reasons for deleting this article:

> Delete this Article because the Union fails or refuses to consider the wishes of Stewards, or to consider judgments of a Steward in matters affecting unit employees.
> The Union has threatened action against Stewards. Because the Article has not been used as a positive Article to promote harmony and cooperation, but rather has been used as a coercive and intimidating Article, it must be deleted.

7. The Respondent proposed to delete the work jurisdiction article, which provides that unit employees may not be assigned work not covered by the agreement, and that nonunit employees may not be assigned unit work covered by the agreement. In its proposal the Respondent gave the following reason for deleting this article.

> Delete this Article because Employer must compete with an increasingly union-free asphalt industry that is not burdened by costly, inefficient and restrictive practices, procedures and language.

8. The Respondent proposed to delete the hours of work and overtime article that, inter alia, provides for showup pay, overtime pay for work in excess of 8 hours per day, and premium pay for certain Sunday and holiday work. Respondent proposed to delete this article for the following reason:

> Delete this Article to meet increasingly union-free asphalt industry practices which operate without the payment of daily overtime and premium pay for Saturday and Sunday operations. Less than six of over 50 asphalt operations statewide are unionized by the Union.

In its place the Respondent proposed that overtime pay would be paid for all hours worked in excess of 40 hours per week, with no provision for showup pay.

9. The Respondent proposed that the working conditions article be amended to delete the clause providing that a discharged or laid-off employee is entitled to regular hourly pay for the hours he is required to wait for his final paycheck.

10. Respondent proposed to delete the subcontractors article, which is in effect a work-preservation clause whereby the Respondent shall require the subcontractor to abide by all the terms of the agreement including payment to the various union trust funds (health and welfare fund, pension fund, vacation fund, and the industry fund).

11. Respondent proposed that the wage scale and zones article, which, inter alia, sets forth wage scales and classifications, contain the following:

> The hourly rates of pay set forth in this Agreement are and shall be considered to be minimum rates of pay. Attached as an appendix entitled Minimum Hourly Wage Rates and Classifications of Work is a schedule establishing classifications A, B, C, and D, each with a minimum hourly wage rate.

12. The Respondent proposed to delete the employees article, which listed and defined 13 general job descriptions, including drivers, warehousemen, greasers, servicemen, mechanics and other classifications of employees within the unit. The Respondent gave the following reason for deleting this proposal:

> Delete this Article because the Employer retains the right to interchange drivers to drive equipment the employee is qualified and licensed to operate.

13. The Respondent proposed to delete the truck rental conditions article, which in effect provides that the drivers of rental or lease vehicles shall be paid the contract wage and benefits, including payments to the various trust funds. The Respondent gave the following reasons for deletion of this article:

> Delete this Article because existing circumstances and economics require the use of non-employer owned equipment to meet the peak demands of a business. It is necessary for the Employer to operate more efficiently and economically to survive in a union-free asphalt industry and in order to provide jobs for employees.

14. The Respondent proposed deletion of the fringe benefits article, which provides for payment to a Teamsters health and welfare trust fund, a Teamsters pension fund, and a Teamsters vacation fund. The Respondent proposed to establish its own health and welfare plan, including a life and accidental death benefit, and its own retirement-deferred compensation plan.

At the second meeting, on 17 June, Parker requested copies of the Respondent's proposed health and welfare and retirement plans. Gus Wittenberg, one of Respondent's officials, said the Company also intended to propose a profit-sharing plan and that he would provide the Union with that information when it was available. There was a discussion of Respondent's proposals. At one point Darkey said no current employee would initially suffer a reduction in pay under the new A, B, C, and D wage classification schedule (see proposal number 11, above), but that an employee's pay could be reduced under this proposal if his performance, ability, or efficiency was not satisfactory in the opinion of management. Each new employee, according to Darkey, would be placed in a particular classification according to the Company's evaluation of his competence, and this could vary from day to day; nor would there be automatic progression to a higher wage category.

Darkey said the Respondent intended to subcontract out any and all work at the cheapest rate possible, in every situation, as the nonunion companies were able to do; that such contracting out would not be limited to overflow work that could not be handled by the current employee complement; and that this would necessarily result in the need for fewer Brannan trucks and therefore fewer Brannan employees.

Parker inquired whether in light of Respondent's negation of the entire contract, it was pleading poverty. Darkey said no and added that the Company had made a profit during each year of the 3-year term of the current contract. At the end of the meeting Parker again requested written copies of the various plans proposed by Respondent, and was told that the Company would provide that information as soon as it was available.

The next meeting was on 26 June. A Federal mediator was present. Parker requested the plan booklets and was told that the Company was in the process of gathering this information and would put it in the mail. A written summary of the proposed pension and profit-sharing plans was handed to the Union. The Respondent submitted a modified proposal, withdrawing its prior proposals on union membership (No. 1, supra), safety (No. 3, supra), and trainees and helpers (No. 4, supra). It continued to delete the new inexperienced employees article; proposed under the work jurisdiction article the same paragraph as originally proposed under management-rights (No. 5, supra); provided that the hours of work and overtime article shall include that overtime at the rate of time and one-half shall be paid for all hours worked on Sunday; proposed a deferred compensation profit-sharing article; and proposed a 1-year agreement. Also, the proposal listed the names of the 77 current unit employees, and classified all except 5 of them within wage group A.

There was discussion regarding whether, under Respondent's wage proposal, the employees could suffer a demotion to a lower wage rate. Darkey said yes, if their performance was not satisfactory. When asked if this change would be subject to the grievance and arbitration procedure, Darkey said that under Respondent's proposal it would not be grievable.

The proposed pension plan was described by Respondent's representatives, and it was stated that whether any money was allocated to the pension fund depended on the profitability of the Company and was solely at the Company's discretion; moreover, that an employee must work 1000 hours a year to qualify. Darkey said there would no longer be a vacation fund nor would employees receive a vacation. Rather, the deletion of the vacation pay provision would just result in a 70-cent-an-hour takeaway from the employees.

Darkey responded to the Union's initial proposal by summarily rejecting each item. He insisted that there would be no increase in wages, and adamantly maintained that the Company would accept only the health and welfare and pension plans it proposed. Parker advised Darkey that the Union had scheduled a membership meeting, and stated that the Union needed to get a firm indication of the Company's willingness to make any movement. Darkey made no response to this query. At the conclusion of the meeting Parker said that the Union neither accepted nor rejected any of the Company's proposals and would continue to consider them.

The 28 June union membership meeting was held as scheduled. The employees voted to reject the Respondent's proposed contract and to strike on 3 July if Parker observed that no progress was made at the 2 July negotiating meeting with the Laborers and Operating Engineers.[3] Parker attended the meeting on 2 July as an observer and saw that no progress was being made. Therefore, the Teamsters struck the morning of 3 July. The other two unions observed the picket line.

On 3 July the Respondent hand-delivered a letter, signed by Respondent's president, W. W. Sellers, to the Union stating that it intended to resume and continue operations; that it would begin hiring permanent replacements; that "effective immediately, we are discontinuing enforcement of the Union Security provisions of the Collective Bargaining Agreement"; and that the Company made the Union its best offer on 26 June and "because of the impasse which exists the Company will impasse the wage rate offer made the Union June 26, 1985."

Parker attended the 8 July meeting between Respondent and the Laborers and Operating Engineers. At this meeting Darkey said that he had a proposal for the Laborers and Operating Engineers but that the Teamsters would not get a proposal because they were on strike. Parker said that even though there was a strike there was no impasse, and that the Teamsters had not rejected any of Respondent's proposals and expected to continue negotiating with the Company. Darkey replied, according to Parker, that when there was a picket line the parties were at impasse. Parker again requested the booklets on the health and welfare and pension plans so that he could give them to the Union's actuary for studying. Shortly after the meeting, Parker wrote a letter to Darkey confirming Parker's statements at the meeting, namely, that the Union disagreed that an impasse had been reached; that the Union had not received the promised health and welfare information so that it could be sent to the Union's actuary for analysis,[4] and that the Union had rejected none of the Company's proposals and intended to submit counterproposals at the next meeting.

By letter dated 9 July the Respondent advised the Teamsters that the Company intended to implement certain terms and conditions of employment for the returning strikers and replacement employees. The letter stated that the subcontractor's article would not be enforced; the proposed hours of work and overtime pay provisions would be put in effect; and all returning strikers and replacement employees would be covered by the Respondent's health and welfare and deferred compensation plan.

[3] The Respondent's bargaining position and contract proposals submitted to the Laborers and Operating Engineers were similar in certain respects to those directed toward the Teamsters. However, many significant items in the Teamsters contract had never been included in the contracts with the other Unions.

[4] Certain information regarding the Respondent's proposed health and welfare plan was hand-delivered to the Union later that day.

The Union replied on 10 July, strongly objecting to the foregoing unilateral action, and stated that it was ready and willing to meet.

Parker attended another meeting as an observer on 12 July. Darkey announced at this meeting that the union-security and hiring hall provisions would no longer be enforced. Parker maintained that the Respondent was not bargaining in good faith, and that Darkey had been less than honest and had refused to respond to the Union's repeated requests to advise the Union what was really needed, in specific terms, to reach agreement. Darkey replied that the Teamsters were inflexible and would not deviate from the subcontracting and rental clauses that was of great concern. Parker said that the Teamsters were flexible and could meet the Company on common ground on those issues if Darkey would forgo the generalities about the nonunion economic climate and articulate what the Company really needed. Darkey asked whether the Union could agree to anything different than what was contained in the Western Paving contract, one of the three major contractors. Parker said yes. Darkey nevertheless reiterated that the parties were at impasse.

The next meeting was held on 19 July. Darkey handed the Union a position statement setting forth, in summary form, the current status of the various proposals and said he was withdrawing the union-security provision. The Union handed the Company a new proposal requesting a wage increase of 50 cents rather than 65 cents as originally proposed. Parker also made a verbal proposal on subcontracting whereby the contract fringe benefits would be included in the paychecks of subcontractors' employees, in response to Respondent's contention that it could not hire certain subcontractors because their employees did not want those benefits paid to the union trust funds. Darkey rejected this proposal, without discussion, and reiterated that the Company would not agree to any contract that had any subcontracting provision in it. Parker maintained that the Union was flexible and that common ground could be reached if the Company would just make counterproposals. Darkey said a compromise might have been possible prior to the strike, but there could no longer be any compromises.

The Union received a letter from the Company dated 23 July stating that the Respondent had implemented its various proposals and had deleted and discontinued enforcement of all those contract provisions that during bargaining, it had proposed to delete.

Parker replied on 24 July as follows:

> I am in receipt of your July 23, 1985 Hand Delivered letter informing this Local of the implementation of the Brannan Company's Hospitalization and Medical Benefits Plan, the Profit Sharing and Productivity Incentive Bonus Plans and overtime proposal effective July 22, 1985 and the deletion of the Truck Rental and Sub-contractor provisions of the contract.
>
> Please be advised we continue to strongly object to all the above changes and insist you make no changes from the status quo until a new agreement or impasse is reached. Impasse definitely has not occurred as we have several new proposals to submit.
>
> As you are aware this Local has rejected none of the Company's proposals and have made several counter proposals in an effort to reach compromises. You, however, have continued your unyielding position and have refused to make any concessions or counter proposals, which smacks of not bargaining in good faith. It now appears our only alternative is to file charges at the Board.
> We also continue ready and willing to bargain at any mutually agreed time and place.

The Company's reply, dated 29 July, is as follows:

> Reference is made to your respective letters which responded to the hand-delivered letter of July 23, 1985, which letter you were advised that certain proposals of Brannan Sand & Gravel Co. would be implemented.
>
> Both Unions have repeatedly been offered the opportunity to make proposals since the strike of July 3, 1985. The Employer was willing and remains willing to answer any questions and/or negotiate and bargain over any proposal made by the Unions.
> The purpose of this letter is to advise you almost four weeks after the strike began July 3, 1985 that Brannan Sand & Gravel Co. is unwilling, based upon the existing circumstances and the present business and competitive conditions, to modify its proposals of June 26, July 2 and July 8 respectively. The offers made to both the Teamsters Union and the Operating Engineers Union represent the final offer of the Employer. The offers and positions of the Union have been rejected and the impasse continues. The law "does not compel either party to agree to a proposal or require the making of a concession."

The next meeting was held on 29 July. Darkey said there would be no new proposals, and that no subcontract language was acceptable. The Union made another verbal proposal to reduce its former wage and fringe benefits offer. Also, Parker asked whether the Company would consider accepting the Union's pension trust plan if the Union would accept the Company's health and welfare plan; and requested that the Company initiate a vacation schedule in place of the vacation trust fund contribution. Darkey rejected each of these proposals in their entirety. Darkey presented the Union with a written position statement reiterating that the Company was unwilling to change any of its prior proposals. Parker again said the Union neither accepted nor rejected any proposals, and would take them under consideration.

A meeting was scheduled for 5 August at the Teamsters building. The unit employees had been invited to attend to observe the negotiations, and many employees had assembled at the prescribed time. The company representatives refused to meet because of the large audience, believing that negotiations under such condition would be undesirable. The meeting was rescheduled for the next day, 6 August, and was held as scheduled.

At the 6 August meeting, Parker offered to reduce the pension and vacation increase contained in the Union's last offer, and again asked if the Company would consider the Union's prior proposal on subcontracting. Darkey rejected the pension and vacation offer and said he would not consider or accept any subcontract language as the Company could get trucks and drivers at a cheaper rate than it would have to pay under the contract. Darkey also said that disputes over health and welfare coverage, as well as disputes under the proposed profit-sharing provision, would not be subject to the grievance procedure. John McKendree, the Union's attorney, asked for the Company's profit and loss statements for the prior 3 years. He also requested a list of the projects the Company had allegedly lost due to the subcontract language, and was apparently told that the Company did not have any records containing such information. McKendree also asked for information regarding health and welfare costs, the pension and profit-sharing plans, and the proposed incentive plan. He inquired whether there might be a year when the Company might not make a pension contribution to the plan on behalf of the employees. Darkey said he was not sure, but would check. Darkey maintained at this meeting, as he had at prior meetings, that the Company would accept no jointly trusteed plans, and insisted on being in sole control of any fringe benefit plans.

The next session took place on 13 August. The Respondent had no new proposals. The Union further reduced its request for a pension increase, and this proposal was rejected. Darkey presented the Union with a written statement of position that emphasized that no concession or further proposals would be forthcoming. There was discussion of the Company's proposed incentive program. In response to various questions by Parker about this proposed plan, Darkey stated that if the plan presented a problem he would just withdraw it from consideration. He then handed the Union a written statement to this effect. Regarding the deletion of the subcontracting article, Parker predicted that this would result in fewer unit employees, as the truckdriving work would probably be contracted out. Parker was told that his presumption was correct and that the Company would no longer need as many trucks.

The next meeting was held on 27 August. Darkey reiterated that there would be no concessions or further proposals. The Union submitted a new proposal, again offering to reduce its request for a pension increase. This was rejected.

Parker addressed the health and welfare and pension plan issues and asked how much Respondent anticipated it would save by discontinuing the various contract trust funds and implementing the plans it had proposed. Although the record does not indicate whether this question was specifically answered, Parker then inquired whether the Respondent would consider reducing wages by that amount, but leaving the trust fund provisions intact. He explained that the employees, some of whom were within perhaps just a year of being vested in the plan, were very concerned about losing their pensions, and that the employees were conversant with the parameters of that plan and had relied on the projected benefits in terms of planning for their retirement. The Respondent was not interested in this proposal.

Parker also asked, in response to a statement by Darkey that the Respondent had come into negotiations trying to freeze labor costs, whether Respondent would consider continuation of the contract, together with a freeze of labor costs. Darkey said, "We will not consider anything except what we have proposed," and added that it would be fruitless to meet further.

The last meeting occurred on 21 October. An attorney for the Union, Karen Yablonski-Toll, who was present at this negotiating session, asked the Respondent to specify with particularity the contract language that it considered to be restrictive, rather than just declare each entire contract provision unacceptable, in order that the problems could be addressed. She inquired specifically about the subcontracting article saying, "We want to know how they restrict." Darkey replied, "We want to operate in the same manner as other union-free contractors." No progress was made. Darkey questioned the Union's majority status and the Union maintained that it represented a majority of the unit employees. Darkey reiterated that the parties were at impasse, and again stated that the Company was totally inflexible and would enter into no contract except on the terms it had previously established.

2. The Laborers negotiations

The contract with the Laborers expired on 30 June. At the outset of the 24 June bargaining meeting, the Respondent presented the Laborers, represented by Business Manager and Secretary/Treasurer Ted Doxtater, with a written proposal embodying similar wage classification language to that proposed to the Teamsters. The Laborers contract, extending from 1 July 1984 to 30 June 1985, contained no trust fund provisions, nor did it have any type of subcontracting provision. It did contain a provision for health and welfare and dental coverage, giving the Respondent the option of using either an insurance company of its choice or the Colorado Laborers Health and Welfare Fund. It also contained a provision, article 17, entitled "Independent Retirement Deferred Compensation" (IRA), as follows:

> INDEPENDENT RETIREMENT DEFERRED COMPENSATION (IRA)
> The Employer will pay a year-end payment to each eligible employee covered by this Agreement. An eligible employee is defined as an employee who has worked for the Company one thousand (1,000) hours or more December 1 of the preceding year through next November 30th. For each employee who meets the eligibility requirement, the payment is as set forth in the Appendix "A" schedule. For employees who do not meet the one thousand (1,000) hour requirement, no payment will be made.

> Effective May 1, 1983, the payment is Ninety-Five Cents (95 cents) per hour for each hour worked.
> The amount will be effective for the term of this Agreement, July 1, 1984, through June 30, 1985.

At the 2 July negotiating meeting the Respondent proposed that the Laborers select either the same health and welfare plan as proposed to the other unions or the current Laborers health and welfare plan; the same pension productivity bonus and profit-sharing plans as proposed to the other unions; and a wage provision that included pay classifications for different categories of work, minimum hourly rates of pay, and the right to increase the rate of pay based on whether the Respondent believes that the employee has the experience, qualifications, skill and ability to perform the assigned duties."

As set forth above, the Teamsters struck on 3 July and the Laborers and Operating Engineers honored the picket lines.

The next meeting after the strike commenced was held on 8 July. The Respondent handed the Laborers a handwritten document stating that "Brannan's proposal of 7-2-85 is submitted as company's final offer." At this point the parties were close to reaching an agreement, and this apparently prompted a company representative to say, according to Doxtater, the Union's representative, that the Company did not want a contract with just one union.

The parties met again on 12 and 22 July. No progress was made. Kathy Nissen, president of the Laborers Union, was present for the Union at both meetings. Nissen testified that she recalled no discussion of union security at either of these meetings. At the next meeting, on 24 July, Doxtater announced that the Union would agree to the Respondent's contract proposals as of 2 July. Darkey said that was fine but that there would be no union-security clause in the contract. An argument ensued, and Darkey explained that the union-security clause was withdrawn by a letter dated 8 July that had previously been given to the Union. Doxtater said the Company could not now withdraw that proposal and Sellers, Respondent's president, said, "We won't sign a contract with just one union."[5]

Darkey testified regarding the 12 July meeting. When asked by his counsel whether the union-security article had been pulled from the table at that meeting, Darkey answered yes, and explained that it had been withdrawn [b]y a letter that had been sent to all three of the unions." The letter to which Darkey referred was signed by President Seller and sent to each of the unions on about 8 July, after the strike began. Respondent's letter to the Laborers reads as follows:

> Dear Mr. Doxtater:
> 1. As you are now aware, the Brannan Sand & Gravel Company responded to the Union's offer of July 2, 1985, and rejected them. The Employer has carefully reviewed its situation and has concluded that it is the intention of the Employer to resume and continue its operations in spite of the strike.
> Accordingly, the Employer will begin hiring permanent replacements. Letters are being mailed to the employees advising them of the Employer's intentions.
> 2. Please be advised, effective immediately, we are discontinuing enforcement of the Union Membership provisions (Article 5) of the Agreement between the Union and Brannan Sand & Gravel.
> 3. Be further advised that because of the impasse which exists in the current bargaining situation, Brannan Sand & Gravel Company will impasse the wage offers made and confirmed July 2, 1985.
> Brannan stands ready and able to meet at a mutually convenient date and time.

On 12 August and again on 20 August, Doxtater wrote to the Respondent advising that the Union had a contract with Respondent and that because of the existence of this contract the striking employees had either unconditionally returned to work or, in the cases of Hillard, Garcia, and Stemen, infra, had offered to return to work.

Employees Alan Hillard, Tom Garcia, and Fred Stemen, who had been on strike, had been advised by the Laborers to return to work. They returned to Respondent's premises on the morning of August 8. They were told that no work was available, and were instructed that they could place their names and phone numbers on a rehire list. Respondent destroyed the rehire list shortly thereafter, and no representative of Respondent called or wrote letters to Hillard, Garcia,[6] or Stemen until 14 October, when Respondent mailed letters to them offering reinstatement.

C. Analysis and Conclusions

1. Teamsters negotiations

At the very outset of negotiations the Respondent, one of the three major paving contractors in the Denver area, stated that to remain competitive and survive in an industry that was becoming increasingly nonunion it would no longer agree to any provisions in a collective-bargaining agreement that in any manner restricted it from most efficiently conducting its business operations. Thus, the Respondent demanded that any collective-bargaining agreement must allow it the flexibility to operate as the some 30 or 40 smaller nonunion companies operated, that is, with no union contract and therefore no requirements whatsoever other than those imposed by state and Federal laws. Consistent with this position the Respondent's proposals constituted a radical departure from the contractual relationship that had been established as a result of a 30-year bargaining history. Respondent's initial position was not merely a strategic one designed to evoke concessions from the Union. Rather, its unwavering position from the very outset of bargaining may be aptly characterized as a fixed resolve that absent complete capitulation by the Union, which necessitated that the Union agree to forgo whatever benefits and job security it had obtained for the employees through the years, there could be no contract.

[5] Sellers did not testify in this proceeding and Doxtater's account of the negotiations is unrebutted.

[6] Garcia's father worked for the Respondent and Garcia testified that about 22 August his father told him that he could probably get his job back. Garcia, who was then employed elsewhere, chose not to attempt to return at that time. There is no evidence indicating that Garcia's father was told by any supervisor or management representative to relay this message to Garcia.

The Board has summarized certain general requirements of good-faith bargaining in Atlanta Hilton & Tower, 271 NLRB 1600, 1603 (1984), as follows:

> Under Section 8(d) of the Act, an employer and its employees' representative are mutually required to "meet at reasonable times and confer in good faith with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment . . . but such obligation does not compel either party to agree to a proposal or require the making of a concession." Both the employer and the union have a duty to negotiate with a "sincere purpose to find a basis of agreement,"[9] but "the Board cannot force an employer to make of a concession" on any specific issue or to adopt any particular position."[10] The employer is, nonetheless, "obliged to make some reasonable effort in some direction to compose his differences with the union, if (a)(5) is to be read as imposing any substantial obligation at all."[11]

The foregoing clearly enunciates the Board's role in cases of this nature, namely, to ascertain whether the parties are making a sincere effort to find a basis of agreement by making some reasonable effort in some direction to resolve their differences. Any rational employer must necessarily understand that its refusal to agree to an increase in wages or benefits operates as an impediment to the culmination of an agreement; that its insistence on reducing those wages or benefits that the employees have previously enjoyed makes the negotiation of an agreement highly unlikely unless the employer can convincingly demonstrate that economic necessity mandates such reductions to provide continued employment; that, absent economic necessity, its withdrawal of significant terms and conditions of employment, which the employees have enjoyed and relied on over extended periods of time, and which provide for job security during their employment and economic security thereafter, virtually mandates that no agreement will be reached; and that its total negation of each and every significant contract provision and its insistence that it maintain total control over each aspect of the employment relationship absolutely precludes, beyond a shadow of a doubt, the reaching of an agreement, as no self-respecting union will execute such a document. Thus it is crystal clear that the Respondent, from the very inception of bargaining, could not have harbored the slightest hope that its initial contract proposals, from which it did not deviate in any significant respects throughout the entire course of bargaining, would ever be acceptable to the Union.

The Respondent reserved for itself the absolute right to ignore established jurisdictional lines for the work historically performed by the various units, and insisted that it be permitted to assign any work to any employee, thus totally rendering meaningless the historic unit descriptions in the various contracts; at the same time it reserved the right to unilaterally demote to a lower wage classification employees who, in its estimation, were unable to satisfactorily perform the newly assigned work. The Respondent insisted on the deletion of the subcontracting clause, which had operated as a work-preservation clause for the unit employees, and specifically reserved the right to lay off or discharge its employees when it deemed that the work could be subcontracted out more cheaply; moreover, the Respondent not only proposed no alternative means of safeguarding employees' jobs, but deemed it necessary to emphasize that subcontracting the work out would be one of its significant objectives. The Respondent also deleted the vacation trust fund premium providing for 60 cents per hour, and insisted that no funds for employees' vacations would be paid and that no paid vacations would be given.

In place of the contractual health and welfare trust fund that provided for fixed amounts credited to each employee, the Respondent established its own companywide health and welfare plan to have a uniform plan covering all employees, apparently for the purpose of facilitating its intent to transfer employees at will across jurisdictional lines from one job to another; and in place of the long-established pension trust fund that the employees had relied on for years and that enabled them to accurately determine the benefits they would obtain on disability or retirement, the Respondent established an independent pension plan reserving to itself the right to make contributions as it deemed expedient.

The foregoing is but a brief recapitulation of some of the Respondent's proposals. Collectively, they are not merely regressive, but rather may be reasonably characterized as an attempt to totally negate every substantial term and condition of employment that the employees had acquired through years of good-faith bargaining, indeed, the very framework of the parties' relationship. And the Respondent, specifically not pleading financial inability as a basis for its position, and admitting that it has been a profitable business, advanced as its rationale for the foregoing the general principle that it wanted to be able to compete more favorably with the scores of incomparably smaller nonunion operations that employ workers who enjoy only the job security and benefits that the employers are willing to provide on an ad hoc basis.

The Respondent was angry with the Union from the very outset of negotiations as the footnotes to its proposals clearly demonstrate. Thus, the Respondent deleted the established hiring hall provision (see proposal No. 2, supra) "because of the Union's reluctance and opposition to assisting the employer in manning an efficient and productive operation." Similarly, the Respondent proposed to delete the job stewards article in its entirety (see proposal No. 6, supra) "because the Union fails or refuses to consider the wishes of Stewards, or to consider judgments of a Steward in matters affecting unit employees," and further "because the Article has not been used as a positive article to promote harmony and cooperation." Certainly the Respondent could have engaged the Union in intelligent discussions in an attempt to reach mutual agreement about the operation of the hiring hall and the duties and responsibilities of job stewards, rather than summarily strike these important provisions from the contract. Such an attitude of automatic and total rejection of these significant contract items can only hinder negotiations, and becomes an impediment to the very objective of bargaining. The foregoing, along with other footnotes to various proposals, demonstrates, at the least, the Respondent's disregard for the bargaining process, and provides additional support for the conclusion that the Respondent was not interested in finding a means of accommodating varying points of view, but rather was determined that whatever negotiations took place would be abrupt and devoid of meaningful discussion and, most importantly, unproductive.

[11] Id. at 135.

The Respondent apparently argues that, absent a formal rejection of the proposals, it was legally permitted to refrain from advancing alternate proposals. Thus, the Respondent emphasizes that throughout the course of bargaining Parker repeatedly stated that the Union neither accepted nor rejected any of the Respondent's proposals. It is crystal clear that the Union's failure to agree to any proposals and its decision to strike constituted expressions of the Union's disregard for Respondent's proposals; and that Parker's aforementioned remarks were designed to be understood in the context of bargaining rhetoric, namely, that contrary to Respondent's repeated assertions that an impasse existed, the Union believed that there was no impasse because there had been no good-faith bargaining on the part of Respondent, and that bargaining should continue. Therefore, I find Respondent's contention to be without merit.

The entirety of the record makes it clear, and I find, that the Respondent did not, even initially, attempt to consider and explore with the Union methods to enhance its competitive position vis a vis other companies within the framework of the established bargaining relationship. Rather, from the outset, it determined that the way to compete with nonunion companies was to become a nonunion company. Indeed, Respondent's expressed position at the outset of bargaining, coupled with the proposals it advanced, and the intransigence it thereafter displayed, mandates such a conclusion. This is not to say that had there been good-faith negotiations the parties would have necessarily reached total accord. However, the Respondent's contrived bargaining strategy virtually ensured the futility of these negotiations. And bargaining premised on such an inflexible approach to resolving differences can never constitute good-faith bargaining. See A-1 King Size Sandwiches, 265 NLRB 850 (1982), enfd. 732 F.2d 872 (11th Cir. 1984); Atlanta Hilton, 271 NLRB 1600, 1603 (1984); Struthers Wells Corp., 262 NLRB 1080 (1982), enfd. 721 F.2d 465 (3d Cir. 1983); Alba-Waldensian, Inc., 167 NLRB 695, 696 (1967). Cf. Reichhold Chemicals, 277 NLRB 639 (1985).

From the foregoing I find that the Respondent did not engage in good-faith negotiations from the outset of bargaining on 7 June 1985. It therefore follows that the strike that commenced on 3 July 1985 was an unfair labor practice strike in protest of the Respondent's unlawful conduct, and that each and every unilateral change made by the Respondent thereafter was violative of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. Further, under the above circumstances, the Respondent's contention that subsequent to the unfair labor practice strike the Union has failed to maintain its majority status as the representative of the unit employees, is clearly without merit. Pittsburg & New England Trucking, 249 NLRB 833, 836 (1980).

2. The Laborers negotiations

The Laborers met with the Respondent on 8 July, subsequent to the commencement of the 3 July strike. During that meeting Respondent furnished the Laborers with the written statement that "Brannan proposal of 7-2-85 is submitted as company's final offer." The 2 July proposal to which Respondent refers is also a written proposal that states, inter alia, that Respondent proposes the union-security clause contained in the expired contract.

Respondent contends that at the bargaining session on 12 July it "pulled" the union-security clause from its 22 July contract proposal. However, the testimony of Union Representative Kathy Nissen, which I credit, shows that Respondent did not withdraw this as a proposal at the 12 July meeting. Moreover, the Respondent called no witnesses to corroborate Darkey's vague testimony that he mentioned this at the bargaining session, nor do the contemporaneous notes made by Respondent's attorney Gustav Ackey, who attended and took notes during this meeting, substantiate Darkey's testimony. Further, Darkey's direct response to Attorney Ackey's question seems dispositive of the matter. Thus, Darkey testified that the union-security clause had been pulled from the table at the 12 July meeting by the 8 July letter, supra, from the Respondent to the Laborers.

Respondent's reliance on the language of the 8 July letter is misplaced. The letter advises the Union of the Respondent's intention to begin hiring permanent replacements, and its intention to simultaneously discontinue enforcement of the union-membership provision (article 5) of the agreement. The Respondent's decision to discontinue enforcement of this provision was in conformity with the law as there was no contract then in existence. Leveld Wholesale, 218 NLRB 1344, 1349-1350 (1975). However, discontinuing enforcement of a union-security provision during a strike and withdrawing it from the bargaining table are entirely different concepts, particularly to an experienced labor attorney like Darkey. Indeed, on 19 July, during a negotiating session with the Teamsters, Darkey specifically withdrew the union-security provision from the table, and did not simply assume that the earlier 9 July letter to the Teamsters, stating that the union-security provision of the expired contract would not be enforced, constituted withdrawal of the provision. Respondent's subjective opinion that the 8 July letter operates as a withdrawal of the union-security provision is irrelevant. Teamsters Local 287 (Reed & Graham), 272 NLRB 348 (1984). Nor could the Union have reasonably known of the Respondent's professed intent. See Carpenters Local 1476 (Lake Charles AGC), 270 NLRB 1432 (1984).

Clearly, Doxtater's acceptance of the contract on 24 July surprised the Respondent, and Darkey attempted to use the letter as a means of precluding agreement. Seller's statement that the Company did not want a contract with just one union, rather than Darkey's ostensible belief that the union-security clause had been withdrawn, demonstrates Respondent's true motivation.

I therefore find that by refusing to enter into, and thereafter execute the complete agreement that the Union accepted, the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. Ashe Brick Co., 280 NLRB 1383 (1986). Further, by such conduct, the strike became an unfair labor practice strike on that date. Therefore, it follows that Respondent's failure to offer employees Hillard, Garcia, and Stemen immediate reinstatement to their former jobs is violative of the Act.[7] See Robbins Co., 233 NLRB 549 (1977); Ashe Brick Co., supra.

The complaint alleges that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by refusing to furnish requested information covering the eligibility of employees for "IRA" bonus pay under article 17 of the expired contract, and by refusing to pay the bonus to eligible employees. Article 17 of the prior agreement, set forth above, provides that the yearly computation for the IRA payment shall commence on 1 December 1985 and that to become eligible an employee must have worked at least 1000 hours during the applicable 1-year period.

Darkey testified that at the 2 July meeting he proposed the same pension and profit-sharing plan to the Laborers as had been proposed to the Teamsters and Operating Engineers. He further explained that the IRA provision would be eliminated at the expiration of the contract, that no payments would be made under it, and that the newly proposed plan would become effective for the Laborers retroactive to 1 January 1985. No testimony by any representatives of the Laborers was offered to refute or contradict Darkey's assertions regarding this issue.

On the basis of the foregoing, I find that, consistent with the Respondent's 2 July proposal and explanatory comments, there was no obligation on the part of Respondent to either make such IRA payments to the employees or to furnish the requested information. Therefore, I shall dismiss this allegation of the complaint.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Unions are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by failing to bargain in good faith with the Teamsters regarding the terms of a successor collective-bargaining agreement, by unilaterally discontinuing provisions of the expired collective-bargaining agreement, and by placing contract proposals into effect prior to a bargaining impasse.

4. The Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by failing and refusing to enter into and execute the agreement it reached with the Laborers on 24 July 1985, and has violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act by failing to reinstate unfair practice strikers upon application.

5. The above unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has failed to bargain in good faith with the Teamsters by engaging in surface bargaining, by unilaterally discontinuing provisions of the expired contract, and by unilaterally initiating various contract proposals prior to a bargaining impasse, the Respondent shall be required to bargain in good faith with the Teamsters, to discontinue the implementation of its unilaterally established contract proposals, to revert to and abide by the contract provisions contained in the expired agreement, and to make the unit employees whole by making all wage payments and trust fund contributions[8] to which the employees are entitled thereunder until the Respondent negotiates in good faith with the Teamsters and reaches agreement on a new contract or an impasse.

Having found that the Respondent has failed to bargain in good faith with the Laborers by failing and refusing to enter into and execute an agreement reached on 24 July 1985, and by failing to immediately reinstate unfair labor practice strikers on application, the Respondent shall be required to execute that agreement forthwith and to give effect to all terms and provisions of that agreement retroactive to the effective date. Moreover, the Respondent shall be required to make employees Allan Hillard, Tom Garcia, and Fred Stemen whole for any loss of earnings they incurred. The backpay shall be computed in the manner set forth in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), plus interest, as set forth in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977)[9]

Under the circumstances it does not appear that the remedial provision requested in the complaint and in the General Counsel's brief is necessary to ensure compliance with the recommended Order and the General Counsel's request for a visitatorial provision as a matter of course in all unfair labor practice proceedings where violations are found should be properly addressed to the Board.

[Recommended Order omitted from publication.]

River City Mechanical and Sheet Metal Workers Union Local No. 162, Sheet Metal Workers International Association, AFL–CIO. Case 20–CA–16451

July 29, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

By Chairman Stephens and Members Babson and Cracraft

On January 7, 1983, Administrative Law Judge Russell L. Stevens issued the attached decision. The General Counsel and the Respondent[1] filed exceptions and supporting briefs, and the Respondent filed an answering brief in opposition to the General Counsel's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The judge found that Respondent River City Mechanical violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by bargaining in bad faith and by making unilateral changes in wages and working conditions. The Respondent contends that it unilaterally implemented its final bargaining proposals after it had reached impasse in good-faith negotiations with the Union. We agree with the Respondent that it bargained in good faith to impasse. We nevertheless find that the Respondent violated the Act by unilaterally implementing certain wages and benefits not reasonably encompassed by its proposals to the Union.

The Respondent is a heating and air-conditioning contractor in northern California. In February 1981, River City timely resigned from Sheet Metal and Air Conditioning Contractors National Association (SMACNA), through which it had concluded its previous collective-bargaining agreement. That agreement was scheduled to expire on June 30, 1981. At 8 negotiating sessions from June 2 to July 1, 1981, the Respondent and 11 other sheet metal contractors engaged in coordinated bargaining with the Union.

As negotiations began, the employers' bargaining representative, Mark Thierman, emphasized the declining fortunes of his clients, who were suffering from a significant labor cost disadvantage in competitive bidding with nonunion contractors for residential jobs in the Sacramento area. Although most residential jobs entailed installation of flexiduct, an operation requiring minimal skills and training, contractors under the SMACNA contract had to hire their work force through the Union's hiring hall at a ratio of four journeymen to one apprentice and at high wage and benefit levels. Their nonunion competitors hired unskilled workers off the street at much lower wage rates.

Thierman sought to divorce his clients from the SMACNA system by negotiating independent agreements with a new residential worker classification as the central feature. Under this proposal, the employers would agree to "red-circle" journeymen then employed, retaining them at the wage and benefit levels of the old SMACNA contracts, but they could hire directly an unlimited number of lower-paid residential workers for residential projects.

Thierman also objected to the interest arbitration provision in the SMACNA contract. The provision—article X, section 8—required parties at impasse to refer unresolved bargaining issues to the National Joint Adjustment Board (NJAB) for binding arbitration. As all Thierman's clients had timely withdrawn from SMACNA, none of them were represented on the NJAB. Thus, he interpreted article X, section 8 to apply only to negotiated renewals of the SMACNA standard-form agreement, not to the separate and independent agreements sought by his non-SMACNA clients. In addition, Thierman informed the Union that he regarded interest arbitration as a permissive bargaining subject, so that any binding effect of the disputed provision would expire with the existing contract on June 30.

Union Attorney Robert Jesinger's initial reply to Thierman was that the Union had no authority to abandon the SMACNA standard-form agreement. Jesinger also rejected negotiating a separate contract for each employer represented by Thierman. Although the Union might have been willing to execute certain addenda to the SMACNA contract, it demanded a fixed ratio of four journeymen to each apprentice on residential jobs. Jesinger also asserted the applicability of the SMACNA interest arbitration provision to the negotiations at issue.

[1] This proceeding had been consolidated for hearing and decision by the judge with Case 20–CA–16449. While the judge's decision and exceptions were pending before the Board, the General Counsel entered into a joint stipulation with Sheet Metal Workers Local 162 and Respondent Perrin Heating and Air Conditioning to sever and dismiss in Case 20–CA–16449. Thereafter, on May 21, 1985, the Board granted the General Counsel's request to withdraw exceptions and dismissed the complaint in Case 20–CA–16449, ending Perrin Heating's involvement as a respondent.

[2] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

The parties maintained these positions until the session held on June 17. At that session Thierman cited several residential and commercial projects that his clients had lost to nonunion competition. He handed Jesinger separate but similar economic proposals from the individual contractors. River City reiterated its commitment to "red-circle" existing employees, and proposed a separate lower-paid employee classification for apprentices with no prior experience. Jesinger handed to Thierman a proposed renewal of the standard contract with three addenda. Addendum 3 created a new class of "residential workmen," and permitted the employers to hire one of these employees for every four journeymen they retained.

On June 30, Thierman presented a single contract counterproposal from contractor B.J. Heating. He had indicated that if agreement were reached with B.J., other clients would probably follow along. The June 30 contract proposal called for: (1) the new residential worker classification; (2) red-circling journeymen at the top rate under the expiring contract of $14.80; (3) health, welfare, and pension coverage for new residential workers under employer plans rather than under the Union-SMACNA trusts; and (4) no ratio limitation or hiring hall requirement for the employment of residential workers.

On July 1, the Respondent unilaterally terminated benefit fund payments under the expired SMACNA contract. At the bargaining table that day, the Respondent and six other contractors adopted the June 30 B.J. proposal as their final offer. B.J. and the remaining four contractors modified the previous day's proposal and made their final offer to accept the Union's standard-form agreement, modified by addenda including provisions creating the residential worker classification with a ratio limitation of four such workers to one journeyman on residential projects.

Union negotiator Jesinger declined on July 1 to accept any residential work force ratio with less than three journeymen for every one residential worker. The Union had agreed to the concept of a residential worker classification. In addition, Jesinger revealed that on June 25 the Union had sent a letter to its International stating that the parties had reached impasse and requesting NJAB interest arbitration. Jesinger stated that he had written this letter before actual impasse in order to secure an early date on the NJAB agenda in the event of impasse.

The Respondent's final offer was never submitted to the Union's membership. B.J.'s final proposal was presented and formally rejected by the Union's membership on July 6. On July 7 the Respondent was struck by the Union. All River City's employees joined the strike at its outset. Within the next 3 weeks, however, employees Melton and Birchfield returned to work. Their new wage was $15 per hour, rather than their previous $14.80 journeyman rate under the old contract. All other River City employees during the strike were replacements paid as residential workers.

In considering the record before us, we first address the issue of the Respondent's alleged bad-faith bargaining in negotiating a successor agreement before considering its subsequent implementation of different terms and conditions of employment. Our analysis of the Respondent's good faith is guided by the fundamental principle that Section 8(d) does not "compel either party to agree to a proposal or require the making of a concession." NLRB v. American National Insurance Co., 343 U.S. 395, 404 (1952). Our responsibility is to determine, from an examination of the totality of the Respondent's conduct, whether that conduct evidences a real desire to reach an agreement. See Atlanta Hilton & Tower, 271 NLRB 1600, 1603 (1984).

The judge found that the Respondent attached principal concern to the matter of employee ratios, and that by insisting on an unlimited ratio of lesser-paid apprentices to journeymen for residential work it was making proposals that it knew the Union could not accept. Contrary to the judge's analysis, we find insufficient evidence here that the Respondent and its fellow contractors intended to frustrate negotiations with the employee ratio proposals. Obviously, these employers sought to extract substantial economic concessions. Evidence of the undisputed economic considerations underlying these proposals indicates, however, that they were not clearly unreasonable and belies an intent to undermine the Union's representative status. We note that the Respondent consistently offered to retain current journeymen at existing wage and benefit levels. Furthermore, the Respondent's firm stand on the residential worker issue must be weighed against the Union's equally hard line on interest arbitration.[3] We conclude that the Respondent's insistence on the residential worker proposal did not manifest bad faith in the circumstances of the instant negotiations. See Reichhold Chemicals, 288 NLRB 69 (1988).

Although not determinative, other elements of the Respondent's behavior at the negotiations also fail to manifest bad faith. The Respondent met with the Union's representatives at regular intervals and supplied pertinent information to them. The judge in fact found that both sides often changed their positions and that the "negotiations were not barren of fruit." The Respondent engaged in none of the dilatory maneuvers associated with surface bargaining. Its conduct exceeded the mere "sterile discussion of union-management differences" properly condemned as a manifestation of bad faith. American National Insurance Co., 343 U.S. at 402.

[3] We need not decide here whether the Union's bargaining position violated the Act. But see Sheet Metal Workers Local 59 (Employers Assn.), 227 NLRB 520 (1976).

There remains the question of whether the Respondent's conduct away from the bargaining table during negotiations demonstrated bad faith in bargaining. We adopt, with one exception,[4] the judge's conclusion that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and/or (1) in several conversations between its agents and unit employees. We will order the Respondent to cease and desist from such conduct. Although these independent violations, which included direct dealing with employees and expressions of intention to go nonunion, can be indicia of bad faith in the bargaining process, we consider them insufficient to prove overall surface bargaining in the totality of circumstances of this case. In this regard, we note that there has been no showing that the provocative and unlawful away-from-the-table statements of the Respondent's officials influenced the aims or attitudes of Thierman in advancing contract proposals on behalf of the Respondent—proposals that were substantially similar to those that Thierman was advancing on behalf of the 11 other employers, who are not alleged to have engaged in any unlawful away-from-the-table conduct. We therefore conclude that the parties engaged merely in hard bargaining, and we shall dismiss the allegation that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) by bad-faith bargaining in its 1981 negotiations with the Union.

Our conclusion as to the Respondent's good faith does not extend to the legality of its conduct after the negotiations, however. To the extent that the Respondent unilaterally modified the wages due its journeymen employees and unilaterally terminated their contractual benefit fund payments, we find that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5).

A bargaining impasse arises when the parties' good-faith negotiations have exhausted the prospects of concluding an agreement.[5] Following impasse an employer is free to make unilateral changes in working conditions reasonably encompassed by its pre-impasse proposals.[6] Such changes may not be substantially different or greater than any offers that the employer proposed.[7]

In the present case, we conclude that the parties had reached impasse when their negotiations terminated on July 1. Following the onset of the strike, River City employed replacements at less than the $14.80-per-hour contractual rate. This procedure is lawful under Board precedent. E.g., Marbro Co., 284 NLRB 1303 (1987); Capitol-Husting Co., 252 NLRB 43, 45 (1980), enfd. 671 F.2d 237 (7th Cir. 1982); Imperial Outdoor Advertising, 192 NLRB 1248 (1971), enfd. 470 F.2d 484 (8th Cir. 1972).

On the other hand, the record reveals that the Respondent raised the wages of returning strikers Melton and Birchfield. It is also undisputed that on July 1 the Respondent unilaterally terminated contractual benefit fund payments for all its employees, including journeymen. Contrary to the Respondent's argument that it was permitted to make these changes in accord with its treatment of strike replacements, we note that the cessation of benefit fund payments preceded the strike and that the wages paid to the returning strikers were not made pursuant to any claim that the strike relieved the Respondent of the duty to bargain and were not expressly limited to the period of the strike. These changes were also inconsistent with the Respondent's offer to the Union to "red-circle" current journeymen at their contractual rates of wages and benefits.[8] We therefore find that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) in these respects.[9] We will order it to cease and desist from doing so, and to make affected employees whole for any losses resulting from the unlawful unilateral changes.[10] [4] With regard to sec. E of the judge's decision, we conclude that the singing by River City Co-Owner Fish of the song, "Do You Know the Way to San Jose?" in the presence of two employees did not violate the Act. The judge found that Fish's action constituted an implied threat in view of the employees' common knowledge that construction employment was then depressed in the Sacramento area, whereas San Jose presented the main locus for such employment. We find Fish's conduct too ambiguous to justify the judge's speculation that Fish thereby threatened the employees with discharge.

[8] We reject the Respondent's contention that the Union's insistence on interest arbitration made permissible the unilateral changes not encompassed by prior contract proposals. See, e.g., Tampa Sheet Metal Co., 288 NLRB 322 (1988). We also reject River City's contention that its 20-cent-per-hour wage increase was de minimis.

Member Cracraft continues to adhere to her position that in certain circumstances an employer's obligation to bargain may be suspended with regard to the wages, hours, and terms and conditions of employment of employees who abandon a strike and return to work. See Schmidt-Tiago, supra, at fn. 9 (joining then Chairman Dotson's dissent in relevant part). This position was and continues to be a minori[illegible]. For institutional reasons, Member Cracraft will apply precedent in [illegible]a.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, River City Mechanical, Rancho Cordova, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Threatening its employees with discharge, business closure, more onerous working conditions, or lockout because of their union sympathies, membership, or activities.

(b) Promising its employees better benefits if they withdraw their support for the Union as their bargaining representative.

(c) Bypassing the Union and dealing directly with unit employees concerning wages and other terms and conditions of work.

(d) Unilaterally paying returning journeymen strikers an additional 20 cents an hour, and unilaterally terminating journeymen's benefit fund payments, where those actions vary from contract terms proposed to the Union; providing, however, nothing in this Order shall be construed as requiring rescission of any wage increase previously granted.

(e) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Restore and give retroactive effect to the unlawfully terminated benefit fund contributions in effect for journeymen employees on June 30, 1981.

(b) Make whole the employees in the appropriate unit who were adversely affected by the Respondent's unlawful unilateral failure to make benefit fund payments.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its principal place of business in Rancho Cordova, California, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[11] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 20, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

MEMBER CRACRAFT, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

Finding that there has been no showing that the Respondent's "provocative and unlawful away-from-the-table statement" influenced the "aims or attitudes" of a coordinated bargaining negotiator, my colleagues conclude that the Respondent did not engage in bargaining in bad faith during its 1981 negotiations. I disagree with my colleagues only as to their conclusion that the Respondent's conduct away from the bargaining table, contemporaneous with negotiations, did not demonstrate bad faith in bargaining.[1] Our disagreement is factual. We agree that the Respondent's good or bad faith in bargaining must be detemined based on the totality of its conduct.[2] We also agree that the Respondent's bargaining table conduct alone does not support a finding that the Respondent bargained in bad faith. However, my analysis of the Respondent's unlawful away-from-the-table conduct leads me to the conclusion that the Respondent was not negotiating in good faith during its 1981 negotiations.

Coordinated bargaining[3] between the Union and 14 independent contracting companies[4] began on June 2, 1981. The Respondent and the other companies were represented during bargaining by Attorney Mark Thierman.[5] Eight bargaining sessions were followed on July 7 by a strike of the Respondent's employees.

[11] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

[1] I agree with my colleagues' findings that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1) by engaging in direct dealing with its employees and Sec. 8(a)(1) by interrogating its employees, threatening not to hire employees based on their union membership, promising benefits to employees, threatening to close its operation, and threatening employees with discharge.

[2] See, e.g., NLRB v. Virginia Electric & Power Co., 314 U.S. 469 (1941); Atlanta Hilton & Tower, 271 NLRB 1600 (1984).

[3] Atlanta Hilton & Tower, 271 NLRB 1600 (1984). The parties herein agreed on the term "coordinated bargaining" to describe their negotiations. Ordinarily, this term is utilized to describe bargaining by different unions that retain separate, independent decision-making authority. See, e.g., AMF Inc., 219 NLRB 903 (1975); Harley Davidson Motor Co., 214 NLRB 433 (1974). In any event, it is clear that the parties herein agreed that the bargaining was on a single-employer basis.

[4] Several of the companies ceased taking part in these negotiations. Eventually, only 12 of the companies remained.

[5] Additionally, representatives of the Respondent were present at at least 3 of these meetings.

Contemporaneous with this bargaining, the Respondent, through its co-owners, Fish and Keeling, negotiated directly with the vast majority of bargaining unit employees. Their specific, detailed proposals covered hourly wages, vacation, health insurance, and pension. Their direct offers varied from the offers made to the Union. Frequently, the Respondent's offers to its employees were contingent on resignation from the Union. The Respondent's offers were carefully explained to employees by its bookkeeper, who provided a dollar-for-dollar comparison of the "direct" offers to the offers being advanced at the bargaining table. In response to employee concerns about job security or vested pension benefits, the Respondent offered personal contracts guaranteeing area wage and formation of an area labor pool for steady employment. The Respondent's bookkeeper also reported to employees that pension benefits would not be forfeited on resignation from the Union.

Interspersed throughout this period of direct dealing, the Respondent also committed numerous violations of Section 8(a)(1) including interrogations, threats of closure, and promises of benefits.

In these circumstances, I conclude that the totality of the Respondent's conduct evinces bad faith.[6] My colleagues' conclusion to the contrary effectively insulates the Respondent from its unfair labor practices by virtue of its coordinated bargaining representative.[7]

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT threaten you with discharge, business closure, more onerous working conditions, or lockout because of your union sympathies, membership, or activities.

WE WILL NOT promise you better benefits if you withdraw your support from Sheet Metal Workers Union Local No. 162, Sheet Metal Workers International Association, AFL-CIO as your bargaining representative.

WE WILL NOT bypass the Union and deal directly with you concerning wages and other terms and conditions of work.

WE WILL NOT unilaterally change your wages and benefits, after bargaining to impasse with the Union, where those changes vary from contract terms proposed to the Union.

WE WILL NOT, however, withdraw any wage increase previously granted.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL restore and give retroactive effect to the benefit fund contributions for journeymen employees that we unlawfully changed on and after July 1, 1981.

WE WILL make whole, with interest, our employees in the appropriate unit who were adversely affected by our unlawful unilateral changes in their benefits.

RIVER CITY MECHANICAL

Kathleen Aure, Esq., for the General Counsel.

Dennis Cools and Robert Brown (Thierman & Simpson), of Sacramento, California, for the Respondent.

[6] Because I would find that the Respondent engaged in bad-faith bargaining, I would also find that a lawful impasse in bargaining was precluded. See, e.g., United Contractors, 244 NLRB 72 (1979); Palomar Corp., 192 NLRB 592 (1971). For this reason, I concur in the result reached by my colleagues and conclude that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(5) in unilaterally modifying its journeymen employees' wages and terminating their contractual benefit fund payments.

I also reject the Respondent's argument that the Union's insistence that the Respondent was bound by the interest arbitration provisions of the expired SMACNA contract constitutes a defense. As the judge concluded, the Respondent's unlawful conduct predated the Union's invocation of the interest arbitration provisions of the expired contract. The Union continued to meet and negotiate despite its contention that the Respondent was bound by interest arbitration. There is simply no evidence to link the Union's position regarding interest arbitration to the Respondent's unfair labor practices.

[7] See Berbiglia, Inc., 233 NLRB 1476 (1977) (appearance of good-faith bargaining at the table negated by the respondent's unlawful conduct away from the table including circulation of a decertification and deauthorization petition, statements of employees that they would receive better benefits without the union, and a letter circulated by the respondent to all unit employees informing them that the union did not desire to represent them); Safeway Trails, Inc., 233 NLRB 1078 (1977) (bad-faith bargaining found despite apparent good-faith bargaining at the table where the respondent engaged in repeated communications directly to unit employees in which it disparaged the efficacy of the union negotiator). Admittedly, these cases may be distinguished factually. Nevertheless, I find their logic equally applicable in the instant case.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RUSSEL L. STEVENS, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried in Sacramento, California, on August 31 and September 1, 2, and 3, 1982.[1] The complaint in Case 20-CA-16449 is based on a charge filed July 21 by Sheet Metal Workers Union Local No. 162, Sheet Metal Workers International Association, AFL-CIO (Union); a first amended charge filed by the Union on August 14; and a second amended charge filed by the Union on October 1. The complaint in Case 20-CA-16451 is based on a charge filed by the Union on July 21, and a first amended charge filed by the Union on August 14.[2] By order dated September 30, the Acting Regional Director for Region 20 consolidated the two cases for trial. The two complaints, as amended January 29, 1982, allege that Perrin Heating and Air Conditioning (Perrin) and River City Mechanical (River City) (Respondents) violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (Act).

All parties were given full opportunity to participate, to introduce relevant evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally, and to file briefs. Briefs, which have been carefully considered, were filed on behalf of the General Counsel and Respondents.

On the entire record, and from my observation of the witness and their demeanor, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

At all times material, Perrin, a California corporation with an office and place of business in Sacramento, California, has been engaged in the sale and installation of heating and air-conditioning units to contractors and homeowners and, during the 12-month period ending August 6, 1981, in the course and conduct of its business operations, purchased and received at its Sacramento facility products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the State of California.

At all times material, Respondent River City, a California partnership with an office and place of business in Rancho Cordova, California, has been engaged in the sale and installation of heating and air-conditioning units to contractors and homeowners, and during the 12-month period ending August 31, 1981, in the course and conduct of its business operations, purchased and received at its Rancho Cordova facility products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the State of California.

At all times material, Respondent River City, a California partnership with an office and place of business in Rancho Cordova, California, has been engaged in the sale and installation of heating and air-conditioning units to contractors and homeowners, and during the 12-month period ending August 31, 1981, in the course and conduct of its business operations, purchased and received at its Rancho Cordova facility products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the State of California.

I find that Perrin and River City each is, and at all times material has been, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Sheet Metal Workers Union Local No. 162, Sheet Metal Workers International Association, AFL-CIO is, and at all times material has been, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

Background[3]

At times relevant, Perrin principally was owned by Robert Tarabetz,[4] who was the company president, and Dave Rossi, who was secretary-treasurer. Also at times relevant, River City was owned by partners James Keeling and James Fish. Both organizations were small companies, engaged primarily in the installation of heating and air-conditioning facilities in residential and small commercial establishments.

Perrin and River City formerly were members of Sheet Metal and Air Conditioning Contractors National Association, Sacramento Valley Chapter, Inc. (SMACNA), which had a contract with the Union effective July 1, 1978, through June 30, 1981.[5] Both companies resigned their memberships in SMACNA in timely manner before expiration of the contract, and advised the Union that they intended to bargain with the Union separately and independently.[6]

Before expiration of the SMACNA-Union contract, Mark Thierman, an attorney, was retained by 14 sheet metal contractors, including Perrin and River City, to negotiate separate and individual labor agreements with the Union. Thierman was retained by the various companies approximately in February 1981, and thereafter personally visited all their shops to learn more about their operations and their problems. The principal problem was that the depression of the housing industry was resulting in an equally depressed heating and air-conditioning industry. Competition among companies in the latter industry was keen, and the 14 organizations represented by Thierman were adversely affected by the ability of nonunion companies to underbid them on the reduced number of jobs that were available. Further, companies from outside the Sacramento area who ordinarily did not compete in that area, were coming into Sacrameto and bidding with the advantage of labor costs appreciably below those prevailing among the 14 companies represented by Thierman.

[1] All dates are 1981 unless stated otherwise.

[2] The complaint in Case 20-CA-16621, consolidated on December 30 with Cases 20-CA-16449 and 20-CA-16451, was severed at trial by counsel for the General Counsel, with leave of the administrative law judge, and later was withdrawn by the Regional Director for Region 20.

[3] This background summary is based on stipulations of counsel and on credited testimony and evidence not in dispute.

[4] Individuals are referred to by their last names, except as noted below relative to two individuals named Keeling.

[5] Keeling testified that River City never had been a member of SMACNA, but G.C. Exhs. 2 and 3 are, respectively, resignations of River City from the association, and notification to the Union of the resignation. In any event, there is no dispute concerning association membership or withdrawal therefrom by any contractor.

[6] The fact that the resignations were timely and effective is not in dispute.

The first negotiation session between the 14 "independent" contractors and the Union was held June 2, and 7 other sessions were held thereafter. Among those who attended all sessions were Thierman; Roy White, who was the Union's business manager and financial secretary and who represented the Union; and Ronald Brown, who was an employee of Thierman's law firm. Others, including some individual contractors or their representatives, attended some of the session. At the first session,[7] Thierman announced that he was representing the 14 contractors, who were named. Thierman said he would be negotiating separate contracts for each contractor, and Robert Jesinger, who was in attendance as a union attorney, suggested the term "coordinated bargaining," which was accepted. Jesinger requested that Thierman submit written authorization of his representation of all the contractors who were negotiating. Thierman emphasized he was seeking new contracts and not renegotiation of the SMACNA contract that was expiring. Thierman stated that the two principal concerns of the contractors were their impaired inability to compete in the Sacramento area and their dissatisfaction with the Union's apprenticeship system. The apprenticeship problem was a part of the competition problem and, Thierman explained, was occasioned by the fact that the ratio of apprentices to journeymen required by the Union's standard contract, i.e., one apprentice to four journeymen, was unrealistic because of the extensive use in small jobs of flexiduct, which required very little skill or training. Thierman stated that he would agree, however, to retain journeymen then employed, at the wage and benefit levels of the SMACNA contract that was expiring.[8] Thierman gave Jesinger proposed wage rates, and Jesinger stated that the Local had no authority to change the International contract; he said it only had authority to change the International contract; he said it only had authority to execute some addenda to that contract. Thierman then objected to section 8 of article 10 of the International agreement, which provided that controversies arising out of the failure of the parties to negotiate a renewal of the agreement must be settled in accordance with section 8, which includes referral of the controversy to the National Joint Adjustment Board (NJAB). Jesinger said[9] that, in his opinion, section 8 of article 10 applied to the contractors Thierman represented and, if an impasse was reached, that section would be invoked. Thierman replied that, in his opinion, such action would violate the National Labor Relations Act (Sec. 8(b)(1)(B) and (4)(A)). The Union asked for the contractors' specific proposals, and Thierman said they would be available at the next session.

At the next session, held on June 5, Thierman told Jesinger he had written the latter a letter outlining his position relative to section 8, article 10 of the expiring contract. The text of the letter, which later was received by Jesinger, read as follows:

> During our bargaining session on June 2, you indicated that it was the Union's position that the impasse resolution procedures set forth in Article X, Section 8 of the Standard Form of Union Agreement would be operative for purposes of resolving disputes arising out of negotiations for a new agreement for those of my clients who have withdrawn from the multiemployer unit. We contend that this is not a "renewal" but an entirely separate agreement with different parties. Notwithstanding, this is to inform you that it is our position that the procedures in question constitute a permissive subject of bargaining (Sheet Metal Workers, Local 59, 227 NLRB 520, 94 LRRM 1602 (1976)), and are thus subject to unilateral modification or rescission by management at any time (Chemical Workers v. Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co., 404 U.S. 157, 78 LRRM 2974 (1971)) particularly after expiration of the agreement itself. Accordingly, as of the expiration date of the agreement, please be advised that management will consider this, and all other permissive subjects in the Standard Form of Union Agreement to have expired and to be of no further force and effect. We believe any action to enforce these abrogated provisions by your client would constitute an unfair labor practice. I trust we can continue negotiations without any further digressions.

Jesinger told Thierman he was not interested in negotiating separate wage scales for all the contractors represented by Thierman, and gave to Thierman a copy of the Union's proposal, which basically was the International agreement negotiated with SMACNA. Wage rates were to be worked out later, the Union wanting a journeyman rate for residential workers and another rate for individuals who were not journeymen. Thierman reiterated that, although some provisions possibly could be applicable to, and acceptable by, all the contractors he represented, he wanted separate contracts for each employer, and not a common contract.

On June 11 Thierman mailed to Jesinger proposed noneconomic contract provisions that were acceptable by all the contractors he represented, and those proposals were discussed at the third session, held June 15. Thierman reiterated that he would not agree to any [7] The facts stated in this paragraph, and in the paragraphs next following, relating to bargaining sessions, are from the testimony of Brown, whose notes of the sessions are R. Exh. 7. Brown was an unusually straightforward, convincing witness, and his testimony is credited. To the extent that his testimony differs from that of White, Brown is credited. White appeared throughout his testimony to be confused, uncertain, and unreliable. His testimony is not credited, except as otherwise noted.

NJAB provision. Wage rates were discussed, but only in general terms, with each side insisting on its position.

At the next session, held June 17, Thierman handed to Jesinger 12 sheets of paper, each listing the economic proposals of the individual contractors.[10] Thierman related instances wherein contractors he represented had lost contracts to nonunion contractors, and requested copies of union contracts with other employers in the Sacramento area. Several contractors who were present related wages then being paid by nonunion contractors, which were well below those then being paid under the SMACNA union agreement. Jesinger gave to Thierman a complete union proposal, which was the standard (International) contract with addenda 1, 2, and 3. The contractors' wage proposals included a separate employee classification for residential workers who had no prior sheet metal experience.

The next negotiation session was held on June 22. Some of the employers' proposals were discussed, and Jesinger said he was withdrawing the Union's proposal for the "equal contracts"[11] clause contained in the International agreement. Thierman reiterated his request for other area contracts, given orally in the meeting of June 17 and by letter to Jesinger dated June 19. Some contractors were at the meeting with their bookkeepers, and they illustrated the problem they were having in competing with nonunion contractors who paid wages far below the union scale. In response to Jesinger's question concerning Thierman's proposed action if a contract was not concluded by July 1, Thierman replied that no unilateral changes would be made in working conditions subject to mandatory bargaining so long as the parties were negotiating, and that, if impasse were reached, he would advise Jesinger before any unilateral implementation of contract proposals. Jesinger said he was not precluding individuals' contracts, but if impasse was reached, he wanted to know which contractors would be willing to submit the matter to NJAB without "a court fight." Thierman replied that the question was premature, but in any event, he felt that no contractor would be legally bound by the NJAB provision of the SMACNA agreement after it expired July 1, because that was a permissive, not a mandatory contract provision. Thierman said that, if the employees went out on strike, the contractors' last best offers would be implemented and replacement workers would be hired. Jesinger said the Union only had one residential agreement for outlying areas, and he gave a copy of that agreement, plus copies of five other agreements the Union had in the local area, to Thierman. Thierman presented counterproposal from B. J. Heating and Air Conditioning, Inc. (B.J.) and said that the most likely candidate for agreement with the Union was B.J.; that if agreement was reached with one contractor, all other contractors probably would "follow suit."

The next session was held on June 30. The Union was given a copy of B.J.'s economic proposals, to which much of the Union agreed, including health, welfare, and pension plans. Jesinger agreed to B.J.'s residential wages scale, and agreed to some modification of the Union's standard employee classifications. A ratio proposal (apprentices to journeymen) was discussed, with B.J. proposing no ratio for residential work, four apprentices (which B.J. referred to as residential workers) to each journeyman for light commercial work, and one residential worked to each journeyman for heavy commercial work. No agreement was reached on proposals for shop fabrication to be done by residential workers; the wage rate for journeymen ($14.80 per hour vs. $16.50); or term of contract (2-1/2 years vs. 1 year).

The final bargaining session was held on July 1. B.J. agreed to accept the Union's standard form of contract (International), with some minor modifications in the grievance procedure, which the Union accepted, and duration of the contract, with which the Union agreed in part. B.J. proposed a modification of addendum 1 relating to an industry promotion fund, and White said he would submit that to the membership. B.J. proposed several substantial changes in addendum 3, concerning shop fabrication, employee ratios (residential workers to journeymen), and the "red circle" provision. Thierman said B.J.'s offer was the final offer of B.J., Placer Heating and Air Conditioning, Don Ring Heating and Air Conditioning, Horrel and Sons, and Sorocco Heating and Air Conditioning, although Ring and Horrel wanted to make some minor modifications to the proposal. Thierman said that, if agreement with the five contractors was reached, some others may agree after a week or so of picketing. However, he said, some would not agree with B.J.'s last offer. Jesinger submitted the Union's standard (International) form of agreement with some modifications, refused to go beyond a ratio of three journeymen to one residential worker; and agreed to B.J.'s proposed pay for residential workers. Jesinger said he wanted a last offer from "those hiding out in the weeds," i.e., Perrin, River City, and others who had not adopted B.J.'s final offer. Jesinger handed a copy of a letter signed June 25 by White, reading as follows:

June 25, 1981

Mr. Edward J. Carlough, G. P.
Sheet Metal Workers Int'l. Assn.
1750 New York Avenue, N.W.
Washington, D. C. 20006

Dear Sir and Brother:

On June 20, 1981 Local 162 requested the services of the N.J.A.B. should negotiations between S.M.A.C.N.A., Sacramento Valley Chapter and Local 162 reach an impasse. The parties mentioned above have sucessfully reached an agreement for a new two (2) year agreement; but an impasse has been reached between Local 162 and a group of independent contractors and contractors that have pulled away from S.M.A.C.N.A. in negotiations for a residential addendum.

We have reached an impasse with this group of contractors (list attached) and respectfully request the services of the Board at their meeting in Denver, Colorado the week of July 6–10, 1981, to > resolve any and all deadlocked issues between this group and any other independent contractors involved.

---

[10] At a time not established during trial, but before June 17, 2 of the original 14 contractors represented by Thierman, Madding, and Beutler, withdrew their authorizations of their representation. Subsequently, Thierman represented only 12 contractors.

[11] This sometimes is referred to as a favored nations clause.

>
> Due to prior commitments, I respectfully request this case be docketed for July 6th or 7th, 1981. All necessary data and documents will be submitted as quickly as possible.
> Fraternally yours,
> /s/ Roy C. White
> ROY C. WHITE
> Business Manager

Jesinger explained that the letter was written before impasse, in order to be placed early on NJAB's agenda, in the event an impasse was reached. He also explained that, although all contractors were listed on the attachment to the letter, the letter was intended to apply only to contractors who adopted B.J.'s last offer on July 1, i.e., B.J., Placer, Ring, Horrel, and Sirocco. Thierman told Jesinger that the contractors who did not join B.J. would have as their final offer, the offer of B.J. submitted on June 30. That offer included the noneconomic proposals previously submitted to the Union, and the economic proposals attached to Brown's notes of June 30. Jesinger told Thierman, "if the members reject their offer we are at impasse and you can implement." Jesinger also told Thierman that he should see White about making arrangements to go to NJAB.

On July 2 Thierman wrote a letter to NJAB[12] stating, inter alia, that section 8, article 10 of the SMACNA agreement did not apply to contractors he named as his clients, i.e., B.J., Placer, Ring, Horrel, Sierra, and Soraccos (elsewhere spelled Sirocco).

An NJAB meeting was held in Denver, Colorado, on July 7.[13] Thierman attended, accompanied by Ring and Bob Johnson (B.J. Heating). Thierman advised the members of NJAB that he was appearing specially since, in his opinion, the contractors he represented were not members of SMACNA. Thierman contested NJAB jurisdiction over the contractors he represented and presented a copy of his letter to Jesinger dated June 4 (quoted supra). Later in July, Thierman received a telegram from NJAB, advising him that NJAB had ruled in favor of the Union and demanding compliance with NJAB's award. Thierman sent a reply telegram refusing to comply with the award. On July 20 Jesinger's office sent a letter to Thierman[14] stating that the Union considered all 12 of the contractors represented by Thierman to be bound by article 10, section 8 of the SMACNA agreement and demanding that all 12 of those contractors submit to the NJAB award.[15] None of the 12 contractors has complied with the award.

On July 7 the employees of Perrin and River City went out on strike, pursuant to a union member vote taken before the NAJB meeting. B.J. and those emloyers allied with B.J. were not struck until sometime in August.

Contentions of the Parties

The General Counsel contends that Respondents violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act on several occasions, as discussed below, and through those actions and the refusal of Respondents to bargain in good faith with the Union, precluded agreement with the Union in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

Respondents deny any 8(a)(1) and (3) violations of the Act; and contend that the Union illegally insisted on submission of the 12 contractors, including Respondents, to the NJAB process, and otherwise bargained in bad faith, thereby precluding further productive bargaining and thereby authorizing Respondents to implement their final offer without further bargaining.

A. Alleged Threat by Rossi

Paragraph 10 of the complaint[16] alleges that, on or about July 6, Rossi of Respondent Perrin threatened employees with discharge unless they withdrew their support of the Union as their bargaining representative.

James Merritt was employed by Respondent Perrin on three occasions in 1978, 1980, and 1981. His 1981 his employment ended July 6 after being employed approximately 10 days. Merritt testified that, at the end of the workday on July 6, he talked with Rossi:

> We were still in the shop, but everybody else was talking and Dave came over and he and I were talking. He told me he would like for me to stay with the company and that—we didn't talk money. We talked, you know, just about that. And I was kind of uncommittal because, to tell you the truth, I didn't really want to get into a big discussion. I believe that union is the only way to go and that's the way I was staying. So I told him I would really, you know, I hadn't really made a decision.
> Then he told me that unless we went non-union that would be the last day we would work, that we would work.

Rossi denied meeting with Merritt on July 6, and denied Merritt's testimony on this subject.

Discussion

The fact that employees and supervisors, among themselves and between supervisors and employees, frequently talked about the Union and negotiations between the Union and several contractors is not in dispute. Such talk was common in the shops, including that of Perrin.

---

[12] R. Exh. 10.

[13] The facts in this paragraph are from Thierman's credited testimony. To the extent of any discrepancy between Thierman and White on this subject, Thierman is credited. As noted supra, White's testimony appeared quite confused and unreliable.

[14] R. Exh. 4.

[15] Thierman's letter to NJAB dated July 2 only listed five of the contractors, and White testified that only those five were involved in the NJAB process. However, it is quite clear that both NJAB and Jesinger considered all 12 contractors represented by Thierman to be bound by the NJAB award. Thierman credibly testified to that effect; the letter from Jesinger's office so states; and the Union's complaint for injunctive and declaratory relief, filed with the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of California on September 3, 1981, so states. Perrin and River City are included within the 12 contractors. White's testimony that Thierman stated at the negotiation session of July 1 that he no longer represented Perrin and River City credibly was denied Brown and Thierman. White's testimony on this point is given no credence.

[16] References to the "complaint" subsequently refer to the amended consolidated complaint issued January 29, 1982.

Rossi's supervisory status is not in dispute, and it is clear that, if the statement alleged to have been made was made, it would have been a violation of the Act. The alleged threat was loss of jobs unless the employees, including Merrit, gave up one of their statutory rights, i.e., union membership.

The only question relative to this issue is that of credibility. Merritt was a convincing witness, and his testimony on this issue is credited. Rossi's statement was a threat in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, as alleged.

B. Alleged Direct Dealing with Employees

Paragraph 11(a) of the complaint alleges that, in mid-June and on or about July 2 or 3, Tarabetz and Rossi of Perrin bypassed the Union and dealt directly with employees in the appropriate unit.

Jack Johnston had been employed by Perrin as a journeyman approximately 15 months, as of June 1981. Johnston testified that he talked with Rossi in mid-June, while Tarabetz was present:

> From what I can recall and by rereading the deposition I made right after in August, they offered if there was no agreement with the union, if they couldn't reach an agreement, that they would offer $15 an hour and some other things, too.
> Q. What were the other things, if you recall?
> A. The only thing I can remember was medical insurance, and that's all I know about that, and a one week vacation.[17]

Johnston also stated, after some leading questions, that possibly Rossi also talked about pensions, and that Rossi told him Perrin would pay his union reinstatement fee if he was laid off by Perrin within a year. Johnston replied that he "would think about it," and asked if Perrin's offer would be put in writing, to which Rossi replied "yes."

Johnston testified that he talked again with Rossi and Tarabetz during the first couple of days in July and that they reiterated their earlier offer. They also told him that if Perrin did not reach agreement with the Union "I could stay and work for them if I wanted to."

Rossi and Tarabetz denied Johnston's testimony relative to this issue.

Discussion

Respondents argue that Johnston's memory was fuzzy, that he harbored a grudge against Perrin, and that he was not a credible witness. It was apparent that Johnston's memory was not clear and sharp, but he appeared to be telling the truth, and there was no appearance of obfuscation or evasion. The fact that he was somewhat uncertain lent credence to his recitation. The denials of Rossi and Tarabetz, and their testimony in general, seemed less reliable than the testimony of Johnston. Johnston is credited.

The alleged unit at Perrin, which is denied by Respondents, is:

> All employees covered under the terms of the June 30, 1978 to June 30, 1981 collective bargaining agreement between Sheet Metal and Air Conditioning contractors National Association, Sacramento Valley Chapter, Inc. and the Union.

Respondents offered no evidence to show that the above unit is not appropriate. It is found to be appropriate, based on the testimony of record and the past acceptance and practice of Respondents.

The contract between SMACNA and the Union expired June 30, 1981, and it had been honored by Respondents and the Union throughout its 3-year life. Continuation of work terms and conditions set forth in the expired contract is required, unless changed by the parties, or the parties have bargained to impasse, or the Union no longer represents the employees. The Union is presumed to be the continuing representative of Respondents' employees. Therefore, Respondents were obligated to deal with their employees only through the Union, so far as work terms and conditions were concerned unless one or more of the above conditions prevailed. Respondents did not show either that the parties agreed to changes in work terms and conditions, or that the Union no longer represented the employees. Respondents argue that the parties were at impasse July 1, but the first offer made to Johnston was before that date. The offer was made in mid-June, although it was reiterated on July 1 or 2.

Respondents' direct dealing with Johnston during pending negotiations with the Union constituted a violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, as alleged

C. Alleged Threat by Fish

Paragraph 12(a) of the complaint alleges that, on or about June 17, Fish threatened employees with more onerous working conditions because they selected the Union as their bargaining representative.

Throughout June, supervisors of Respondents commonly talked with employees, individually and in groups, concerning union matters. Prework coffee sessions, and "bull sessions" of employees, sometimes alone and sometimes in company with supervisors, were common. The matter of negotiations frequently was discussed and was of keen interest to employees. A frequent topic of discussion was the possibility of Respondents "going non-union." During these conversations, Respondents' supervisors often made remarks concerning the Union, which were derisive or disparaging.

John Moss, a union member who had been employed by River City as a journeyman approximately 3 years, testified that Fish talked with him approximately June 17:

> Okay. I was not in the office. I was out in the front of the shop loading my truck to go out to the job. At that time Jim Fish come up to me and was > in kind of a lousy mood and made the statement that from now on we're going to have to start working about 10 hours around here and I'm not paying no doubletime and that I'm not hiring anymore of these union guys and anybody that don't like it, I'll get somebody that does.

---

[17] As of Mid-June, Perrin's highest proposal was to "red line" journeymen at their then wage of $14.80 per hour.

Fish denied John Moss' testimony on this subject.

Discussion

The alleged statement by Fish would, if true, constitute an unlawful threat under the circumstances of this case. As discussed elsewhere here, River City was in the midst of negotiations in mid-June and was not favorably disposed toward the Union. The wages required under the then-existing SMACNA agreement, and wages being sought by the Union for a new contract, were burdensome and, in some instances, not conducive of competitive bidding. The Union knew that fact, and acknowledged to Thierman that some relief was necessary in the residential area, for the 12 contractors Thierman represented. Fish's statement to John Moss, if made, would have constituted a threat of working conditions that would more nearly conform with the requirements of the business, so far as its competitive position was concerned. Whether John Moss was friendly and sometimes socialized, as John Moss and Fish testified, and whether lengthy work hours were not instituted, as Fish testified, are irrelevant facts.

The only question is one of credibility. John Moses was a credible witness, and his recitation of events relative to this issue is accepted as factual.

It is found that River City violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act as alleged.

D. Alleged Direct Dealing with Employees

Paragraph 12(b) of the complaint alleges that, on or about June 17, June 29, July 2, July 6, and on several unknown dates in June, Fish bypassed the Union and dealt directly with its employees in the appropriate unit.[18]

Billy Bush was employed as a journeyman by River City approximately 7 months, from January to July 1981. Bush credibly testified that he was present at early morning sessions commonly attended by employees and supervisors in June, when union negotiations and other union matters were discussed. On one such occasion in June, Bush testified, several employees were talking with Fish, who said that the benefit package the Union was seeking in negotiations was too high. Bush testified that Fish said "they could give us a better coverage for $50 than what the Union was . . . for Kaiser plan . . . than what the Union had for us." Bush also testified that Fish told him approximately June 20:

> He said work was slowing down but he wanted to keep five of us going. There was me, my brother, John and Jack and Dan. But he said he had plenty of work coming up after the 1st of July.

On another occasion before June 20, Bush said, Fish told him "that they could pay us $15 an hour, plus give us a better health plan, and we'd take more money home." Bush further testified that Fish came to the Auburn Oaks Plaza job he was working on in late June and

> He said they'd give us $15 an hour, a week's vacation the first year, two weeks the second year, a retirement plan after six months, and maybe eventually a profitsharing, plus a health plan.[19]

Bush also testified that, sometime between July 1 and 6, he and three other employees talked with Fish, Keeling, Liana Keeling (River City's bookkeeper, and the wife of James Keeling), and Roy Harris (a supervisor, who was the stepfather of John and of Jack Moss, another employee of River City):

> A. Well, we was talking about the offer they gave us and Liana said that she would take—using me as an example.
> Q. Was that Liana Keeling?
> A. Yes. To show me how much more I'd bring home a week, you know, if I went non-union with them. And she figured it out, because I have a wife and three kids, and figured out I'd take home $25 a week more. Then I asked if that was above my vacation pay and they said no, that they couldn't pay that. So I said I was losing $50 a week then. They—
> Q. Was there any response to that?
> A. They said they couldn't help that.[20]

Bush testified that he overheard Keeling talking with Jack Moss later the same day at the preceding conversation:

> Moss was talking to Jim Keeling and asked him if we dropped out of the union and stayed with him what's happen if he got mad at us and fired us or let us go. And he said that there was I think he said 25 shops that were in this that were going to drop out and they were going to form like their own little union and they'd loan people back and forth so there'd be plenty of work for everbody no matter what happened at River City.

During the same converstion, Bush said, Fish told the employees River City would have a pension plan for employees within 6 months. Bush said he had a union pension plan, but was not yet "vested." Fish stated:

> He said that he had heard, you know, we had talked about losing our pensions and stuff and he said that we didn't lose it, we couldn't lose a pension as long as we were vested in the union. That all we had to do was just send a letter in and drop [18] The allegations of par. 13(a) of the complaint, concerning Keeling's participation in direct dealing with employees, are included within this section of the decision.

---

[19] Journeyman wages were $14.80 per hour plus benefits of approximately $6 per hour.

[20] It is noted that this conversation was after July 1, the date Respondents allege the parties reached impasse.

> out of the union and our pensions would still be there.

John Moss corroborated Bush's testimony relative to the frequent early morning sessions of employees, frequently attended by Fish and other supervisors, wherein union negotiations and other union matters were discussed. John Moss testified that on June 29 Fish was with several employees during an early morning session and stated:

> How if we made $15 an hour, because of the different tax bracket we'd be in and not having to pay union dues, that we would actually bring more money home on our check. And at that point I remember saying to Jim Fish well, what if you get mad at me and just lay me off, what am I going to do.
> Q. Did Mr. Fish respond?
> A. No. Mr. Keeling did. And he broke in and said well, there are going to be approximately 27 shops that we're forming our own worker pool and that you can go to any one of these shops and get a job if you leave here. And at which point my brother broke in and said what guarantee do we have that you wont lower our rate to $4 in six months, you know, we have no guarantees if we go non-union. And at that point Jim Fish said they were going to get together and draw up a complete contract of our package and all the shops would sign it and that way we'd be guaranteed certain pay and certain benefits from shop to shop.
> Q. Anything else that you recall about that conversation?
>
> A. Yes. I remember my brother Jack asking him, because he wasn't sure what would happen to his ten years that he had put into the union toward his retirement.
> Q. What did he say?
> A. And they both told him that there was no way—Jim Fish and Jim Keeling both told him that there was no way that the union could hold back anything that he had accumulated up to that date.

John Moss testified:

> On July 2nd Jim Fish—it was four o'clock in the afternoon after work and there was the same guys just getting ready to go home in there and he called me out of the office separate and took me around to the, I guess it would be the west side by the gutter rack and told me that he would be able to pay me $15 an hour, that I'd have a Kaiser health plan better than the union's than the one I had now. He said the first year I'd have a one week paid vacation, the second year would be a two week paid vacation and that he couldn't go over retirement right now, but that in six months we'd sit down and talk about a retirement plan.
> Q. Did you respond to Mr. Fish at that time?
> A. Yes. He asked for my answer and I was kind of afraid to give it to him because I didn't know what would happen as far as my job status. So I told him that I would have to go home and talk to my wife and make plans.

Robert Luke, a union member, was hired by Fish in April 1981 as a journeyman to work for River City. Luke testified that, approximately on June 25, he and employee Dan Flanagan talked with Liana Keeling and Fish "and [they] stated that they were going to go non-union and they wanted us to go non-union with them." Liana Keeling stated that she had talked with an International (union) representative, who assured her that, if the employees sent letters to the Union and "disaffiliated," they could not be fined and would not lose their pensions. She told Luke and Flanagan that the union costs to employees were too high, and that, if they went non-union, the employees would get more take-home pay each week, and also would get pension and health plans at less cost to the employees than what the Union was charging them. Fish said Luke could send the Union a letter of resignation, and stated "take a week off and do it." Luke testified that, approximately 3 weeks before expiration of the contract (the expiration date was June 30), he was called into Fish's office, where Liana Keeling was present, and > Jim asked me if I would go non-union with him and made me an offer of $15 an hour, a pension plan, I believe it was after six weeks' employment, a medical plan through Kaiser, one week's vacation the first year, two weeks' vacation the second year. And after the business got going I'd go into the profit sharing plan.

Luke said he gave no answer to Fish.[21]

Wayne Lofgren presently is employed by River City, and worked at the Auburn Oaks Plaza project as a journeyman in mid-June 1981. Lofgren testified that, on June 12 or 13, Fish came to the Auburn Oaks Plaza jobsite, took him to one side, and said "he was offering $15 an hour and a health and welfare plan and one week's vacation if you stayed a year, something like that." Lofgren testified that he did not give Fish an answer.

Daniel Flanagan was employed by River City approximately 3-1/2 years as a journeyman. He was a union member. Flanagan testified that he talked with Fish and Liana Keeling on June 29 or 30, and that Luke also was present. Fish and Keeling showed the two employees the benefits they pay the Union and "then broke it down in what they could pay us." Keeling said the employees would make $50 more than they then received. Fish agreed with what Keeling told the employees. After the meeting with Fish, Flanagan stated:

> That was I believe the same day right after that meeting. Jim Fish took me out the back door of the shop and offered me, he said you will make a little more than $15 an hour, since I was the shop foreman then. And I get one week's vacation with pay, a health plan, and eventually work into a profit sharing program.

[21] Luke presently is employed by Fish at Fish's "new shop."

Jack Moss worked as a journeyman for River City approximately 3 years. He testified that in October or November 1980 Fish came to the job he was working on and offered him and his brother John $4 more per hour "if he went non-union." Moss said he did not reply. Moss further testified that, in June 1981, several employees and he were having an early morning discussion with Fish and Harris, and that Fish said he could pay the employees $15 per hour and if they did not pay union dues they would take home more money. At that time Moss testified, the negotiations between River City and the Union were a common source of conversation. Moss further testified that, approximately on June 17, Fish came to the project where he was working:

> It was in West Sac and he come out there and he said Jack, I'd like to know what you plan on doing. Are you going to go non-union with us? I can pay you $15 an hour. I can give you a better health plan than you are getting now. And in time maybe we can work a pension plan out and some vacation. And I told him at that time no, I was not going to be able to do that.

Jack Moss further testified that he overheard an argument on June 29 among John Moss, Bush, Keeling, and Fish, and that he entered the argument. The topic of discussion was River City's proposed personal contracts with its employees. Jack Moss said he asked how the employees could be protected against River City's possible reduction of pay and benefits (after the Union was out), and "Jim Fish interrupted and said that they were going to draw up a contract with all these provisions on it for us to sign." They then discussed possible loss of less-than-vested interests in union pension plans, and Fish told Jack Moss that, since he was close to vesting, he could take off a couple of months until he was vested, after which he would not lose his union pension.

Harris testified that, in mid-June, he went to the Auburn Oaks Plaza site with Fish, who talked individually with Bush, Lofgren, and employee Tom Melton. Harris said he did not overhear all the private conversations, but that he did hear Fish tell Bush "something about wanting to get negotiations going, that if anyone stayed they'd get $15 an hour I think was mentioned."

Liana Keeling denied ever talking with any employees concerning union wages or benefits, and also denied ever being with Fish and employees when Fish made an offer of $15 per hour to employees. However, she stated that Fish told her in June, when they were alone "possibly if any of the men stayed or wanted to or whatever that he would pay $15." Liana Keeling later testified that, sometime after July 1, Jack Moss came to the office and talked with her concerning River City's intentions relative to the employees. She said she replied that she did not know, but "We'll be paying medical, and dental, and good wages," and that the employees would vote on medical plans which she had researched.

Fish denied ever talking with employees concerning offers if River City went nonunion. He said he only responded to employees' questions concerning the status of negotiations. Fish said Luke asked him sometime between July 1 and 6 what River City would do if everyone walked out, and that he replied he would get replacements. Luke said, "make me an offer" and Fish replied, "It's basically what you're getting now and the health and welfare plan."

David Birchfield, who worked for River City as a union member and journeyman from 1979 until 1981, testified that, approximately July 1, Fish talked with the employees and said, "our jobs was there if we wanted them. If we didn't, we would probably go out on strike. And he said, you know, he had the job if we wanted to work."

Keeling testified that his principal job was to solicit contracts and to do estimating for jobs. He said Fish and Harris supervised the employees. Keeling testified that he did not attend any negotiation sessions, and that he never discussed any union matters with employees. He denied telling employees that River City was going nonunion, and denied being present at any conversation when Liana Keeling discussed employees' take-home pay.

Discussion

It is clear that, so far as this allegation is concerned, Flanagan must be considered separately because he was a supervisor as that term is defined in the Act. Flanagan was a credible witness, and testified without contradiction that he was paid at the Union's foreman scale, directed the work of employees in the shop; gave work assignments to employees; worked with his tools 5-1/2 to 6 hours each day and spent the rest of the time doing paperwork and "keeping everybody and keeping everything moving"; admonished employees who made errors; read the blueprints for jobs and distributed the work among employees; rejected or accepted employees' work; effectively recommended employees for hire and layoff; evaluated the work of employees and informed Fish or Harris of those evaluations; and effectively recommended suspension and discharge of employees. The shop had from two to four employees, and Flanagan was the only shop foreman. Flanagan worked alongside other employees, dressed as they did at work, parked where they did, and did not attend management meetings. However, he clearly was boss of the shop, and it is found that he was a supervisor within the meaning of the Act. Therefore, so far as this allegation of the Act is concerned, his testimony is given no weight.

If accepted as true, the testimony of Bush, John and Jack Moss, Luke, and Lofgren would establish violations of the Act as alleged. As discussed above, Respondents and the Union were in the midst of negotiations in June. The Union represented Respondents' employees in the appropriate unit, and it would be unlawful for River City to deal directly with employees without participation of the Union, relative to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of work. The testimony of the named employees was that Fish did, as alleged, deal directly with them and attempt to persuade them to "go nonunion."

The question is whether the named employees testified truthfully. It is found that they did. Bush, Luke, and the two Moss brothers particularly were credible witnesses.

The pattern of the conversations between Fish and the employees was a common one, and the testimony of the employees did not appear illogical or contrived. All the employee-witnesses answered in a forthright manner, and none of them appeared antagonistic toward Fish or River City.

It is found that, by dealing directly with employees as alleged, Respondent River City violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

E. Alleged Threat by Fish

Paragraph 12(c) of the complaint alleges that, in mid-June, Fish threatened employees with discharge because they selected the Union as their representative.

John Moss testified that in late June:

> I remember one morning my brother Jack and I were walking up to the shop and Jim Fish was standing at the big door in front of the shop and as we walked up he grinned at us and started singing "Do You Know the Way to San Jose."
>
> . . . .
> Q. At the time that Mr. Fish sang "Do You Know the Way to San Jose" did you have any knowledge of jobs in San Jose?
>
> A. Yes. It was common knowledge throughout all the union members there that the only work right now in this time was in San Jose.

Moss presently is employed in San Jose.

Fish denied this testimony by John Moss, and said he can barely whistle.

Discussion

Under the circumstances described by John Moss, which were corroborated to the extent that several employees testified relative to depressed work availability in the Sacramento area, Fish's actions, if accepted as true, would constitute a job threat. The threat was there, even if no words were spoken.

The question is one of credibility, and John Moss was a convincing witness. It is clear throughout the record that River City wanted to be free of the Union, and adopted several measures, as discussed here, to achieve that goal. This testimony by John Moss was consistent with the general scene then prevailing, and is credited.

It is found that Respondent River City violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act as alleged.

F. Alleged Promise of Better Benefits

Paragraph 12(d) of the complaint alleges that, on several dates in June and July, Fish promised employees they would receive better benefits if they withdrew their support from the Union.

These promises are included within the discussion above in section D and are found to constitute a separate violation of the Act.

G. Alleged Threat by Fish

Paragraph 12(e) of the complaint alleges that, on or about July 6, Fish threatened employees that River City would discontinue negotiations with the Union if the employees did not vote to ratify a proposed contract between River City and the Union.

The General Counsel introduced no testimony or evidence in support of this allegation.

Paragraph 12(f) of the complaint alleges that, in June 1981, Fish threatened to close the River City shop if the Union received the same benefits negotiated by the San Francisco Bay area Union.

Bush testified that, in early June, Fish told him, "if our union tried to get a contract like the Bay Area got that he'd close the doors down."

Fish denied this testimony by Bush.

Discussion

An unlawful threat is apparent if Bush's testimony is credited. That credit is given, and it is found, that Respondent River City violated the Act as alleged.

H. Alleged Instructions to Employees to Resign from Union Membership

Paragraph 12(g) of the complaint alleges that, in June 1981, Fish instructed employees to send resignation letters to the Union.

Lofgren testified that, on June 12 or 13, he talked with Harris on the job at Auburn Oaks Plaza, which was the same day Fish came to the jobsite and talked privately with him:

> [H]e suggested that I just send a letter in or something like that to drop out of the union or something.
>
> JUDGE STEVENS: Send a letter to who?
> THE WITNESS: To I guess the union or whatever.
> JUDGE STEVENS: The union?
> JUDGE STEVENS: All right. Thank you.
> BY MS. AURE:
> Q. Did you say anything to him in response to that?
>
> A. No. I didn't say anything.
> Q. Did you tell him you wanted to get out of the union?
> A. I didn't say nothing.

Harris denied telling any employee to resign from the Union.

Discussion

There is some testimony in the record concerning Flanagan's possible resignation from the Union, but that testimony was vague and inconclusive, and did not establish a violation of the Act, regardless of Flanagan's supervisorial status. As noted supra, Flanagan was a supervisor within the meaning of the Act.

So far as Lofgren's testimony is concerned, it was cryptic and unconvincing. It is given no credence. Harris' denial is credited, and no violation of the Act is found relative to this issue.

I. Alleged Threat to Lock Out Employees

Paragraph 12(h) of the complaint alleges that, on or about July 6, Fish threatened to lock out River City's employees if they failed to ratify a proposed contract between River City and the Union.

Employees who were members of the Union were scheduled to meet the evening of July 6 for the purpose of voting on Respondent's proposed contract. Rush testified that he talked with Fish before starting work the morning of July 6, and that "he told me to take my tools home that night, that we'd be locked out the next day." Bush further testified that Fish "said he knows that we wouldn't accept the contract that they offered the Union and they wouldn't accept the union contract."

John Moss testified that, on July 6:

> It was just a normal working day. We'd come in and park our trucks and were walking down the driveway heading out and Jim Fish ran out of the shop and called my brother and I back and said that hey, you guys had better take your tools with you because if you don't vote the way we want you to vote tonight there won't be a job to come to tomorrow.

Jack Moss testified that Fish told him on July 6:

> As we were leaving the shop that day as we were done working, my brother and I. We were walking out the gate and Mr. Fish said to us that we had ought to take our tools with us because if the vote didn't go in Mr. Fish's favor tonight with our union there would be no job for us to come back to tomorrow. So we of course went in and got our tools.

Fish denied the testimony of Bush and John and Jack Moss on this issue, and denied telling any employee to take his tools home.

Discussion

Fish's statement, if it was made, clearly was a coercive threat. The only question is one of credibility.

Bush and John and Jack Moss were convincing witnesses and they are credited.

A violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act is found, as alleged.

J. Alleged Interrogation of Employees

Paragraph 12(i) of the complaint alleges that in mid-June Fish interrogated employees concerning their union activities.

No evidence was introduced relative to this issue, and a violation as alleged is not found.

K. Alleged Direct Dealing with Employees

Paragraph 13(a) of the complaint alleges that, on or about June 29 and on an unknown date in June, Keeling bypassed the Union and dealt with unit employees.

Luke testified that, on June 26, Keeling asked him if he "was going to go non-union with him" and Luke replied that he could not give him an answer at that time.

As discussed supra, Keeling was present at, and participated in, conversations wherein Fish, assisted by Liana Keeling, dealt directly with employees by describing the exact differences between pay and benefits the employees received through the Union, and pay and benefits they would receive if they dealt with River City as a nonunion employer.

Keeling denied ever dealing directly with employees.

Discussion

Based on the credited testimony of Luke, and on the testimony of other witnesses discussed supra, under section D, it is found that Keeling, alone and together with Fish, dealt directly with employees and bypassed the Union as alleged in the complaint.

L. Alleged Promise of Benefits

Paragraph 13(b) of the complaint alleges that in June Keeling promised employees better benefits if they withdrew their support of the Union.

These promises are included with the issues discussed supra, where it was found that Fish and Keeling dealt directly with employees in violation of the Act. A separate violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act is found, based on the promises of Keeling.

M. Alleged Threat to Close the Business

Paragraphs 13(c) and (d) allege that in June 1981 Keeling threatened to close River City if the Union received the same benefits negotiated by unions in the San Francisco Bay area, and also threatened to close the business rather than sign a contract with the Union.

Bush testified that in June Keeling stated to him and other employees "if our union tried to get a contract like the Bay Area got that he'd close the doors down" and on a separate occasion stated to him and other employees "if the union found a loophole to make him sign a contract he'd shut the doors."

Keeling denied the threats attributed to him.

Discussion

Bush is credited, and these allegations are found, to be supported by the record.

N. Alleged Interrogation of Employees

Paragraph 13(e) of the complaint alleges that on or about June 26 Keeling interrogated employees concerning their union activities.

No evidence was introduced in support of this allegation, and a violation is not found.

O. Alleged Promise of Benefits

Paragraph 14 of the complaint alleges that, on June 25 and 30 and on July 3, Liana Keeling promised employees better benefits than the Union offered, if they withdrew their union support.

Liana Keeling's participation with Fish and her husband when various unlawful promises were made to employees is discussed supra, particularly in section D.

Testimony concerning Liana's preparation of a comparison of benefits and costs of union proposals to River City, and concerning her presentation of the comparison at a negotiation session with the Union and to employees, was conflicting. However, based on the testimony of employees discussed above, it is found that Liana did talk with employees as alleged and tried to get them to stay with River City in a nonunion capacity in exchange for which they would receive better benefits than they would get through the Union.

Liana's agency status is clear. She was the wife of one of River City's owners, she attended at least one negotiation session as a representative of River City, and she often dealt with employees as a management representative. When she made the promises to employees, she made them on behalf of River City and in violation of the Act, as alleged.

P. Alleged Threat by Harris

Paragraph 15(a) of the complaint alleges that, on or about June 10, Harris threatened employees with discharge because they selected the Union as their bargaining representative.

Harris' supervisory status is not in dispute.

John Moss testified that on June 10 he and his brother Jack Moss talked with Harris:

> He came out to us and looked around and made sure that just Jack and I were there and he told us that he had been told by Jim Fish and Jim Keeling that they were not going to continue to stay in the union when the contract expired and that [it] would be to our benefit to go out and try to find another job. And at which point I remember Jack—
> Q. Your brother Jack?
>
> A. Right. Had said are you sure about this, Dad, is this definite. And he said yes, there's no doubt about it.
> Jack Moss corroborated John Moss' testimony on this issue.

Harris testified that he talked with John and Jack Moss about their jobs on three occasions in June. He said the first occasion was in early June, when the two sons were worried about what was happening concerning the Union. Harris said he told them, "I think you probably know more about it than I do" because they attended union meetings, which Harris did not. Harris said he told them "if they were worried . . . why don't you look for another job." Harris testified that the next conversation was a week or so later, when Jack called him aside, with John present:

> He says Dad, what should we do. I said I can't answer that for you, you are big boys, I said, you know, whether they should stay or look for another job or what. And that was the extent of that conversation.
> Q. Did you mention anything to them about whether they should stay union or nonunion?
> A. Yes, I did. In fact, I said it in front of Mr. Keeling and—and I told them both, I said I know how you feel, stay union, and later on down the line if you have to come back, come back.

The third conversation, Harris testified, was near the end of June, when he asked John and Jack Moss if they wanted to be laid off so they could draw unemployment insurance payments. Harris said they replied no, because they wanted to stay "to the end" and make as much money as they could.

Discussion

Harris had been a union member since 1969, but resigned his membership on July 7, after which he remained employed by River City. Harris denied telling John or Jack Moss, or any other employee, that River City was going nonunion, or that Keeling or Fish told him River City was going nonunion. Harris said he never talked with Keeling concerning the business possibly being closed in June 1981. He said, however, that Keeling told him "if negotiations didn't work out that he wouldn't be able to pay the Bay Area wages."

John and Jack Moss were credible witnesses, and their testimony was supported in part by Harris, who acknowledged that he told them they should look for another job if they were worried about River City. Harris acknowledged during testimony on another issue (discussed supra) that he overheard Fish telling Bush he would give employees $15 per hour if negotiations with the Union were not successful. Harris was aware of the uncertainty and concern of employees, particularly John and Jack Moss, about their jobs, and he testified that he told some employees River City could not pay bay area wages. Harris denied that he knew Fish and Keeling were thinking about "going non-union," but that testimony is inconsistent with much of his other testimony, and is subject to doubt. In any event, it is clear that Harris told John and Jack Moss, who were concerned about their job because of difficulties between River City and the Union, that perhaps they should look for other employment. The three witnesses were on good terms and had a family relationship, but John and Jack Moss did not live at home and, as Harris testified, he considered them "big boys" who could take care of themselves. Perhaps Harris' statement was veiled, but it was, nonetheless, an implicit threat that, if they wanted to stay in the Union, they should look for another job. Whatever the relationship was among the three men, Harris' advice was that of River City, and it was coercive in violation of the Act, as alleged.

Q. Alleged Direct Dealing with Employees

Paragraph 15(b) of the complaint alleges that, in June, Harris dealt directly with unit employees.

There is no evidence to support this allegation. Harris went to the Auburn Oaks Plaza jobsite with Fish on June 12, when Fish talked with employees as discussed supra, but there is no evidence that Harris talked with any employee that day, or any other day, concerning wages, benefits, or working conditions.

R. Alleged Instruction to Employees to Resign from the Union

Paragraph 15(c) of the complaint alleges that, in June, Harris instructed an employee to send a letter of resignation to the Union.

This allegation refers to an alleged conversation between Harris and Lofgren, discussed above in section I. As there noted, Lofgren's testimony on this subject is given no credence. No violation is found relative to this issue.

S. Alleged Threat to Close the Business

Paragraph 15(d) of the complaint alleges that in June Harris threatened that River City would close its business rather than sign a contract with the Union, and stated that River City would not sign a contract with the Union.

No testimony or evidence was introduced in support of this allegation, and no violation of the Act is found.

T. Alleged Discharge of Employees

Paragraph 16 of the complaint alleges that River City discharged employees Lofgren and Dave Chassey because of their union activities and in violation of the Act.

The General Counsel withdrew the allegation relative to Chassey, during the trial.

So far as Lofgren is concerned, the General Counsel argues that he was discharge d because he failed to give River City a commitment "to go non-union."

Harris testified that he laid off Chassey and Lofgren approximately on the same day because the Auburn Oaks Plaza job was coming to an end.

Lofgren testified that, when he was laid off, Harris said something like "if I decided to go no-union" there may be later worker for him, but Lofgren testified several times that he was having considerable difficulty recalling events because "it's been a long time" since they happened. Harris credibly denied making the statement Lofgren said he made. Lofgren testified that, when he was laid off, "Things were winding up there at Auburn Oaks," and that "everybody knew it." The only job at that time was for rough duct work, and nearly all that duct had been installed. Employee Tom Melton, who also was on the job, was laid off a few days after Chassey and Lofgren.

As noted supra, Lofgren's uncertain testimony concerning Harris' alleged statement about going "non-union" is given no credence, and that statement consitutes almost the entire case so far as Lofgren's layoff is concerned. Even if that testimony were to be credited in its entirety, arguendo, there still would be inadequate basis for finding that the layoff was in violation of the Act.

This allegation was not proved.

U. Alleged Lockout

Paragraph 17 of the complaint alleges that on or about July 6 River City locked out its employees because of their union activity.

Fish was a union member, and knew that River City's employees were scheduled to vote the evening of July 6, relative to contract proposals and a proposed strike. Fish scheduled a meeting with employees the evening of July 6, which was to be held after the union meeting. Fish threatened two employees with a lockout July 7 if the proposals of River City were not accepted, as discussed in section J, above. However, River City did not lockout its employees, because it never had an opportunity to do so. Pursuant to vote taken the evening of July 6, the employees went on strike July 7, and commenced picketing approximately at 7 a.m. that day. There is no evidence that River City instructed its employees the evening of July 6 that they were locked out and could not come through the doors the following day. John Moss testified that on July 7, "Well, I was locked out. Right. They went non-union." That testimony is conclusionary, unsupported, and ambiguous. It is given no weight in view of the clear record that, in fact, no lockout took place.

This allegation was not proved.

Respondents' Files

Although River City's representatives were more forceful in their efforts than were those of Perrin, it is clear from the actions of both firms, as discussed in detail above, that they intended throughout negotiations either to go nonunion or to achieve through union concessions the same competitive advantages they could achieve without a union contract.

Respondents' need for relief from high union-inspired costs, particularly in the residential area, is clear, and their attmepts to negotiate such relief are both understandable and lawful. As shown by the testimony of White, Brown, Fish, and other witnesses, the negotiations were not barren of fruit. Both sides often changed their positions during negotiations, even relative to the acceptance, or refusal to accept, the Union's standard (International) contract. However, it is clear that Respondents were making concessions that appeared conciliatory, with the goal constantly in mind of either going nonunion, or obtaining a contract that would give them the same advantages they would have without a contract. Patently, the Union could not yield to the extent desired by Respondents. The testimony of employees discussed above shows the parameters within which Respondents were willing to move. The offers employees received personally from both Respondents show what Respondents wanted if they were to sign a contract. Further, that testimony establishes that, if they did not get what they wanted, Respondents planned to discontinue recognition of the Union as the representative of their employees.

In addition to the lack of good faith exhibited by the violations of the Act during negotiations, as discussed above, River City indicated its intentions in other ways.

1. John Moss credibly testified that, in September or November 1980, Fish said to him and his brother Jack, "they had thought about going non-union and if they ever did he could probably pay us approximately four more dollars an hour than we make right now."

2. Bush credibly testified that, during the negotiation period in June, Fish stated to several employees "if the union agreed to what they [the contractors] were trying to get passed that they were stupid." Bush later testified that the contractors were going to propose a ratio of four nonskilled workers to each journeyman. Later, Bush credibly testified, Fish told several employees that the contractors were insisting on the four-to-one ratio, but that the Union was not budging.

3. Bush credibly testified that, in mid-June, Keeling stated to several employees that he had just sent a $20,000 check to the Union "and said he just bought them a new Cadillac and he wasn't going to buy them no more." Bush's testimony on this matter credibly was corroborated by John Moss. Keeling denied the testimony of Bush and John Moss.

4. John Moss credibly testified that on one occasion during negotiations Fish told him and several other employees that the Union was "cheating" the employees by not giving them the health coverage they were paying for, and that River City could get better coverage for them.

5. John Moss credibly testified that, in June, Fish told him and other employees "how many shops had gone non-union and were going non-union and just made a reference that, in his opinion, he didn't see the union could make it another year."

Fish and Keeling testified that River City's principal concern was a lower rate of pay for residential workers, and that the matter of a ratio of residential workers to journeymen never was of particular concern to River City. Brown partially supported that testimony by stating that ratios first were discussed by the parties at the negotiation session of June 30. However, that testimony later was changed on cross-examination, and Brown acknowledged that ratios were discussed on June 5 (Thierman said ratios were a matter of difference between the parties); June 15 (Thierman said his clients could not agree to any ratios); June 17; June 22 (Jessinger said the Union would not agree to a ratio of four residential workers to one journeyman); June 25; and June 30 (B. J. offered four residential workers to one journeyman). Brown said neither River City nor Perrin ever offered anything other than unlimited ratios. In any event, the question still remains whether Fish made the statements attributed to him by the General Counsel's witnesses as discussed above, and it is found that he did. Further, Fish acknowledged that B. J. wanted a ratio of workers, and Fish's statements to employees did not necessarily reflect what was going on during negotiations. Still further, Keeling and Tarabetz testified that their principal concern during negotiations was the ratio of apprentices to journeymen, and that they wanted an unlimited number of apprentices to journeymen. He said he did not want any set ratio at all—he wanted to hire the numbers of each classification that he desired. Finally, Johnston credibly testified that, in the morning of July 6, Tarabetz told a group of employees "an agreement hadn't been made yet and he wasn't sure if there was going to be one made because of the amount of helpers per journeymen." Tarabetz stated that, if the Union accepted the conractors' offer, they would stay with the Union. The record is replete with incidents showing that Respondents were hard pressed financially, were suffering from nonunion competition, were pushing the Union for relief, were blaming much of their plight on the Union, did not like the Union's representation of their employees, and wanted to become nonunion employers if they did not get the relief they sought through negotiation.

A question arises whether Respondents urged conditions on the Union that they knew the Union would not accept. It is found that they did. All witnesses who attended the negotiation sessions agreed that the parties frequently changed their positions on many items and were close to agreement on June 30. It is clear, and I find, that one of Respondents' principal concerns as of June 30 was the matter of employee ratios, and that Respondents' position was its insistence on an unlimited ratio. That position is stated in Perrin's proposal that was made available to Perrin's employees the afternoon of July 6. It reads:

> There shall be no limit placed on the company as to the number of residential workers it may employ for the purpose of residential work. When engaged in "light commercial work" (individual units of ten (10) tons or less used in non-residential construction) the Employer will use at least one sheet metal journeyman for every four residential journeymen (A or B). When engaged in "heavy commercial work" (individual units exceeding ten (10) tons in non-residential construction) the Employer may use one residential worker or every four sheet metal journeymen.

The proposal also provided that residential employees and employees other than journeymen could be hired solely by Respondent Perrin, free of any control by the Union. Only journeymen were to be red lined. It is apparent that the Union would not accept such stringent limitations on its position as representative of unit employees.[22] Respondents already have prepared proposals for presentation to employees the evening of July 6, after the Union meeting that day, and Perrin made its proposals available to employees for their scrutiny before the union meeting. The logical conclusion is that Respondents knew before the union meeting that the employees would not accept Respondents' proposals to the Union.

It is found that Respondents River City and Perrin bargained in bad faith with the Union during the time of their negotiations, as alleged by the General Counsel.[23]

Respondents' Unilateral Implementation of Offers

At the union meeting of July 6 the members voted to reject Respondents' offers, and to strike commencing the following day.[24] As previously scheduled, and as the employees previously had been notified, Perrin held a meeting of employees just after the union meeting on July 6. Tarabetz and Rossi attended, as did several employees. Tarabetz handed to the employees Perrin's proposal under which Perrin offered jobs to them. The proposal was somewhat different from the proposal offered to the Union.[25] Included in the offer was a journeyman (foreman) wage of $15 per hour,[26] a dental plan, profit sharing, and personal use of company trucks. Some employees resigned from the Union that evening by telegram, and the following day, July 7, former apprentices Miles and Cheshire reported for work as nonunion foremen. Employee Reek also returned as a nonunion employee.

[23] NLRB v. Reed & Prince Mfg. Co., 205 F.2d 131 (1st Cir. 1953).

[24] The Union recommended to the employees that they reject Respondents' offers.

Only one employee, Birchfield, accepted River City's offer to return to work as a nonunion employee. He resigned his union membership, and came back to work 2 weeks later, at $15 per hour as a journeyman.

The record shows beyond any reasonable doubt that Respondents entered into bargaining in bad faith—they intended to go nonunion, unless they could bring the Union to heel on a subject they knew the Union would not agree to; i.e., the matter of unlimited ratios of journeymen to residential workers.[27] There was no showing that the Union did not represent Respondents' unit employees as of the time Respondents refused further to recognize the Union and bargain with it as required by the Act. Even existence of an impasse would not relieve Respondents from further bargaining.[28]

In light of Respondents' bad-faith bargaining, no impasse was reached, and Respondents' unilateral implementation of its own schedule of wages and benefits was a violation of the Act, regardless of whether the implemented wages and benefits were the same, or substantially the same, as Respondents proposed during negotiations.[29]

V. Respondents' Discontinuance of Contributions

The fact that, subsequent to June 30, Respondents failed and refused to continue payment of contributions on behalf of employees as required by the old contract is not in dispute.

Such failure and refusal by Respondents constituted violations of the Act, as alleged by the General Counsel.[30]

Respondents' Defense

Respondents argue that their duty to bargain was discharged as a result of Local 162's bad-faith bargaining by insisting on the NJAB procedures to replace the parties at the bargaining table.

Respondents argue that the Union violated Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act when it insisted on, and invoked, the NJAB procedure against them. However, that issue is not before me.[31] Whether the Union violated the Act is not dispositive of the issue whether Respondents violated the Act as alleged in the complaint involved in this decision.[32] In any event, whether the Union violated the Act is irrelevant because, by the time the Union invoked the NJAB procedure, Respondents already had decided to go nonunion, had dealt with employees independently of the Union, and had violated the Act in several instances, all of which established bad-faith bargaining. Clearly, anything the Union did concerning NJAB did provoke those actions by Respondents, or justify their violations of the Act that preceded any NJAB procedures. The Union's initial letter to NJAB was no more than a request to be placed on the agenda, and the date of that letter is not controlling so far as any issue is concerned. The NJAB matter was discussed during several bargaining sessions, with the Union threatening to invoke the procedure and Respondents denying that the procedure was applicable, but that fact did not control, or even have any apparent influence on, the course of negotiations. Legal arguments during negotiations are a common fact of life. Further, while those arguments were going on, Respondents systematically were approaching their employees with the proposal that they stay with Respondents as nonunion employees, pursuant to separate and independent agreements with those employees. Clearly, the arguments at the negotiation table were not keeping the parties apart, or coercing Respondents in any manner.

Respondents rely on Sheet Metal Workers Local 59 (Employers Assn.), 227 NLRB 520, 521 (1976), but that case does not control the issues here because there, a charge against the union was the only charge being litigated. The Board there stated, inter alia, "our finding of an 8(b)(1)(B) violation in this case rests not only on the fact that the Union insisted to impasse on certain nonmandatory bargaining subjects, but also on the basis that the entire thrust of the Union's tactics was to force the negotiations to a deadlock in order to submit the dispute to" NJAB. Such facts are not present in this case. Here, it is clear that the reason for the impasse was that Respondents wanted no ratio of residential workers to journeymen, and the Union wanted such a ratio. Respondents knew the Union would not accept their proposal, hence they were prepared for independent employee contracts the evening of July 6, in keeping with their earlier direct dealing with employees. There was no deadlock because of the NJAB procedure—that matter was brought in by the heels, so to speak, after the real damage already had been done. It is noted, parenthetically, that by July 1 the Union already had agreed not to include the NJAB procedures within its proposals for a new contract.

Respondents argue that they were privileged unilaterally to institute changes in their employees' working conditions on July 7 because the employees' strike of July 7 was illegal under the expired SMACNA agreement. That argument is based on assumption, arguendo, of the Union's position that article X, section 8 of the expired agreement survived that expiration. However, as discussed above, whether the Union violated the Act by insisting on application of article X, section 8 is irrelevant, because by July 7, when Respondents' instituted changes in employees' wages and working conditions, Respondents already had violated the Act as alleged by the General Counsel, and had "gone nonunion." As noted in Respondents' brief, the Union did not attempt to enforce the NJAB award until approximately 2 weeks after July 7.

[25] This proposal to employees is not in evidence.

[26] As previously noted, journeyman wages as of July 6 were $14.80 per hour.

[27] For discussion of bad faith in proposing terms and conditions patently unacceptable to the Union, see NLRB v. Cable Vision, 660 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1981).

[31] Respondents' earlier charge of such a violation was dismissed by the Regional Director for Region 20. That dismissal was sustained on its appeal to NLRB.

[32] American Gypsum Co., 231 NLRB 1291 (1977).

Respondents also argue that the Union's failure to provide them with copies of all contracts the Union had negotiated (as of the June 17 bargaining session) was a breach of the Union's duty to bargain in good faith. The Union later provided Respondents with copies of all such contracts, except for the one applicable to the Sacramento SMACNA group. However, that failure was an incidental matter, and one that is lost in the jungle of events. It had nothing to do with the basic issues, which spring from Respondents' expressed intention to "go nonunion" or to obtain concessions from the Union which would be tantamount to no contract. Surely, failure to provide the requested contract did not cause, or contribute to, Respondents' various threats, promises, direct dealing with employees, and other violations of the Act described above.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES ON COMMERCE

The activities of Respondents, set forth in section III, above, occurring in connection with their operations described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States, and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondents have engaged in certain unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act, it will be recommended that they be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed and found necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

The appropriate remedy for Respondents' unilateral action in discontinuing contributions to the health, welfare, and pension plans provided in the collective-bargaining agreement between the parties, which expired June 30, 1981, is to reinstate the status quo ante and retain it until Respondents fulfill their obligation by bargaining a new agreement or by bargaining in good faith to impasse. For this reason, I shall recommend that Respondents make whole its employees affected by Respondents' unilateral change in benefits. It will be recommended that the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement which expired on June 30, 1981, be reinstated forthwith and continued in effect until after the terms of a new agreement are agreed on or until impasse is reached.

It is recommended that all allegations of the complaint found not to have been proved, be dismissed in their entirety.

On the basis of the above findings of fact and on the entire record in the case, I make the following

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Perrin Heating and Air Conditioning and River City Mechanical are, and at all times material have been, employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Sheet Metal Workers Union Local No. 162, Sheet Metal Workers International Association, AFL-CIO is, and at all times material has been, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The following two units are appropriate for purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All employees of (Perrin Heating and Air Conditioning) and (River City Mechanical) covered under the terms of the June 30, 1978 to June 30, 1981 collective-bargaining agreement between Sheet Metal and Air Conditioning Contractors National Association, Sacramento Valley Chapter, Inc., and Sheet Metal Workers Union Local No. 162, Sheet Metal Workers International Association, AFL-CIO.

4. The Union is, and at all times material has been, the exclusive bargaining representative of all employees in the appropriate unit described above.

5. Respondent Perrin violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by threatening employees with discharge unless they withdrew their support of the Union as their bargaining representative.

6. Respondent Perrin violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by bypassing the Union and dealing directly with unit employees concerning wages and other terms and conditions of work; by unilaterally implementing its contract proposals without bargaining in good faith to impasse with the Union; and by discontinuing making contributions to unit employees' benefit funds without bargaining in good faith to impasse with the Union.

7. Respondent River City violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by threatening its employees with discharge, business closure, more onerous working conditions, and lockout because of their union sympathies, membership, and activities; and by promising employees better benefits if they withdrew their support of the Union as their bargaining representative.

8. Respondent River City violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by bypassing the Union and dealing directly with unit employees concerning wages and other terms and conditions of work; by unilaterally implementing its contract proposals without bargaining in good faith to impasse with the Union; and by discontinuing making contributions to unit employees' benefit funds without bargaining in good faith to impasse with the Union.

9. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

10. Respondents did not otherwise violate the Act as alleged in the complaint.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On November 30, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Karl H. Buschmann issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel and the Charging Parties filed cross-exceptions and supporting briefs. The Respondent and the Charging Parties additionally filed reply briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions, as modified, and to adopt the recommended Order.

As set forth more fully in the attached judge's decision, the parties began negotiating for a collective-bargaining agreement in March 1985.[2] On June 13, the parties reached agreement on five items: health benefits, severance pay, vacation pay, breakdown time, and job security. The parties memorialized their agreement in a handwritten document that provided that the agreement was made "pending the resumption of negotiations" and, inter alia, "[t]hese changes will be incorporated into any agreement entered into by the parties following July 31, 1985."

Negotiations for a final agreement continued into the fall and in October, the Local Unions notified the companies that they had changed their position on the job-security issue. The Local Unions further indicated that they were willing to strike if the companies would not modify the job-security provision.

At the parties' November 14 meeting, Harry Graham, labor relations manager of Continental Baking Company, offered a complete contract proposal containing a modified job-security provision, the four other provisions of the June agreement, and other contract terms. With minor modifications, Graham's proposal was agreed to and signed by all parties, including Joseph Giunta, the Respondent's personnel director who was representing the Respondent at that bargaining session. The Respondent later refused to sign the agreement in its final form and refused to be bound by the agreement.

The judge found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) and Section 8(d) of the Act by failing and refusing to execute the collective-bargaining agreement reached on November 14, 1985. In so finding, the judge reasoned that the June agreement constituted a binding settlement on those terms that the parties were free to change only by mutual consent. As the Respondent consented to changing the June agreement when it willingly entered into the November agreement, the Respondent was required to execute the November agreement.

The Respondent has excepted to the judge's decision, arguing that it did not voluntarily enter into the November 14 agreement. Rather, the Respondent asserts that because the June agreement was a binding settlement, the Local Unions were not free to threaten to strike if the companies did not renegotiate the job-security provisions and that, by threatening to strike, the Local Unions coerced the Respondent into agreeing to the November 14 proposal. In effect, the Respondent argues that it was no more lawful for the unions to resort to economic weapons in support of their bargaining position on these provisions than it would be for a party to insist on midterm alterations in a collective-bargaining agreement governed by the requirements of Section 8(d) of the Act. The General Counsel and the Local Unions filed limited exceptions to the judge's decision, asserting that the June agreement was not a binding settlement, but rather a statement of progress on the negotiations that was intended to be incorporated into a final agreement, if one were reached. We find merit only in the General Counsel's and the Local Unions' exceptions.

[1] The judge inadvertently stated that an agreement was reached by the parties on November 16, 1985. The record is clear that the agreement was reached on November 14, 1985.

The judge further found that "[o]nce agreement was reached between the parties on a multiemployer and multilocal level, each company executed a separate collective-bargaining agreement with the Local Union which represented the Company's employees." The record testimony indicates that once agreement was reached between the parties on a multiemployer and multilocal level, each company executed that agreement with the Local Union representing the company's employees. Thus, all three companies had identical contracts with the various Local Unions representing their different work forces.

[2] All dates refer to 1985 unless otherwise indicated.

The Charging Parties, eight local unions of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL–CIO (Local Unions), bargained on a multiemployer basis with Stroehmann Bakeries, Inc. (the Respondent), Continental Baking Company and Interstate Brands Corporation. The collective-bargaining agreements in effect from 1982–1985 expired on March 30.

There is no dispute that, following a period of negotiations, the parties agreed to five provisions on June 13. It is also clear that the handwritten document memorializing that agreement was not intended to be a final contract, as that document expressly stated that the provisions would "be incorporated into any agreement entered into by the parties following July 31, 1985." The only question is what effect that document had on the parties' further obligations to bargain in good faith.

In the normal course of negotiations, there is much give and take until a final collective-bargaining agreement is reached. Frequently, agreement may be reached on some issues, only to be modified as other issues come into play. Consequently, there is usually no binding agreement until a final, complete agreement is reached.[3] Notwithstanding that practice, parties negotiating for a contract always have the ability to make any provisions final and binding along the way, thus precluding any further negotiations on those issues.

The parties here agreed to five provisions in June. There is no evidence, however, that when they agreed to those provisions, they intended them to be final and binding. Thus, there was no indication that the parties intended those subject matters to be off limits for further discussion. Absent such evidence, we conclude that, as in the normal course of negotiations, the parties here reached agreement on several provisions en route to reaching a final agreement, but that no agreement became final and binding until the final contract was made.

As we find that the June 13 agreement was not a binding agreement, the Local Unions were free to seek modifications of those provisions in negotiating a final agreement.[4] Such modifications were sought, and they were agreed to by the Respondent.[5] The Respondent, having agreed to the contract, violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act as defined by Section 8(d) of the Act, by failing and refusing to execute the collective-bargaining agreement.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Stroehmann Bakeries, Inc., Williamsport, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

Michael Cooperman, Esq., for the General Counsel.

Timothy P. O'Reilly, Esq. (Morgan, Lewis, Bockius), Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, for the Respondent.

Robert M. Baptiste, Esq. (Baptiste & Wilder), of Washington, D.C., for the Charging Party.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

KARL H. BUSCHMANN, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried in Buffalo, New York, on 11 and 15 December 1986. The charge in Case 3-CA-13439-2 was filed by International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL-CIO[1], Local Union No. 791, Local Union No. 687, Local Union No. 182, Local Union No. 316, Local Union No. 529, Local Union No. 669, Local Union No. 693, and Local Union No. 648[2] (Local Unions) on 8 October 1986. The complaint, dated 22 October 1986, and amended 29 October 1986 and 11 December 1986, alleges that the Respondent, Stroehmann Bakeries, Inc. violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) and Section 8(d) of the National Labor Relations Act by refusing to execute the collective-bargaining agreement reached 14 November 1985. The Respondent filed its answer on 10 November 1986, admitting certain allegations, including the jurisdictional and supervisory aspects of the complaint and denying the substantive allegations that it violated the Act.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel, the Union, and the Company, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

The Company, Stroehmann Bakeries, Inc., is a Delaware corporation, with an office and place of business in Williamsport, Pennsylvania, and plants throughout New York State. It is engaged in the manufacture and wholesale sale of bakery products and is admittedly an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of the Act.

The Charging Parties (Locals 791, 687, 182, 316, 529, 669, 693, and 648) are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act. The various Local Unions have in the past negotiated jointly as the Upstate Bakery Council with the Respondent on a multiemployer basis, which, in addition to Stroehmann, included Continental Baking Company [Continental] and Interstate Brands Corporation [Interstate]. Once agreement was reached between the parties on a multiemployer and multilocal level, each Company executed a separate collective-bargaining agreement with the Local Union that represented the Company's employees.

[3] See American Steel Line Co., 210 NLRB 811, 814 (1974).

[4] In light of this finding, we find it unnecessary to address the judge's conclusion that Sec. 8(d) is not applicable to a binding interim agreement.

[5] We agree with the judge's finding that the Local Unions were under no contractual prohibition against striking and therefore their threat of a lawful strike did not constitute duress or in any way vitiate the validity of the Respondent's consent to the final collective-bargaining agreement.

[1] On 1 November 1987 the Teamsters International Union was readmitted to the AFL-CIO. Accordingly, the name of the International has been amended to reflect that change.

[2] The complaint was amended 29 October 1986 by adding Locals 693 and 648.

The collective-bargaining agreements in effect from 1982 to 1985 expired on 30 March 1985, and negotiations for new agreements commenced in March 1985 between the Employers and the Local Unions. The Unions were represented by Harold Ulrich from Local 182 as the main spokesman,[3] assisted by William Phillips from Local 791 and Robert Dietrich from the Eastern Conference of Teamsters. Charles Caffrey, senior vice president and general counsel of Stroehmann, and Harry Graham, area labor relations manager of Continental, reperesented the three Companies.[4] Their efforts were directed at drafting a collective-bargaining agreement to be effective from 1 April 1985 to 31 March 1988.

On 13 June 1985 the parties had reached an agreement on five items and signed a document that Caffrey had prepared in handwritten form (G.C. Exh. 7). The five items dealt with health benefits, severance pay, vacation pay, breakdown time, and job security. The last item was, according to Caffrey, the most important issue raised by the Local Unions.

The agreement provided, inter alia, "These changes will be incorporated into any agreement entered into by the parties following July 31, 1985." As contemplated by the express terms of the June agreement, the parties met again on 31 July 1985 to resume negotiations on a final agreement with the presence of Richard Cook, industrial relations manager for Interstate.

The next negotiation meeting occurred on 11 September 1985. By that time, Stroehmann had agreed to buy from Interstate its Millbrook, Dolly Madison Division. The sale became effective 12 October 1985. At the September meeting, it was agreed that the terms of the June agreement would also be applicable to Interstate employees.

Of great importance during these negotiations was the issue of job security because of a trend to convert employee-operated delivery routes to owner-operated routes. The provision in the June agreement that prohibited the Companies from converting their drivers to independent contractors until 31 March 1986 was designed to deal with that issue.

The parties met in October after Stroehmann's acquisition of Interstate's Dolly Madison Division. At that time, and at subsequent meetings, the Local Unions made it clear that they had revised their position on the issue of job security, and that they were demanding added job security. On 6 November 1985, union negotiators Dietrich and Phillips specifically urged the companies' representatives Caffrey and Graham that the job-security provision in the 13 June 1985 agreement be changed to provide "protection for the full term of the contract." Graham testified that he was apprehensive about a strike if they did not change the job-security provision of the June agreement. This was confirmed by Caffrey, who testified that they either agree to the change or there would be a strike. About that time, the Union voted strike.

Caffrey was unable to attend the next meeting scheduled for 14 November 1985. He directed Stroehmann's personnel director, Joseph Giunta, to attend the negotiation and to protect the Company's interest. Graham had informed Caffrey in advance of the meeting of provisions of the proposal that Graham was about to offer and Caffrey instructed Giunta to sign the proposed agreement. At the meeting, Graham offered Continental's proposed contract that contained the four provisions of the June agreement. The fifth provision dealing with job security had been changed. With minor modification, the proposal offered by Graham was signed by the parties in attendance, including Giunta on behalf of Stroehmann. The agreement, as signed, was subsequently ratified by the union membership.

Subsequent developments showed that Stroehmann refused to be bound by the agreement. First, Stroehmann refused to sign the agreement in its final form with the Local Unions; furthermore, Stroehmann informed the Local Unions that it had withdrawn from the multiemployer negotiations; and Stroehmann filed a charge with the National Labor Relations Board against the Local Unions for their failure to give proper notice under Section 8(d), when they changed the terms of the June agreement.

Analysis

According to the complaint, the Respondent's refusal to execute the September agreement amounted to a failure to bargain in good faith in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 8(d) of the Act. In support, the General Counsel argues that the June agreement was merely a "tentative agreement" which was changed "through lawful economic pressure" in the course of subsequent negotiations, and that the final agreement was reached on 14 November. The Union similarly argues that the June agreement "did not constitute a final and binding immutable agreement" but a tentative agreement subject to change as negotiations continued. The Respondent's failure to execute the agreement reached on 14 November was, according to the Union, a willful violation of the Act.

The Respondent argues that the parties had reached a final agreement on the most important issue—job security—on 13 June 1985, and that Stroehmann's signing of the November memorandum under threat of a selective strike is ineffective to constitute a voluntary agreement to reopen negotiations on the job-security issue. The Respondent states that the June agreement was not a progress report, and that the Local Unions had no right to modify the June agreement under Section 8(d) of the Act without proper notice.

Under Section 8(a)(5) of the Act, it is an unfair labor practice to refuse to bargain collectively, and Section 8(d) of the Act requires "the execution of a written contract incorporating any agreement reached if requested by either party." The failure to sign a written memorandum of the agreement reached between the parties constitutes a per se refusal to bargain. H. J. Heinz Co. v. NLRB, 311 U.S. 514, 525 (1941), NLRB v. Midvalley

[3] Ulrich died prior to the hearing.

[4] Interstate did not initially participate in the negotiations until Richard Cook, its industrial relations manager, appeared at the meetings in July 1985.

Steel Fabricators, 243 NLRB 516 (1979), enfd. 621 F.2d 49 (2d Cir. 1980).

The evidence here shows that the Respondent had signed the November agreement, but that it refused to execute the final collective-bargaining agreements with the individual Local Unions, claiming that the June agreement was the final agreement on the five issues, including the job-security provision. Whether the Respondent was justified in its failure to execute the final agreement with the Local Unions on this basis requires a determination whether the November agreement constitutes a valid contract.

In determining whether parties agreed to a contract, the Board is not bound by technical questions of traditional contract interpretations. Rather, the Board is free to use general contract principles adapted to the collective-bargaining context to determine whether the two sides have reached an agreement. NLRB v. Electra-Food Machinery, 621 F.2d 956, 958 (9th Cir. 1980), NLRB v. World Evangelism, Inc., 656 F.2d 1349, 1355 (9th Cir. 1981). To be sure, there is no dispute that following negotiations over a 3-month period all parties agreed on 13 June 1985 to five provisions. On that day, Caffrey, representing Respondent Stroehmann Bakeries, drafted a memorandum agreement (G.C. Exh. 7). That document, in handwritten form, was signed by Caffrey for Stroehmann, Graham for Continental Baking Co., and Harold K. Ulrich on behalf of the Local Unions. It is also clear from the testimony, and from the document itself that it was not intended as the final contract. Caffrey testified as follows about the significance of that agreement: "I regard it as a final settlement of those five issues, and that there was agreement that those five items would be included in any agreement executed thereafter." This testimony and the document itself makes no provisions for pay or any other issue that shows a final and comprehensive contract was contemplated. This agreement was more than a "progress report" and can properly be characterized as an interim settlement on certain issues. This is confirmed by the express language in the initial paragraph that states, inter alia: "These changes will be incorporated into any agreement entered into by the parties following July 31, 1985." Clearly, the parties contemplated further negotiations and intended to incorporate the five provisions into their final agreement.[8] Indeed, following further meetings between the parties, all the provisions, except one, were incorporated into the final agreement. For example, proviso 1 of the June document, dealing with health and welfare benefits, became paragraph 14 in the November agreement; proviso 2 regarding severance pay was adopted as paragraph 1 of the final agreement; the vacation pay provision, proviso 3, in the June memorandum, became paragraph 2 in the final document; and proviso 4, dealing with breakdown time, became paragraph 3 in the November agreement. The last paragraph of the June agreement concerning job security was changed. The reason that the provision did not appear in the November agreement was that Dietrich, speaking for the Local Union, was dissatisfied with it and informed Caffrey during meetings in October and early November that the job-security provision was unacceptable. In this regard, Caffrey testified as follows: "[The Union] changed its position with respect to the so-called job security provision and from that moment on, the union wanted to jettison that part of the June 13th agreement and replace it with a provision that would tie the parties to a prohibition against conversion to owner/operators for the term of the agreement."

The new provision dealing with job security was initially proposed by Graham because he was concerned about a strike by the Union. He read the language over the telephone to Caffrey. Although he believed that Continental and the Union had reached the agreement behind his back, Caffrey instructed Giunta to sign the agreement on 14 November. Significantly, there is no suggestion that Giunta was either unauthorized to represent the Respondent or that he did not know the significance of what he was signing. To the contrary, Caffrey had been made aware prior to the meeting that the new provision would be the subject of negotiations, and specifically instructed Giunta to protect the Company's interest and to sign the document. The Respondent's conduct in this regard differed with that of the parties in Heavy Contractors Assn. v. Hod Carriers Local 1140, 312 F.Supp. 1345 (D. Neb. 1969), affd. 430 F.2d 1350 (8th Cir. 1970), a case relied on by the Respondent. There, the parties had reached an agreement and "discussed modification but never agreed to modify or to reopen or to be bound by subsequent negotiations." The court recognized that following an agreement, the "parties are free, if they wish, to discuss wage changes but are not required to do so." Under the facts in the present case, the parties were free to discuss changes in the agreement reached on 13 June 1985 and to change the agreement by mutual consent. Accordingly, although I agree with the Respondent that the June document constituted a binding settlement, the parties were free to change it by mutual consent. The Respondent's conduct leaves no doubt that it was aware of the dissatisfaction of the Local Unions with the job-security provision. The Respondent knowingly and willingly negotiated a final agreement containing a changed job-security provision and the parties signed the agreement. It is well settled that the acceptance of a final offer of a bargaining agreement manifests mutual assent, creating a binding bargaining agreement, and therefore triggers the duty to execute a written contract on request embodying that agreement. NLRB v. Electra-Food Machinery, 621 F.2d 956, 958 (9th Cir. 1980); NLRB v. H. Koch & Sons, 578 F.2d 1287, 1291 (9th Cir. 1978). Moreover, the notice requirement of Section 8(d) was not applicable to the June agreement, since it was not the final "collective-bargaining contract."

The Respondent's final argument that it is not bound by the contract because it signed the final agreement under the threat of a strike is not convincing. Because the collective-bargaining agreement had expired, the Local Unions were under no contractual prohibition to strike. It has long been settled that the threat of a lawful strike does not constitute duress or vitiates a collective-bargaining agreement. 13 Williston, Contracts, § 1617A (3d ed. 1970).

[8] The parties reaffirmed their agreement on the five issues on 11 September 1985, when the parties signed an agreement whereby Stroehmann agreed to apply the June agreement to the facilities purchased from Interstate (R. Exh. 12).

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Stroehmann Bakeries, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL-CIO, Local Union No. 791, Local Union No. 687, Local Union No. 182, Local Union No. 316, Local Union No. 529, Local Union No. 669, Local Union No. 693, and Local Union No. 648 are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The following employees of the Respondent constitute units appropriate for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All driver-salesmen employed by Respondent within the geographic jurisdiction of each Local named above.

4. By failing and refusing to execute the collective-bargaining agreement reached on 14 November 1985, the Respondent failed and refused to bargain collectively and in good faith with the representatives of its employees, and violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) and Section 8(d) of the Act.

5. The unfair labor practices of the Respondent as described affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. More specifically, having found that the Respondent failed to bargain in good faith, I shall issue a bargaining order and an order to sign the agreement reached on 16 November 1985.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[6]

ORDER

The Respondent, Stroehmann Bakeries, Inc., Williamsport, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Failing and refusing to bargain with International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL-CIO, Local Union No. 791, Local Union No. 687, Local Union No. 182, Local Union No. 316, Local Union No. 529, Local Union No. 669, Local Union No. 693, and Local Union No. 648 with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other terms and conditions of employment.

(b) Failing or refusing to execute the final agreement reached on 14 November 1985 with representatives of the Local Unions.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request, bargain with the Local Unions as the exclusive representatives of the employees in the appropriate bargaining units described below with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other terms and conditions of employment.

> All driver-salesmen employed by Respondent within the geographic jurisdiction of each Local named above.

(b) Execute the collective-bargaining agreement reached on 14 November 1985 with the Local Unions.

(c) Post at is facility in Williamsport, Pennsylvania, and its plants in New York State copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[7] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 3, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in consipicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.
